EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LET THE RECORD SPEAK ON ACID PRECIPITATION

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, over the past few years, we have heard a great deal on the causes and effects of acid precipitation. This issue alone, aside from budgetary matters, has created the greatest amount of misinformation during the 97th Congress. During the course of our deliberations on this important issue, I have made every attempt to stick with scientific data rather than unsubstantiated claims regarding the environmental impacts of this phenomenon.

It is my hope that the record we have established during this Congress will show that science does not support a massive regulatory program aimed at reducing acid precipitation at this time. Rather, the preponderance of scientific information supports continued and accelerated study of the causes and effects of acid precipitation before final judgment can be made on how best to combat its impacts.

Many assumptions on the causes and effects of acid rain have been made by control proponents; assumptions which I question are valid. These assumptions have also been addressed by various scientific panels, among them:

Prof. Kenneth Rahn, of the University of Rhode Island, found in a study attempting to identify sources of sulfates and nitrates in New Jersey and New England that a much larger proportion came from local sources than was previously thought. This calls into question the basic thesis of the bill: that Mideastern coal-burning facilities are responsible for the acid deposition in the Northeast. Senator MITCHELL tried to shake Professor Rahn from his statement, but the Rhode Island scientist refused to alter his position.

Prof. Volker Mohnen, director of the Atmospheric Sciences Research Center in Albany, N.Y., argued forcefully in the Environment and Public Works Committee hearings that there is no linear relationship between sulfur dioxide emission reductions and acid rain in the Eastern United States. Professor Mohnen indicated that the limiting factor in the formation of acid rain is not the ambient concentration of sulfur dioxide, but the availability of oxidizing agents which determine the rate of conversion.

A technical panel sponsored by the Department of Energy, the State Department's advisory committee on environmental affairs, and the previously published Jason report of SRI International, all support the thesis that factors other than sulfur dioxide concentrations control the rate at which acid rain is formed.

A more recent draft study by Dr. Perry Samson, of the University of Michigan (for OTA), indicates the importance of nitrogen oxide and hydrocarbons in determining the sulfuric component of acid rain. This study, as well as Dr. Mohnen's work, make it appear that the production of acid rain in the Eastern United States may be insensitive to the ambient sulfur dioxide concentrations. Hence, a reduction in sulfur dioxide emissions, even one as large and costly as that proposed by the Environment and Public Works Committee, may produce no measurable decrease in acid rain in the sensitive areas of the Northeast.

A more recent study by the Edison Electric Institute (EEI) of data furnished by the State of New York shows a shift toward lower levels of acidity in Adirondack lakes during 1980 and 1981.

Similarly, a just-published report by the U.S. Geological Survey, based on the most extensive monitoring data available of trends in the acidity of precipitation and surface waters in New York, shows either no change or a slight decrease in acidity between 1965 and 1978.

Notwithstanding the domestic controversy on acid precipitation, much has been said on how this issue affects United States-Canadian relations. At this point, I would like to share with my colleagues remarks made by Carl Bagge, president of the National Coal Association, before the 64th annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association on August 30, 1982, in Toronto. While Mr. Bagge obviously has a vested interest in seeing that acid precipitation controls are not enacted, I believe his remarks contain a great deal of merit with respect to what both nations are doing to address this issue. His remarks are as follows:

REMARKS OF CARL BAGGE

"Geography has made us neighbors. History has made us friends. Economics has made us partners. And necessity has made us allies."

John Kennedy's words to the Canadian Parliament in 1961 ring true today. For we cannot repeal our unique partnership, our friendship, and our economic kinship.

Rowland Frazee, Chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada, recently put it this way: "We cannot change Canada's close and intricate relationship with our major trading partner, the United States. Our recession and our recovery are tied to theirs . . . In most major ways," he added, "events here depend on events there."

That's why the acid rain issue cannot be separated from economics—from the most far-reaching air quality program proposed in American history. And that's why the effects of this proposal on both our economies is part of my message today.

For it's the recognition of these effects that leads directly to the still unanswered scientific questions so closely tied to the acid rain issue. They are not a "smokescreen" as we hear so often from Ottawa. Scientific understanding—not wishful thinking, not political slogans—is the foundation for sound solutions to both human and environmental problems. And it's answers to these scientific questions that have to steer the acid rain course of our two great nations.

There are at least three plausible explanations of acid rain.

One, the "local-source" theory, holds that emissions don't regularly travel long distances before falling as dry particles or wet precipitation. Instead, acid rainfall is caused principally by sulfur and nitrogen oxides from local sources.

Also, many scientists believe that these pollutants serve as raw materials, which are converted into acid compounds by other oxidizing chemicals. Under this "catalytic theory," it's not the amount of sulfur and nitrogen oxides in the atmosphere, but the oxidants which make possible the acid content of rainfall.

Two weeks ago, the Battelle Institute announced that its scientists believe a vital chemical link to acid rain has been found—a catalyst that's common in urban smog. Battelle says that this potential breakthrough opens up an entirely new area of research.

Yet, it's the "coal plant-long transport" theory which is touted as the single cause. It's accepted by some politicians on both sides of the border, and often reported as fact by the media in Canada and the United States.

As this theory goes, acid rain is caused when sulfur dioxide from Midwestern coal-fired plants mixes with nitrogen oxides. These effluents are sent on the winds hundreds of miles where they fall as acid rain on parts of the Northeastern United States and Canada. Emissions from coal plants allegedly are directly involved in lake acidification and fish kills, harming vegetation, and linked to some human health problems.

Three theories, three possible answers, but we believe the jury is still out. I ask you to consider some of the reasons:

Scientists haven't found any sound evidence of acid rain damage to vegetation in the natural environment, and no direct link between acid rain and human health problems has been confirmed. Clearly, the most important scientific question at issue is whether there's a direct cause and effect relationship among sulfur dioxide from coal plants, acid rain, and ecosystem damage.

The recent National Academy of Sciences study, called "Atmosphere-Biosphere Interactions," is the most widely-quoted in support of this theory—basing its findings on "overwhelming circumstantial evidence."

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

One reason is the statement found on page 182: "Acid rain, due to further oxidation of sulfur and nitrogen oxides . . . from anthropogenic (man-made) sources," the author wrote, . . . "is causing widespread damage to ecosystems . . ." But here's what the same author wrote on page 142: ". . . direct cause and effect linkages between sources of acids and effects on ecosystems will not be possible for the foreseeable future."

Not even the most skillful form of press agentry can reconcile internal conflicts like these. Based on the second statement, it's impossible to draw a direct cause and effect relationship between coal plants and acid rain.

The mystery doesn't end there. Central to the "long-transport" theory is the hypothesis that effluents are travelling hundreds of miles where they are falling as acid rain in Canada and the United States.

But as it turns out, American and Canadian scientists can track emissions from a particular source only about 30 miles, not hundreds of miles. Since this is so, scientists from both nations are using computer models to help track effluents much longer distances.

The problem is, there's insufficient long-term rainfall monitoring data of reliable quality. What's more, scientists are having difficulty modeling the complexities of atmospheric phenomena, which are known to affect effluent movements. This means that the statements pinpointing how much acid rain is coming from the United States, and how much pollution is of local or distant origin, are purely hypothetical and theoretical.

Last year, in a Los Angeles Times story, an official of the Ontario Ministry of Environment admitted that computer modeling is only a "useful guideline" to help find out what's happening in the atmosphere over one year. Computer guidelines are useful. But they aren't a scientifically-proved method. And there's no justification for using these guidelines, however useful, as the basis for a multi-billion dollar regulatory program, regardless of what you've been led to believe.

One acid rain theory, as you'll recall, holds that local sources are possibly to blame for acid rain. But acid rain theorists on both sides of the border seem to get an advanced case of myopia when local sources are suggested as a possible cause of lake acidification. A case in point in the INCO smelter.

The INCO smelter is the world's largest. It's sending nearly one million tons of sulfur dioxide into the air each year from a "superstack" taller than the Sears Tower. That's one to three percent of all sulfur dioxide in the Western Hemisphere.

Yet, we read and hear that thousands of Canadian lakes are increasingly "sensitive" to acid rain from the United States. Press reports claim that by century's end 50,000 lakes "may" be dead.

Let's look at what's actually happening, rather than what might happen. A "sensitive" lake isn't an affected lake. The Canadian lakes so far identified as dead are a tiny fraction of the half-million lakes in this vast country. What's more, many of these dead lakes are found in the Sudbury area—the INCO smelter's backyard.

Canadians aren't the only ones who are looking past local pollution sources. The same myopia persists among "long-transport" theorists in the United States. The acid rain bill reported out of the Senate Environment Committee, for example, essentially ignores sulfur dioxide from oil-burning plants, and for all intents and purposes controls only coal-burning plants in 31 states on or east of the Mississippi River.

Kentucky and New York have roughly the same overall sulfur dioxide emissions. Yet, Kentucky—a large coal-burning state—would have to cut its emissions four times as much as New York—an oil-burning state.

The American coal industry isn't making light of acid rain. Acidified lakes are real, not imagined. And we are keenly aware of the economic implications of damage to Canada's environment. But inflammatory rhetoric can't replace unvarnished facts. Above all, let's get our facts straight.

There's no doubt that a large percentage of sulfur dioxide in the United States is produced from man-made sources. But if the "coal plant-long-distance transport" theory is to hold water, as sulfur dioxide levels go down, so should acid rain.

Yet, scientists aren't even sure if acid rain is increasing or decreasing. In the longest-running survey of rainfall in the United States, the United States Geological Survey found virtually no change in rainfall acidity in New York State over 13 years beginning in 1965. This is significant, because New York is one of the most often-mentioned targets of acid rain damage.

Also, EPA is reporting a 40 percent drop in sulfur dioxide concentrations over the past ten years, and a 15 percent drop in sulfur dioxide emissions in the Ohio River Basin—the alleged source of Canada's acid rain.

These cuts are all the more impressive, for as sulfur dioxide levels were falling, electric generation in the United States was rising from 888 billion kilowatt-hours to 1.4 trillion kilowatt-hours—a 56 percent jump. During that same time, coal burning by America's electric utilities shot up 65 percent.

In light of these trends, we are dismayed at Ottawa's charge that the United States isn't doing its fair share to curb air pollution. Over the past ten years, American industry—and ultimately consumers—spent nearly $160 billion on air pollution control. We are doing an outstanding job removing pollutants from our plants and our automobiles.

This doesn't imply that the coal industry has supported every tenet of America's clean air laws, any more than the Canadian Provinces welcome every pronouncement by the Ottawa Government.

It means that American people are paying willingly but dearly for clean air—some $14 billion each year to keep the Clean Air Act in force. And it's simply wrong-headed for Ottawa to suggest that our industry and our government are "footdragging" on cleaning the air, or that our government's actions aren't reflecting the wishes of the American public.

We find these allegations even harder to take, given the Ottawa Government's continued heralding of its pollution-control efforts. Again, let's look at the record.

One good example are pollution controls at the INCO smelter. These controls are offered by Canada's Environment Minister, John Roberts, and others as evidence of Canada's good faith to meet its obligations on what's called a "two way street."

In a recent interview, Mr. Roberts said that the smelter's emissions have been cut from 3,500 tons per day to 2,500 tons. "This is a significant step," he said. I agree, but how were these reductions made? Mr. Roberts gave the answer: "It was done successfully at the sacrifice of potential production at the world's largest smelter."

Isn't this a perverse kind of progress? I doubt the Canadian people—particularly in the Sudbury area where unemployment is reported at 40 percent—relish more pollution controls at the expense of this nation's already-flagging industrial performance.

The coal industry and the American people will never support clean air progress through economic stagnation. We aren't "backing away" from clean air goals. But we are also supporting greater economic growth—more jobs, and better paychecks for the working people of our country. And it's this tandem goal that's at the heart of our efforts to streamline the Clean Air Act.

And, we should remember that the United States Clean Air Act is still the world's most effective. Unlike Canada, our federally-mandated clean air laws are enforced vigorously with civil penalties and the cutoff of federal funds.

Just as important, the Clean Air Act continues to benefit both our countries. New Source Performance Standards are in force. So, as new coal plants go into service, replacing older, less efficient ones, the air will get progressively cleaner—even in the face of quickened economic growth.

On the other hand, the proponents of tighter sulfur dioxide controls got a lot of mileage out of Ontario Hydro's decision to build two scrubbers. According to press reports, an Ontario Hydro official said the building of scrubbers would likely have a "multiplier effect." In short, if Ontario Hydro "bit the bullet," perhaps utilities in the United States would jump on the bandwagon.

I'm not sure what the gentleman means. For there are already 87 scrubbers in the United States at a cost of $4 billion, plus an annual cost of $1.7 billion to keep them operating. Thirty five more scrubbers are under construction. And EPA is reporting that half of all America's coal-burning units will be outfitted with scrubbers in less than 20 years. Canada, I am quick to add, has yet to build a single utility scrubber.

I've also heard talk that Ottawa's much touted acid rain program is a ploy to increase electric power exports to the United States, which last year brought in several million dollars.

Mr. George Rejohn of the Canadian Embassy in Washington recently said, "Such silly inventions and distortions do not merit serious nor thoughtful attention."

I agree. We don't accept these conspiracy theories. But can you blame people for wondering, when Ontario Hydro cancels its first two scrubbers, and admits the decision came after the loss of potential power sales to General Public Utilities?

When you step back and take a long, hard look at all the evidence, it comes down to this: The causes and effects of acid rain are unknown. America has the best clean air record in the world. We've spent billions of dollars on clean air, and billions more are committed. Yet, despite all this—despite the sacrifices—the acid rain theorists, including the Ottawa Government, say it's not enough.

We are asked to embrace the potentially most burdensome regulatory program in American history, and are expected to have guilt feelings if we resist.

Mr. Roberts summed up the Canadian Government's view this way: American calls for more acid rain research are like saying: "We need to know which mosquitoes are carrying malaria before we clean up the swamp."

I would only remind the honorable gentleman of Lord George's famous warning. He said: "It is very dangerous to leap a chasm in two bounds."

Can the coal industry—and the American people—possibly look past the chasm of scientific doubt and make a leap of faith to accept what in reality is a 12-million ton cut in sulfur dioxide over the next 12 years? How can we when the Department of Energy is predicting costs to industry and consumers of as much as $300 billion—over and above the present Clean Air Act—in the next 30 years? Shouldn't we be angry when electric rates in some parts of the United States are expected to rise 100 percent, placing an awesome burden on consumers, who already are strapped by the high cost-of-living?

Why shouldn't we fight this legislation? According to the United Mine Workers of America, the jobs of 89,000 mining industry employees and 225,000 jobs in related industries would be affected. Total income loss would be $6.6 billion per year. These job losses would hit in Northern Appalachia and the Midwest areas where unemployment is at 10 percent or more.

The coal industry will stand fast in opposition to this bill and let me make the reason crystal clear: Even with the billions of dollars spent, the jobs lost, and the crushing effects on our economy, there's not the slightest assurance that the acidity of rain will be affected.

Yet, when the coal industry and the U.S. Government through its State Department point to the lack of acid rain evidence, the enormous costs and job losses, we are accused by your acid rain Minister in Ottawa of engaging in "informational haze." What's more, the Ottawa Government is expressing "outrage" at our attitude, and predicts a worsening of relations between our two countries unless we come to our senses. Frankly, I believe the "outrage" is misplaced, and it's not just the weakness of the case for acid rain controls.

Your Government is openly proud of the millions of dollars spent in lobbying our Congress to enact acid ran controls. The Ottawa Government apparently believes that these tactics are successful. For after the acid rain bill was reported out of the Senate Public Works and Environmental Committee, it was followed by speeches in the Canadian Parliament calling the action a "great breakthrough."

But let's not let our wishes become the father of our thoughts. As reasonable men and women, do you actually believe that a majority of Congressman and Senators from the 31 affected states will support a bill that imposes such massive electric rate increases on their consumers with no assurance of benefit?

Is there likely to be much support for a bill that would have such devasting human dimensions, and such crucial implications for the revitalization of America's industrial and commercial heartland?

Acid rain is based on the theory of gravitation—that what goes up must come down. But don't forget Newton's law, which says: For every action there's an equal and opposite reaction. And we are reacting.

Calling to mind what Rowland Frazee said about the close and intricate relationship of our two economies, let there be no doubt: if this legislation becomes a part of the Clean Air Act, the higher energy costs, the job losses and severe overall economic effects will also affect this side of the border.

What's more, if this bill is part of the Clean Air Act, the chances are good that there will be no change in the law. This means, very frankly, that the efforts to streamline this Act—while preserving both economic growth and clean air goals—will be lost, also to the detriment of both our nations.

There is a reasonable course, and I urge you to consider it. The American coal industry believes deeply that acid rain research must be accelerated, and we are in good company.

Two weeks ago, a federal task force set up under the Acid Precipitation Act of 1980, called for more research to fill the "major gaps" of information about the causes and effects of acid rain.

Several bills are pending in Congress which would build a strong acid rain research foundation.

One bill of considerable merit, which would step up research, is sponsored by Senator Robert C. Byrd, the Senate Democratic Leader. In the House of Representatives a similar legislative approach is sponsored by Congressman Edward Madigan. His bill was approved by the House Energy and Commerce Committee by an overwhelming 27-5 margin. And, I might add, it is the only acid rain legislation approved by the House.

These bills call for more acid rain research beyond the three-year $64-million commitment of the Reagan Administration, and would augment the $32 million already spent or earmarked by the American Utility Industry.

A key element of the House bill is to restore existing acidified lakes with liming, and other methods known to be effective.

Acid rain may well be a serious problem for our two countries. But we must be certain that the cures that are prescribed actually works, that it doesn't have the side-effects of greater economic adversity and a worsening of relations between our two great nations.

How can we allow the acid rain issue to undermine the trust and cooperation between Canada and the United States, which has flourished for nearly 200 years? I urge the thoughtful members of the Canadian bench and bar through this organization to send a message to your public officials. Good common sense must replace strident rhetoric.

I'm no diplomat. But it doesn't take a statesman to see the need for voices to be lowered, and for thoughtful consideration to begin. We need to get this issue out of politics and public relations and into the laboratory where it belongs!

Let me close with these thoughts.

Churchill once said, "The farther backward you can look, the farther forward you can see." His admonition applies to the United States of America.

For many years, our domestic policy was fueled with a spirit of action, despite the financial costs. We sent men to the moon and brought them safely back to earth. We opened our hearts and our treasury to help create a better life for millions of our people. And we are still waging a war to protect the health and safety of our citizens, and to preserve a legacy of environmental quality.

We've had a large measure of success, but we've also learned some lessons from experience. For far more could have been accomplished, at far less cost, if we had tempered our burning desire to act with a proper understanding of what we were trying to get done.

Armed with the lessons of history, we are optimistic about the future—about finding solutions to both our human and environmental problems—and with good reason.

America has no lack of scientific genius. We have some of the world's best minds. America doesn't lack political will. Our record in building one of the greatest societies on earth is beyond question. And we suffer from no lack of spirit. The flame of desire to forge a better life for our children and grandchildren still burns brightly.

Yet, the acid rain debate brings into sharper focus on overriding challenge facing America. We must find a way to face the future with a relatively diminishing amount of financial resources. Like it or not, these hard choices must be made in the years to come.

This doesn't imply that the United States is ready to set aside any of its national goals. Far from it. But it means that we must meet all our goals with the resources at our command without sacrificing any one of them.

Clean air is one of America's goals. But it isn't the only one. We must also produce more energy at reasonable cost—energy needed to build economic growth and development which serves all our people. We can do it only by tackling our many goals in an efficient, and a cost-effective way, and with a full understanding that greater use of coal is essential to our success.

That's why our government—and your government—must understand the full dimensions of acid rain, before creating more bureaucracy, more costs, and an uncertain economic future for our people.

But it isn't just economic uncertainty that's at stake for our two nations. For I remind you again of what John Kennedy said to the Canadian Parliament nearly two decades ago: "Geography has made us neighbors. History has made us friends. Economics has made us partners. And necessity has made us allies."

Then the President added this thought: "What nature hath so joined, let no man put asunder."

I hope, and I pray God we don't forget it.●

UNITED STATES AND THE U.S.S.R. DISCUSS REDUCTIONS IN NUCLEAR ARMS

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, yesterday's Los Angeles Times carried an interesting report on the status of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. strategic arms reduction talks currently underway in Geneva. While I am not privy to the details of these talks, and cannot verify the accuracy of this report, I must tell my colleagues that this news report is worth reading.

I think the time is rapidly approaching when the sincerity of the U.S. negotiating position will have to be proven. I sincerely hope our Nation demonstrates its good faith in these nuclear arms talks, and gets on with the deescalation of the nuclear arms race.

The news article follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Sept. 13, 1982]

U.S. WEIGHS SURPRISING SOVIET OFFER ON A-ARMS

(By Robert C. Toth)

WASHINGTON.—In its counterproposal to President Reagan's call for drastic strategic arms reductions, the Soviet Union has made a surprisingly forthcoming offer, according to U.S. officials—an offer that would cut Moscow's own missile and bomber force by 25% and the U.S. arsenal by 10%.

The Soviet move, presented at the new strategic arms reduction talks (START) in Geneva before the mid-August recess, has created a sharp division among U.S. analysts. Some see it as a sign of serious negotiating intent by Moscow. Others consider it a sophisticated ploy to buy time until domestic and international pressures force the United States to accept a compromise the Soviets would find more favorable to them.

As a result, Administration officials are approaching the Soviet formula with great caution.

"The Soviets are always less willing to consider deep reductions in their forces" than the United States, Fred C. Ikle, under secretary of defense for policy, said. "They seem somewhat less reluctant now than previously, and to that extent I'd say they appear relatively serious about the negotiations."

In a speech last May at his alma mater, Eureka College in Illinois, Reagan called for cuts of almost 65 percent in the Soviet missile strength and 50 percent in U.S. forces—down to a common ceiling of 850 missiles each. He excluded bombers and cruise missiles.

The Soviet proposal calls for a maximum of 1,800 missiles and bombers on each side, according to U.S. officials. It also calls for:

—Curbs on the giant new missile-carrying submarines being developed by both nations.

A total ban or limits on cruise missiles.

Extension of "confidence-building" measures such as giving advance warning of missile test flights.

While the Soviet offer is unacceptable as it now stands, U.S. officials said, the extent of the proposals surprised most American specialists. The Soviets had been expected "only (to) nibble at our proposal this year," as one Administration official said, while they sized up new Secretary of State George P. Shultz and waited for maneuvering over the Kremlin's leadership succession to end.

Not all Administration officials are convinced that the Soviet proposal is significant, however.

"The Soviets have done nothing more than throw (Jimmy) Carter's 1977 plan back at us," complained one official critical of the offer. "It's as if that's the most radical idea they are capable of."

In March, 1977, the Carter Administration proposed cutbacks on both sides to a common ceiling of between 1,800 and 2,000 weapons. Moscow immediately rejected the idea, but there have been recurring reports that it later regretted having done so.

The 1977 plan was shelved by the Carter Administration after the Soviet rejection, and the two sides went on to conclude the more modest second strategic arms limitation treaty, dubbed SALT II. The treaty was never ratified, however. Reagan has called it "fatally flawed," even while promising not to violate its provisions.

The new Soviet proposal has been also criticized as a mixture of "warmed-over" ideas rejected during the SALT II negotiations, along with predictable extensions of that agreement. SALT II had projected significant reductions in superpower arsenals in a SALT III treaty.

But the more optimistic view—held by a minority of U.S. analysts—is that the Soviets have made a significant overture. U.S. officials in this camp see the Soviet offer for reductions to 1,800 weapons, as well as the implicit call for some limit on total warheads for those weapons, as accepting two key principles in the Reagan plan. (Reagan called for a limit of 5,000 warheads on both sides, a cut of one-third in existing arsenals.)

"Obviously no breakthrough is imminent in the START talks," one White House aide said, "but the Soviets have certainly not closed the door to serious negotiations with this offer."

As the two proposals now stand, in terms of weapons coming into the U.S. arsenal, the Soviets want to ban or limit weapons they most fear—cruise missiles and the highly accurate D-5 ballistic missiles to be deployed on the giant Trident submarines—without making any concession to U.S. fears of specific Soviet weapon systems.

Reagan's proposal, for its part, sought much the same in reverse. It would curb just those Soviet weapons that could launch a successful surprise attack against U.S. weapons and command centers—Soviet land-based intercontinental missiles, particularly the SS-18 ICMBs with their large payloads and high accuracy—without taking into account Soviet fears of U.S. weapons.

Neither attitude is unexpected at the start of negotiations. But some U.S. officials consider it surprising that the Soviets proposed substantial cutbacks as their opening position at this juncture.

These officials say they are surprised for two reasons.

First, Moscow must be uncertain—since most U.S. officials are uncertain—whether Reagan will ultimately be willing to make the inevitable compromises between the two positions to achieve a new treaty. In the same way, Shultz's views on arms control and his influence at the White House are still largely unknown.

Second, with the Kremlin leadership in transition, contenders for the job now held by President Leonid I. Brezhnev are expected to be reluctant to make arms reduction offers that might alienate the powerful Soviet military, whose support they would need in the succession maneuvers.

Given this situation, one Pentagon official said, "the Soviet offer seems to indicate they are at least as serious about a new arms agreement at this point as we are."

Whatever the Soviet motives, the proposal that was made still has many blank spaces that U.S. diplomats will want to fill in when the START talks resume in Geneva on Oct. 6.

Chief among the questions is how the Soviets would divide up the 1,800 weapons among land-based and submarine-based missiles, bombers and cruise missiles, particularly what limits they would put on their own land-based ICBMs.

The Soviet proposal also calls for a total ban on cruise missiles before they are deployed. Soviet diplomats reminded American negotiators that if the SALT I treaty had banned multiple warheads on missiles, much of the problem of arms control now would be obviated. They thus seek to prevent cruise missiles from becoming the next intractable weapons.

However, with the United States about to start deploying more than 8,000 cruise missiles and with the Soviets themselves mounting an intensive program to catch up in this area, U.S. officials believe the Soviets would settle for only limiting the weapons in number and range. Soviet delegates have hinted as much, one official said.

In that case, he added, the Soviets would insist on counting the nuclear warheads on U.S. cruise missiles in the total warhead ceiling for strategic weapons that Reagan wants in any new agreement. In this way, he said, the Soviets have implicitly accepted the Reagan principle of a limit on total warhead numbers.●

ANOTHER VIEW OF VIOLENCE IN NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as chairman of the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs I receive hundreds of letters a month from individuals concerned about the issue of peace and justice in Northern Ireland.

Recently a Mr. Tadhg Seosemh Farrell of Toledo, Ohio, sent me a copy of an article he had published in the Catholic Chronicle of Toledo. The article is entitled "England Shares Blame for IRA Violence—Killer Plastic Bullets Denounced."

I call this article to the attention of my colleagues as I find it consistent with my longstanding position that all forms of violence in Northern Ireland whether civilian or official is wrong and stands in the way of a peaceful political solution which is so desperately needed.

The article follows:

ENGLAND SHARES BLAME FOR I.R.A. VIOLENCE—KILLER PLASTIC BULLETS DENOUNCED

(By Tadhg S. Farrell)

As Americans able to live in a civilized society, at times we seem to display a very strange capacity for demanding reprisals or revenge when what we have determined to be our very own personal conception of human decency and justice has been violated.

Without a moment's hesitation, we are ready to openly denounce, mourn, and demand retribution when we see justice being denied in one part of our world. In the same breath, we fully support military or political regimes that are guilty of the same violations of human rights or worse.

If the oppressor is viewed as "being on our side" or antagonistic to a government we consider to be the enemy, we are ready to turn our backs and suddenly become dumb, deaf, and blind. All too often this response is determined by our economic and political dealings with the perpetrators and the victims. If our ally of the moment murders innocent people, or tortures prisoners we can justify his methods—usually by a pragmatic statement that this particular regime is fighting a communist conspiracy or terrorism.

The bombings that occurred in London on July 20 which brought the I.R.A. again to the front pages can only underscore once more the tragedy that is Northern Ireland. After the hunger strike ended last year, we were lulled into a feeling of complacency with a belief that the troubles in Ulster had somehow been made to magically disappear.

The wounds that tear this small province apart continue to fester and to infect all who come in close contract. For the Conservative Party of Margaret Thatcher, the myopic solution to the Northern Ireland problem lies in being able to blame all the violence and murder on the I.R.A.

On June 30, 1982, a high court in Belfast ordered a new inquest into the death of Julie Livingstone, 14, who was shot and killed by a British soldier on May 12 of last year. In doing so the judge stated that the soldier may have acted wrongly.

The weapon that killed her is officially called a "baton round," but by more common terminology it is referred to as a plastic bullet. When the British first introduced rubber and plastic bullets into use in Northern Ireland, they made a determined effort to convince the news media that these were "nothing more than harmless toys." Maj. Clayton, military adviser and programs director for the manufacturer, stated that the name was deliberately changed from "baton round" to give it "a slightly humorous image," and "looking back it does seem as if that aim was achieved."

One and one-half inches in diameter, four inches long, and weighing close to five ounces, this weapon of terror is fired from a hand-held rifle at a muzzle velocity approaching 180 miles per hour. The impact on a human being is the same as being hit by a 90-pound weight. Unlike its predecessor, the rubber bullet, designed to be bounced off of the pavement and merely break a leg bone, the plastic bullet is aimed directly at the person to be hit. Since the introduction of these weapons in 1971, 16 people have been killed by their use—eight of them children under 14.

In the case of Julie Livingstone, witnesses stated that Julie was walking home when they saw a British Army Saracen (armored car) traveling toward her at a high rate of speed. As it passed by Julie, the witnesses reported hearing a loud pop. As the Saracen sped away, Julie was found lying face down on the pavement mortally wounded from a head injury. A blood-stained plastic bullet was lying nearby.

Last year alone, 12 civilians were killed by plastic bullets in Northern Ireland, among them a girl of 12, a girl of 14, and two boys less than 14. Mrs. Nora McCabe, 30, was shot and killed by a plastic bullet fired at a range of less than 20 feet while she was returning from a shopping trip. She left behind a husband and three small children.

Earlier this year, Mrs. Kathleen Stewart of Belfast was brought to Toledo to speak at Christ the King Parish under sponsorship of Clan na Gael of Toledo. She had lost her 12-year-old son Brian to a plastic bullet in 1976 as he stood waiting on a corner while his family was preparing to celebrate his birthday. Two weeks later, Mrs. Stewart's two younger children were stopped on their way home from school by a British patrol. One of the soldiers asked them if they like the birthday present he had given their brother two weeks before. Laughing, he then told them he might give them the same present next year.

In the last 12 years, close to 1,000 innocent civilians have been killed in Northern Ireland by British troops or Loyalist paramilitaries. In that time not one British soldier has been brought to trial or convicted of any crime committed while on duty in Ulster.

On May 13, 1982, the European Parliament voted on a text condemning and banning the use of plastic bullets. The only group to vote against the passage was the Conservative Party of Margaret Thatcher and the Rev. Ian Paisley.

In the U.S., Congressman Mario Biaggi (D-N.Y.) has submitted House Resolution 356 which calls on the British government to end the use of plastic bullets in Northern Ireland.

As head of the Ad Hoc Committee on Irish Affairs, Congressman Biaggi has been most vocal in denouncing the violence committed by all sides in Northern Ireland. It was because of his untiring efforts in the cause of justice and peace that he was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize to be awarded later this year.

If there is ever to be a chance for peace, it will only come when there is a change in policy on the Ulster problem. And that will only be when England realizes that it also must accept responsibility for a large portion of the violence.●

A TRIBUTE TO JAMES WILLIAM MAZZU

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues and the Nation a remarkable man. Cpl. James William Mazzu was a soldier who lost his life in the Korean conflict on November 30, 1950.

I am extremely proud to say that Corporal Mazzu was a member of my district. A man of many talents, Corporal Mazzu belonged to the 2d Infantry Division Bag Pipe Band and was an intelligence map designer. Corporal Mazzu was a dedicated artist who drew cartoons for his division paper.

Corporal Mazzu had a special talent for drawing cartoons depicting the Korean conflict. His colleagues appreciated his cartoons because they provided thoughtful insights into the lives of the soldiers. The cartoons are presently a valued addition to the Army Historical Center. I am grateful for and proud of Corporal Mazzu's contributions to the United States, his commendable service in the military, and his cartoons that are a reflection of that service.●

THE SALE OF SURPLUS LAND

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues a letter I received from one of my constituents, Mr. Joe Reinhart of Portland, Oreg., concerning the administration's plans to sell off our public lands. The arguments made in this letter parallel exactly my own misgivings about Secretary Watt's "asset management" plan.

The concerns expressed by my constituents were repeated everywhere I went in my district during the August recess. Oregonians are proud of their heritage—they do not want America's public lands sold off for some short-term gain.

Mr. Speaker, we would be wise to heed the advice found in Mr. Reinhart's letter so as not to be accomplices in a terrible crime against our citizens. I hope my colleagues will join me in this.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 29, 1982.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN AuCOIN: I just finished reading a Time magazine article (Aug. 23, 1982) on the Reagan Administration's plan to sell "surplus" federal land in order to reduce the national debt. I oppose this proposal for the following reasons.

First, our short term economic problems should not dictate national policy regarding public lands. These lands should be considered part of our national heritage; a savings account. The interest from our capital investment is sustained-yield forests, national recreation and wildlife areas, and aesthetic and other intangible values. All citizens benefit from that national investment. And considering our present economic problems, once that capital reserve is withdrawn, it will not be replaced.

Second, the health of Oregon's economy is closely linked to the vitality of the timber industry. As the time article points out, large timber companies are in favor of the Administration's sell-off (or sell-out) because they have overcut their own lands for short term profits. Now, in the name of the "free market," they want to "manage" public lands. God help us. In the past few years, many small, locally owned mills have either folded or been taken over by large, national companies. I am opposed to a policy of letting out of state corporations dictate Oregon's economic decisions. Witness, for example, the commitment of Georgia-Pacific to Oregon. As a representative of this state, I ask you to make sure that our resources are available for Oregon lumber companies, not put in the hands of out of state interests.

Third, the Administration's plan is another example of the rich becoming richer at the expense of the rest of us. I ask you, who can afford to buy this land? I will tell you. Neither myself, my family, nor my friends have the money. Who can pay existing mortgages, let alone borrow at today's interest rates? Land speculators, developers, and the wealthy. The Administration's proposal, in a nut shell, is a way for the federal government to take land available for everyone's use, and put it in the control of a select group of individuals: Not very democratic.

In conclusion, everyone agrees that the federal government must balance its budget, the national debt must be reduced, and the economy started on the road to good health. And, there are undoubtedly truly "surplus" federal lands. However, I do not trust Secretary of the Interior James Watt. By using executive orders without Congressional review, the Administration's proposal opens the door for abuse. If the Administration needs more money, it should reduce military spending and/or raise taxes again. At the very least, Congress should hold hearings on this important national question.

Thank you for your time and consideration. I eagerly await your response.

Sincerely yours,

JOE REINHART.●

THE EFFECTS OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

Tuesday, September 14, 1482

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, as Americans throughout the country are pleading with Congress to provide relief from high interest rates and inflation, one of my constituents, Mrs. Jody Walker from Princeton, Ky., has written a thought-provoking letter to me in order to illustrate what our Nation's present economic climate is doing to small businesses. I think my colleagues will be interested in Mrs. Walker's comments. Her letter follows:

JUNE 19, 1982.

DEAR SIR: This is not a letter of complaint but rather an attempt to show you what the present economic climate and high interest rates are doing to small businessmen, and to us in particular.

Ken and I bought a Dairy Queen Brazier in Princeton, Kentucky 3 years ago. The interest rate at that time was 9%; our monthly payment of $2,000.00 included $1,100.00 interest; and the loan would have been paid off in 10 years.

In April of this year we had to refinance the business. The interest went to 17%; our monthly payment of $2,500.00 includes $2,350.00 interest; and the loan had to be extended to pay off in 15 years.

We are a small business, grossing about $280,000 per year and employing twelve. Ken and I have worked without pay for 3 years in an attempt to make the business a success.

We had hoped to be able to open another Dairy Queen in a nearby town this year, but after finding out what the interest rate would be, we are not going ahead with our plans. This keeps 12 or 15 people from finding jobs and eliminates several construction jobs. It means less sales taxes to be paid and less income taxes to be paid. We simply are not willing to pay $2,500.00 per month and have $2,350.00 applied to interest while we work for nothing. When interest rates are 17% and 18%, the small businessman pays little on principal and the entire payment is used to pay interest. As a result, the small businessman is unable to reduce his debt which prevents him from improving his building or adding new equipment. As a result companies supplying the products and services must lay people off. The small businessman pays little tax in that interest is deductible. The small businessman is hurt and the Federal Government is hurt.

This is only one small example but when you mulitiply it by all the small businesses that must pay these high interest rates, you can see it is a problem of great dimension.

In our town (Princeton, Ky.) the Ford Agency, a grocery store, a clothing store, a department store and a furniture store have all closed in the last eight months. Princeton's population is 8,500. The Federal Government must get this situation under control. I do not have the answers but I do know that if we operated our business like the Federal Government operates we would have closed down 2½ years ago. Something must be done to stop the Government from competing with individual citizens for loan money. Also, I feel a sincere effort must be made to balance the budget.

I am writing this in hopes a graphic demonstration of the effects of high interest rates will have more impact than the overall statistics.

Sincerely yours,

Mrs. JODY WALKER.

FARM LABOR CONTRACTOR REGISTRATION ACT

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, by request, the administration's recent proposals to replace the Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act with the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act.

The negotiations which led up to the administration's proposals were long and at times frustrating. Representatives from all sides had serious concerns with the existing law that they felt needed to be addressed. Agricultural producers have long labored under the uncertainty of the 1974 FLCRA. In the past 10 years growers and producers have faced extensive private litigation and enforcement actions by the Department of Labor.

We have attempted to establish certainty during these long negotiations. That is also the goal of the administration's bill. It will answer the question "Who is responsible for the protections and duties available under the act?" with the answer, "He or she who provides the service or employs the worker—farm labor contractor or not—has the duty to protect the workers."

Certainty will benefit all parties. Agricultural employers will be relieved of the excessive burdens of FLCRA and will for the first time be sure of their duties to migrant workers. Agricultural employees will, in turn, know who is responsible for their protections, by fixing the responsibility on those who ultimately benefit from their labors—the agricultural employer. Unions, likewise, will be assured for the first time that they will not fall within the coverage of an ever-increasing maze of conflicting definitions which characterize the current law.

All of the problems of the migrant workers in this country will not disappear after this bill becomes law. Today, as always, exploitation, poor housing, and abuse all too often go hand in hand with the backbreaking work performed by the agricultural worker. As this bill is put into place, I will continue to use this subcommittee's oversight authority to investigate the effect of these changes on the lives of the migrant worker and to look for ways to insure a better quality of life for these workers and their families.

I remain concerned about another group of workers who perform the same services as those covered by this law, the temporary foreign workers brought into this country under the H-2 worker program. The Judiciary Committee this morning will begin markup of the Simpson-Mazzoli amendments to the Immigration and Nationality Act. That bill, as passed by the Senate fails to address adequately the future of the labor protections found in current regulations. If we do not insure that those protections for both the foreign and domestic workers are retained, we will have opened up a "guest worker" program under a different name. Congress cannot create a new statute, on one hand, which attempts to protect workers, while on the other hand pass another statute that weakens labor protections for workers doing similar work.

The parties that took part in the negotiation should be congratulated on their efforts to work out a compromise in a difficult area. They have recognized a problem that needed attention and have worked tirelessly to see that it is resolved.

I am introducing the administration's legislation because I believe that it should become law. I was involved in its development. I believe that it represents a positive step in the protection of migrant workers and I will continue work to see that it is enacted.●

NDANK, NDANK

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, most Americans are unaware of the tremendous stake our country has in a successful conclusion of the efforts of Assistant Secretary of State Chester Crocker to negotiate a settlement leading to a free and fair election in Namibia under the truly impartial supervision of the United Nations Resolution 435.

As a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives, I have watched with increasing concern the efforts of the Soviet empire to expand further into the southern part of Africa. Numerous committees of the Congress have inquired into the continuing "resource war" being conducted by Russia in its effort to gain control of the sources of oil and strategic minerals in Africa. Congressional studies show that 62 strategic minerals are extremely important to the industrial base of the United States economy. Namibia has many of these minerals, including the largest uranium mine in the world and one-sixth of all the uranium in the free world. Such other important minerals as copper, zinc, gold, diamonds, cadmium, arsenic trioxide, germanium dioxide, and possibly gas and oil are found in Namibia.

Let us hope that Dr. Crocker is not maneuvered into any kind of a cosmetic settlement which, in effect, will open the door to slow-motion domination and control of Namibia by SWAPO or some other Soviet "proxy" government of the kinds now controlling Angola, Mozambique, Ethiopia, Afghanistan, and other targets of Soviet Empire expansionism.

Any settlement which would permit even the remotest possibility of a future Soviet takeover by the terrorists of the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO), the Soviet-financed organization which has been conducting a guerrilla campaign against the people of Namibia for the last 15 years, would be totally unacceptable. The following lead editorial from the Wall Street Journal of August 23 states the case very well. I hope my colleagues in Congress, as well as other interested Americans, will read it carefully.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Aug. 23, 1982]

NDANK, NDANK

Among the Wolos tribesmen of West Africa, there is a popular saying: ndank, ndank. Literally translated it means slowly, slowly. Things take time. To press a matter too hard is to risk spoiling the outcome.

It's a perspective worth keeping in mind as we watch events on that often unhappy continent, particularly in Namibia. Diplomats have been pressing hard for a political settlement of the conflict between South African backed forces and guerrillas of the South West Africa Peoples Organization, or SWAPO. Our fear is that the five-nation Western "contract group" that has been ramrodding negotiations may be pushing a little too hard.

Certainly the results to date would appear meager. About a year ago there was a flurry of excitement when it was hinted that agreement had been reached on the political principles of a settlement. But it soon became clear that the parties couldn't even agree on a voting formula.

Then there were reports that one of South Africa's prime conditions for a settlement—the removal of Cuban troops from neighboring Angola where they have supplied and succored the guerrillas' assault on Namibia—might be met. The Angolans, it was said, were increasingly unhappy with the Cubans, who haven't helped much in their own fight against internal dissidents but who nonetheless are costing Angola half or more of its annual foreign exchange earnings.

But Fidel Castro, not surprisingly, promptly said he had no intention of pulling out. Even more recently there were reports of a ceasefire between South Africa and SWAPO but this too turned out to be a mirage.

It's still possible that something will be worked out sooner rather than later, we suppose. South Africa would undoubtedly like to be rid of its Namibia defense cost. The SWAPO guerrillas, who have been all but defeated militarily, might be tempted to come to terms in hopes of winning elections scheduled for next March. Most of the guerrillas come from Namibia's dominant tribe, the Ovambos.

Contact group diplomats thus have remained optimistic about the possibilities of settlement. They believe that the key to success is American pressure on South Africa combined with economic incentives to Angola and possibly even Cuba. But all this ignores that the real key to a settlement, withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola, lies in Moscow.

Castro can't make a move without the Kremlin's consent and Angola's Marxist government would likely collapse in the face of its own guerrilla movement without Cuban protection. A Soviet signal to withdraw would come as a thunderclap, a blow to the Soviet reputation for reliability nearly as grievous as the U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam. As the Soviet Union has little to offer besides its military reliability and that of proxies such as Cuba and East Germany, it is hard to imagine such a step.

So we fear that much of the talk about an imminent settlement may reflect less the realities of the situation than the fond hopes of the Western contact group.

Chester Crocker, the U.S. assistant secretary of state who is point man in the negotiations, has played a brilliant diplomatic game so far. By tying Cuban withdrawal from Angola to a Namibian settlement he has overcome South African intransigence and shifted the spotlight of public opinion to Cuban and Russian imperialism.

But the contact group should not be too eager to force a settlement. Unless the settlement is truly in the interest of all parties, it will eventually fall apart and destabilize the area even further. The political process in Africa is a frail reed: Witness the near-coup in Kenya and the resurgence of terrorism in Zimbabwe.

Also, the SWAPO cause is not as popular in Africa as one might think from reading the newspapers. Moderate African nations are asserting themselves more vigorously in continental councils. Even some of the front line states in southern Africa would prefer an opportunity to stop the fighting and get on with their business.

By all means let the diplomacy continue but time is not necessarily on the side of the insurgents. If the insurgents perceive that we can't be hustled into agreement that they can't win by force of arms, meaningful agreement will be all the easier to reach. Ndank, ndank.●

JAPANESE TREMBLE IN FEAR OF "BIG ONE"

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, the Japanese may be beating us at another game—earthquake prediction and hazard mitigation.

The Washington Post reported today that Japanese scientists have predicted Tokyo is due for a massive earthquake before the year 2000. Scientists there keep a 24-hour watch over seismic detection devices located along the ring of Japanese islands. These devices help determine when an earthquake is likely. Satellite data and other information is coordinated with this seismic information providing officials with the basis for emergency planning decisions.

I am pleased to report that earlier today the House passed the Earthquake Hazards Reduction Act reauthorization. I am satisfied with the bill and hope the Senate will defer to the House version. The upcoming HUD-independent agencies appropriations bill will be considered by the House during the next couple of days. Funding for earthquake programs conducted by the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the National Science Foundation is included in this bill, although not at the levels I would prefer to see.

A severe earthquake could disrupt not only the local area where it occurs with loss of life and property, but could have ramifications for the entire country. A catastrophic event in California for example, has been estimated to potentially cause 5,000 to 25,000 fatalities and $20 to $50 billion in damages. No one State, not even California, can sustain such a blow. The Federal Government will have to become involved if only to address the problems caused by such losses to the rest of the country.

The Japanese may have several thousand years of experience ahead of us in this area, but with a little commitment from our Government I think we can catch up.

Mr. Speaker, I include the Washington Post article for the RECORD for my colleagues to read.

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 14, 1982]

JAPANESE SCIENTISTS WARN TOKYO IS DUE TO BE HIT BY MASSIVE QUAKE

(By Tracy Dahlby)

TOKYO—A handful of Japanese civil defense experts, tiny black boxes in hand, converage on a climate-controlled room. Amid situation maps and the whir of computers, they advise the prime minister to sound a full-scale alert.

Local businessman Jiro Hatano calmly gathers up his stocks of water and dehydrated food and makes a speedy getaway, possibly to a camouflaged concrete bunker in a neighborhood garden as hordes of his fellow residents of Toyko rush to evacuation staging areas throughout the city.

This doomsday scenario, which specialists say could become a reality any day now, is not based on fear of nuclear attack or invasion but on the threat of the gigantic earthquake that is expected to devastate this congested city of 12.5 million.

Just when calamity will strike is now the subject of a sharp debate among Japanese scientists, who are busily marshaling the country's high technology to the still-murky task of quake prediction. But they generally agree that the city has now entered a danger period, making a major quake likely sometime between now and the year 2000.

"History tells us that Tokyo has been hit repeatedly by giant earthquakes," says Masahiro Kishio, assistant director of the earthquake analysis division at the national meteorological agency. "We can say with absolute certainty that the area will be hit again."

Early in the month, 100,000 residents of Tokyo took part in massive firefighting and evacuation drills in commemoration of the great Kanto earthquake of Sept. 1, 1923. It registered a magnitude of 7.9 on the open-ended Richter scale and killed 143,000 people, mostly in the ensuing firestorm, which reduced the city to a smoldering moonscape.

Should a jolt of similar magnitude rock Tokyo today, government officials estimate that at least 36,000 people would die, and another 63,000 would be seriously injured. Nearly half a million wooden houses and shops would be destroyed by fires or tidal waves, leaving 4 million people homeless.

The officials admit, however, that such calculations are extremely difficult. Tokyo now has five times more inhabitants than at the time of the Kanto quake and a population density of 26,000 people per square mile, or nearly three times that of Washington. Its sprawling cityscape is a maze of skyscrapers, apartment buildings and elevated highways built above hundreds of miles of underground shopping arcades and subway tunnels, all of which has amplified the scope for disaster.

The grim possibilities have sent tremors through Japanese officialdom and touched off massive efforts to shield the old capital from destruction. Tokyo is spending nearly $6 billion—an amount equal to half its yearly national military budget—on a current series of countermeasures including the construction of "earthquake-proof" public buildings, hospitals, schools, roads, and sewer and water systems.

More than 1 million rations of milk, rice, hardtack biscuits and a 42-day emergency supply of fresh drinking water have been stocked near five large city parks designated as official evacuation areas. A big budget for television and radio spots and printed materials is aimed at keeping the average resident well briefed on what to do when the big quake comes.

"We can't entirely prevent widespread damage, but we can try to limit it," says Kishio. "And we're fairly certain we can predict the occurrence of a major earthquake within one or two days."

Scientists keep a 24-hour watch over data from devices located at 238 stations along the volcanic spine of the Japanese islands and from one underwater cable on the seabed southwest of Tokyo for signs of the swarm of smaller tremors which are thought to presage a serious jolt.

Tokyo's subterranean water table is checked for a sudden drop that night also indicate a big quake is imminent, while photos from weather satellites are monitored for changes in the cracks in the earth's crust that are thought to run through the city's suburbs.

Should the signs point in an ominous direction, chauffeur-driven government cars will fan out through the city to pick up a half-dozen seismological experts, each fitted out with an electronic signalling device in a black box and deliver them to the situation room at the national meteorological agency. There, they must quickly decide whether to formally ask the prime minister to call a public alert.

A study of a thousand years of historical documents led the late professor Hiroshi Kawasumi of Tokyo University's earthquake research center to the theory that a major quake occurs in Tokyo roughly once every 69 years. Scholars now point out that, according to that theory, the city has already entered a critical period.

According to Hiroaki Yoshii, a senior researcher at the Japan Institute for Future Technology, who has recently completed a study on the subject, a giant-size jolt could create havoc in the country's big business circles because of the high concentration of corporate headquarters in Tokyo. "There would be a sudden shortage of funds from financial institutions to manufacturers, and a lot of business failures and corporate mergers," he says.

Major banks already have begun spreading their highly computerized operations to branch offices around the country and installing emergency communications networks. Earlier plans by the government to relocate the national capital have now been dropped because of the astronomical costs involved, Yoshii says.

Japan, as all schoolchildren here know, is a land of earthquakes and, historically, the destruction brought on by frequent giant tremors has kept a powerful hold on the popular imagination. The Hojoki, a 13th century Japanese classic, says, "For one terror following on another, there is nothing to equal an earthquake."

Today, Japan is jolted by more than a thousand tremors a year large enough to be felt by its inhabitants, many of them in Tokyo. That, and the fact that the city was destroyed both by the great Kanto quake and American firebombings in World War II, has made Tokyo residents largely fatalistic about another impending disaster. And government efforts to gird for the worst, officials complain, have failed to prompt a genuine state of readiness among the public.

"We are the kind of people who spend scads of money and time on vacations and golf," says Hatano, who sponsors a private organization to educate his fellow citizens on earthquake relief measures, "but won't give a second thought to our own individual security."●

RESTORE FULL COLA'S FOR FEDERAL LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS AND FIREFIGHTERS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill today that would restore full cost-of-living adjustments (COLA's) for Federal law enforcement officers and firefighters, who were unfairly penalized in the recently adopted Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982 (Public Law 97-253).

Under the Budget Reconciliation Act, which I voted against, all civil service employees who retire before age 62 would receive only half of the COLA that other Federal retirees receive. The intent of this provision is to reduce Federal spending by discouraging early retirement from the Federal Government.

However, this new law is blatantly unfair because it makes no distinction between the civil service employee who can choose his or her retirement age, and the approximately 30,000 Federal law enforcement officers and firefighters who are forced by law to retire at age 55.

My bill would correct this injustice by allowing those Federal law enforcement officers and firefighters who retire before age 62 due to the mandatory retirement law (Public Law 93-350) to receive full cost-of-living adjustments in their retirement pay.

As a former law enforcement officer, I am committed to insuring that our Nation's public safety officers receive fair and adequate compensation for the important, and often life-threatening, work they perform. The legislation I am introducing today, the "Federal Law Enforcement Officers' and Firefighters' Retirement Protection Act of 1982," is consistent with that objective.

I wish to express special thanks to the 5,000 member Federal Law Enforcement Officers' Association (FLEOA) for bringing this problem to my attention. I am hopeful that the legislative remedy I am proposing today received the prompt and favorable congressional consideration that it certainly deserves.●

THE EXPORT TRADING COMPANY ACT—A JOBS BILL THAT WILL WORK

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I notice in this morning's newspapers that the House leadership will apparently seek quick consideration of a massive $1 billion "jobs bill." The news reports suggest that the legislation may be brought to the floor later this week, rushed before us because—in a quote attributed to you, Mr. Speaker—"the American people need to see action now before it is too late."

Mr. Speaker, the voters will issue this Congress its report card on November 2, and I suspect that the grades that they hand out will, in many cases, not be passing marks.

While it is certainly "too late" to enact much of the legislation our constituents had a right to expect from us when they elected us in 1980, I would humbly point out that there is no compelling reason to rush an ill-advised $1 billion jobs bill before this body. The House of Representatives has already approved—unanimously—a jobs bill: the Export Trading Company Act. The legislation would create between 320,000 and 640,000 new American jobs in the small- to mid-sized businesses hardest hit in these tough economic times. In addition to creating many more jobs than the legislation you propose to bring to the floor, the trading company bill would give our American businesses the tools to compete more effectively in the ever more competitive world market. The jobs created by this legislation are real jobs, jobs that will last because they result from an increased demand in the private sector, not "quick fix" jobs created through increased Federal spending. The jobs created by enacting the trading company measure will not cost the taxpayers an additional dime.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate has also passed—unanimously—its version of the Export Trading Company Act, and it is awaiting action by the conference committee. Does it not make more sense to urge the conferees to complete their work on this major job-creating trade legislation than to spend precious time bringing an ill-advised, budget-busting, counterproductive, billion-dollar measure to the floor?●

PASTOR HONORED FOR 50 YEARS OF SERVICE

HON. CHARLES F. DOUGHERTY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to extend congratulations and best wishes to both the Crescentville Baptist Church and to its pastor, Charles L. Dear. Today Pastor Dear is celebrating his 50th year of service to the East Godfrey Avenue parish.

After responding to a call to serve, Pastor Dear began his ministry at the Crescentville Baptist Church on September 14, 1932. He and his wife Velma have provided extraordinary guidance and spiritual leadership throughout the entire history of the church even during such tragic occurrences as a 1977 fire which heavily damaged the Bible School Building.

Furthermore, their combined sense of selflessness is exemplified by the unique fact that throughout their ministry at the Crescentville parish, Pastor and Mrs. Dear have lived by faith, receiving only the funds channeled directly to the support of the pastor by the church members. Because they have been so willing to give of themselves, the Lord has seen fit to bless their ministry and consequently, the church has grown considerably from the original few who first met to form a church.

It is with a grateful heart that I join with my colleagues and the entire congregation in honoring Pastor Dear for his faithful service to the ministry. May Pastor Dear continue to proclaim the riches of the word of God and may God's blessing be with him and his wife in the future that lies ahead.●

SELECTIVE SERVICE REGISTRATION: VIOLATORS MUST BE PROSECUTED

HON. G. V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, in a followup to statements I entered earlier in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I want to share this Washington Post editorial of September 1, 1982.

The editorial, entitled "Politics and Draft Registration," echoes the point I made in earlier statements on this issue. Selective Service registration is the law of the land, and as the Post says, violation of the law requires prosecution.

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 1, 1982]

POLITICS AND DRAFT REGISTRATION

Should young men be tried and convicted for violating the law requiring registration for the draft? A number of thoughtful readers, some of whose comments we printed last Thursday, evidently think not. We continue to disagree, respectfully, and we think the subject is worth addressing again, especially in light of the conviction on Thursday of a second student, Benjamin Sasway, for violating the law.

Some readers complain of our characterization of the draft registration law as "about the mildest intrusion on personal liberty a government interested in maintaining the possibility of conscription can make," and they complain of our comparison between this law and laws requiring motorists to stop at stop signs. But they are unable to describe any milder intrusion, and then they say nothing that convinces us that the stop sign analogy is not apt. Governments put up stop signs and require registration for military service to protect, in different ways, the public safety. Governments have obligations to enforce these laws—to protect others and to encourage obedience—even against those who will not obey them because of a genuine religious belief that to obey such a law is wrong. The conscientiousness of that belief is a proper factor for a judge to consider in sentencing, but not one that should sway a prosecutor from bringing a case or a juror from returning a guilty verdict.

Mr. Sasway and, we suspect, most of those young men in violation of the law do not claim a religious objection. Their objections to the draft registration law are political. In a letter sent to President Carter in 1980 and which he has not repudiated since, Mr. Sasway said, "I am obligated to protest even simple registration since I feel the spirit of this mandate, like the actual conscription, is immoral and incompatible with a free society. Furthermore, I cannot allow myself to be forced into a military establishment that is too misdirected and too conservative to serve the country's interests." It is settled constitutional law that conscription is not incompatible with a free society; the argument that the military establishment is misdirected is by its very nature political. Mr. Sasway has been free, and would have been free had he registered, to try to persuade his fellow citizens that, by ordinary political means, his views are right and should be enacted into law. Violating the law requires that he be prosecuted.●

THE TOM AND JANE SHOW

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 22, 1982, I submitted an interview with Jane Fonda and Tom Hayden that appeared in Stars and Stripes which convincingly pointed out that while Tom and Jane may have changed their outward style and appearance from that of their radical stance in the 1960's and early 1970's, their ideology has not changed one iota. And what is that ideology?

I would like to submit for the RECORD statements make by Tom and Jane over the years which bear remembering. Tom and Jane should also take a good look at an article by Al Santoli entitled "Why Vietcong Flee" found in the "Extension of Remarks" of July 16, 1982, to see where twisted Hayden ideological views ultimately lead: Cambodian genocide, nearly a million boat people—over one-half dead—reeducation camps, and close to a half million Vietnamese sent to Siberian labor camps.

Ideas have consequences, Mr. Speaker, and Tom and Jane should be willing to face up to the tragic consequences of their Marxist-Leninist ideology. At this time, I would like to submit Tom and Jane's statements for the RECORD.

THE WORD ACCORDING TO TOM AND JANE

"I am the Vietcong. We are everywhere! We are all Vietcong."—Tom Hayden, Czechoslovakia, 1967.

QUESTIONS ON H.R. 6046, THE EXTRADITION REFORM ACT OF 1982

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, a bill has been reported to the House by the Judiciary and Foreign Affairs Committee whose stated purpose is to reform the Nation's extradition laws and to make it easier to cooperate in international efforts to deal with terrorists.

Stronger efforts to deal with terrorists and other violent criminals are clearly called for.

But in the last several days, I have received reports that the bill may seriously erode the rights of Americans and of foreigners in the United States who have struggled against repressive regimes abroad. Because of drafting problems, the bill may do much more than it originally intended. According to some, the bill would prohibit U.S. courts from reviewing extradition demands by foreign governments to insure that no demand is part of a foreign effort to suppress political dissent. Failure to provide such judicial review would be an end to the proud, 200-year tradition of the United States as a refuge for those fleeing from political dissent. Of course, we support returning terrorists, but I doubt that any American would want to be part of returning an editor of a newpaper or a religious figure who may have led a protest against his country's repressive government. One would not want to pass a bill which would enable, for example, the Soviet Union to demand the return of a Solzhenitsyn if he were to publish another book critical of the Soviet Union.

Enough questions have been raised by the bill that I hope we will have a detailed debate on what the language of the bill will actually permit. It is quite possible that as a result of that debate, a number of amendments will be in order.●

SECRETARY OF STATE SHULTZ OPPOSES TRADE EMBARGO AND SUPPORTS DRESSER INDUSTRIES

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I read a fascinating article by the present Secretary of State George P. Shultz, which clearly opposes the foreign policy of the Reagan administration. The speech, I should quickly add, was made before George Shultz became Secretary of State and a supporter of the Reagan foreign policy. Personally, I found the earlier speech more convincing than the present statements by Secretary Shultz.

Coincidentally, I also just came upon an editorial from Industry Week, a publication which usually gives the Reagan administration strong support, which reads very much like the views of Secretary Shultz before he became a defender of the Reagan foreign policy.

George Shultz, in his pre-Secretary role, said:

We must recognize that major commercial relationships cannot be turned on and off like a light switch; they have to be built up and sustained over a period of time.

The Industry Week editorial says:

It's time to stop using trade indiscriminately as just another pawn in the world's political chess game. It's time to think through and establish a foreign policy that is consistent with sound international economic policy and compatible with our domestic economic and social goals.

I urge Secretary Shultz, or whoever is determining U.S. foreign policy, to pay heed to the advice of George Shultz and those who must live and work in the real world.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I wish to insert in the RECORD the two articles discussed above.

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 29, 1982]

SHULTZ BACKS DRESSER, VILIFIES EMBARGOES(!)

(The following article is based on a speech that Secretary of State George P. Shultz delivered in October, 1978, when he was president of the Bechtel Corp. Last week Shultz said these views did not apply to the latest sanctions imposed by his new employer, the Reagan administration.)

(By George P. Shultz)

An extra element has been injected into international trade in the past few years, a political dimension overlaid on top of commercial transactions. This political element is a vigorous and flamboyantly administered initiative that uses foreign trade as a tactical instrument of foreign policy. I call it light-switch diplomacy.

There is apparently a belief in our government that individual trades can be turned on and off like a light switch to induce changes in the domestic and foreign policies of a host government. As a result, the position of U.S. goods in world markets is eroding as our trading partners increasingly see evidence that we cannot be counted on as a reliable supplier. The impression abroad now is, unfortunately, that the U.S. wants foreign business on our own terms and that as yet we have not figured out what those terms are.

Examples of light-switch diplomacy abound. Take this chronology involving Dresser Industries' $150 million contract to build a drill-bit plant in the Soviet Union. As a way of demonstrating our protest to Soviet treatment of dissidents, various presidential advisers urged the president [Jimmy Carter] to veto the sale.

Aug. 9 [1978]: The Commerce Dept. (reportedly with the president's blessing) approves Dresser's export license, enabling the company to go ahead with the sale.

Aug. 25: A special review panel convened at the request of the Defense Secretary advises against the "technology transfer."

Aug. 30: The president's senior advisers vote by a 3-to-2 margin to stop the deal.

Sept. 6: The president reaffirms the decision to allow the sale.

The light goes on, the light goes off, the light flickers, the light goes on. I don't know whether it is going to stay on or not but in the meanwhile it is hard to see that these manipulations have had any impact on the nature and operation of Soviet society.

Against this background, we must realize that our dependence on world trade has increased sharply. Exports and imports, considered together, are equivalent to about one-fifth of our gross national product, which is double what they represented a decade ago. Yet our share of world exports has been steadily declining. Our market share of exports of manufactured goods, for instance, has fallen almost 30 percent since the late 1950s.

Meanwhile, our appetite for imports has been voracious. These imports are not just a matter of taste and convenience. We can't just say, "Well, she doesn't need to have a handkerchief from Paris." We have come to depend on many of these imports to provide us with key commodities; oil is only the best-known example.

We must recognize that major commercial relationships cannot be turned on and off like a light switch; they have to be built up and sustained over a period of time. It takes a long time to go abroad, get positioned, and learn about how to do things there. A considerable investment is made on both sides of the transaction, and there emerges a certain interdependence that necessitates confidence in the continuing good faith of both sides. In this process of investment, a company develops what the government may regard as a bargaining chip. But if our government then takes that bargaining chip and spends it, where does that leave the company? The company has lost out, and its commercial relationship deteriorates. Who wants to deal with an unreliable supplier, especially when the supplier is not the only game in town?

We can predict, even observe, that light-switch diplomacy as it is used more and more becomes a wasting asset. Increasingly, when the diplomat flicks the switch, the light will not go on. It will not go on because private firms cannot afford the cost, cannot make the investments, to create the bargaining chips and then have the bargaining chips used. And self-respecting trading partners will not put up with it.

If light-switch diplomacy is turning off our trading partners, what then is the proper relationship between trade and government policy?

(1) Governments should provide a stable and predictable set of rules under which trade can take place on individual and corporate initiative, as free as possible from the uncertainties inherent in the ad hoc exercise of government authority. Rules instead of authorities—rules that we can read; rules that are predictable.

(2) Traders, individual or corporate or government, must keep their bargains, and government must not place private parties in the position of breaking a bargain properly arrived at.

Certain products and countries may require special treatment on grounds of national security. But here, as elsewhere, rules are essential. If there is some product we should not sell, it should be specified. Just because a product is in an area linked to security does not mean we should just leave the whole thing open to the discretion of an ever-changing cast of characters who have access to the light switch. Ad hoc and changeable decisions add up to chaos and an environment that frustrates fruitful commercial relationships.

Outside the security-related area, rules should be kept to a minimum, be clear and consistent, and be as free as possible from the need for interpretation by government authorities.

If our government adheres to these principles, then U.S. companies can develop and uphold their reputation as reliable suppliers, a reputation essential to their success in export markets. When our government turns away from these principles, it correspondingly undermines our competitive position abroad.

[From Industrial Week, Sept. 6, 1982]

RUSSIAN PIPELINE EMBARGO SETS OMINOUS PRECEDENT

It's politics as usual in Washington. The use of trade as a political weapon or carrot by the Administration in power is not new. But now it has been elevated to new heights.

In the U.S. vs the USSR natural gas pipeline to Europe, the President has not only put sanctions on sales from U.S. firms; he has also broadened them to prohibit sales from foreign subsidiaries or licensees of U.S. multinationals.

This action sets a precedent that can only further confuse and frustrate U.S. industry's efforts to get involved in international trade, efforts which must be accelerated and expanded as we enter the era of a one-world market.

The irony of the situation is that, as foreign policy, it is inconsistent (pressure from the farm lobby keeps grain shipments going), is angering our European allies, is ineffective, and is doomed to failure. It all started with President Carter tightening exports to Russia as punishment for its invasion of Afghanistan. The Russians are still there.

President Reagan during his election campaign decried the idea of applying U.S. law overseas. Pointing to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, he said we can't export our morality. Now it appears he may have fallen into the same trap.

The Russians will build the pipeline. Foreign competitors stand ready and willing to supply the materials. Europeans need and want the gas the pipeline will bring them. They are angered by President Reagan's position, which they feel is an impingement on their sovereignty.

Europe's dependence on a Russian energy resource is ominous. But so is our continued dependence on foreign oil. Ill-conceived national policies and laws put the U.S. into the energy bind it's in today. That same bumbling will put U.S. industry behind the eight ball in the competitive race toward internationalization and world markets. Industry can hardly be faulted for shying away from trade if the rules keep changing.

It's time to stop using trade indiscriminately as just another pawn in the world's political chess game. It's time to think through and establish a foreign policy that is consistent with sound international economic policy and compatible with our domestic economic and social goals. And that has to include support, rather than hindrance, of the internationalization of U.S. industry.●

AN ANALYSIS OF MEDIA COVERAGE OF WAR IN LEBANON POINTS TO BIAS AGAINST ISRAEL POSITION

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, throughout the recent Israeli operation peace for the Galilee, I have been concerned over what I consider to be less than accurate reporting of the campaign by certain segments of the American media.

The organization Accuracy in Media Inc., of Washington, D.C., has done a detailed analysis of the media's coverage of this conflict. What emerges as a central theme was the fact that notwithstanding certain clearly biased reports by the major media of this Nation—the support of the American people for Israel continued strong.

From the outset coverage failed to fully emphasize the fundamental reasons why Israel launched the campaign. They did so to protect her citizens from the relentless attacks by PLO terrorists operating in Lebanon. It was nothing more than any nation would do to protect her people from an enemy so close to its borders.

With the evacuation of the PLO from Lebanon now complete one hopes it will signal a new peace beween Israel and Lebanon, one which will be a catalyst for a more enduring peace throughout the Middle East. I recently visited both Israel and Lebanon together with my colleagues Mr. SCHEUER and Mr. MCGRATH. While there we met with Prime Minister Begin and left convinced that he too wants a lasting peace in the Middle East but one which respects and recognizes a sovereign Israel secure and free from those who would destroy it.

I urge my colleagues to read the Accuracy in Media analysis carefully and one hopes that the bond which has united this Nation with Israel will continue undiminished. It is a relationship which has been the very cornerstone of our foreign policy over the past 30 years. A strong and sovereign Israel is vital to our own national security and our policies must be directed to insuring the maintenance of a strong State of Israel.

I now wish to insert into the RECORD the article entitled "Lies About Lebanon."

[From the AIM Report, September 1982]

LIES ABOUT LEBANON

On August 20, the day before the PLO evacuation from Beirut began, The Washington Post published a poll which indicated that 42 percent of the respondents believed the Israeli invasion of Lebanon and the removal of the PLO from that country would change things for the better. Only 22 percent thought that the change would be for the worse, while 9 percent didn't think that there would be much change, and 27 percent had no opinion.

This poll indicated that public opinion in this country was still predominantly on the side of Israel. Fifty-two percent of the respondents said their sympathies were more with Israel, while only 18 percent sided with the Arabs. The pro-Israel percentage was down by three points from March, prior to the invasion. There was a three-point increase in the number who said that they sided with neither Israel nor the Arabs.

These results are rather surprising in light of the fact that the news coverage of the Israeli invasion and editorial opinion tended to be highly critical of Israel, with considerable emphasis placed upon charges that there had been heavy civilian casualties and widespread destruction of homes. Partisans of Israel felt strongly that the media were exhibiting a pro-PLO bias.

Despite the sympathetic interviews with Yasser Arafat and photos of him kissing babies, The Washington Post/ABC poll found that the number of respondents who believed that the PLO did not represent a majority of Palestinians had climbed from 48 percent in March to 60 percent in August.

This poll suggests that the invasion and the media coverage of it did little to alter the strong pro-Israel sentiments of the American people. This raises the question of whether the coverage was less pro-PLO than it was perceived to be by partisans of Israel. Or were the American people simply not paying much attention to what the media were saying? The latter is a distinct possibility. The poll showed 60 percent of the respondents saying that they had not followed the news from Lebanon at all closely even though editors had considered it to be a top news story for two months.

THE PLO DISINFORMATION CAMPAIGN

On June 20, a full-page ad appeared in The New York Times with the bold headline: "Death and Devastation in Lebanon." In smaller type: "40,000 people killed and wounded; 700,000 people homeless." The ad charged that the Israelis had intensively bombed Beirut, Tyre and Sidon and had totally destroyed scores of small towns, villages and refugee camps. It charged that virtually every population concentration of Palestinians and Lebanese east and south of Beirut had been "subjected to terror bombing, with consequent death and dreadful injury among the most vulnerable of the civilian population—women and small children, the elderly and the ailing."

The ad was signed by 214 Americans who said they were anguished by the knowledge that this wanton destruction had been inflicted by armament supplied by the United States. The signers included a number of familiar names from the anti-Vietnam movement—Ramsey Clark, the Berrigan brothers, Dave Dellinger, Julian Bond, Pete Seeger, I. F. Stone, and Studs Terkel.

The same figures for casualties and homeless in Lebanon were used again in an ad submitted by an organization called Concerned Americans for Peace for publication in several newspapers on July 11. This ad demanded that "the killing of innocent men, women and children and the destruction of their homeland must stop." It then said that "various established organizations have created separate committees to channel aid to the war-ravaged people of Lebanon." Saying, "Some of these include," it proceeded to list the names and addresses of six well-known relief organizations, including the American Red Cross and CARE. The placement of the names and addresses of these organizations gave the impression that they were co-sponsors of the ad.

However, when these organizations were asked about the use of their names in conjunction with the ad, they all denied that they had authorized anyone to use their names. The Christian Science Monitor had taken the trouble to check this out. Finding that the use of the names of the relief organizations had not been authorized, The Monitor declined to run the ad. The Los Angeles Times ran the ad but omitted the names of the relief organizations. The New York Times, The Washington Post, The Chicago Tribune, The Atlanta Constitution and Journal, and The Dallas Times-Herald all ran the ad with the names of the relief organizations.

These newspapers also failed to check to see if there really was such an organization as "Concerned Americans for Peace." Had they done so, they would have found that the post office box address that was listed in the ad for the organization did not exist. They would also have learned that the advertising agency that placed the ad could not locate the individual who had given them the order, paying for it with cashier's checks drawn on a bank in Encino, California. The amount of money involved ran into tens of thousands of dollars. It undoubtedly came from the Middle East. Whoever placed the advertising was in all probability acting as an agent for foreign principals and should have registered with the Justice Department. Under the law, ads placed by such agents are required to reveal the identity of their principals. In this case the law was easily circumvented because the newspapers made no effort to find out the real source of the money.

There was something else the papers should have checked—the figures cited in the ad for the number of people killed, wounded and rendered homeless by the Israeli attack. The Washington Post did raise a question about the numbers. In The Post the ad was modified to say that "according to news reports" there had been 26,000 killed and wounded and 600,000 rendered homeless, reductions of 14,000 and 100,000 respectively from the figures originally submitted. The other papers accepted the higher figures without question.

EXAGGERATED CIVILIAN CASUALTIES

Even the figures used in The Washington Post, which had appeared in news stories, appear to be wild exaggerations. The New York Times reported on July 14 that visitors to southern Lebanon could easily see that the widely used figures of 10,000 dead and 600,000 homeless were "extreme exaggerations." It turned out that these figures had originated with the Red Crescent organization, which was headed by Yasser Arafat's brother.

The number of civilians killed in Tyre, Sidon and Nabatiye was only 323 according to Israeli sources. David Shipler of The New York Times reported that discussions with local officials tended to confirm the Israeli figure for those three cities. He said that the count did not include an estimated 200 civilians killed in Israeli air strikes before the invasion nor those killed in the Palestinian refugee camps. Nor do we have figures on the number killed in Beirut. However, the scale of the exaggeration of the early figures has been exposed by recent reports on the number of homeless. On August 17, Olof Rydbeck, commissioner-general of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees, revealed that the number who had lost their homes in southern Lebanon was "at least" 60,000. That is one-tenth of the number cited in early news stories. He did not have a figure for northern Lebanon, but he estimated that it might be as much as 40,000.

While the media have been criticized for having accepted unquestioningly the exaggerated civilian casualty figures put out by the PLO, The New York Times and the UPI helped publicize another highly exaggerated figure as late as the second week in August. On August 10, The Times carried a UPI story reporting that Dr. William Monsour, chairman of the Pittsburgh chapter of the Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, had said that 3,000 Palestinian children wounded in Israeli bombing raids on Beirut were to be flown to this country for treatment. On August 12, The Times discussed this project again, saying help was being sought to bring "as many as 3,000 severely wounded Lebanese and Palestinian children" to the U.S.

The Times did not ask Dr. Monsour the source for his figure, but another reporter did. His revealing reply was: "If that mad dog Begin goes on bombing . . . he should be in chains. Then there will be triple that number. If these war criminals go on, before we know there will be 10,000." Pressed for a source for the 3,000 number, Dr. Monsour said that the American University in Beirut "think there are 6,000." The representative of the university in New York, Bill Rice, who is handling communications for the project, said that he doubted that the figure came from Beirut. He referred the question to Janan Al-Awar of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee headquarters in Washington. Miss Al-Awar said that there were lots of wounded children in Lebanon, but she said she had no idea how many. She said that 3,000 was the number that Dr. Monsour had indicated that he could process through his medical center in Westmoreland County, Pa. It was not an estimate of the number of children who might require treatment. The UPI and The Times had given currency to another statistic that had simply been pulled out of the air.

On August 2, The Washington Post carried a large UPI photo of a heavily bandaged baby being fed by a nurse. The caption supplied by UPI read: "Nurse feeds a seven-month-old baby who lost both arms and was severely burned late yesterday afternoon when an Israeli jet accidently (sic) hit a Christian residential area in East Beirut during a raid on Palestinian positions to the west." The photo is said to have moved President Reagan, who mentioned it to the Israeli foreign minister when he called at the White House that day.

The Israelis made a very careful investigation of this case. They interviewed the doctor who treated the child and two nurses at the hospital. They had two Israeli doctors examine the child. They found that the child had not lost its arms. It has suffered a fracture in one arm and a superficial burn on the face. The broken arm has been placed in a cast. At the time the child was examined by the Israeli doctors it was recovering nicely.

The child has also been photographed by photographers for the Associated Press and Time magazine. They were interviewed by an Israeli journalist who reported that neither recalled anything being said about the child having lost its arms. The AP photographer has reported that the baby has been injured by the PLO shell. Confronted with the evidence that he had incorrectly described the baby's injuries, the UPI photographer is said to have insisted that there must have been two babies with the same name. The Israelis deny that this was the case. Their military investigators also confirmed that the injury resulted from PLO shelling, not an Israeli bomb.

On August 22, UPI sent out a story reporting what the Israeli government was saying both about the child's injuries and their cause. UPI Editor-in-chief H. L. Stevenson told AIM that he didn't know if the Israeli account was true or not, but he agreed to investigate the matter further. This was a change. On August 20, The Washington Post said UPI was standing by its story.

INFLAMMATORY STORIES

On August 15, the UPI provided its clients with a story by Julie Flint from Beirut that was inflammatory. "Beirut's hospitals are filled with Lebanese and Palestinians, guerrillas and civilians, who are victims of Israeli phosphorus shells, an anti-personnel weapon that produces deep burns," wrote Flint. She quoted doctors as saying there had been "hundreds of phosphorous victims." She described in gruesome detail the agony of those suffering from phosphorous burns, quoting a surgeon as saying, "Phosphorous produces the worst of all the burns. It keeps on burning. You pour water on the burn time and time again, but it doesn't go out. The skin sloughs away." Flint described one victim who had been wounded by a phosphorous shell. The doctor who treated him was quoted as saying, "We opened the bandages on the operating table and smoke came out. The man was wounded ten hours before. The leg had burned for ten hours."

Miss Flint, having described these as "anti-personnel" weapons, said Red Cross officials in Geneva had said that a 1977 protocol prohibiting the use of "inhumane weapons that cause unnecessary suffering" covered phosphorous. She also noted that a 1980 UN convention had restricted the use of incendiary weapons against military objectives in civilian areas.

The facts are different. Israeli authorities pointed out that phosphorous shells have been used by armies the world over for many years as "markers" for the artillery. The smoke they give off shows the gunners where the shells are landing and enables them to better zero in on their targets. They are not designed or used as antipersonnel weapons as Miss Flint had reported.

Loren Jenkins, writing in The Washington Post on August 20, said it was impossible to tell how many civilians had been killed or injured by phosphorous shells in Beirut. He said that hospital records did not distinguish between patients suffering from phosphorous and other burns, and pressure on hospital laboratories had made chemical analyses of the causes of burns impossible. In contrast to Miss Flint's assertion that the hospitals were "filled" with victims of phosphorous shells, Jenkins quoted the chief of surgery at the American University hospital in Beirut as saying, "Most of the serious injuries we were getting during the early part of the war were from bullets and shrapnel. In the last two or three weeks, though, we have been getting a number of serious burns patients."

ARE THE MEDIA ANTI-ISRAELI?

Israel has long had an excellent press in the United States, but it seems clear that even though the American public has not switched from being predominantly pro-Israel as a result of the invasion of Lebanon, there has been a noticeable change in the attitude of many in the media.

When a newspaper is offered an opinion ad that it doesn't agree with, the usual procedure is to go over the text with a fine-tooth comb to find factual errors or other plausible reasons for rejecting the ad. Accuracy in Media has encountered this almost every time it has sought to place ads in the Washington Post or The New York Times. Virtually every statement has to be documented.

The willingness of these and other newspapers to accept the highly inaccurate ad placed by the phoney organization, "Concerned Americans for Peace," without even checking to see whether such an organization existed or whether the respected relief agencies had authorized the use of their names is highly significant. Such controversial ads have to be approved by senior officials of the paper. The failure to give this ad the same treatment that is always given to Accuracy in Media ads is a clear indication that the senior official of these papers liked the ad's message.

This was reflected in the news stories, the photos, and the editorial pages of many of our leading newspapers, as well as in the reporting on TV. According to one count, 17 of the first 19 articles about the war in Lebanon on the Op-ed page of The New York Times were critical of Israel. The trend in The Washington Post was similar. Op-ed articles ran 20 to 4 against Israel and the editorials were 7 to 0 in the first weeks of the war.

The attitude that led the editors and publishers to accept the phoney organization's ad has also led them to accept wild exaggerations in news stories and questionable photos. Martin Peretz, the editor of the liberal New Republic magazine, was one of the first to expose those exaggerations after returning from a trip to Lebanon. Interviewed on a Washington radio talk show, Peretz was asked why professional journalists would engage in such inaccurate reporting. He replied, "Revolutionary movements . . . still seem to have some romantic cachet and way of engaging sympathy with the Western press." Martin Peretz should know. He was a leader in the anti-Vietnam movement.

The PLO is Marxist. It is backed by the Soviet Union and in turn it has given assistance to communist guerrillas in such countries as far-away Nicaragua. Those who have been responsible for distorted reporting and editorial comment supporting every communist-backed guerrilla movement in Latin America, Africa and the Far East were often restrained in dealing with the PLO and Israel. There was a lot more risk in trying to make popular heroes of the PLO than in performing that service for the Sandinistas or the guerrillas in El Salvador, Rhodesia or Southwest Africa.

The Israeli invasion of Lebanon and the resulting casualties among innocent civilians provided an opportunity for some in the media to side as openly with the communist-backed terrorists in Lebanon as they had been siding with them elsewhere in the world. Those pro-terrorist journalists have had great success in intimidating the U.S. government, deterring it from taking the forceful action necessary to administer a decisive defeat to the terrorists anywhere in the last 20 years. Israel drove them into paroxysms of rage by refusing to be capitulate under their attack. The Washington Post/ABC poll suggests that the majority of the American people also tuned them out.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

We have cited two emotion-laden inaccurate UPI reports from Lebanon. Those responsible deserve to be at least reprimanded. We suggest that you write to H. L. Stevenson, Editor-in-Chief, United Press International, 220 E. 42nd St., New York, N.Y. 10017 about the photo of the baby and phosphorous shell story by Julie Flint.●

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 6956 TO CUT FUNDING FOR CENTAUR

HON. RONNIE G. FLIPPO

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, I intend to offer an amendment to the HUD-independent agencies bill, H.R. 6956, to eliminate funding which has been added for the sole-source procurement of a Shuttle/Centaur upper stage. In a few brief paragraphs I want to outline the arguments surrounding this issue, what my amendment would do, why I feel that is the correct way to go, and then document my argument with previous letters from NASA and DOD.

The issue concerns how the United States should proceed in developing a higher energy upper stage for use with the Space Shuttle. We have the Space Shuttle which is working well, but which has limits. By design, the Shuttle will only reach orbits of a few hundred miles altitude. To go higher—for example, to go to the commercially important geostationary orbit at 22,000 miles or to the planets—an additional rocket stage is needed and this is called an "upper stage."

We usually measure the performance of upper stages in terms of the amount of weight that can be carried to geostationary orbit (GSO) 22,000 miles up. At present, we have the "inertial upper stage" (UIS) developed by the Air Force under a joint agreement with NASA which can deliver 5,000 pounds to geosynchronous orbit. The Appropriations Committee bill would provide funds for development of a different upper stage—the "Centaur" by sole-source contract which could deliver approximately 10,000 to 12,000 pounds to geosynchronous orbit. The Centaur is not new—it has been used for some time as an upper stage for expendable boosters. It would have to be substantially modified for use in the Shuttle. Significantly, the Shuttle and several spacecraft already in development would also have to be modified. All these additional modifications will be very expensive and have not been adequately considered. Depending on how you do the accounting, the added costs could be several hundred million dollars.

Centaur advocates say it would be inexpensive because it already exists. But the "already exists" argument cuts both ways. First, Centaur has to be modified to fit the Shuttle. Second, there is already existing hardware (in the Shuttle and in spacecraft in development) that would have to be modified at great cost.

Perhaps this cost would be worthwhile if we had missions that demanded the extra capability. As of now we do not. The IUS can handle all firmly planned missions. Both NASA and the Air Force have assured me of that, as the letters below confirm.

So, as of right now, we do not have a hard requirement that cannot be met by the inertial upper stage.

What of the future? Spacecraft will grow. In the late eighties needs will outgrow current IUS capabilities, although IUS may be modified slightly to meet some of this growth. But by the early 1990's spacecraft will have grown beyond the capability of Centaur (which is already near optimum design, being an older design rocket).

In addition, NASA proposes to develop the Centaur without competition, always a questionable practice. There is adequate time to conduct an open competition for the next generation upper stage and assure that we get a capability which will carry us into the mid-1990's.

My amendment would take another step toward this by deleting funds for noncompetitive Centaur procurement in 1983.

The NASA authorization bill for fiscal year 1983, H.R. 5890, which passed the House on May 13, 1982, contained funding to begin a competitive process for a new upper stage. So my amendment would conform H.R. 6956 to language the House has already passed.

My amendment was printed in yesterday's RECORD, but since it is brief, let me repeat it here;

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FLIPPO TO H.R. 6956

On page 20, line 13, strike out "$5,542,800,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,402,800,000", and

On page 20, line 17, insert immediately before the period the following: "Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated under this heading shall be obligated or otherwise made available for the sole-source procurement of the design, development, or production of liquid-hydrogen, liquid-oxygen (Centaur) upper stages".

Finally, I want to put two letters in the RECORD. One from the Air Force outlines their needs and the tremendous extra costs of Centaur. The second, from NASA and the Air Force describes the lack of justification for Centaur. I commend these letters to your attention:

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
Washington, D.C. August 16, 1982.

Hon. DON FUQUA,
Chairman, Committee on Science and Technology, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter responds to your request for an assessment of the applicability of Centaur for DOD use. Our assessment covers both Centaur performance and cost.

Currently designed DOD spacecraft will not likely grow beyond the 6000-7000 pound range which could be accommodated by improvements in the Inertial Upper Stage (IUS) performance. However, we expect the next generation of DOD spacecraft which fly in the late 1980s & 1990s will be designed with extensive survivability measures (including large maneuvering propellant reserves) which will probably increase total weight well beyond IUS capabilities. Consequently, it appears that a new higher energy upper stage (HEUS) will be required for the next generation of DOD geosynchronous spacecraft.

The Congressionally directed use of the Centaur by NASA for their Galileo and ISPM planetary exploration missions adds about $100 million to DOD IUS program costs. To be of use to DOD, the Centaur would have to be modified into a 20 foot long version to be Shuttle compatible with DOD payloads. It would cost an additional $400-900 million (above the $634M NASA Centaur budget) for DOD spacecraft to make the transition from IUS to the modified Centaur. Our situation differs from NASA's in that we have several existing—and continuing—operational spacecraft programs configured for the IUS. Thus, our cost estimates include reconfiguring the NASA planetary Centaur and the DOD spacecraft to use the 20 foot version of Centaur.

Independent of the Congressional direction to NASA on the use of Centaur, we continue to believe that DOD requirements beyond IUS capability can best by met by a competitively developed new Higher Energy Upper Stage. A Centaur derivative would, of course, be a logical alternative in the HEUS competition. We do not see how legislation which dictates specific technical upper stage decisions can be helpful in giving DOD the flexibility it needs to develop a HEUS which is both optimized for DOD missions and is cost effective.

I hope this assessment of Centaur applicability for DOD missions satisfies your needs. Please advise me if I can be of further assistance.

Sincerely,

VERNE ORR,
Secretary of the Air Force.

NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., July 13, 1982.

Hon. RONNIE G. FLIPPO,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications, Committee on Science and Technology, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We urge your careful review of a major issue regarding H.R. 6685, the Urgent Supplemental. The bill, as amended by the Senate, contains direction for NASA to develop, via sole source contracts, the Centaur upper stage for its planetary missions and to cancel procurement of the Inertial Upper Stage (IUS) vehicles now being bought on an Air Force contract for these missions.

While the use of the Centaur for NASA planetary missions was cost effective a year ago, NASA has proceeded to develop these missions using the IUS for the past six months. The result is that a return to the Centaur will significantly increase mission costs. Moreover, since we have also proceeded with the procurement of the IUS vehicles and manfacturing effort has gone forward for a half a year, a NASA cancellation will increase substantially the costs of the remaining IUS vehicles for the DOD. NASA is presently discussing with contractors small improvements to existing stages to meet the near-term growth requirements for commercial payloads. If a small increase in payload capacity is required for DOD payloads, this can be similarly accommodated. Since there are no other NASA or firm DOD requirements for the Centaur upper stage prior to approximately 1988 in the 1980s, there can be no justification for these increased costs since a high energy upper stage (HEUS) can be developed when a requirement exists in the late 1980s.

We therefore believe the Nation would be better served if the Air Force and NASA are permitted to proceed with a carefully structured high energy upper stage program. This approach would be far more effective and beneficial since a HEUS would be required whether or not we develop the Centaur. The USAF and NASA have developed an agreement in principle for a joint HEUS program structured to meet commercial, scientific and military needs for the 1990s.

We therefore request your assistance to eliminate the restrictive and wasteful direction on the Centaur upper stage as was indicated in the President's first veto message.

Sincerely,

JAMES M. BEGGS,
Administrator.
VERNE ORR,
Secretary of the Air Force.●

HANDGUN BODY COUNT

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. Speaker, every month more than 400 Americans are killed with handguns and more than 5,000 are wounded in crimes involving handguns. Obviously our present handgun control laws are not sufficient. A gun in every hand is not the answer to crime. Legislation that would stop the easy availability of handguns is now supported by a majority of Americans and we in Congress should listen to the cries of American citizens.

Today, though, the situation remains unchanged. The handgun body count for the month of June registered 552. It saddens me that in my own State of Florida, there were 76 handgun deaths, the highest number reported in any State. Since January, 3,773 handgun deaths have been accounted for.

TRIBUTE TO MRS. CHRIS EVERT LLOYD

HON. E. CLAY SHAW, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend and congratulate an outstanding athlete and fine young woman, Mrs. Chris Evert Lloyd, winner of the 1982 U.S. Open Women's Tennis Championship.

History was in the making, though no one knew this for certain, when Mrs. Lloyd, a native of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and Ms. Hana Mandlikova, a native of Czechoslovakia, squared off for the final match of the U.S. Open.

Throughout the 2 weeks of the Open, Mrs. Lloyd spoke of motivation and how tough it was to maintain year after year.

Her motivation and determination paid off this past Saturday as she captured the title of the U.S. Open 6–3, 6–1 before a capacity crowd at the National Tennis Center in Flushing Meadows, N.Y.

Though history was being made at this 101-year-old tournament, Mrs. Lloyd's concentration and determination were so strong during the 1-hour-4-minute final that she had problems recalling the details of the match after she won her final volley.

Saturday's victory gave the 27-year-old Mrs. Lloyd her sixth victory at the U.S. Open. She is only the third woman to do so.

Mrs. Lloyd won her first U.S. Open in 1975 at the age of 20. She went on to win the Open in 1976, 1977, 1978, and 1980.

The victory also gave Mrs. Lloyd her 66th career victory in singles play at the Open championship, an Open record. Her record there now reads 66-6 in 12 years of play.

And finally, with this victory, she has become the first woman, ever, to win a grand slam event 9 consecutive years in a row.

Mrs. Lloyd's present addition to the anals of history further compliments the superb record this outstanding athlete and fine young woman has already established.

Mrs. Lloyd began her tennis career at the age of 6 in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., under the guidance and supervision of another pro, her father, Jimmy Evert. After winning numerous junior titles, Mrs. Lloyd turned professional and joined the pro circuit at the age of 18.

Since joining the pro tour, she has traveled worldwide, winning tournaments in the United States, Europe, and Australia. Mrs. Lloyd has triumphed in three Wimbledon and four French Open tournaments and has been ranked No. 1 worldwide in 7 of the past 8 years.

At the age of 27, Mrs. Lloyd has assured us that her career will not end here, but will continue for several more years. She has plans to play in several more tournaments in the United States and Europe and perhaps one in Australia at the end of this year.

Mrs. Lloyd, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, congratulations on a victory well earned and the new chapter in tennis history you have given to us all.●

BADGE OF ACHIEVEMENT

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to announce that Mr. Christopher A. Hane of Randallstown, Md., has achieved the revered rank of eagle scout. Mr. Hane, a lifelong parishioner of the Holy Family Catholic Church, is a member of Scout Troop No. 970. I have had the pleasure of knowing Chris personally when he served as my congressional page earlier this year. I am grateful to Chris for all the good work he did on my behalf in that demanding position. It is Chris' dedication and perseverance that has earned Chris a Maryland distinguished scholarship to study international relations at the Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore.

Chris' parents, Herbert and Brigitta of 8830 Meadow Heights Drive, also deserve to be congratulated on their fine job as loving parents to Chris and his three brothers and sisters. Mr. Hane, an employee at the Health Care Finance Administration, is also a little league soccer coach, while Mrs. Hane is active with the parish school's parents association and attends community college as a business student.

Chris can be proud of this outstanding accomplishment. The rank of eagle scout is a symbol of honor which reflects the highest ideals and principles of Scouting and responsible citizenship. This badge of achievement will serve Chris well wherever he may go in life. Chris is a fine young man and I wish him much continued success.●

THE MOSCOW HELSINKI MONITORING GROUP ENDS ITS WORK

HON. JONATHAN B. BINGHAM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, last week I received the news that the Moscow Helsinki Group announced its dissolution at a press conference on September 8 in Moscow. The announcement was made by Elena Bonner, wife of banished academician Andrei Sakharov. As a Commissioner of the U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the government body charged by law with monitoring compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act of 1975, I view this latest development with the utmost regret, and with genuine apprehension for the future of security and cooperation in Europe.

The Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group, along with the several other Soviet Helsinki groups that were subsequently formed, established the goal of monitoring instances of human rights violations in the Soviet Union. As most of my colleagues are aware, it was not long before the Helsinki monitors were themselves the victims of the repression that they had set out to combat.

One of these victims is Viktor Nekipelov, a pharmacologist and writer, 53 years old, who was sentenced on June 13, 1980, to 7 years in strict regime labor camp and 5 years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda."

Born in Harbin, China, Nekipelov came to the U.S.S.R. with his parents when he was 9 years old. Two years later, in 1939, his mother vanished in the Great Purge. As he began to contact dissidents and voice his own political protests, Nekipelov became the target of official harassment in the late 1960's and early 1970's. He was arrested and tried in July of 1973 according to article 190-1 of the RSFSR Criminal Code, "slandering the Soviet state." He was sentenced to 3 years in prison. At one point during his imprisonment, Nekipelov was sent to Serbsky Institute for Forensic Psychiatry in Moscow. In his book, "Institute for Fools," Nekipelov describes the conditions in psychiatric hospitals in the Soviet Union.

Upon Nekipelov's release, the KGB repeatedly harassed his family and initiated a series of searches of his home. Denied permission to emigrate, Nekipelov has so far been unsuccessful in his attempts to leave the country. A member of the International Pen Club, he joined the Moscow group in November of 1977 and since that year, he has contributed to many samizdat petitions and articles.

Mr. Speaker, although the official work of the Moscow Helsinki Group may have been suspended, there is no doubt in my mind that the struggle for basic human rights in the Soviet Union will continue. It is imperative that the Soviet Government realize that we in the free world have not forgotten the Moscow Helsinki monitors nor their fellow countrymen who have suffered for their commitment to the ideals embodied in the Helsinki Final Act.●

RESULTS OF ANNUAL QUESTIONNAIRE FROM 10TH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT

HON. JAMES T. BROYHILL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, every year I send to my constituents in the 10th Congressional District of North Carolina a questionnaire. These questions are based on the issues that come before me in Congress. Today I would like to share the results of the questionnaire with my colleagues.

The first question, "Do you favor higher tariffs and/or import quotas to protect American industry and American jobs, even though this would mean higher consumer prices?" found 57 percent saying "Yes" and 43 percent responding "No."

There were 84 percent who favored an amendment to the Constitution which would require a balanced budget, except in the time of a national emergency.

Nuclear power as a form of energy for the future was overwhelmingly approved by a 72-percent to 28-percent margin. This question also mentioned that adequate safeguards would be mandatory in the development of nuclear energy.

Over 70 percent of the returned questionnaires indicated that the Federal Government should not set up taxpayer-financed public service jobs to assist the unemployed.

There were two questions on the issue of abortion. The first was, "Do you think the Government should decide whether or not a woman is allowed to have an abortion?" The response was clear and overwhelmingly "No," 89 percent responded negatively. However, when asked whether taxpayers' funds should be used to pay for abortions to needy women, 72 percent said "No" and 28 percent said "Yes."

On the question of banning all handguns, 84 percent indicated that the Federal Government should not require this measure to be taken.

"Do you think the Government should require stronger health warnings on cigarette packages?" This question was polled at a 56-percent negative response to a 44-percent favorable response.

There were 60 percent of the people who favored requiring health warnings to be placed on alcoholic beverages.

On the controversial question of social security, several alternatives were mentioned. The ones receiving the most responses were borrowing funds from the general tax revenues to help bolster the program, reducing the cost-of-living increases and gradually increasing the age of retirement. Others considered were reducing the benefits uniformly and eliminating the cost-of-living increases totally.

The last question was, "How do you feel about the future of America compared to a year ago?" I was pleased to see that 35 percent of the people feel optimistic about the future. There were 30 percent who felt about the same as last year and 22 percent were pessimistic. Only 13 percent were undecided about how they felt.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am pleased with the way the majority of people in my district feel about the future and how they feel about the key issues which we have to examine in Congress.●

EXTRADITION BILL FLAWED

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, although I support efforts to reform the extradition process, I cannot support H.R. 6046 in its present form. This legislation, unfortunately, does not adequately protect the civil rights of persons sought for extradition. Accordingly, I plan to offer and support amendments to the bill to rectify its defects. Reform of the extradition process has been a long time in the coming, and I see no reason to rush through legislation without serious and intense debate about each of the bill's failings and about amendments to correct them.

First, the bill authorizes preventive detention for at least 10 days upon the mere request of a foreign government. This provision would affect citizens and noncitizens alike and would apply to those simply charged with, not convicted of, criminal acts. It should be remembered that many of the nations with whom we have treaty obligations to pursue extradition are repressive regimes—nations such as Haiti, Poland, and El Salvador. Thus, there is ample reason to guard zealously the rights of the persons sought. Persons sought for extradition, like criminal defendants, should be released in most instances because they need to prepare their cases and consult with counsel, and to avoid the unnecessary deprivation of liberty.

I am also concerned that the bill contains no specific limit on the time within which the Government must be ready to proceed with the extradition hearing. Such a time constraint would provide a necessary check against possible abuses by the Government. Without such a check, the person sought to be extradited could be incarcerated and languish in jail, possibly prejudiced by the loss of evidence, dimmed memories, and unnecessary anxiety.

There are other problems with the bill. For example, the definition of the traditional exception to extradition for political offenses is too narrow and does not sufficiently protect those whose alleged crimes were in fact political. Also, the bill would prohibit a court from inquiring into allegations that a foreign country is seeking extradition of a person in order to retaliate for that person's political or religious beliefs, race, or nationality.

Extradition is a very serious process, for the individuals involved and for the nations invoking our laws. We must be careful to explore all the possible ramifications of the bill. Toward that end, I look forward to and expect a vigorous debate on these and other issues.●

PUBLIC OPINION DEMANDS AN END TO THE NUCLEAR ARMS RACE

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, the rise of the nuclear freeze issue has been one of the more remarkable political developments of recent years. While it is clear that a nuclear freeze, by itself, is not a meaningful goal for governmental policy, it should be equally clear that a nuclear freeze is an essential first step to meaningful nuclear arms reductions.

I recently came upon an interesting and useful discussion with public opinion analyst Lou Harris on the nuclear arms issue and public opinion in the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. Since this issue is of growing interest to the public, and almost certain to be a major issue in this November's election, I wanted to share this interview with my colleagues. I hope that those who still doubt the public attitudes on this subject pay special attention to this article.

[From the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, August/September 1982]

A TALK WITH LOUIS HARRIS

(By Jamie Kalven)

Over the past year, we have witnessed an impressive awakening of world public opinion to the dangers of the nuclear arms race. The West European movement for European Nuclear Disarmament is now finding counterparts in the United States. And more modest expressions of concern have been heard from Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

The American public is concerned, even scared, by the enormously high level of nuclear deployments by the Soviet Union and the United States, but they are even more worried by the belligerent rhetoric of government leaders concerning the possibility of using these weapons. Not only do Administration officials speak of "limited nuclear options," but they speak of being able to "prevail" over the Soviet Union in a "protracted" nuclear war. With the help of such comments the American public is rapidly coming to realize that we must somehow get out from under the shadow of this Damoclean sword.

One measure of their concern was the massing of more than 700,000 in the streets of New York to greet the opening of the Second United Nations Special Session on Disarmament on June 12. Other measures are provided by Louis Harris in the following sketch of American public opinion on the problem of nuclear war.

The potential political implications of Harris's findings are stunning. And the phenomenon his figures delineate has already provoked a response from Washington: the Reagan Administration's new found passion for arms control as formulated in START. But if Harris's analysis is correct, it will take more than that to deflect the rising expectations of the American people. What is a scarcely discernible tremor in 1982 could turn into a political earthquake by 1984 unless there is measurable progress toward the elimination of any possible use of nuclear weapons as an instrument of international conflict resolution.

—BERNARD T. FELD.

"An incredible phenomenon"—these are the words public opinion analyst Louis Harris used in a recent interview with the Bulletin to describe his latest findings on public attitudes toward the threat of nuclear war.

Few people bring a more seasoned perspective to bear on questions of public opinion than Harris. Director of one of the most respected polling organizations in the country, he has been taking soundings on the attitudes of the American people for more than 30 years. And he says he can recall nothing quite like the "urgent hunger for peace" disclosed by his recent polls.

Consider the following findings on attitudes toward a nuclear arms freeze and toward a nuclear arms reduction agreement with the Soviet Union:

A large majority (73 to 23 percent) favors every country that has nuclear weapons banning the production, storage, and use of those weapons.

An even larger majority (86 to 11 percent) wants the United States and the Soviet Union to negotiate a nuclear arms reduction agreement.

Another large majority (81 to 16 percent) wants the United States and the Soviet Union to agree not to produce any new nuclear weapons, provided both have a rough equivalence of such weapons today.

"These results are startling and simply cannot be ignored," says Harris. And it is unlikely that they will be ignored by elected officials, in view of figures like this: 56 percent of the voters say that they would vote against a candidate for Congress who favored escalation of the nuclear arms race, even if they agreed with him on almost every other issue: while only 14 percent say they would vote for him under such circumstances.

One of the most remarkable characteristics of the public's thinking, in Harris's view, is that it goes beyond the proposals that are presently under consideration. "Perhaps the most striking number in all the research we've done on the subject," he reports, "is that by 74 to 22 percent, a big majority of the American people, say that they want all countries that have nuclear weapons to destroy them." Another large majority (66 to 31 percent) think it is immoral for any country to produce more nuclear weapons.

Harris interprets these findings to mean that if an agreement were reached between the two superpowers to freeze or reduce nuclear weapons, the public would demand further reductions, and then further reductions, beyond that, until the last nuclear weapons were eliminated.

How does he account for this phenomenon? The single most important factor, he says, is probably "a growing distrust of the rulers of the two superpowers." People have long been aware "in a passive kind of way" of the threat of nuclear destruction. But now they are "genuniely frightened"—"Frightened in an activated as opposed to a passive way"—by the perception that "the leaders of the Soviet Union and the leaders of the United States are heading toward a nuclear confrontation." This fear is reflected in the 52 to 45 percent majority of the American people who are worried that President Reagan will get us into another war. And it is reflected in the portrait of the Soviet leaders that emerges from the following figures:

A large majority of the American people (84 percent) see the Soviet Union as a threat to the security of the United States.

A 2-to-1 majority (63 to 23 percent) think that there is a likelihood over the next 40 years that the Soviet Union will attack the United States.

A substantial majority (69 to 24 percent) think the Soviet leaders would not hesitate to use nuclear arms, if they were desperate enough.

Fully 49 percent of the American people view the Soviet Union as an outright "enemy," while another 31 percent think the Soviet Union is unfriendly toward the United States even if not our enemy. Thus, an 80 to 10 percent majority see the Soviet Union as a power hostile to the Inited States. These figures reflect a marked deterioration since 1976 when a 69 to 21 percent majority saw the Soviet Union as hostile—a deterioration Harris attributes to the impact of Afghanistan and Poland. (According to Harris, only three other powers in the world are viewed with a comparable degree of suspicion: Iran is viewed as hostile by 80 to 16 percent; Libya by 66 to 22 percent; and the Palestine Liberation Organization by 73 to 15 percent.)

In sharp contrast to their feelings about the Soviet state, Harris notes, the American people "feel remarkably little hostility toward the Russian people on a people-to-people basis." Thus, while 80 percent regard the Soviet Union as a power hostile to the United States, no more than 19 percent think the Russian people are unfriendly toward the American people; and only 9 percent feel unfriendly toward the Russian people.

Harris also points out that American distrust of the Soviet Union cannot be attributed entirely to the fact that it is a communist country, for there is a major communist country which is now seen as a close ally by 15 percent of Americans and as a friendly power, if not a close ally, by another 55 percent; the People's Republic of China. Viewed in light of the fact that in 1976 a 74 to 17 percent majority saw China as a hostile power, the finding that 70 percent of the American people now regard China as a friend should serve as a reminder that the enmities that fuel the nuclear arms race may prove more temporary, more ephemeral, than they seem at the moment.

One of the central themes that emerges from Harris's findings is the strength of the American people's desire to seek areas of agreement with the Soviets. This desire is all the more striking, Harris notes, because it moves against the undertow of such deep distrust. By a "huge margin" of 78 to 7 percent, the American people believe that the Soviets only want agreements when they can gain an advantage; and by another large margin of 75 to 21 percent, they are skeptical that the Soviets will keep their end of agreements. Yet despite this, 8 out of 10 American (83 to 15 percent) think it is important for the United States to try to establish better relations with the Soviet Union.

This general attitude is reflected in strong support for a wide range of potential agreements between the two countries:

A large majority (82 to 16 percent) would like to see the START talks end in agreement.

An almost identical majority (83 to 14 percent) think it is urgent for the two countries to reach agreement on capping, limiting, or reducing nuclear arms in each country.

The desire for agreement also reaches into a number of other areas:

Nearly all Americans (90 to 5 percent) would like an agreement to help end the world's energy problems.

Another big majority (88 to 6 percent) would favor agreement on a joint undertaking to curb air and water pollution.

There is a desire for agreements on matters the Soviets are not particularly eager to negotiate:

A big majority (85 to 3 percent) would like a U.S.-Soviet agreement that would enable Jews to leave the Soviet Union more easily.

Another large majority (85 to 5 percent) would like an agreement that would give more freedom to writers and scientists within the Soviet Union.

And there is as well a desire for agreements in areas where the United States has shown a reluctance to negotiate:

A large majority (72 to 16 percent) would favor an expansion of U.S.-Soviet trade.

A plurality (49 to 32 percent) would support giving the Soviet Union a "most favored nation" status in trade.

Thus, despite their skepticism about the good faith of the Soviet government, the American people want their government to seek out as many areas of agreement with the Soviet Union as possible. Harris characterizes their attitude this way: "They're saying we've got to try it, because the alternative to having agreements is building tensions which could lead to war—and to oblivion. The alternative has become unacceptable.".

Harris cautions that this does not mean "that America has lost the will to defend itself" or that the public is moved to negotiate out of a sense of weakness. "The only kind of agreements people here want," he emphasizes, "are those which are to the mutual advantage of both parties."

It is precisely this concern with mutuality, he reports, that makes the present moment "seem particularly ripe to the American people" as a time to negotiate nuclear arms agreements with the Soviet Union. For a majority of Americans now feel that there is rough equivalence in nuclear strength between the two countries and hence that "This is the right time to do something." The shift in public opinion on this point over the last two years has been dramatic: In 1980 a 57 to 37 percent majority felt the United States was weaker than the Soviet Union. Today, by contrast, a 59 to 38 percent majority feel the United States and the Soviet Union are roughly in parity.

The public's insistence on mutuality is also apparent in the response Harris and his colleagues received when they recently asked the following question: "Would you favor or oppose the U.S. deciding to gradually dismantle our nuclear weapons before getting an agreement from other countries to do the same?" By 82 to 15 percent, people who had favored a nuclear freeze by 6 to 1 declared that they would oppose any such move. The moral, as Harris sees it, is that "the American people want to negotiate from a position of rough parity and want a freeze or reduction of nuclear weapons to leave each country in a state of rough parity." Any suggestion that the United States disarmed unilaterally, he warns, will "blight" the emerging public constituency for nuclear arms control.

What other dangers does he foresee? There is, he says, one other "very important" danger: It would, in his view, be "a mistake" to couple the nuclear war issue with other issues—for example, to argue that money being spent on the nuclear arms race should be spent on various social programs. Such a strategy would, he argues, "weaken rather than strengthen the movement, because what you're doing then is saying to people: 'Look, in order for you to join my anti-nuclear movement, you have to agree to call for a restoration of food stamps or something.' "

He advises: "If you want to be effective on this issue, you must zero in on it. The movement is much stronger on a straight-forward, simple basis. I don't think it's an oversimplification simply to say: 'We demand that this potential scourge of humanity be halted and finally ended.' The more you diffuse the issue with a whole series of other issues, the more you weaken the movement."

In Harris's view, any such effort to integrate the nuclear war issue with other issues misconceives—and undermines—the unique strength of the movement. That strength resides in the fact that this is an issue that affects everyone equally, an issue that has aroused the common concern of people who may agree about little else.

"There is no way," says Harris, "to paint the people who are affected by this issue into a simple mold and say they check out on this or that stereotype. They don't. This cuts right across the spectrum of social and political divisions in this country. It's an idea that will not go away. It's going to be with us until the final weapons are obliterated."●

WE DO NOT NEED EXPENSIVE ALGERIAN NATURAL GAS AT A TIME OF PLENTIFUL LOWER 48 DOMESTIC SUPPLIES

HON. TOM CORCORAN

OF ILLINOIS

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, last Friday I was joined by our colleagues CLARENCE J. BROWN of Ohio and DAN COATS of Indiana in protesting the planned import of Algerian liquefied natural gas (LNG) by Texas-based Panhandle Eastern Corp. and their subsidiary Trunkline LNG Co. The LNG was loaded over the weekend and is now enroute to Louisiana. The ship is scheduled to arrive in Lake Charles, La., on about September 26. Panhandle Eastern and Trunkline supply natural gas customers in Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, and Ohio.

We object to this importation, Mr. Speaker, because the LNG will be more expensive than most lower 48 domestically produced natural gas. Especially as we approach the winter heating season, it is very poor planning on the part of Panhandle to begin importing expensive foreign natural gas, particularly at a time when domestic supplies of gas are so plentiful. We should be utilizing our less expensive and readily available lower 48 gas, but Federal law today encourages using gas found in very deep—over 15,000 feet—formations, imported liquefied gas, Canadian and Mexican gas, and Alaskan gas.

We filed our protest with the Department of Energy's Economic Regulatory Administration (ERA) and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC). ERA has the primary responsibility for deciding whether the import or export of gas is in the public interest. FERC exercises authority over domestic rates, siting, construction, and operation of particular facilities, and the place of entry or imported gas.

Several organizations and individuals have filed protests with ERA and/or FERC. The ERA docket number is 82-12-LNG and the FERC docket number is RP-82-127-000. Organizations and individuals protesting the import of Algerian LNG include: Congressmen TOM CORCORAN, CLARENCE J. BROWN, DAN COATS, ROBERT H. MICHEL, and PAUL FINDLEY; the Illinois Commerce Commission, the Associated Natural Gas Co., the Battle Creek Gas Co., the Central Illinois Light Co., the Central Illinois Public Service Co., the Citizens Gas Fuel Co., the Michigan Gas Utilities Co., the Missouri Utilities Co., the Ohio Gas Co., the Richmond Gas Corp., the Southeastern Michigan Gas Co., the Toledo Edison Co., the Consumers Power Co., the State of Michigan, the Michigan Public Service Commission, the Michigan Consolidated Gas Co., and several businesses filing as members of the Association of Businesses Advocating Tariff Equity (ABATE).

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of our colleagues, I would like to include in the RECORD at this point the texts of my September 10 letter to the Administrator of ERA, with which the petition was filed, the September 10 letter to Fossil and Synthetic Fuels Subcommittee Chairman PHILIP R. SHARP in which Mr. BROWN, Mr. COATS, and I ask that Panhandle be scheduled as a witness at the already scheduled Friday hearing on natural gas pipeline issues, and the Corcoran-Brown-Coats petition filed with ERA. We also filed a substantially identical petition with FERC.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., September 10, 1982.

RAYBURN HANZLIK,
Administrator, Economic Regulatory Administration,
Washington, D.C.

Re: Docket No. 82-12-LNG

DEAR MR. HANZLIK: Enclosed for filing on behalf of Tom Corcoran, Dan Coats, and Clarence J. Brown, Members of the United States Congress, is an original and 15 copies of a Joint Petition to Intervene in a proceeding before the ERA initiated by Consumers Power Company titled: "Petition For An Order To Show Cause Why Order Approving The Importation Of Liquified Natural Gas Should Not be Vacated And For Order Suspending License Pending Expedited Hearing." As you know, the project to which this proceeding relates involves the importation of LNG from Algeria by Trunkline LNG Company.

I and my colleagues who seek intervention in this proceeding represent constituents who either are served by companies which must purchase this very expensive natural gas or are served by companies which hold licenses to import Algerian LNG and which may seek to import LNG in the near future, pending the outcome of this case. It seems to us incredible that Trunkline would choose a time like now to commence imports of Algerian LNG. Even without the price increases attributable to Algerian LNG, Panhandle has told the natural gas consumers it serves that rates will increase as much as 40 percent this year. Virtually every natural gas pipeline in the country, now has more natural gas than it can sell and is shutting in significant amounts of domestic natural gas production. The natural gas over-supply situation has deteriorated to the point where natural gas is actually being flared in Ohio.

We support the comprehensive analysis of the legal issues set forth by Consumers Power in its petition regarding Trunkline's LNG plans. Our purpose in intervening is not, however, to add to the discussion of those issues, but to put that discussion in a broader energy policy context. We believe that this is worthwhile, even imperative, because this Trunkline proceeding is conclusive proof of a natural gas supply policy gone haywire.

To the extent that Trunkline is to blame for selecting a very high cost and unstable supply of natural gas, and trying to bring that supply in at what is surely the worse possible time, the consumers served by Trunkline and Panhandle must be protected. To the extent that Federal natural gas regulatory policy is responsible for this situation, that policy must be changed.

With the loading of Trunkline's first cargo of LNG scheduled to commence tomorrow, we urge you to act as quickly as possible on the Petition filed by Consumers.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely yours,

TOM CORCORAN,
Representative in Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C. September 10, 1982.

Hon. PHILIP R. SHARP,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, Committee on Energy and Commerce, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We are writing today to urge that you invite Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company and Columbia Gas Transmission Corporation to be witnesses at the already scheduled September 17 Fossil and Synthetic Fuels Subcommittee hearing on natural gas pipeline issues.

Our desire to include Panhandle and Columbia as witnesses has been spurred by Panhandle's plans to import Algerian liquified natural gas (LNG) beginning tomorrow and by recent disclosures that natural gas in Ohio shut in by Columbia is being flared. As you can see from the enclosed copies of petitions we filed today with the Department of Energy's Economic Regulatory Administration (ERA) and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC), we oppose the importation of expensive foreign natural gas when an apparent oversupply of domestic natural gas exists. We think it would be useful to discuss this situation with Panhandle and Columbia representatives at the September 17 hearing here in Washington—prior to the planned arrival of LNG in Louisiana.

Also enclosed for your information is a copy of very recent correspondence between Tom Corcoran and ERA regarding the role of the Federal government in connection with the import of natural gas.

We commend you on the current series of natural gas hearings being conducted by the subcommittee. As members of the subcommittee, we look forward to working with you in making the September 17 hearing even more useful by including Panhandle and Columbia as witnesses.

Sincerely,

CLARENCE J. BROWN.
DAN COATS.
TOM CORCORAN.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA BEFORE THE ECONOMIC REGULATORY ADMINISTRATION

Consumers Power Company v. Trunkline LNG Company and Trunkline Gas Company: Docket No. 82-12-LNG

JOINT PETITION TO INTERVENE

Tom Corcoran, Dan Coats, and Clarence J. Brown, Members of the United States Congress, hereby petition for leave to intervene in the above-captioned proceeding pursuant to Section 1.8 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure adopted by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and the Economic Regulatory Administration.

Tom Corcoran represents the Fifteenth District of Illinois and is a Member of the Fossil and Synthetic Fuels Subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee. Natural gas consumers in his District are served by distribution companies which are wholesale customers of Panhandle Eastern Pipeline Company (Panhandle), a corporate affiliate of Trunkline and Trunkline LNG.

Dan Coats represents the Fourth District of Indiana and is also a Member of the Fossil and Synthetic Fuels Subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee. Natural gas consumers in his District are served by distribution companies which are wholesale customers of Panhandle Eastern Pipeline Company.

Clarence J. Brown currently represents the Seventh Congressional District of the State of Ohio and is the Ranking Minority Member of the Fossil and Synthetic Fuels Subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee. The natural gas consumers in his District are served by wholesale customers of Columbia Gas Transmission Corporation (Columbia) which has previously been granted a license to import liquefied natural gas from Algeria (See DOE/ERA Op. No. 11, Columbia LNG Corp., Docket No. 70-14-LNG, Dec. 29, 1979), although no such import activity is currently planned.

Communications with respect to this Petition should be addressed to: Linda Gillespie Stuntz, Associate Minority Counsel, Committee on Energy and Commerce, U.S. House of Representatives, H2-564 Annex No. 2, Washington, D.C. 20515, (202) 226-3400.

Petitioners support the case against Trunkline LNG's imminent importation of Algerian LNG which has been made so well by Consumers Power Company.[1] The purpose of this petition is not to repeat the arguments set forth by Consumers but rather to present and address the fundamental question raised by Trunkline's importation of liquified natural gas from Algeria.

Why, at a time when natural gas pipelines all across the country (including Panhandle and Trunkline) are experiencing surplus deliverability of natural gas, when gas prices have risen to the point that industrial users are switching off or shutting down, is Panhandle bringing in very expensive Algerian natural gas? In other words, why would any business do something that is so economically foolish?

Although Panhandle must be held responsible for having selected such a costly and insecure supply of natural gas, the answer to this fundamental question lies in the way in which this country regulates the natural gas industry. The economic insanity of shutting in or flaring domestic gas, as is happening right now in Ohio, while more expensive imported natural gas is delivered to consumers, could only happen in an industry distorted by Federal regulation. Any regulatory structure that permits, even encourages this, must be changed.

It is this system of regulation that makes companies like Panhandle responsible for planning in 1975 how to secure the natural gas supply that will be needed in 1982. Panhandle, unfortunately, chose to meet this future supply obligation by developing the capacity to import Algerian natural gas. Not one objection was made when Panhandle sought a license to import LNG in 1976. Panhandle subsequently spent more than half a billion dollars on LNG facilities, pursuant to the terms of that license.

Now, the LNG is finally to be delivered. Panhandle's timing could hardly be worse. As it turns out, Panhandle and every other pipeline were wrong about the needs of gas consumers in 1982. The blame lies not entirely with Panhandle, however, but with a system of government regulation that encourages companies to turn to the most expensive and insecure supplies of natural gas, like LNG, rather than sensibly developing domestic national resources. This regulatory system now denies companies like Panhandle the flexibility to respond to a gas market that is changing in ways and at a speed no one could foresee.

Natural gas regulation, including the regulation of natural gas imports, needs to be changed, but not on an ad hoc basis in this proceeding. Rather, Petitioners call on the ERA and the FERC to re-examine and revise this nation's LNG policy in light of the current developments in the natural gas industry. Only in this way can the interests of consumers in adequate supplies of natural gas at sensible prices be truly protected.

CONCLUSION

A fairer and more rational natural gas supply policy must be adopted. The testimony presented at the hearings currently being conducted by the Fossil and Synthetic Fuels Subcommittee on the status of the natural gas industry should be considered by the ERA and by FERC in their review of Trunkline's activity and LNG policy generally. Petitioners stand ready to assist the ERA and FERC in arriving at a resolution of this matter which truly is "in the public interest."

Respectfully submitted,

TOM CORCORAN,
DAN COATS,
CLARENCE J. BROWN,
Members of Congress.●

[1] Petitioners understand that United States Congressmen Robert H. Michel and Paul Findley, and a number of natural gas distribution companies from Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, Indiana and Ohio also intend to file today a Petition with the ERA to suspend Trunkline's authorization to import Algerian LNG pending final hearing and resolution of issues raised concerning the propriety of Trunkline's plans to commence Algerian LNG imports. Petitioners herein also support this effort. In addition, petitioners are today also filing a Petition to Intervene in support of the complaint filed by Michigan Consolidated Gas Company (Consolidated) before the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (Docket No. RP82-127-000) in which Consolidated has asked the Commission to reject any tariff sheets filed by Trunkline LNG, Trunkline or Panhandle which provide for the pass through of LNG costs to their customers.

ADMIRAL RAMBONNET

HON. C. W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced private legislation for the relief of Adm. Henri E. Rambonnet and his wife, Jeanne.

Admiral Rambonnet is a remarkable individual with a very colorful and unique past. Born in 1923 in the Netherlands, Admiral Rambonnet worked with the Allies in WW II as a member of the Netherlands underground resistance forces. For his brave conduct in the liberation of his country and in aiding American and British pilots shot down by the German occupying forces, his name was placed on record at the Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Force by General Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Finally able to enlist in the Royal Netherlands Navy, Admiral Rambonnet served his country with distinction for 32 years before retiring. His duties included assistant naval attaché to the Royal Netherlands Embassy at Washington, D.C., aide-de-camp to Her Majesty the Queen of Netherlands, and commander of the Benelux Channel area (COMBENECHAN) in the NATO-command line.

Admiral Rambonnet and his wife, Jeanne, have lived in the United States for 3 years now. They have many new friends, are financially secure and would like to make America their home. Unfortunately, they fall within the nonpreference category and, therefore cannot gain permanent resident status. Because they have exhausted their administrative review and because they would make fine and responsible citizens, I have decided to introduce private legislation in their behalf.

Today, when so many others come into this country illegally, with no means of support and no understanding of what it takes to become an American citizen, I believe we should accept and even encourage people like the Rambonnets to remain in the United States. They would be a credit to America.●

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, today the House Judiciary Committee began markup on H.R. 6514, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1982. I would like to share my opening statement with my colleagues:

I want to commend Chairman PETER RODINO for scheduling this markup on H.R. 6514, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1982. Momentum is with this bill. The Senate passed it on August 17. Editorial boards are urging that Congress do something. However, it is not enough to change our immigration policy. Above all we have to improve our laws. That is the legacy I would like the 97th Congress to leave.

I do not think H.R. 6514 improves our immigration laws.

I agree that our current immigration "policy" is badly in need of an overhaul. I am concerned, however, that some provisions of the Simpson/Mazzoli bill may produce consequences that its supporters do not foresee—and do not desire.

The employer sanctions provisions, I believe, are particularly open to abuse. Clearly, employers should not be permitted to hire—and exploit—undocumented aliens with impunity. In their current form, however, the employer sanctions provisions of the Simpson/Mazzoli bill provide no protection against employment discrimination toward Hispanics and other minorities who are legal residents or U.S. citizens. The sanctions offer a convenient cover for an employer who wants to discriminate—he or she can simply claim that the documentation presented by an "undesirable" applicant appeared fraudulent. Even employers who hire in good faith observance of both immigration and civil rights laws may err on the side of caution when examining documents presented by minorities, especially Hispanics. I particularly fear these consequences at this time when the Reagan administration is reneging on the Federal Government's commitment to affirmative action and equality of employment opportunity.

Recent Reagan administration initiatives have set the scene for the wholesale dismantling of programs to aid minorities within Federal agencies. As chair of the House Post Office and Civil Service Subcommittee on Civil Service, I have conducted on-going oversight of equal employment opportunity in the Federal Government. We found through our questionnaires to 32 of the largest agencies that budgetary commitment to special emphasis offices in Federal agencies had decreased, including the Hispanic employment program and the minority Outreach and Upward Mobility program.

The League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) has prepared a brief overview of the state of equal opportunity law enforcement in the United States. Its conclusion is that no guarantee of prompt redress exists for those Hispanics who, as a consequence of the advent of employer sanctions, are wrongfully refused employment, or otherwise denied equal employment opportunity.

I have included their report in my statement:

A. THE STATE OF EEO LAW ENFORCEMENT

The Commission on Civil Rights in its June 1982 report noted that funding and staffing cuts in the EEOC have resulted in a retardation of the EEOC's progress toward providing complainants with prompt relief, addressing class and systematic discrimination problems and eliminating inconsistent equal employment requirements.

As the table below shows, EEOC's systematic spending power is $6 million (5 percent) lower than in FY 80.

EMPLOYEE SANCTIONS AND EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION

EEOC Budget Totals and Totals in Constant Dollars: 1980–83 (Proposed)

[In thousands of dollars]

Fiscal year	Appropriation (annualized) [1]	In 1980 constant dollars
1980	124,562	124,562
1982 (budget request)	140,389	119,041
1982 (continuing resolution)	[2] 139,889	118,617

[1] Figures represent what EEOC could spend during a whole fiscal year under each spending ceiling.

[2] This figure does not include a $4,200,000 supplemental appropriation EEOC expects during the 4th quarter of fiscal year 1982 because this appropriation has not been enacted. Mary Stringer, supervisory budget analyst, EEOC, telephone interview, Mar. 11, 1982.

As a result of spending cuts the EEOC in FY 81 cut back the number of planned class complaint investigation of broad patterns and practices of discrimination by 13 percent, and expects to keep at this lower level in FY 83.

According to the Commission's report, the EEOC plans further cutbacks in services, such as labor force data processing. Such cutbacks would restrict the EEOC's plans to include in its targets other "employers," such as unions and apprenticeship committees that have had many discrimination charges filed against them.

Because of budgetary constraints, the EEOC in FY 83 expects to approve 14 percent fewer new suits than it approved in FY 81, even though a rising complaint load indicates a greater need for litigation. The agency may also have to reduce the number of suits it actually files in FY 83.

As the table below from the Commission's June 1982 report shows, EEOC's staff resources have been declining steadily. The agency has lost 461 authorized positions since FY 80 and is currently below its authorized level. Clerical and field office attorney positions have been affected most heavily, slowing down the production of documents and work on legal cases. The EEOC plans further cutbacks in FY 83, for expert witnesses and other support services for cases in litigation.

EEOC FULL-TIME, PERMANENT STAFF POSITIONS 1980–83 (PROPOSED)

Fiscal year	Authorized	Actual
1980	3,777	3,433
1981	3,468	3,416
1982 (request)	3,468	([1])
1983 (request)	3,278

[1] EEOC failed to provide requested data on actual staffing levels. See Edward Morgan, Director, Office of Congressional Affairs, EEOC, letter to John Hope II, Acting Staff Director, U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, May 7, 1982.

As a consequence of staff shortages the EEOC in FY 81 estimated it would take 6½ months to resolve all Title VIII complaints on hand. With yet fewer staff on hand, its present FY 82 estimate is a month longer, and its FY 83 estimate is still another month longer.

Staff shortages have lead the EEOC to assume a progressively more passive enforcement role. Lack of sufficient funding and staffing has diminished the agencies ability to conduct federal civil rights compliance reviews. Staff allocations have lead to an emphasis on inefficient individual complaint investigation activities, albeit at the reduced level shown.

The resulting cutbacks in the EEOC's activities targeted at systemic discrimination, inevitably places the burden of initiating enforcement action on the victims of discrimination, persons often lacking the requisite resources of familiarization with the law or with the requirements of program operations. The rights of victims who do not know how to file complaints or fear reprisal for doing so, have been left unprotected.

CONCLUSION

The employer sanctions provisions presently contained within the proposed Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1982, will only further exacerbate the existing problems the current budget reductions are creating for disadvantaged and ostracized American citizens and legal residents. The consequence of the present legislation will be to erect additional barriers for people outside the American mainstream.

It should be noted that while the present budgetary cutbacks have limited the EEOC's capacity to initiate suits, the number of national origin complaints filed with the agency have been on the increase. (See table below.)

COMPLAINTS FILED WITH THE EEOC

Annual reports	Total charges	National origin charges	Percent of total
1966	6,133	143	2.3
1973	77,242	12,377	16
1979	79,084	7,913	10
1981	94,460	9,235	9.89

Note: Hispanic complainants comprise an overwhelming majority of the total percentage of national origin charges filed. The inability of the EEOC to adequately effectuate its mandate will have its most direct consequence on the Hispanic community, the group being now asked to bear the employment risks associated with S. 2222.

Unfortunately, in its consideration of the Simpson bill, the Senate Judiciary Committee, and consequently the full Senate, rejected all amendments that were offered to protect the civil rights of ethnic groups. I hope the House Judiciary Committee will be more receptive toward these amendments. I believe we can have meaningful employer sanctions without diluting our long fought for and hard-won civil rights laws.

I also am concerned about the bill's provisions for legalizing the status of undocumented persons currently in the United States. While I agree that massive deportations are both undesirable and unworkable, I do not believe a legalization program should be established without equal attention to enforcement efforts that will ensure we are not beginning a tradition of amnesty.

Currently, the Simpson/Mazzoli bill simply expresses the sense of Congress that enforcement and border patrol activities of the Immigration and Naturalization Service should be stepped up, and states that Congress intends to provide adequate funding for enforcement. As we have seen in other instances, there can be many a slip between Congress's sense of what should be done and the funds that are available to carry out that intent. Unless the Simpson/Mazzoli bill includes a firm commitment to upgrade INS, its legalization provisions will only contribute to our immigration dilemma.

This lack of commitment to enforcement brings home my most serious concern with the Simpson/Mazzoli bill: many of its provisions will be totally unenforceable. I am curious as to whether the INS have prepared any draft regulations. How would enforcement work? How much would it cost? I think the answers to these questions will be crucial to the debate on this bill.

The Immigration Service cannot even carry out its current responsibilities, and suggestions that local authorities be empowered to enforce immigration laws are frightening and must be turned back. The result will not only contribute to an already growing disrespect for our Nation's laws, but will, in some circumstances, produce the worst of all worlds. We may, for example, contribute to civil rights violations in employment while failing completely to enforce sanctions against employers who should be punished.

Immigration reform is a deliberative process. It is unlikely that any mistakes we make in this attempt at comprehensive reform of our immigration laws will be corrected quickly. Therefore, I believe it is imperative that we consider all possible ramifications this reform may have. I thank Chairman RODINO for scheduling this markup so that we may do so.

I think than once my colleagues hear all the ramifications, they will agree with me that if we rush through the Simpson-Mazzoli approach to immigration in the next 2 weeks, its consequences will come back to haunt us in the future congressional session.●

NATIONAL SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS TEACHERS DEVELOPMENT ACT

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 14, 1982

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, over the past decade, our attention and the attention of citizens across the country has turned toward a series of crises: The petroleum shortage, one outbreak of war after another, the Iranian hostage crisis, and, now, mass unemployment. And while our attention has been turned, a problem we thought we had solved 15 years ago has again built to near crisis proportions. The problem is not so dramatic as a war; it does not drain our emotional energy as did the hostage crisis; and we cannot see it on the nightly news as we can the long lines of the unemployed at soup kitchens all over the country. But it is a problem that will affect our economy and our lives profoundly if something is not done about it now.

In this technological Nation today, half the new teachers assigned to train our children in mathematics and science—half the teachers whose charge is to prepare our children to join the world of work—are unqualified to teach the science or mathematics courses they are assigned. The fruit of our failure to adequately train our teachers has been a dramatic drop in science and mathematics scholastic aptitude test scores for students over the past 10 years. At the same time, colleges which should be teaching advanced courses have had to increase by over 70 percent their offerings because so many students are unprepared for college level study of science and mathematics.

On Saturday, September 11, I attended a conference sponsored by the Congressional Caucus for Science and Technology. The theme of the conference was "The Status of Science and Mathematics Education on the Precollege Level." The keynote speaker at that conference was Mr. Donald Beilman, a long-time executive of the General Electric Co., who has just assummed the directorship of the North Carolina Microelectronics Research Center. Mr. Beilman pointed out that electronics corporation executives in the United States believe that, in large measure, the advances Japan and West Germany are making in high technology are due to the fact that they have assembled a critical mass of highly trained personnel. It is people with ideas and the ability to turn those ideas into products that are moving those countries ahead.

Anyone here who represents an area where high technology firms are located needs do nothing more than turn on the radio any time of the day and listen to the aggressive advertisements designed by each company to lure scientists, engineers, and technicians away from rival companies to be convinced that the United States is far from having this critical mass of properly trained people. And if we think the problem is bad now, it is projected that in computer sciences alone, this country will need 685,000 more trained personnel by 1990. Where are we going to get them if our schools are not supplied with teachers sufficiently trained themselves to pass their knowledge on to the next generation?

Today Mr. Moffett and I are introducing the National Science and Mathematics Teachers Development Act, a modest program to begin the upgrading of teachers skills in science and mathematics. In the early 1960's it was found that one of the fastest and most successful ways of improving teaching skills was to provide summer workshops for teachers wherein they could become informed about the latest developments in their fields. We propose to begin those programs again. They served us well when the country last faced this problem. One should not argue with success, but rather take advantage of the measures that produced that success. I hope our colleagues will take note of the serious nature of the problem we face and of the long-term impact not dealing with the problem now will have on the economic well-being of the country. I hope each of you will lend you support to the National Science and Mathematics Teachers Development Act.●

SENATE—Wednesday, September 15, 1982

(Legislative day of Wednesday, September 8, 1982)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Commit thy works unto the Lord, and thy thoughts shall be established.—Proverbs 16: 3.

Gracious God, as Thou has guided the leadership of this Republic through difficult days, so guide those who bear responsibility in public office today. As Thou didst direct our Founding Fathers through the temptestuous issues and explosive differences of colonial days—as Thou didst lead through the deep divisions of the Civil War—so lead us now in the way of unity and peace.

Help us to appreciate the unexcelled tapestry of American life, the diversity that is our heritage. Help us not to demand uniformity which stifles and stagnates, but to seek true unity which is possible only when diversity is respected, appreciated, and honored.

Lead us in the way of righteousness and justice dear God, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES) and the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) will be recognized on special orders of not to exceed 15 minutes each.

After that, Mr. President, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past 12 noon in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

At 12 noon, Mr. President, the Senate will resume consideration of House Joint Resolution 520, at which time the Baucus amendment No. 2040 will be pending. There will be a cloture vote today at 5 p.m. pursuant to the unanimous-consent order entered previously. The mandatory quorum to precede the vote on cloture has been waived by the same order.

Mr. President, it is possible that today I will ask the Senate to proceed to consideration of the Hatch amendment to the Constitution dealing with abortion. I have not yet had an opportunity to discuss that matter with Senator HATCH, who was necessarily absent from the Senate yesterday because of elections in his home State of Utah. I will try to have a further announcement on that subject during the course of the morning business period.

PROSPECT OF POST-ELECTION SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I just returned from a leadership meeting at the White House with the President of the United States. The legislative agenda was discussed at some length.

I must say that the principal items that must be dealt with, on which both the President and the Members of the House and Senate agreed, were the appropriation bills. It is very late now, and I despair of having all 13 of the appropriation bills passed before we go out, but certainly we should pass some of them. We must then pass a continuing resolution for those that were not covered.

The question of when that continuing resolution would expire has been discussed rather widely in the Senate and was discussed this morning. I feel constrained to advise Senators that the impression I have is that there is at least a possibility that the continuing resolution would expire, as it is now proposed by some Members, sometime in December.

If that is the case, then the answer to the anxious question so often put, "Will we have a post-election session?" is "Yes," because we simply cannot leave without doing the appropriation bills or a continuing resolution.

So, as much as I personally regret to say it, I urge Senators to consider that because of the appropriation process there is at least a substantial prospect that we may be back after the election. I will discuss that with the minority leader today. I intend to discuss it with the Speaker today. However, Senators should take first warning that there is now, in my judgment at least, the prospect of a post-election session of Congress.

Mr. President, I have no further need for my time. If anybody will still speak to me after making that dreadful announcement, I will be glad to yield the floor.

I believe the Chair wishes to make an announcement. I yield for that purpose.

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, appoints the following Senators to attend the GATT Ministerial Trade Conference to be held in Geneva, Switzerland, November 21-26, 1982: The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY), the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA), and the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN).

BASHIR GEMAYEL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, once again we learn how fragile are our hopes for a peaceful and reunited nation of Lebanon. The bomb that exploded yesterday in Beirut resulted in more than the tragic death of the young President-elect Sheik Bashir Gemayel and a number of his followers. It dealt a shattering blow to the aspirations of the Lebanese, Christian and Moslem alike, for peace. Nevertheless, after so many years, so many deaths and so much destruction, the search for peace must go on.

The efforts of Ambassador Habib to end the crisis in Beirut and the beginning efforts of Bashir Gemayel to unite Moslems and Christians in the restoration of the authority and sovereign integrity of Lebanon cannot go for naught. Beirut must not now dissolve into a new wave of bloodshed and destruction.

Over the past few months the people of Beirut have shown remarkable courage and resilience in the face of adversity. Virtually every contending faction has demonstrated the will and the ability to act in a common effort to save their country. That was, I believe, the goal of the new President-elect and he had already demonstrated his determination to pursue it. The perpetrators of this cowardly act cannot be allowed to frustrate that goal.

The wave of recriminations and revenge that have followed similar atrocities in the past have not yet begun and we can only hope that this time they will not begin. It would be my hope that the government of President Sarkis can move rapidly to fulfill the constitutional process and perhaps thereby forestall a new round of violence. With that in mind, I would hope that President Reagan's call for all parties to honor the disengagement agreement and do everything possible to reduce tensions will be heeded.

While we extend our sympathies to the Lebanese people, we must extend as well our encouragement to those who will seek peace. I am heartened by the return to Beirut of Ambassador Morris Draper and know that I share with all my colleagues our hope that his efforts to negotiate the early withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon will be successful.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield to me just one moment?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would like to say that the minority leader would like to have his time reserved for later.

Mr. BAKER. May I do that at this point then.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time allocated to the minority leader under the standing order be reserved for his use at any time during the remainder of this day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INTANGIBLE MILITARY COMPARISONS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, comparisons of military capability by static indexes may be misleading. There are times when tactics and strategies overcome superior force levels. Furthermore, a nation's economic condition and its influence in world affairs are legitimate factors in considering relative power.

Yet we hear little about these less glamorous factors in the world power equation. Instead, we hear that the Soviet Union has expanded its influence at the loss of U.S. prestige around the world.

Is this true or is it a simplification of a complex situation? In part 3 of a Defense Monitor report from the Center for Defense Information, some answers to these questions can be obtained. An examination of the weapons export policies of the United States and U.S.S.R., a search of the record for advances and setbacks in foreign policy, and an assessment of the future trends in the U.S.-U.S.S.R. relationship all provide a useful balance to the more strident rhetoric often heard about the inexorable decline of U.S. power.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the conclusion of the Defense Monitor article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFENSE MONITOR—PART III

WEAPONS EXPORTS

The U.S. has provided weapons to about 130 of the world's 161 nations.

In the 1970's the United States sold or gave away $123 Billion in weapons, military training, and construction to foreign countries.

U.S. weapons exports rose from less than $5 Billion in 1971 to $17.4 Billion in 1980.

In his first year in office, President Reagan recommended to Congress over $25 Billion in arms sales.

U.S. arms exports in FY 1982 may total $30 Billion, far exceeding the previous record high of $17.7 Billion in 1975.

Over the past decade, the U.S. has agreed to sell or give away over 6,000 tanks, 600 artillery pieces, 3,000 military aircraft, 10,000 missiles, and 250 combat ships.

Only half of all U.S. foreign military sales since 1950 have been delivered, leaving about $55 Billion of arms in the pipeline.

Of the 41 military-dominated, repressive governments in the world, the U.S. has been a major supplier of arms to 28.

In 1980, the U.S.S.R. surpassed the U.S. in arms agreements and deliveries to the Third World for the first time.

The U.S. is still the number one supplier of weapons to the Third World if one looks at more than the past year or two. From 1978 to 1980, the U.S. sold $29.9 Billion of arms to the Third World compared to $26.6 Billion for the Soviet Union.

The U.S. is still the number one supplier of weapons to the rest of the world if exports to developed nations are included.

In 1980, all non-communist nations combined accounted for 61 percent of arms agreements with the Third World, all communist nations for 39 percent, and the U.S.S.R. alone for 36 percent.

WORLD INFLUENCE

A comprehensive study of trends of Soviet world influence in 161 countries since World War II does not support perceptions of consistent Soviet advances and devastating U.S. setbacks.

Outside Eastern Europe, Soviet influence has lacked staying power. Inability to accumulate influence in foreign countries over long periods is a dominant feature of Soviet world involvement.

Starting from a very low base of political, economic and military involvement, the Soviets worked to increase their influence around the world. Starting with influence in 9 percent of the world's nations in 1945, they peaked at 14 percent in the late 1950's, and today have influence in 12 percent of the world's nations. Of the 161 countries in the world today, the Soviets have significant influence in 19.

The Soviets have been successful in gaining influence primarily among the world's poorest and most desperate countries.

Soviet foreign involvement has to a large extent been shaped by indigenous conditions and the Soviets have been unable to command loyalty or obedience.

Soviet setbacks in China, Indonesia, Egypt, India, and Iraq dwarf marginal Soviet advances in lesser countries.

The Center for Defense Information, utilizing indexes of power developed by former C.I.A. official Ray Cline in his books on World Power Trends, has calculated this division of world power: Pro-West and China 70 percent; Soviet Union and its clients 20 percent; other 10 percent.

THE FUTURE

The Pentagon's 5-year plan calls for building a huge new arsenal of weapons which "are difficult for the Soviets to counter, impose disproportionate costs, open up new areas of major military competition and obsolescence previous Soviet investment."

The U.S. plans to deploy at least 100 MX missiles, the most modern, accurate and lethal ICBM ever built.

The U.S. is moving forward with the Trident II (D-5) missile which will give submarine-launched missiles the ability to destroy hardened missile silos for the first time.

The U.S. is building a fleet of at least one hundred B-1B bombers at a cost of about $40 billion ($400 million per plane).

The U.S. is now deploying modern, highly accurate, highly lethal ground, air, and sea launched cruise missiles. Over 9,000 will be deployed (some SLCMs will carry non-nuclear explosives but will be indistinguishable from nuclear-armed SLCMs.)

The U.S. will build an advanced technology "Stealth" bomber at tremendous cost to replace the B-1.

The U.S. will deploy the Pershing II medium range ballistic missile in 1983. It will be the most accurate missile ever built and will be able to reach the Soviet Union from bases in West Germany in 5-10 minutes.

The U.S. is substantially increasing spending on ballistic missile defense and could deploy a new system in the mid-to-late 1980's.

The Soviet Union has tested and may have deployed a crude, rocket-launched anti-satellite weapon system. The U.S. is now testing and will soon deploy a much more sophisticated anti-satellite weapon which can be launched from any modified aircraft.

The Soviet Union has stated that it will match any U.S. nuclear advance. U.S. authorities acknowledge that the Soviets are capable in the next decade of developing a new manned bomber, advanced cruise missiles, improved submarine-based missiles, super-accurate ICBMs, and new ABM systems.

GENOCIDE MAKES MANKIND AN ENDANGERED SPECIES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the French mathematician and philosopher, Blaise Pascal, once said that man is "the only animal with brains enough to find a cure for the diseases caused by his own folly." It is regrettably true that there are often unintentionally harmful consequences to any major political action. The test of statesmen is the degree to which they admit and correct their miscalculations. In areas like endangered species, millions of dollars are spent every year in virtually every nation on Earth to save those creatures threatened by our encroachment into their ecosystems. The Senate in particular has accepted its duty to wildlife and we have worked most diligently to right whatever wrongs we have committed.

These legislative actions represent America in one of its finest hours; a nation which has pioneered many of the longest standing conservationist laws. Yet it is not these threatened creatures that I wish to discuss today but one species that is conspicuously absent from most of these international agreements. This unfortunate creature is man himself.

As ironic as it may seem, mankind has accepted its responsibility as keeper of the Garden of Eden only to immediately banish its own kind somewhere east of Eden. It would probably be easier to add a 21st name to the 20 already protected forms of pearly mussels than for me to push through any meaningful legislation to halt the systematic slaughter of national, ethnic, racial, and religious groups. I can say this with confidence because I have attempted for the last 15 years to persuade this body to pass just such an agreement—the Genocide Convention.

What, you may ask, is the reason for our seemingly deep-set prejudice against ourselves? What do these animals possess that would make their struggle for survival easier to champion than, let us say, the people of Uganda or East Timor? One argument is that our Nation can not embark upon the complicated and potentially dangerous course involved in an international agreement like the Genocide Convention. However, our Nation has already done so in 519 separate international treaties covering threatened and endangered species. We have gone even further in adding 240 domestically protected animals to this number including 9 types of parakeets, 10 types of mice, and 20 types of turtles. Everything from the appalachian threespine stickleback to the pigfooted bandicoot is watched over, that is, everything but man.

Some would suggest that man, the hunter, does not need the attention and protection afforded to other animals because of his fantastic powers of invention and destruction. Yet it is precisely these "human advantages" that should compel us to pursue agreements like the Genocide Convention. Today mankind's only true adversaries of equal strength come from within its own species, and consequently it is protection from our own kind that we need so badly. The Genocide Convention will not put a halt to senseless killing in the world, but it can move us closer to a world in which nations work together to prevent genocidal murder from occurring again in our lifetime. Monuments to our past inability to work together as a world community stand ominously around the globe; silent reminders of man's self-destructive potential. From the gray crematoriums of Dachau to the shallow graves around Lake Victoria, man's legacy of genocide haunts our memoires and warns us of a possible future if we do nothing. It is time, as Pascal said, to journey with other nations in finding a cure for this folly and ratify the Genocide Convention.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no further need for my time under the standing order. Since the minority leader's time is reserved for his further instructions, I yield back the remainder of my time, which I believe would produce the recognition of the Senator from Florida on his special order.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR CHILES

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

CRIME AND DRUG TRAFFICKING

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, since May, Senator NUNN and I have come to the floor of the Senate every day to speak out on crime and drug trafficking. We have spoken about our concern with the crime problems we face, and about our ever increasing alarm over the fact that the Senate has not taken action on crime fighting legislation. I believe that our alarm over the lack of activity by the Senate is well justified. On May 18, Senator NUNN and I introduced a package of proposals, S. 243, that would go a long way toward helping in the war on crime. The bill included provisions that will make it easier to fight mob violence, reforms in the bail bond system, especially as it applies to drug dealers, stiffer sentences for violent criminals and for big time drug dealers, and an overhaul of the habeas corpus laws to eliminate frivolous and repetitious appeals; 16 other Senators have joined us as sponsors of this crime fighting bill.

S. 2543 is not the only crime fighting package before the Senate. Just before Memorial Day, Senator THURMOND and Senator BIDEN, the chairman and the ranking member of the Judiciary Committee, introduced another crime fighting package, S. 2572. It contains several of the provisions in the crime package Senator NUNN and I had introduced earlier, as well as other important reforms, including a program to protect victims of crime, reforms to the insanity defense, and better asset forfeiture laws. A total of 54 Senators, over half of the Senate, have joined as cosponsors of this measure.

Mr. President, the Senate's failure to act on either of these proposals is even more disturbing when one realizes that each of these bills has been pending on the Senate Calendar since late May. In other words, the Senate could have considered either of them at any point during the last 3 months. We even went so far as to enter into a time agreement on one of the bills, S. 2572, that would enable us to consider and pass the proposal in no more than a couple of days.

Despite all of this, and despite the vital importance of action on this issue, nothing has happened. Meanwhile, the time has kept slipping away, and fewer and fewer days remain in this session. Some may believe that there already is too little time remaining to pass a bill through both Houses of Congress. I disagree with that assessment, because I believe that there is strong public momentum and support for action on crime. More important, I am concerned about the kind of message we in the Senate send to the American people if, given this special opportunity to do something about crime, we fail to act.

For the past 2 months, I have tried to focus on one particular aspect of the criminal justice system which is sorely in need of reform: The Federal habeas corpus laws. Today however, with time running short, I should like to spend a few moments discussing some of the broader issues we face in dealing with the crime problem, in order to remind my colleagues of the urgent need for action. Just last week, in an address to an international conference on drug enforcement, William Webster, the Director of the FBI underscored once again the link between illegal drug trafficking and crime. It is clear that an essential part of any fight against crime must be a full-scale attack on drug trafficking.

Recently, the Miami Herald ran a series of articles on the effects of one of the most dangerous of the illegal drugs, and sadly enough, one of the most popular illegal drugs: cocaine. I should like to share some of the findings made in those articles with my colleagues, because they point out the importance of doing something about illegal drugs.

Explosive growth is the best way to characterize the use of cocaine in the United States over the past years. Most of the cocaine used in the United States is grown in Bolivia, Colombia, and Peru and is then smuggled into the United States. In 1961, customs officials seized 8 pounds of cocaine; 10 years later, in 1971, the amount of cocaine seized jumped to 408 pounds. And 10 years after that, in 1981, 3,725 pounds of cocaine were seized by customs officials. Earlier this year, Federal law enforcement agents in Miami seized 3,906 pounds of cocaine in one single arrest.

Mr. President, fully one-third of the amount of cocaine seized by customs agents last year was seized in the Miami area. Of course, the 3,900 pounds cocaine bust I just mentioned also occurred in Miami. Miami sadly, has become the cocaine capital of the United States, and the Herald article pointed out some of the unfortunate effects that so hand-in-hand with being a cocaine center. It is common knowledge that the crime rate and the murder rate in Miami has skyrocketed in recent years, and that Miami now has the dubious distinction of being the murder capital of the country. The Herald article showed how cocaine use has contributed to the rising crime rate in south Florida. The University of Miami conducted a study of behavior patterns of some 170 cocaine users. The study revealed the following:

60 percent of cocaine users surveyed have broken the law by selling cocaine to support their habit.

52 percent are divorced or separated because of their habit.

47 percent stole cocaine, or pulled some sort of con game to get cocaine.

31 percent stole from their families or friends.

29 percent wrote bad checks.

24 percent committed household or store burglaries.

31 percent stole from stores, and 19 percent committed robberies.

These statistics are shocking, Mr. President. They show me that the link between crime and drugs that we have heard so much about in fact is all too real. They also lend support to the notion that, by cutting off the drug traffic, and bringing the people who control it to justice, we can have a major impact on crime. In south Florida, we have a special task force, headed by the Vice President, that has helped slow the flow of drugs into south Florida. We need to expand that effort to other parts of the country. And we must also make sure that those drug dealers who are caught are not able to use legal loopholes to avoid justice. Today, drug dealers who are arrested rely on weakness in the current bail laws to buy their way out of jail. S. 2543 strengthens the bail laws as they apply to persons arrested for drug trafficking violations, and forces the person arrested to bear the burden of showing why he should be granted bail. S. 2572 contains provisions that can be used to require a person who posts a large bail bond to show where his bail funds came from. S. 2543 triples the sentences for persons convicted of smuggling large amounts of marihuana. And S. 2572 reforms the asset forfeiture laws, to make it easier for law enforcement authorities to immobilize drug trafficking organizations by seizing their assets: the ships, planes, and cash they use to do business.

Mr. President, these much needed changes could be approved by the Senate if we simply move on the crime bills now on the Senate Calendar. The need to so something about illegal drug trafficking, and the crime it creates, is clear. We in the Senate have an opportunity to make a difference, but only if we act. Time is running out, with as few as 13 days left in the session. We can make a difference, but only if we move now.

FLORIDA IN-SCHOOL DRUG EDUCATION

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, we are all aware of the seriousness of the drug problem this Nation faces, and of the need for all of us to work together to find ways to stop drug abuse.

One of the most tragic aspects of this problem is its impact on our young people. It is essential, therefore, that we pay special attention to taking whatever steps we can to protect our children from the ravages of illegal drug use.

Most of the news we hear about illegal drugs is bad news. Today, however, I should like to share with my colleagues some good news about a success story in the effort to make young people aware of the dangers of illegal drugs. During the 1980–81 school year, Hillborough County, Fla., sixth graders took a drug prevention program. The results seem impressive, as students who took the program were found to be only half as likely to use alcohol, drugs, or cigarettes as those students who did not take the course.

I congratulate the Hillsborough, County Schools, the C. E. Mendez Foundation, which ran the program, and Elizabeth McConnell, who was the program director. But, most important, I congratulate the young people themselves for their success in avoiding all the problems that seem to go hand-in-hand with illegal drugs.

Mr. President, doing something about drug abuse is a problem for each and every one of us. I am glad to see people in Hillsborough County working together in their community to fight drug abuse.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles published in the Tampa Tribune about the drug prevention program, and I recommend to them to my colleagues.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STUDY: IN-SCHOOL DRUG PROGRAM PROVES EFFECTIVE

(By Patti Breckenridge)

Hillsborough County public school students who took a drug education course in 1980-81 were half as likely to use alcohol, drugs or cigarettes on campus one year later as classmates who weren't in the program, a new report indicates.

About 1 percent of the 3,635 students who took the course as sixth-graders violated school rules prohibiting substance possession and abuse as seventh-graders, a random sampling of that group showed.

But twice as many—nearly 2 percent—of the 4,534 sixth-graders who were not offered the course committed substance-related violations as seventh-graders, the report said.

"That difference is statistically significant," said Susan Turner, who coordinated the evaluation.

Armed with that favorable evaluation from testing experts in the school system, the non-profit group that runs the drug education program will ask the School Board Tuesday for money to expand.

School Superintendent Raymond Shelton said Thursday that the school system can't afford to finance that expansion.

But School Board members have final say on budget matters.

Operated by the Mendez Foundation, the drug education program was provided this year to all sixth-graders. The program's $200,000 budget was primarily supplied by private donors, but the School Board contributed $75,000 and the state less than $10,000.

Mendez officials want to extend the drug education course to ninth graders and expand their efforts in educating parents.

They say they need at least $100,000 more to do that. Even if they find additional private support, part of that sum would have to come from the School Board.

"We're kind of subtle and soft-selling people," said Charles Mendez, son of the couple who started the foundation.

"We've always felt our program was effective based on the reactions of students and their parents. But it's sometimes difficult to quantify a feeling like that.

"I think this report confirms our effectiveness."

The report is the first evaluation of the Mendez program since it started the drug education course in public schools four years ago.

Besides the findings on the course's effect on drug use, drinking and smoking on campus, the evaluation also revealed that students who take the course definitely increased their knowledge about substance abuse and retained that knowledge six months after completing the course.

A random sampling of the students who took the course during the 1980–81 school year showed a 49 percent success rate in answering questions about substance abuse before taking the course, an 87 percent success rate immediately upon completing the course and an 86 percent success rate six months after completing the course, Turner said.

The program was initially aimed at sixth-graders because that is the first time Hillsborough County public school students move from one school to another, Mendez said.

Ninth-graders face the same problem so they would be a logical group to provide a "booster" course in substance abuse and health education, he said.

But Shelton said the school system can afford to spend no more than $90,000 on the Mendez program in 1982–83, and all of that will be needed for the sixth-grade program since that age group will be much larger this year than in 1981–82.

Some School Board members may disagree.

Two months ago, both Cecile Essrig and Sam Rampello said they would like to see the Mendez program expanded.

The program's emphasis on enhancing a student's self concept—making it easier to combat peer pressure to use drugs, drink alcohol or smoke cigarettes—"is as important to education as teaching other basics," Essrig said at the time.

But at least one School Board Member said in May that he was leery about spending more money on the Mendez program.

"Drugs are definitely not the most pressing problem in schools," Sonny Palomino said. "The priority in a school system should be furnishing the best education. And I'm not sure drug education is as important as strengthening our math, science and language programs."

CHEP HELPS IMMUNIZE YOUNG AGAINST DRUGS

(By Sam Stickney)

It seems we spend more time in this business viewing with alarm than pointing with pride. This is especially true as it relates to young people and the drug scene. But important changes are occurring which substantially reduce the chances of students entering Hillsborough school systems—both public and private—falling victim to drug abuse.

In other years we have devoted much time to various approaches for dealing with youngsters who had developed a physical or psychological dependence on any of several mind-altering chemicals. There were no easy solutions. Some responded to psychological counseling, others eventually outgrew the problem, but too many become social dropouts and emotional derelicts.

Then someone had a better idea. Instead of waiting for the problem to develop and then dealing with it, why not apply that much vaunted ounce of prevention?

Elizabeth S. McConnell, program director of the C.E. Mendez Foundation, introduced a Children's Health Education Program which is destined to become known by the acronym CHEP, the sound of a young bird in its nest.

The ebullient Mrs. McConnell went into classrooms at the sixth grade level and challenged students to develop a health respect for themselves and their bodies. She talked about peer group pressures and how to resist their negative influences and, peripherally, got across the idea that becoming involved in the drug culture wasn't too cool.

She didn't saddle the kids with some heavy trip. This was fun. It was also instructional and it soon became evident that she was reaching these students in a very positive manner.

The program was enlarged and received the blessing of the Hillsborough County School Board. The CHEP report for the current school year reveals that 10,706 sixth grade students were reached. In addition, 42 presentations were made to PTAs and civic groups, a program for parents made possible through the Shimberg Foundation got under way and a ninth grade pilot program was tested.

The biggest story, however, concerns the sixth grade level. That ounce of prevention is paying impressive dividends. It works just like Mrs. McConnell said it would. The proof of this is to be found in a program evaluation of CHEP which produced these conclusions:

During the 1981-82 school year, instruction provided by the Children's Health Education Program made a substantial difference in students' knowledge about drug-related concepts and decision-making processes.

After cessation of program instruction, students retained this knowledge over a six-month time period.

Students who received instruction in the Children's Health Education Program as sixth graders in 1980-81 committed significantly fewer substance-related offenses as seventh graders than students who did not receive (this) instruction.

The report has a lot of statistics to support these conclusions, but the bottom line is that those kids who were exposed to CHEP in the sixth grade were less likely to experience a drug problem the following year than those who were not in the program.

How long this "immunity" will last remains to be seen. Perhaps reinforcement will be needed in the future. Even some of the best vaccines call for booster shots. But the encouraging news is that CHEP is working and for most of those youths who received the ounce of prevention there will be no need for a pound of cure.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BUMPERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

THE CLINCH RIVER BREEDER REACTOR

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, my comments this morning deal with my continuing strong opposition to the building of the Clinch River breeder reactor. This is one time when all Americans ought to be glad that sometimes the U.S. Congress operates in a very laborious, slow, and tedious way, because when breeder reactors were first discussed in this country, many people, including this speaker, thought that breeders were going to be the panacea for this country's energy problems.

All of us know that the proponents of breeder reactors highly touted the idea that breeders produced more energy than they consumed, and certainly anything that would do that looked like a panacea.

Since 1971 and 1972, when the Clinch River breeder was first discussed as a reality to be built on the Clinch River in Tennessee, more and more information has surfaced about it, and everything that anybody has heard about Clinch River since it was first an embryonic idea in some scientist's mind has indicated that we ought not to build it.

The time when the project had the greatest momentum going for it was about 1976, and happily for the country Jimmy Carter became President at that time. Jimmy Carter does not get credit for many things. He is still spoken of in denigrating ways in a lot of circles in this country. But he certainly deserves credit for his efforts to torpedo this project, and it was because of his adamant, strong opposition to it that it was not built during that period of time.

But now we are faced again with an administration which strongly supports it, indeed strongly supports all nuclear projects, to the detriment of every other sensible energy initiative.

My original opposition to the Clinch River breeder was very simple. The breeder reactor makes plutonium, and plutonium makes weapons.

I heard a scientist say this morning that the Clinch River breeder was going to generate in its lifetime enough plutonium to manufacture 1 million nuclear weapons. I forget whether he said it would do that on an annual basis or in its lifetime, but either way it is terribly devastating. So that was my first objection.

There are six countries now that have nuclear weapons, and more will get them. A lot of thoughtful people in this country think that whole situation is just a ticking time bomb. I heard on the radio as I came in this morning, that some professor at some small college has suggested that we have a big party in the year 2000 all across this country. He is proposing to spend $1.2 billion on a big party in the year 2000, if we make it to the year 2000. If we do not, of course, we are not going to need the party.

The second thing then that began to trouble me about the Clinch River project was the technology. Back in 1976 there surfaced a very secret, private, internal memo of Burns & Roe, who were the consultants for the Clinch River breeder. In that memo they said:

> We need to get out of this project at the earliest possible time because it is a turkey. The chances of success for this project are almost less than nil.

I thought, if the consultants do not think any more of the project than that, why should I? I am just an ordinary country lawyer, a layman on scientific issues, and if the knowledgeable people thought it was a bad technology and a bad location—they even said the Clinch River was a bad site—why should I continue to, support it, and why should I vote money of the American taxpayers for the project?

Then there was this original proposition: If you will recall, the utilities were going to put up about half the money." You have to understand," they said, "we want to put a cap on our participation of about $250 million."

But at that time, the Clinch River project was supposed to cost about $670 million. The utilities were originally talking about footing half the costs, but they only committed themselves to about $250 million.

Well now we have spent more than $1 billion, and have not turned the first spade of dirt. The utility companies have put in about $110 million, maybe more than that, but there is one thing for sure, they are not putting any more money in, and I do not blame them. They want the project but they understand what people in this body seem to never understand, and that is not to throw good money after bad.

Do not depend on the utilities to put up a dime of the next $2.5 billion to $5 billion that are going to be necessary to build and complete the Clinch River breeder.

Then why were we going to build it to begin with? What was the justification? The justification was, No. 1, it manufactures fuel you can use in light water reactors. We have about 70 of these reactors in the country right now. The Clinch River breeder would be a good, cheap, continuing source of fuel for light water reactors, because we were going to run out of uranium.

No. 2, we were going to continue to increase electrical consumption in this country. Our demand was going to increase by 7 percent annually. That is what the annual increase had been for years, and nobody had any reason to believe it would slow down.

But after the Arab oil embargo and after energy prices began to skyrocket, people in America began to conserve. And so now for the past 3 years energy consumption has increased only 2 percent a year, not 7 percent.

In addition to that, utilities all over the country are canceling plans to build light water reactors. Washington Power has discontinued the building of five nuclear reactors. Three of them were already well underway, and some of them over half completed, but they are scrapping them.

The TVA down in Tennessee is also scrapping plans for light water reactors and some construction that is already underway. So certainly there is no justification on the grounds of depleting our uranium supplies. I read in an article in the Wall Street Journal yesterday that Westinghouse is in some considerable difficulty because the price of uranium just continues to drop. While the projections I saw when the Clinch River project was first presented to me were that uranium was going to cost $100, right now it is $20, having dropped from $40, and the price still going down—so certainly we are not running out of uranium, and we do not need to supply light water reactors because none are being planned, and none are being built.

Then, of course, there is another question: If this were the best technology in the world, which it is not, would it be money well spent?

I might say that there is going to be a forum this afternoon with four of the finest physicists in the country, and each of them is going to say the technology of the Clinch River breeder is outdated. One of them said this morning that continuing the project is like buying a 1967 GTO, putting on some new tires and a stereo, and acting like you have a brand new automobile.

Senator HOLLINGS of South Carolina has called this whole project, I thought appropriately a CETA project for nuclear scientists. But even the nuclear scientists do not want it. They think it is a bad technology. I think they would rather go on foodstamps than lend their name to it.

But, in any event, the French and the Germans and the Japanese and the Russians all dived into breeder reactors. And I have heard it on this floor a thousand times: "We can't let them get ahead of us." Well, I will tell you what they are doing. In France, they are postponing the building of five additional breeders because the ones they have are turning out to present terrible safety problems for them. Their cost overruns are absolutely out of sight. And the same thing is happening in the other three countries.

Breeders are not yet a technology that is worth putting that kind of money in. The scientists say if we build the Clinch River breeder right now, when it is finished it will be 16 years out of date.

The Clinch River breeder will use what they call the loop technology. The French use what they call the pool technology. The French have completed one Phoenix, and another one is under construction and should be finished next year, way behind schedule. The pool technology the French are using is far advanced above the Clinch River breeder's loop technology and yet we have not changed one thing. We are still going right ahead just as though the scientists never said a word.

Mr. President, let me close by saying this: If this sounds parochial to you, let it. For the last 4 years I have been trying to get money out of the Congress and out of the administration to retrofit all the dams on the Arkansas River that the Corps of Engineers believe are capable of being retrofitted for hydroelectric power. There are 17 dams on the Arkansas River. Three of them are generating power right now and nine more of them are capable of generating electrical power. The Corps of Engineers says that for $800 million you can put hydropower on all of those nine dams in Arkansas that are capable of generating a total of 365 megawatts of power, and yet I cannot get this administration to put one dime into it. Not a dime. And those dams will generate 365 megawatts of power with virtually no annual operating cost because, as you know, in hydropower all you do is open the gate and let the water through. You do not feed it coal, you do not feed it uranium, you do not feed it gas, and you do not feed it oil. You just open the gate.

The cost of that project, even retrofitting existing dams, is $2,200 per megawatt. The Clinch River breeder, even if it only wound up costing $3.5 billion—and I promise you it will cost $5 billion to $10 billion—will generate electricity at a loss of $10,000 a megawatt, or about four times as much as it would take to generate power on the Arkansas River, with no comparison in terms of environmental concern or the annual operating cost. That is how insane this administration is on energy.

And there is another project in Arkansas ready to go, the best biomass project in the United States. The University of Arkansas was donated a lot of biomass equipment and technology by the Gulf Oil. Let me say something nice about Gulf. We appreciate it. And Gulf does not hear me say anything nice about them very often. But we appreciate that donation.

The University of Arkansas took that technology and started producing ethanol from 1 ton of municipal waste a day. Now they have the plans all drawn up, using virtually all proven technology, for a biomass facility in Little Rock that would use 50 tons of waste a day. If it is successful, the next phase would convert 750 tons of urban waste, wood products, cellulose products to ethanol.

The other day, I called the Secretary of Energy. He said, "Dale, there is just no money for biomass." It is a $43 million project. There are 1,150 sites in the United States that have been identified as being capable of using 750 tons of waste a day to make ethanol.

Now, if you are looking for a contribution to this country's energy independence, there would be a contribution. But instead this administration wants to put another $2½ billion into Clinch River, a turkey, obsolete technology, and not spend one dime for something that will really give this country something to think about; namely, generating a lot of ethanol from waste.

Mr. President, I did not come over just to condemn the administration's energy policies. I sound like a broken record on that. Everybody knows how I feel about that. I hope they do. I am just saying the Clinch River breeder would be a terrible mistake.

Mr. President, if you took the $2.5 billion that we are going to spend to complete the Clinch River breeder, you could put it into household weatherization in this country for conservation, and between now and the year 2000 save 48 million barrels of oil annually at a cost of $2 a barrel.

Those hydroprojects which I was talking about down in Arkansas have a life expectancy of 100 years. The Clinch River breeder, if it does not blow up first, is scheduled to last 35 years.

The only reason in the world left to build the Clinch River breeder is somebody's parochial interest or because enough arms can be twisted in here or just because there are enough people who absolutely will not change their minds about something. I think the time has come and I believe the votes are here to kill this project.

The Clinch River breeder reactor has been like Rasputin. You think you had it killed and all of a sudden it started breathing again.

I hope this time, before we go out of here in October, that the Senate ultimately and finally will kill a project that does not make any sense by any yardstick or measurement.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator withhold?

Mr. BUMPERS. Yes.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT-ELECT BASHIR GEMAYEL

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the assassination of President-elect Bashir Gemayel, the resultant danger of civil unrest in Lebanon, and the Israeli movement into West Beirut this morning, raise new and troubling issues for that area. As a result of my meetings with President-elect Gemayel in Beirut and Prime Minister Begin in Jerusalem over this past weekend, and my general assessment of the climate in Lebanon and Israel, it is my view that Israel does not intend to use the current unrest to acquire any additional power base in Lebanon.

The situation in Lebanon has been tense for many years—since the civil war between the Christians and the Moslems began some 7 years ago. The fighting was, of course, intensified as a result of the conflict between Israel and the PLO during the past 3 months.

In discussions with both President-elect Gemayel and Prime Minister Begin, it was the expectation of both men that Israel would withdraw from Lebanon as soon as Syrian and PLO forces were out of that country and Lebanese forces ready to move in. In my floor statement yesterday, I detailed President-elect Gemayel's concern that Lebanon not be pressed for an immediate peace treaty with Israel. Implicit in Mr. Gemayel's statement was his expectation that Israel intended to withdraw from Lebanon. Prime Minister Begin advised, as noted in my floor statement yesterday, that Israel would not press President-elect Gemayel for a peace treaty. Prime Minister Begin further emphasized Israel's intention to withdraw from Lebanon as soon as the Syrians and PLO departed that country.

While our conversations obviously did not contemplate the assassination of the President-elect and the attendant problems, the issues which were discussed persuaded me that Israel seeks only a stable Lebanon, has no interest in keeping military forces in Lebanon on an indefinite basis and has undertaken this morning's movements only to keep the peace and maintain order there.

The assassination of President-elect Gemayel is a tragedy for the man, his family, his country, the region, and the world. Decent men and women everywhere should deplore the assassination and take all possible action to restore stability Lebanon.

The bombing of a political party headquarters during a meeting of party officials is a despicable crime of unbelievable terrorism. It is unheard of in most countries. In Lebanon, where nearly every political party has its own army and political murders and civil warfare are almost a way of life, it is no less shocking, although characteristic. The killing of this young leader has irrevocably changed the Middle East and shattered the peace so carefully constructed by Ambassador Habib and others.

Bashir Gemayel was Lebanon's best hope to end years of internal violence and political chaos. He seemed the only leader strong enough to restore the government's control of its own territory. With this control, the 10,000 PLO fighters remaining in Lebanon could be expelled and occupation of parts of this tiny nation by Israeli and Syrian forces ended, Israel having declared its intention to leave as soon as the Syrian and PLO forces were out of the country.

Bashir Gemayel's presidency was the keystone in the arch for bringing peace to Lebanon and then to the entire region.

I saw in the face of this young man the determination to change Lebanon and in his eyes a vision for national reconciliation. In his demeanor, I felt resignation to the continuing danger of death. To his wife and family I offer my condolences, to his countrymen, my sympathy. His death affects all throughout the world who seek peace.

THE DEATH OF PRINCESS GRACE OF MONACO

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the tragic and untimely death yesterday of Princess Grace of Monaco is worthy of note in our proceedings in the U.S. Senate.

I make these comments because Grace Kelly was a native of Pennsylvania and the Kelly home was two blocks from my own home in the East Falls section of Philadelphia.

Grace Kelly brought great distinction to Pennsylvania and the United States. Her achievements in Hollywood and her famed life as Princess of Monaco, as the wife of Prince Rainier and mother of three fine children, need no embellishment in these brief remarks because they have been recounted at length in today's newspaper and TV reports.

It was an extraordinary treat for all of us who had the good fortune to know her while she lived.

She was a beautiful woman in every sense of the word. Beyond her fabulous face and figure, she was talented, humane, and deeply devoted to her family.

The Kelly family is legendary in Philadelphia. Her father, John B. Kelly, Sr., amassed a fortune in the brick building business. He was a candidate for mayor of Philadelphia in the mid-1930's against the political machine, an undertaking of some magnitude, and narrowly lost.

His son, John B. Kelly, Jr., avenged slights to his father and succeeded in becoming an Olympic champion at sculling. Jack Kelly and I were at the University of Pennsylvania together, served in Philadelphia city government together and have been good friends over the years.

I know I speak for all my colleagues in the U.S. Senate in sending condolences to Prince Rainier and the children in Monaco, to the entire Kelly family in Philadelphia, and to Grace Kelly's friends and admirers everywhere.

THE RECESSION IN THE ENERGY INDUSTRY

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, this is the second in a series of speeches I am delivering on the impact of the current recession on different sectors of the economy. When I last spoke to you in April on the distressed state of small business, I emphasized the need for Congress and the White House to work together in pulling the United States out of its recessionary pit. The need for action is even more urgent today as we continue to bump along at the bottom of the worst slowdown since the Great Depression. My speech today focuses on the recession in our critical energy sector.

THE NATIONAL RECESSION

Our Nation remains in a deep recession. Over the past year, real gross national product has dived farther than at any other time since the thirties, dropping more than 5 percent in the last quarter of 1981 and again in the first quarter of this year. Latest figures show a slight increase of 1.3 percent for the second quarter due largely to inventory adjustments and it is too early to tell whether or not this means the recession has ended. We are very likely just moving sideways now. Unemployment in the United States has jumped to a postwar record of 9.8 percent, the worst since the thirties. Including discouraged workers, there are more Americans out of work as I stand here today than at any time in our Nation's history except for the Great Depression year of 1933. With industrial production almost 10 percent below last year's level and at the lowest point since 1977, unemployment may well get worse before it improves.

LAGGING ENERGY DEMAND

The decline in industrial production has magnified the nationwide decline in energy demand. One conservative estimate attributes up to 30 percent of the decrease in petroleum consumption over the past year to the national recession.

Nineteen eighty-two is the third consecutive year that total energy consumption in the United States has fallen. Oil demand across the Nation has dropped 4.2 percent with the call for petroleum products off an even larger 5.6 percent this past year. The only other time in history that we had such a consistent decrease in the demand for oil and gas was during the early years of the Great Depression. Although reduced energy consumption has been a national goal for some years now, the proper means of reduction should be through increased efficiency and conservation, not economic recession.

The lower demand for oil is reflected in the 3.2-percent drop in Texas crude oil production in 1982 compared to this same period last year. On the average, at current prices, that represents some $15 million a day in lost output across the State. And according to the Texas Railroad Commission, buyers of Texas crude dropped their August requests for crude by 7,305 barrels a day from last month's figure. This reinforces a trend that has been developing over the past few months and should leave the August average daily production figure down roughly 15,000 barrels a day from its April level. Texas oil production is expected to continue its decline in the coming months, as well, according to the magazine Texas Business, with oil, gas, and coal producers not expecting a recovery until the fourth quarter of this year or the first quarter of 1983.

The mixture of tension within OPEC, good oil and gas finds last year, energy conservation, and the recession-induced drop in demand has given birth to an oversupply of energy on world markets. The result: A steep and persistent drop in prices. Nationally, wellhead crude oil prices have dropped almost 20 percent since last year, from $34 to $28 a barrel. Texas is experiencing a similar drop, with its oil prices off from 10 to 20 percent over the past 12 months. Even more significant, many oil producers last year expected oil prices to continue their upward trend, albeit not as rapidly as had been the case between 1980 and 1981. The precipitous drop in prices caught the industry off guard, placing many energy concerns in tight straits. Firms that invested in the expectation that oil would now be in the neighborhood of $38 a barrel are caught short with that oil still around $30 a barrel. And, if we include the effects of the windfall tax, one Texas firm estimates that the effective selling price of crude is down to $23 a barrel, almost 10 percent less than the pre-decontrol price in December 1980.

Indeed, it is an appropriate time for us to reevaluate the merits of the windfall tax. With the price of oil down significantly, the justification offered by some for the tax—that undue returns are flowing to the oil industry—does not hold water. All that tax is doing now is stealing funds needed for capital expenditures and drilling exploration, the source of the industry's future growth. For that reason, I urged the Senate Finance Committee to block the administration's proposal to raise taxes on independent producers' intangible drilling costs and percentage depletion which would have sharply cut funds available for domestic drilling and capital investment.

Economic textbooks tell us that lower prices should be accompanied by some higher levels of consumption. Yet, the continuing decline in energy consumption suggests that the recession, by choking the industrial sector and forcing people out of work, is the culprit behind much of the energy sector's woes. One of the most severe effects of any recession is the sense of pessimism that it breeds. Firmer prices, brought about most effectively and most equitably by halting the march of this recession, are essential if attitudes and realities in our critical energy sector are to change.

Another destabilizing feature of the current recession is the persistently high level of interest rates. Despite the recent welcomed decline, interest costs remain too high and prospects for a genuine liquidity crisis remain far too real. Energy firms are finding it more expensive and now—after the demise of the Penn Square Bank in Oklahoma—more difficult to secure reasonable credit.

Smaller independent firms, which accounted for 87 percent of last year's drilling activity, rely almost entirely on outside capital for their drilling efforts. Yet a number of them are now being forced into the bankruptcy courts because their cash flow is insufficient to meet interest-swollen costs. It is important to remember that real interest rates still remain substantially higher than in any period in our history. An easing of the inflation rate without an accompanying decline in interest rate spells real trouble because it chokes off any chance of a recovery. And that is exactly what we have witnessed thus far in 1982.

THE ENERGY SECTOR RECESSION

The combination of lagging demand and continued tight credit markets have hit the energy industry like a blowout. In order to stay viable, energy concerns have had to take dramatic cost-reducing measures, including decreased capital spending, less exploration, lower profits, and smaller employment levels. Drilling activity by the majors is expected to be off by 20 percent this year, well below their original expectations. Business Week recently reported that drilling fund investment has dropped over 30 percent since the beginning of the year and that the major oil companies are cutting their exploration budgets for the year by 10 percent.

The Hughes Tool Co., reports that the active rotary rig count in Texas, one of the chief indicators of the oil industry's health, is down 40 percent since this time last year, to 815 from 1,362. That firm, incidentally, recently had to dismiss 10 percent of its own work force. The State's rig activity is down an even larger 44 percent from its peak of 1,451 last December, with well over 600 rigs sitting idle today. And that continues with rig activity falling from 1 percent to 3 percent a week. Nationally, rig activity has slowed almost 40 percent since it peaked at 4,530 last December, leaving around 25,000 rig workers across the country unemployed.

The great oversupply of rigs has prompted analysts to predict that no new rigs will be built over the next year or two. That is serious news for our already hard-hit rig fabricators and rig-related workers. Well completions themselves have been up fairly sharply this year, but that fact is deceptive. The rise in completions so far this year is only a carryover of the momentum built up from the robust rig activity of last year; completions are expected to drop off substantially in the coming months. Moreover, the number of SEC-registered oil and gas programs has dropped 34 percent during the first 6 months of 1982. Private funds for leases are off over 40 percent as well.

Overall, the industrial production level for our mining sector is down over 10 percent since last year and is at its lowest point since 1979. The industrial production slowdown in fields such as iron and steel, nonelectrical machinery, and in the chemical-related sectors are, in part, a reflection of the energy slowdown. The production of nonelectrical machinery, for example, used for building exploration and drilling equipment is down almost 15 percent since last year. The industrial production index for chemicals and related products is down 10 percent since last year. And industrial production for steel and iron, a major energy user and an input into drilling equipment, is off more than 35 percent since last year, its lowest point in a decade.

Hardest hit by weak demand and interest costs are the smaller, independent energy firms. Lacking the diversified economic base of the majors, independents are having a much harder time weathering the energy recession. In the worst shape are those firms which bought modern, expensive equipment in recent years in order to stay competitive. The debt service burden on these firms is intense and many are struggling just to stay in business. Some have not, and the result has been a rash of business failures and bankruptcies over the past few months which have fallen heavily on Texas.

THE TEXAS RECESSION

The stranglehold of still excessive interest rates and diminished consumer and industrial demand in nearly every sector is squeezing the Texas economy in an unfamiliar and unprecedented manner. As I mentioned in my first speech, Texas' vibrant energy industries—the energy sector and associated industries—have always shielded that State from the worst effects of recessions in the past. Now, these same industries—once considered recessionproof—have fallen prey to the same slowdown afflicting our economy and most of the world. The recession has contributed directly and mightily to the oversupply of oil on the markets and the consequent softness in oil prices. Combined with high interest rates, that recession is crippling Texas energy concerns, from the largest conglomerates to the smallest independents. The number of business failures, layoffs, and investment cutbacks in Texas concerns me greatly. Of course, not every firm is losing money or cutting back on spending, but too many are suffering for us to sit by idly and do nothing. For every healthy Texas firm in the energy sector now, a half-dozen are trimming outlays and laying workers off.

Unemployment is at a distressing level in Texas, and reached a seasonally adjusted 7.0 percent in July. Although States in the Midwest and New England may look enviously at that figure, it is a postwar record and reflects a doubling in unemployment over the past few years. And the energy sector is at the heart of this downturn. The Texas Employment Commission reported in June that "manufacturing establishments and oil-related industries absorbed most of the (recent) unemployment (increases)." Within the manufacturing sector, the agency reported that the "most severe decline occurred in oil field machinery." Other sectors of the Texas economy dependent on energy, such as manufacturing, shipping, housing, and banking, are suffering even more with the energy sector in a recession.

Oil company bankruptcies in the Dallas area alone have jumped nearly 65 percent during the first half of 1982, compared with the same time period last year. Refinery capacity utilization has been reduced to near 60 percent, down over 5 percent since last year. The petrochemical industry is also running below its potential, with a utilization rate of about 65 percent. A number of refineries and petrochemical plants have been closed. The Texaco refinery in Port Arthur, the city's largest employer, has announced that it will be reducing its work force by 25 percent once its 4,000 employees end their strike. Port Arthur already faces an 11-percent unemployment rate.

Mr. Dave Fellers of the Texas Oil Marketers Association recently estimated that, including those firms now in trouble, about 10 percent of the marketing companies in Texas have gone out of business. In Baytown's United States Steel plant, 800 employees have been laid off because of poor demand. Unemployment compensation claims there are rising at a dramatic rate, and the Baytown Chamber of Commerce estimates that about 60 local businesses have failed during the past year. An even larger layoff occurred at Lone Star Steel's plant near Daingerfield due in part to illegal dumping of subsidized products by European producers.

As a result of slowdowns in refineries, chemical plants, and shipyards designed for building offshore oil rigs, unemployment in Orange, Tex., is over 15 percent, more than double the rate at the first of the year. Levingston Shipbuilding, one of the city's largest firms, has publicly announced that major layoffs will occur later this year unless new contracts are developed.

In Abilene, unemployment has reached a record high of 6.7 percent, up from 4.5 percent a year earlier. According to Gerald Cook, the executive director of the Abilene Industrial Foundation, about one-third of the area's oil-related manufacturing workers have been released. Those layoffs are having secondary effects throughout the area with a recovery still months away.

Oil country communities, such as Benavides in South Texas and Silverton in the Panhandle, have been hit extremely hard. Oil fields, once bustling with activity, are not being worked and many rigs are stacked. Indeed, from Midland and Odessa to Dallas to Galveston, and to Alice, the energy sector is contracting and prospects for a rapid recovery are not bright. Firms are searching for reasonable credit and communities are seeking new businesses, but neither are to be found.

DEEDS NOT TALK

This litany could not be much longer, but the evidence is clear that Texas and her energy industries are in a recession. Ending the national recession will go a long way toward restoring the health of the Texas economy and its key energy sector. Our national recession is an interest rate recession, and its cure consists of lower interest rates. Those rates began to fall considerably in August, but still remain at excessive levels. It is important that the Federal Reserve and its Chairman, Paul Volcker, accommodate these falling interest rates. The Federal Reserve must avoid the errors of last December when their return to a contractionary monetary policy stopped a promising slide in interest rates and extended the recession for at least an additional two quarters. The Fed must meet its own target growth rate for the monetary variable M_1 this year of 2.5 percent to 5.5 percent.

Congress and the President have a big role to play, as well, in the recovery. They must move promptly toward a balanced budget. The recent decline of interest rates will lop about $10 billion off the cost of financing the burgeoning national debt in fiscal year 1983. But a walloping deficit is still projected by the administration and much more must be done to slash spending. That is the best way to insure that interest rates continue moving down so they can spark a robust recovery.

The stakes in a quick recovery are larger, after all, than the economic health of one State or one industry. As the largest energy producing State, the weakening of the Texas energy industry has acute national and international ramifications. One-third of the Nation's natural gas is produced in Texas and about 30 percent of our crude oil comes from the oil fields of my State. Houston alone is home to more than 50 percent of the country's basic petrochemical manufacturing capacity. Indeed, a sluggish economy, and a weak energy exploration sector in particular, only fosters greater dependence on foreign countries for our vital energy needs, leaving our energy-thirsty economy needlessly vulnerable to foreign political manipulation and economic disruption. The restoration of a stronger energy industry in Texas must be an urgent national priority.

PUBLIC EMPLOYEES' APPRECIATION DAY

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with our distinguished colleagues from Virginia, Maryland, and Arkansas in cosponsoring the resolution designating January 17, 1983, as "Public Employees' Appreciation Day."

A strong and stable civil service is integral to successful government. Policies need to change to meet the changing needs of our society. However, there must be a cadre of well-informed and competent individuals who know the system well to be able to carry out the new policies of different administrations. In recent years, the civil service has come under increasing attack from a variety of sources. Often, Federal workers find it easy to blame politicians for these attacks, but politicians only reflect the feeling of the people of this Nation. It is clear that citizens of this country are exasperated at the conduct of the Federal Government. Anti-Federal Government and Federal employee feelings are rampant today because the Federal Government has frequently overextended itself into the private lives of our Nation's citizens.

The public is unaware, however, of the great contributions made by the Federal work force to the high standard of living experienced by so many Americans. The delivery of our mail is more efficient than in any other nation in the world. Medical breakthroughs at the National Institutes of Health and other Government health organizations are so common today that often the press fails to even report them. Approximately 30 million Americans are dependent on timely social security checks to live. The processing of those checks, new applications and payments to new survivors take a tremendous amount of organization and work and yet so few problems in the system ever surface.

I could go on and on with the achievements by the Federal work force. It is one thing for Congress to know about them; it is another for the public to know. There is a need for the American public to pause and reflect on the contributions of our thousands of civil servants. A Presidential proclamation of January 17, 1983, as "Public Employee's Appreciation Day" is a good way to start.

HONEY BEE ESSENTIAL TO AMERICA'S FOOD SUPPLY

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I recently learned of the administration's plan to close the bee research laboratory in Laramie, Wyo. This facility conducts essential research on honey bees at a minimal cost to the Government. The laboratory is ideally located near the major honey-producing areas in the United States and receives financial support from the University of Wyoming. The move will actually cost money, due to the expense of moving personnel and equipment from Laramie to Tucson, Ariz. This proposal must be reconsidered by the administration, since a healthy bee industry is essential to all Americans.

The honey bee is one of the busiest and most productive creatures in the world. Honey bees not only reproduce themselves, but also pollinate several different crops and produce tons of nutritious honey. Unfortunately, the future of the domestic beekeeping industry is being threatened by honey imports. It is essential, not only to the agricultural sector, but to all America, that the honey bee be preserved in the United States.

When bees collect nectar from flowers of plants to produce honey, they also transfer pollen, the male element in the plant fertilization process, from one plant to another. This activity is necessary for the plants to be properly pollinated. There are approximately 90 crops grown in the United States which depend on bees, at least to some extent, for pollination. The estimates of the value of the crops pollinated by bees varies widely. If you consider only the fruit, vegetables, and seeds resulting from bee pollination in the United States, the estimated value would be $10 to $15 billion. However, the importance of bees goes far beyond the crops directly benefiting from bee pollination. In fact, it has been estimated that almost one-third of our total diet comes directly or indirectly from insect-pollinated plants. With food costs in the United States at over $100 billion annually, it is clear that bees are vital to the American public. Without the honey bee to pollinate crops, the diet of American consumers would be limited to nuts, cereal grains, and meat. The cost of meat products would also increase without the honey bee.

This economic point is illustrated by the fact that honey bees have come to the forefront of a debate in Great Britain on the future of the Falkland Islands. It seems that plans for improving agriculture there have been stopped cold by the fact that no honey bees can live in that climate. Without honey bees, most profitable crops cannot be grown. The British are investigating a species of hardy bee which is too well insulated to fly. Instead, it crawls from flower to flower, performing its romantic duties in a pedestrian fashion.

The honey industry is also an important sector of our national economy. There are over 200,000 beekeepers throughout the United States with over 1,600 commercial beekeepers. The beekeepers own 4.3 million colonies of honey bees, which produce about 100 million dollars' worth of honey annually. These figures do not include the thousands of people involved in the processing and distributing of honey to the American consumers.

Currently, the entire domestic beekeeping industry and American food supply are being threatened by honey imports. In recent years, honey imports have dramatically increased to the point that over 30 percent of the honey sold in the United States is imported.

Prior to the mid-1970's, honey imports averaged about 10 million pounds annually, but since 1973, honey imports have increased dramatically. Honey imports reached 77 million pounds in 1981. The low prices for honey imports are underpricing domestic honey production, which forces beekeepers to place their crop under Government loan, rather than sell their honey at a loss. In 1981, 55 million pounds of honey were placed under loan.

Under the Commodity Credit honey loan program, the producer places his honey under loan. If he is unable to sell the honey by the following July, he can turn it over to the Commodity Credit Corporation. It is estimated that 37 million pounds of surplus honey will be turned over to the CCC this year. The Department of Agriculture uses a portion of the honey for school lunch programs and other food programs, but this is no way to distribute all of the surplus honey.

The import problem has been caused because the United States has become a dumping ground for world surplus honey production. The U.S. 1-cent-per-pound tariff, imposed in 1948, has not been changed, while all other major honey-importing nations have at least a 27-percent ad valorem tariff on honey imports.

In 1976, the International Trade Commission investigated the impact of honey imports on the domestic honey industry. The ITC found that honey imports were adversely affecting the domestic industry and recommended a tariff-rate quota be imposed to control imports. Unfortunately, the recommendation was not followed and now the domestic beekeeping industry is in jeopardy.

If the beekeeping industry is to be preserved, action must be taken to control honey imports and continue an effective honey bee research program in the United States. This action is not only vital to the beekeeping industry, but also to every American, because of the need for bees for crop pollination and an adequate food supply.

YOUNG SOUTH DAKOTAN PROMOTES DOMESTIC HONEY INDUSTRY

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, in the last months, I have worked to assist the domestic honey industry, which is such a vital component of our agricultural economy. I have introduced a resolution calling for an International Trade Commission study on the adverse effects of honey imports on this important agribusiness. I have also introduced legislation, S. 2124, to provide tariff relief from unfair foreign competition. I have just recently learned of the administration's proposal to close the Bee Research Laboratory in Laramie, Wyo., and have called on the administration to reconsider this decision. This laboratory is ideally located near major honey-producing areas in the United States and provides invaluable support and assistance to the industry. Today I want to commend another South Dakotan who has been actively promoting the benefits of our domestic honey industry.

Miss Kim Mentzer of Gann Valley, S. Dak., is the reigning American Honey Princess. On behalf of the American Beekeeping Federation, Kim has been traveling across the country to speak before groups and attend community functions and State fairs. I had the opportunity to meet Kim at the South Dakota State Fair this past month and I was very impressed with her poise and intelligence. She is an excellent representative of my home State and the American honey industry. The daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Roger Mentzer of Gann Valley, Kim is a home economics education student at South Dakota State University in Brookings. I know that her experiences as the American Honey Princess this year have been a fine practical education for her. She is a credit to South Dakota and to this very important industry.

THE MARCOUX FAMILY OF THOMPSON, CONN.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, Connecticut is honored to have one of its families named the 1982 International Knights of Columbus Family of the Year. For me, that honor takes on special significance. It is not only a Connecticut family the Knights of Columbus have recognized, but also a family I have had the pleasure of knowing over the years: the Marcoux family of Thompson, Conn.

Those of us who know Pete and Julia Marcoux and their eight children know they are a unique family. It seems there is not a community organization in Thompson that does not list a Marcoux among its members. I cannot remember any occasion when Pete or Julia or their children were not willing to help out. Certainly, the State, their town, and their neighbors have benefited greatly from their commitment and dedication. I know I have tremendous admiration and respect for their accomplishments.

That community spirit finds its roots in a homelife that apparently defies the pressures and challenges of today's world. Raising children is never easy and yet Pete and Julia have made raising eight beautiful children seem effortless. From the eldest, Stephen, 25; to Anne Marie, 24; Richard, 23; Michael 21; Maureen, 20; Patrick 18; Margaret, 16; and Julie Karen 15; the Marcoux children epitomize the very best of American youth.

The International Knights of Columbus could not have made a better choice. I share Connecticut's pride in the recognition of a State family and, add my personal congratulations to a family I am honored to have as friends.

THE ASSASSINATION OF LEBANON'S PRESIDENT-ELECT

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the assassination of Lebanon's President-elect Bashir Gemayel is shocking. My deepest heartfelt sympathies go to his family and to the Lebanese people who looked to him to lead their nation into an era of reconciliation and reconstruction. The death of this brilliant young man is all the more tragic because he symbolized hope for the future of Lebanon. More than any other individual, Bashir Gemayel offered the possibility of Lebanon emerging from 8 years of conflict as a secure and unified nation. With his assassination, fear for the future of Lebanon will increase greatly.

All of us, who are friends of Lebanon, share the grief of the Lebanese people. At the same time, I hope that the vision of Bashir Gemayel of a united, democratic, and tolerant Lebanon will not be a victim of the assassins. When I spoke to the President-elect on August 27, he stressed to me the need for all Lebanese to overcome past animosity and unite. He displayed considerable sensitivity to the necessity to reach out to all segments of Lebanese society. I particularly was impressed by his determination to act as President of all Lebanese and not just as the leader of a single political or confessional group.

Less than a month ago, he set forth his goals as President of Lebanon in an article in the Washington Post:

> First, any solution to the Lebanese crisis must be based on recovery of Lebanese sovereignty over the entirety of the national territory and the restoration to the Lebanese state of its full powers. Second, Israeli and Syrian forces must return to their own countries. . . . Third, the hundreds of thousands of Palestinians remaining in Lebanon must submit to and respect the authority of the Lebanese government in Lebanon. . . . Fourth, most important, and most widely recognized, the people of Lebanon must agree that force has no place in the inevitable disagreements that arise within any country. . . . [Lebanese society] must remain based upon the unity of Lebanon; the uniqueness of the Lebanese experience; and liberty, security, and justice for all Lebanese within a democratic government that guarantees all citizens' basic freedom.

Although the assassins have taken Bashir Gemayel from the Lebanese before he could begin implementing his policy of reconciliation, these hopes for Lebanon need not die with him. The Lebanese people have faced more than their share of tragedy during the past 8 years and once again will have to call on their inner strength to retain the vision of a united Lebanon.

GEORGE D. WOODS

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to a very dear friend, George D. Woods, who died recently at the age of 81. George embodied the best traits which our society can produce. He was a successful businessman, a devoted public servant, and a patron of the arts. During his presidency of the World Bank from 1963 to 1968, he broke new ground in increasing loans to the poorest developing countries and began lending nontraditional sectors such as agriculture and education. The farsightedness and wisdom of his approach is reflected in the strong endorsement of the World Bank's policies and loan portfolios contained in recent private sector and public studies of the World Bank.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article on George Woods published in the New York Times following his death.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 21, 1982]

GEORGE D. WOODS, 81, DIES; EX-PRESIDENT OF WORLD BANK

George David Woods, an investment banker who served as president of the World Bank from 1963 to 1968, died yesterday at his home near Lisbon. He was 81 years old and also maintained a residence in Manhattan.

Mr. Woods, a founder and eventually chairman of the board of the First Boston Corp., one of the Nation's leading investment houses, served as a director of numerous companies during, his career, including The New York Times Co.

Long after Mr. Woods had turned over the reins of the First Boston Corp. of New York, he maintained an office in New York and was sought out by executives around the world for consultation.

At his death, he was a trustee of the Ochs Trust, which holds a controlling interest in The New York Times Co.

Mr. Woods, who had lived most of his life in New York, has also been a director of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts in New York City and chairman of the board of the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center.

Last night, his physician, Dr. Fred Plum, recalled that the tall, lanky Mr. Woods looked like a banker but had none of a banker's austerity. He was, Dr. Plum said, "a man of great personal wry warmth," whose business dealings led to a worldwide circle of friends.

Mr. Woods' favorite expression, according to his wife, the former Louise Taraldson, was, "You can accomplish an awful lot of good if you don't care who gets the credit."

Mr. Woods had been close to the late Nelson A. Rockefeller and for a time maintained a home at the Rockefeller estate at Pocantico Hills, N.Y.

In the late 1950's Mr. Woods, on a special assignment for the World Bank before he became its president, helped straighten out the financial chaos left in the wake of the nationalization of the Suez Canal by Egypt.

Earlier, as an executive of the First Boston Corp., he was instrumental in the financing of the Kaiser Engineering and Alumimum Co. of Canada, when other Wall Street companies were not heeding Henry J. Kaiser's pleas for help.

George David Woods, the son of a naval shipyard worker, was born in Boston on July 27, 1901. He spent his boyhood in Brooklyn, where his father, seeking work, had moved the family.

After the death of his father and with only a diploma from Brooklyn Commercial High School, Mr. Woods set out for a career on Wall Street at the age of 17. He started as an office boy in the firm of Harris, Forbes & Company and moved ahead steadily.

The banking upheavals of the 1930's saw his firm transformed into the First Boston Corporation, a leading investment-banking house. He became chairman of the board of First Boston in 1951.

His call to the World Bank first came from Eugene Black, its president from 1949 to 1962 and an old associate and friend from the days at Harris, Forbes. Mr. Black had previously asked Mr. Woods to help out on special assignments.

It was in this fashion that Mr. Woods became familiar with the workings of the World Bank, and in the summer of 1962, Mr. Black asked him to Washington for a meeting with President John F. Kennedy and C. Douglas Dillon, the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Woods learned that he had been chosen by the Kennedy Administration as its nominee for president of the World Bank. He accepted.

Under his stewardship, the World Bank kept on an innovative course. Mr. Woods pursued a policy of giving poor countries freer access to loans. For the first time, the bank also made loans in such areas as agriculture and education.

The World Bank's loans were made from funds raised through the sale of its bonds on the world's foremost financial markets. Mr. Woods also pressed hard for sharply increased contributions from the public treasures of the rich nations to the Bank's "easy-loan" subsidiary, the International Development Association.

A New Yorker to the core, Mr. Woods declined to take a house in Washington, keeping his New York apartment instead. When he and his wife left New York, they were likely to spend time in a house they owned in Portugal.

"This problem of development is not going to be solved in your lifetime," he once told a young questioner, "and perhaps not in the lifetime of your children. I can't say the job has been easy, but I believe in this effort."

Mr. Woods had a longstanding love affair with the New York theater. He was a backer of Broadway productions, and some of them, "Dead End" and "Sailor Beware," became hits. He was also former treasurer and director of Ringling Brothers, Barnum and Bailey Circus and helped his friend John Ringling North reorganize the circus.

In addition to his wife, Mr. Woods is survived by a sister, Grace Johnson, of Scarsdale.

According to his wife, Mr. Woods will be cremated, but, in accordance with his wishes, there will be no funeral or memorial service.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION ADJUDICATION PROCEDURE AND JUDICIAL REVIEW ACT

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor and enthusiastic advocate of judicial review for veterans, I take particular pleasure in supporting final passage of the Veterans' Administration Adjudication Procedure and Judicial Review Act.

I commend Senator HART for his longstanding commitment to this legislation. Senator HART first introduced judicial review legislation in 1976. In 1979, he introduced a substitute measure, S. 330. With the strong support and able assistance of Senator CRANSTON, the then chairman of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, this bill passed the Senate on September 17, 1979. Unfortunately, the House failed to act on that bill prior to adjournment of the 96th Congress. When S. 349 was introduced in January 1981, I was pleased to join Senators HART and CRANSTON in sponsoring this bill.

I would be remiss if I did not take this opportunity to thank Senator SIMPSON for promptly scheduling hearings on this bill and for expeditiously moving the bill through the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

Veterans are the only group of Federal beneficiaries who, after having exhausted all their administrative remedies, are denied access to the Federal courts. Under existing law, the Board of Veterans' Appeals remains the final arbiter of veterans' benefit decisions. To deny veteran claimants their due process rights is discriminatory, unfair, and reduces them to second-class citizens. Clearly, veterans should be accorded the same legal rights as other Federal claimants.

The legislation before us corrects the inequities in existing law. Under this bill veterans will be provided with limited access to the Federal courts for judicial review of final decisions of the Board of Veterans' Appeals. While an appeal can be made on both questions of law and fact, the scope of review on questions of fact has been limited to material facts that are "so utterly lacking in a rational evidentiary basis that a manifest and grievous injustice would result" if factual decisions were not set aside. By strictly limiting the court's authority on questions of fact, the Board of Veterans' Appeals will remain the expert arbiter on these questions.

In addition to judicial review, the bill contains two other provisions which should enhance the veterans' claims process. It subjects the Veterans' Administration to the formal rulemaking requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act and codifies a number of internal adjudication procedures already in use with the agency.

Finally, the bill modifies the current $10 limitation on fees attorneys may receive for representing VA claimants. The committee recognized the outstanding work veterans' service organizations do in representing VA claimants and wished to discourage attorney representation at the initial application, decision, and appeal levels. Therefore, the bill retains the $10 limit on attorneys' fees until after a claim has been denied by the Board of Veterans' Appeals. At that point, however, the committee believed veteran claimants might have need of the services of an attorney and the bill would permit the Administrator to approve a reasonable fee for attorneys not to exceed $500. If a claimant and an attorney enter into a contingent-fee arrangement, then attorneys fees would be limited to 25 percent of any past-due benefits awarded in the case.

89-059 O-86-32 (Pt. 17)

This bill has been carefully constructed to preserve the informal, nonadversarial nature of VA adjudication proceedings while giving veterans the same due process rights as other Federal beneficiaries. It will go a long way toward insuring that veterans receive from the VA every benefit and service to which he or she may be entitled under the law and I urge the bill's passage.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the reform of the U.S. immigration laws is of major importance. Recently, this body approved S. 2222, the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1982. While I believe that S. 2222 represents a first step in the right direction, I voted against this bill because it does not approach our present immigration problem in the balanced manner that I prefer.

One aspect of the immigration problem that I believe S. 2222 does not adequately address is its effect on and basis in foreign policy considerations. Senator GARY HART recently wrote an article concerning immigration policy as a foreign policy issue that appeared in the New York Times. While I do not necessarily agree with everything that Senator HART says in the article, I commend him for bringing to light this generally overlooked aspect of our immigration policy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator HART's article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 24, 1982]

IMMIGRANTS AND THE NEW BILL

(By GARY HART)

WASHINGTON.—The legislation overhauling United States immigration law that the Senate has approved focuses almost entirely on domestic issues—stricter law-enforcement, lower quotas, regularizing the status of undocumented workers already in this country. But the Senate has not fully addressed the problem that brings thousands of immigrants to our shores each year.

Immigration is not merely a domestic issue. It is also a matter of foreign policy. So even the strictest enforcement of the various elements of the Senate bill, which has been sent to the House, would have little long-term effect. Quite simply, these provisions do nothing to address the root causes of migration and the flow of refugees: economic underdevelopment, social injustice, human rights violations, population growth. Until our immigration debate addresses these serious international issues, we will never develop an adequate immigration policy.

The Haitian refugees detained in United States camps vividly illustrate this point. Although they cannot possibly think they have entered the "golden door" of economic and social opportunity, they continue to come. Life in the camps, with all its hardships, is obviously preferable to a life where social and economic opportunity are systematically denied.

There are enormous disparities between rich and poor in Haiti. Five percent of the population accumulates 50 percent of the national income. In 1980 (the last year for which data are available), Haiti's average per capita income was $275, the lowest in the Western Hemisphere. On the average, the Haitian Government spends $1 per person per year on education; it spends $18 per person per year on internal security.

According to the Organization of American States, corruption pervades all levels of Haitian government. As a result, domestic revenues and foreign aid are diverted for personal enrichment, rather than being spent on economic development.

Repression has been a fact of life in Haiti since 1957 when Francois "Papa Doc" Duvalier began his brutal regime. His successor and son, Jean-Claude "Baby Doc" Duvalier, has continued the tradition. The result has been a flood of poor, uneducated "boat people" to the United States.

Haiti is by no means alone in contibuting immigrants. From March 1979 to March 1981, the number of Central Americans and South Americans in the United States increased from roughly 840,000 to 1.002 million. In the last 18 months alone, 200,000 Salvadorans have fled to the United States. And in Southeast Asia, intolerable conditions have brought hundreds of thousands of Indochinese to the United States.

It is unrealistic to think that these trends will not continue. Unprecedented population growth has contributed to tension not only in Mexico, the Caribbean basin and Central America, but also in the Middle East and the Far East.

Entrants into the labor force in the nonindustrialized world are expected to grow by at least 700 million in the next 20 years. Moreover, migration from rural areas to already over burdened cities will increase. Add continuing civil and regional wars, famine and repression, and migration flow will become a migration flood.

Limiting our changes in immigration policy to domestic measures will thus have little impact on migration pressures from troubled areas of the world. Ultimately, our immigration problems must be managed with the cooperation and participation of other governments. The immigration factor must become an integral part of the formulation of our foreign policy, particularly as it applies to certain areas of the globe. For example, we need to recognize that our tacit support of the repressive Duvalier regime will be paid for in an influx of "boat people" to this country.

Policies that favor confrontation and military solutions must be avoided in dealing with Central American countries since such policies add to emigration pressures.

Trade and investment incentives for Mexico and the Caribbean basin should take into account their impact on the creation of jobs and demographic movements. For example, Washington might consider providing incentives to United States and Mexican firms willing to locate in northern Mexico in return for Mexican Goverment assistance in blocking illegal immigration.

Both bilateral and multilateral assistance can, if properly directed, help create jobs and slow population growth in various countries around the world.

Regardless of good-faith legislative efforts to reform domestic immigration procedures, the problems presented by immigration in the 1980's and 1990's will not be solved without a more democratic, imaginative and farsighted foreign policy.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as in morning business, I have a number of items that may be dealt with, I believe, by unanimous consent.

There are a number of items on my legislative calendar which are cleared for action by unanimous consent. I especially invite the attention of the minority leader to the following: Calendar Nos. 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, and 791.

I inquire whether the minority leader is in a position to consider all or any of those items at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, those items have all been cleared on this side of the aisle.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the items just identified be laid before the Senate in sequence.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask the distinguished majority leader if he will also indicate what items he would like to proceed with on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am prepared to go forward with those items beginning on page 4, under Department of Justice, the first item being No. 937 Edward R. Camacho, of Guam, to be U.S. marshal for the district of Guam, including all those on page 5 under Department of Justice, Panama Canal Commission, and Air Force, and on page 6; then, on page 7, nominations placed on the Secretary's desk in the Air Force, U.S. Air Force, U.S. Marine Corps.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, all of those items have been cleared on this side of the aisle. So there is no objection to proceeding with the items that the distinguished majority leader has enumerated on the Executive Calendar and on the General Calendar.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, then, after we complete consideration of the items on the Legislative Calendar it would be my intention to ask the Senate to go into executive session for the purpose of considering the items that are cleared there.

WORLD FOOD DAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate first Calendar Order No. 785, Senate Joint Resolution 174.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 174) to authorize and request the President to designate October 16, 1982 as "World Food Day".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

THE PROBLEM OF WORLD HUNGER AND ITS OBSERVANCE

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, thousands of people across the United States are planning to take part in World Food Day observances on October 16, 1982. These people belong to a broad coalition of groups interested in eradicating the problems of world hunger—farm, labor, education, industry, and antipoverty groups—all working together to find a solution to this most serious problem.

It is estimated that hunger of a chronic nature affects over 500 million people around the world today. Undernutrition and malnutrition lead to the deaths of 40,000 children every day, or almost 15 million children each year. Hunger and malnutrition are also responsible for a large number of the cases of brain damage, sterility, and other permanent physical defects. For example, over 250,000 people go blind each year due to vitamin deficiencies. These numbers are staggering, indicating the danger of ignoring this issue.

And yet, the trend in the industrialized world is to focus on our own problems, and not on those of our starving neighbors. Problems of inflation, high unemployment, and lowered productivity are hurting all of the major industrial powers, who are, as a result, focusing inward on their own problems and cutting back on efforts to aid their less fortunate neighbors. They are concentrating their efforts and funding on their own hunger and poverty problems. They are cutting back on aid to multilateral organizations interested in alleviating world hunger. They are also cutting back on direct foreign aid to the Third World. These factors magnify the problems of the Third World.

These Third World countries face a number of factors that make it increasingly difficult for them to feed their people. Most face trade imbalances, fueled in part by the price of oil. The infrastructure necessary for a healthy agricultural system, including roads, irrigation systems, food processing, and storage facilities, is to a large extent missing in many of these countries. Most of these countries now have a large pool of unemployed urban dwellers, with little chance of getting work to pay for their basic necessities, such as food. A number of these countries have targeted industrial development as their main economic goal, and have put a large amount of their precious economic resources and capital into development of industry, at the expense of the agricultural sector. Other problems include less arable land available for cultivation each year, water shortages, and rising grain prices.

This presents a bleak picture. But steps are being taken to insure that the difficulties of this problem do not exceed our capacity to solve it. The Hunger Elimination and Global Security Act (S. 1675), of which I am a cosponsor, contains provisions to insure that American food and other assistance would benefit the poorest and most hungry. Another step is the World Food Day resolution, which will help to draw attention to this ever-increasing problem facing the world.

Over 260 groups have joined the World Food Day National Committee to coordinate efforts on this issue. Last year, all 50 Governors signed proclamations designating October 16 as World Food Day, and 10 Governors have done so thus far this year. Last year, thousands of people all over the world participated in World Food Day celebrations. Greater public awareness of this issue is necessary to make a larger effort to eradicate the problem of world hunger. The World Food Day resolution does that by showing the seriousness of our intention to give our full efforts to wipe out the problem of world hunger.

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, as we head into our season of harvest, and see the vast abundance of this land, we are reminded of those in the world who are not as fortunate as we are, who are hungry and have little hope of ever seeing a bountiful harvest.

To commemorate both the strength of American agriculture and the need to meet the world hunger challenge, I am once again sponsoring this World Food Day resolution. This October 16, 1982, thousands of Americans and people the world over will be marking World Food Day through religious services, civic observances, and educational activities. I applaud all of these efforts, especially the events planned in my home State of Vermont.

I am deeply committed to confronting the underlying causes of the desperate hunger and proverty that limit the lives of over 500 million men, and women and children in the world. As a member of the President's Commission on World Hunger, I am convinced that hunger can be eliminated if certain policy decisions are taken, both in the developed and developing world. I agree with the recent analysis by Martin McLaughin of the Overseas Development Council that we must pursue the following goals:

First, increased food production by small farmers in food-deficit countries; second, better distribution of available food; third, ways to sustain hungry people until they can either grow enough food or earn the income to buy it; and fourth, fairer distribution of income through land reform, increased employment in the countryside and other related measures.

I will work in the Senate to further these goals. It is in our own national interest to ease the tension that results from the pressures of poverty and hunger in the Third World. I also feel that addressing world hunger is a moral challenge as well.

All Americans can give thanks for a rich and just land where hunger is almost a horror of the past. Now it is time to help the rest of the world toward food self-reliance. I urge all Americans to observe World Food Day, and I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.●

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 174

Whereas hunger and chronic malnutrition remain daily facts of life for hundreds of millions of people throughout the world;

Whereas the children of the world are those who are suffering the most serious effects of hunger and malnutrition, with millions of children dying each year from hunger-related illness and disease, and many others suffering permanent physical or mental impairment, including blindness, because of vitamin and protein deficiencies;

Whereas although progress has been made in reducing the incidence of hunger and malnutrition in the United States, certain groups notably Native Americans, migrant workers, the elderly, and children, remain vulnerable to malnutrition and related diseases;

Whereas there is widespread concern that the use and conservation of land and water resources required for food production throughout the United States ensure care for the national patrimony we bequeath to future generations;

Whereas national policies concerning food, farmland, and nutrition require continuing evaluation and should consider and strive for the well-being and protection of all residents of the United States and particularly those most at health risk;

Whereas a major global food supply crisis appears likely to occur within the next twenty years unless the level of world food production is significantly increased, and the means for the distribution of food and of the resources required for its production are improved;

Whereas the United States, as the worlds's largest producer and trader of food, has a key role to play in efforts to assist nations and peoples to improve their ability to feed themselves;

Whereas the United States has a long tradition of demonstrating its humanitarian concern for helping the hungry and malnourished:

Whereas efforts to resolve the world hunger problems are critical to the security of the United States and the international community;

Whereas a key recommendation of the Presidential Commission on World Hunger was that efforts be undertaken to increase public awareness of the world hunger problem;

Whereas the first World Food Day on October 16, was supported by proclamations of the Governors of all fifty States, a resolution of Congress, a Presidential proclamation, efforts of the United States Department of Agriculture, and by more than one hundred and seventy-five national private and voluntary organizations; and

Whereas the one hundred and fifty-two nations of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations designated October 16, 1982, as "World Food Day" because of the need to alert the public to the increasingly dangerous world food situation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating October 16, 1982, as "World Food Day", and calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate activities.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 235) to proclaim March 21, 1983, as "National Agriculture Day," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 235

Whereas agriculture is this Nation's most basic industry, and its associated production, processing, and marketing segments, together, provide more jobs than any other single industry; and

Whereas the productivity of agriculture is a vital ingredient in our strength as a Nation, both domestically and on the world scene; and

Whereas, to maintain a healthy agriculture, it is necessary that all the people of the United States understand how agriculture affects their lives and well-being, and be aware of their personal stake in an abundant food and fiber supply: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That March 21, 1983, is hereby proclaimed "National Agriculture Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe this day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 238) to designate October 9, 1982, as "National Running and Fitness Day," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 238

Whereas the public awareness of the need for maintaining physical fitness is becoming increasingly evident;

Whereas jogging is an excellent, convenient, and inexpensive form of exercise that provides opportunities for a graduated program of physical fitness for most individuals regardless of age, sex, or level of fitness;

Whereas numerous medical authorities believe that a regular, sensible jogging program improves the function of the cardiovascular system, reduces coronary risk factors, and serves as an advisable supplement to weight-reducing or weight-control program;

Whereas a positive correlation exists between the development of a fit body and the ability to experience an enriched and more satisfying life; and

Whereas an estimated thirty million persons all across America jog or run as a recreation activity which is beneficial and enjoyable: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation declaring October 9, 1982, as "National Running and Fitness Day", and calling upon the people of the United States and interested groups to celebrate such day by participating in fitness-related sports, seminars, and other events throughout the United States and to incorporate regular exercise into their everyday lives.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 239) designating October 16, 1982, as "National Newspaper Carriers Appreciation Day," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 239

Whereas newspapers and their availability to the citizens comprise a cornerstone of a free society and of our democracy, as affirmed under the freedom of the press clause of the first amendment to the United States Constitution;

Whereas every day more than 107 million Americans read one or more of the nine thousand three hundred and ninety-six daily, weekly, or other newspapers published in the United States;

Whereas 83 per centum of the daily newspapers printed in the United States are delivered to the homes of readers;

Whereas newspapers carriers have always played an important and vital role in the distribution of newspapers;

Whereas there are approximately one million newspapers carriers in the United States;

Whereas 90 per centum of such newspapers carriers are eighteen years of age or under; and

Whereas it is appropriate to acknowledge the too often unappreciated contribution of newspaper carriers to freedom, and to recognize their devoted efforts in delivering the paper regardless of inclement weather: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 16, 1982, be designated as "National Newspaper Carriers Appreciation Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate celebrations and activities.

NATIONAL DRUNK DRIVING AND DRUGGED DRIVING AWARENESS WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 241) to provide for the designation of the week of December 12, 1982, through December 18, 1982, as "National Drunk Driving and Drugged Driving Awareness Week."

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate has agreed to prompt passage of Senate Joint Resolution 241, which designates the week of December 12 through December 18, 1982, as "National Drunk Driving and Drugged Driving Awareness Week." I also would like to thank my colleagues for their support, particularly those 34 Senators who have joined me as cosponsors in this important effort.

Drunk driving is a problem which remains with us year after year, dulling us into acceptance of the death and destruction it causes. The current public demand for new approaches and solutions at all levels, Federal, State, and local, is heartening indeed. In particular, I applaud the volunteer efforts of citizens groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD) and Remove Intoxicated Drivers (RID), who have played such a large part in stimulating the current initiatives.

The Senate recently unanimously approved legislation to assist State and local efforts against drunk driving. With passage of this resolution the Senate will underscore once again its support for these new efforts and provide another focus for the continued drive to raise public awareness of the dangers of drunk driving.

Of increasing concern to all of us working in the field of alcohol and drug abuse is the rising incidence of driving after drug use, either alone or in combination with alcohol. Researchers are just beginning to collect data on the effects of drugs on driving ability, but it is clear from what we now know that drug use, with or without alcohol abuse, carries an increased risk of driving ability impairment.

Our intent is to help reduce the shocking toll, in human terms and economic costs, of both drunk and drugged driving. It is my hope that selecting the week of December 12, 1982, for Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week, right before the Christmas and New Years holidays and the increased socializing which often includes excessive drinking, will reduce the incidence of traffic accidents across the Nation during this holiday period.

Designation of Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week will raise in the public's mind perhaps a new understanding of the risks of drugged driving and renewed appreciation of the known dangers of drunk driving. It will also provide an opportunity for governmental and private groups and businesses to develop innovative and informative messages warning against drunk and drugged driving. Finally, it will send an important message to those working in the field that this Congress supports their tireless efforts to reduce injuries and deaths on our highways from this critical national problem.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 241

Whereas traffic accidents cause more violent deaths in the United States than any other cause, over fifty thousand in 1980;

Whereas traffic accidents also play a substantial role in serious injuries in this country;

Whereas between 40 and 55 per centum of drivers who are fatally injured have alcohol concentrations in their blood above the legal limit and this figure rises to 55 to 65 per centum in single vehicle crashes;

Whereas the total societal cost of drunk driving has been estimated anywhere from $5,000,000,000 to $25,000,000,000 a year, which does not include the human suffering that can never be measured;

Whereas there are increasing reports of driving after drug use and accidents involving drivers who have used marihuana or other illegal drugs;

Whereas more research is needed on the effects of drugs on driving ability and their impact on the incidence of traffic accidents, either alone or in combination with alcohol;

Whereas an increased public awareness of the gravity of the problem of drugged driving may warn drug users to refrain from driving and may stimulate interest in increased research on the effects of drugs on driving ability and the incidence of traffic accidents;

Whereas the public, particularly through the work of citizens groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD) and Remove Intoxicated Drivers (RID), is demanding a solution to the problem of drunk driving;

Whereas the President has appointed a Commission on Drunk Driving to heighten public awareness and stimulate the pursuit of solutions;

Whereas many States have appointed task forces to examine the existing drunk driving program and make recommendations for a renewed, comprehensive approach;

Whereas an increase in the national awareness of the problem of drunk and drugged driving may help to sustain current efforts to develop comprehensive solutions at the State and local levels; and

Whereas the Christmas and New Year's holiday period, with more drivers on the roads and an increased number of social functions, is a particularly appropriate time to focus national attention on this critical problem: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of December 12, 1982, through December 18, 1982, is designated as "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that week with appropriate activities.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL LEGAL SECRETARIES COURT OBSERVANCE WEEK

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 97) to designate the second full week in October as "National Legal Secretaries' Court Observance Week," which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment on page 2, line 3, to strike "each year", and insert "1982".

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the second full week in October 1982 is designated "Legal Secretaries' Court Observance Week." The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon Federal officials, the Governors of the several States, the chief officials of local governments, interested groups and organizations, and the people of the United States, particularly the legal community, to observe the week with appropriate activities.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read:

Joint resolution to designate the second full week of October 1982 as "National Legal Secretaries' Court Observance Week".

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 97

Whereas, legal secretaries are an integral part of the administration of justice in the United States;

Whereas, highly skilled and highly trained secretaries make it possible for the legal system to function effectively;

Whereas, the contributions of legal secretaries to the legal system are often made outside the courtroom and many secretaries have little exposure to courtroom proceedings;

Whereas, exposure to courtroom proceedings would enrich the legal secretaries' understanding of their work; and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States recognizes and emphasizes the desirability of providing legal secretaries an opportunity to observe court proceedings: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the second full week in October 1982 is designated "Legal Secretaries' Court Observance Week." The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon Federal officials, the Governors of the several States, the chief officials of local governments, interested groups and organizations, and the people of the United States, particularly the legal community, to observe the week with appropriate activities.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

COMMEMORATING THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE WASHINGTON CATHEDRAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is one other matter that has now been cleared for action, I believe, and that is a concurrent resolution to be offered by the distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH).

Could I inquire of the distinguished acting minority leader if he is in position to consider it at this time?

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I am. There are no objections to consideration of this concurrent resolution on the part of the minority.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the acting minority leader.

Mr. President, I send a concurrent resolution to the desk on behalf of the Senator from Missouri and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 120) to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the Washington Cathedral.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, September 29 will mark the 75th anniversary of the Cathedral Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, better know to this city and the people of this country as the Washington Cathedral. This magnificent cathedral has risen on Mount St. Alban's in northwest Washington since 1907, and I have introduced this concurrent resolution today to commemorate its 75th anniversary.

The Washington Cathedral plays an important part in the spiritual life and the political life of this country. The Congress of the United States may take pride in the fact that in the late 19th century it granted a charter to the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Foundation, leading to the construction of this stately and imposing cathedral. When one considers, for example, that the construction of Canterbury Cathedral in England took 5 centuries, the building of the Washington Cathedral seems all the more remarkable a feat.

I believe it is altogether fitting for the Congress of the United States to recognize and honor the cathedral's 75th anniversary.

Mr. President, I urge the immediate adoption of this concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 120) was considered and agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. CON. RES. 120

Whereas the foundation stone for the Cathedral Church of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, known as the Washington Cathedral, was laid on September 29, 1907, with the President of the United States, Members of Congress, and Justices of the Supreme Court in attendance;

Whereas George Washington was the first to call for a "great church for national purposes in the capital city";

Whereas the Congress in 1893 granted a charter to the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Foundation for religious, charitable, and educational purposes, leading to the construction of this grand Gothic cathedral;

Whereas the Cathedral is administered by the Episcopal Church, it is truly a house of prayer for all people, with its pulpit open to all faiths, seeking to serve the whole Nation, offering its ministry on behalf of all churches;

Whereas in times of trial the leaders of our Nation often have gathered there to pray and seek God's guidance;

Whereas this majestic monument to our Nation's faith in a Divine Creator dominates the physical and spiritual horizons of the City of Washington;

Whereas the Cathedral is an architectural and artistic masterpiece that will lift up the human heart for centuries to come;

Whereas the nave of this magnificent cathedral was dedicated in the year of America's two hundredth anniversary "for the reconcilliation of the peoples of the earth";

Whereas the Cathedral inspires over 500,000 American visitors each year; and

Whereas September 29, 1982, marks the seventy-fifth anniversary of this great Cathedral: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States recognizes and pays tribute to the Washington Cathedral on its seventy-fifth anniversary and to all the men and women whose especial labors have contributed to the building of this great house of worship.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate is directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the Canon of the Cathedral Church of Saint Peter and Saint Paul.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be recinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The clerk will continue to call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHMITT). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as the Senate knows, I have been trying to find time to move to the consideration of the Hatch amendment to the Constitution. I had thought, perhaps, we could do it yesterday. I still hope we can get to that today. But for a variety of reasons—and they are good reasons—the principals involved in that debate as well as the principals involved in the debt limit/Helms debate need a little time to arrange their schedules and to consult with each other.

RECESS UNTIL 2:30 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 2:30 p.m.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 12:46 p.m., recessed until 2:30 p.m.; whereupon the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. JEPSEN).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATOR GORTON RECEIVES GOLDEN GAVEL AWARD

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it has been called to my attention by the Journal Clerk that at 4 p.m. today the distinguished junior Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON), who is now presiding, will have presided over the Senate for 100 hours, which will add his name to that very short list of Senators who have presided for 100 hours. He will be the recipient of the Golden Gavel Award. I congratulate the Senator from Washington for that accomplishment. I remember when I was a young Senator, having now recovered from being young, that I presided at great length but they did not keep track in those days. I do not know whether I received a golden gavel or not. I recall so clearly that what I know about the rules of the Senate I learned from sitting in that chair. I congratulate the Senator from Washington for his diligence and dedication to duty. I congratulate him on the award which he will receive shortly after 4 o'clock.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATIVE TO ABORTION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, for some days now I have indicated that at some point I intended to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Hatch constitutional amendment dealing with abortion.

I understand it is not possible to gain unanimous consent to proceed to that measure and, therefore, I will not make such a request. But at this time, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 110.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, the majority leader is correct, there have been objections by Members to the unanimous-consent request. A motion to move to it would be debatable. I simply want to say that what we wanted to do on our side was to dispose of the Helms amendment first and not have it mixed up with the constitutional amendment.

I do congratulate the Senator from Utah for going through what I regard as the proper procedural route, and if we had been able to dispose of the Helms amendment and decide that issue we would have had no trouble considering it at this time. But we do not want it considered while we are in the midst of this debate.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I understand the position of the Senator from Oregon. But, by the same token, I think no one is taken by surprise at this motion at this time. I had hoped to be able to do this on yesterday, but for good reasons the Senator from Utah was not able to be here, because he had a State election in his State yesterday. I do not blame him.

But, Mr. President, this has been going on for some time. I would invite Senators' attention to the fact that for a year now, I have said, that if we would forbear to offer amendments either to the Constitution or in statutory form to other pieces of legislation, particularly appropriation bills, that I would attempt to schedule a free-standing debate on these matters.

Through a variety of circumstances this was the time chosen for that debate, and this is the vehicle that was chosen for debate, that is, the debt limit bill now pending.

At one time it appeared that we might get a unanimous-consent agreement for the disposition of these matters. Also for good reasons, and I have no blame to attach to any party in this respect, that agreement was not gained, could not be entered into.

I have no criticism of any Senator. To the contrary, I assert that every Senator treated me in good faith and honesty on that subject.

But, Mr. President, we are now at a point where it is necessary to try to redeem a commitment I had made over a period of time, that is, that we were going to have a debate on abortion, and that must include debate as well on the Hatch amendment.

The Senator from Utah has been kind and generous in his cooperation. He has been patient, as indeed have the Senators from North Carolina and others who are deeply interested in this subject.

But now it is all too clear that we must get on with the business at hand. We do not have a cloture vote on the debt limit or rather on the Helms amendment until 5 this afternoon. This looks like a pretty good time to do it.

Therefore, Mr. President, I felt constrained to make this motion at this time.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I appreciate the comments of both of my colleagues. I think that we came within a gnat's eyelash of being able to secure a unanimous-consent agreement whereby we could have debated my proposed constitutional amendment and had a vote up or down on it.

I had deeply wanted thorough debate on this amendment, I wanted to see both sides discuss this matter in a full and fair manner.

Some of my distinguished colleagues have said repeatedly that we should have been properly addressing the abortion issue only through a constitutional amendment, yet here we have such an amendment reported from the Judiciary Committee, after full and complete hearings, and yet several of my colleagues remain unprepared to prevent even the semblance of a reasonable debate or fair consideration of this amendment.

They feel strongly about their positions; I understand that. I believe nevertheless that after such debate, if we had had it, a substantial majority of this body would have supported passage of this amendment. But I also want to be frank here. I have no illusions. I spent 6 years trying to get the balanced budget constitutional amendment to the floor of the Senate. We only passed that by a constitutional two-thirds majority this year and that was only after an extremely extensive debate that took almost 3 weeks.

Though a substantial majority might have supported the passage of this amendment, in all frankness, I do not believe we would have the requisite two-thirds vote at this time.

It is tragic that the opportunity which we anticipated for a full and open debate on this proposal is not going to materialize; it is now apparent that there will be a filibuster not only on the constitutional amendment itself but also on the motion to proceed. There will not be a genuine debate on this issue.

I feel a little boxed in at this point because there is simply not sufficient time remaining to deal with this matter in view of what some would call "obstructionist" devices employed by a minority on this issue. I think this effort deserves full and fair debate.

I have spent a great deal of time in recent days assessing this situation. This body has spent a great deal of time in consideration of the proposed Helms amendment to the pending debt ceiling resolution. We have already had two cloture votes and two additional ones are expected, if necessary.

I have to admit my disappointment that the most fundamental questions relating to abortion as public policy have not been given the attention they deserve during this period. We have spent far more time discussing court stripping and procedure and the constitutionality of the Helms measure that on the basic question of abortion itself. That is, does this country want to continue to assent to the Supreme Court decision of Roe against Wade, a decision which effectively legalized abortion on demand during the entire term of a woman's pregnancy, a decision which, in one fell swoop, overturned the considered judgment of the State legislatures of every State in this Union. This is the question that Congress has yet to directly address nearly a decade after the decision of Roe against Wade.

I have come reluctantly to the conclusion that this issue cannot be discussed and debated thoroughly under the present circumstances and in the present environment. The time constraints and the circumstances of the present Helms amendment debate have made that impossible, in my view.

Therefore, I would respectfully like to ask the distinguished majority leader of the Senate several questions relating to this matter. The Senator from Tennessee, in my opinion, has been under diverse and conflicting pressures from his colleagues on the subject of abortion, and I commiserate with him. It has been a difficult problem for him, and he has certainly treated everyone, fairly and objectively.

We almost had a unanimous-consent agreement where this could have been debated and voted up or down. I believe the majority leader deserves great credit for having conducted himself honorably in this matter and for having lived up to every assurance he made to all parties in this debate, certainly to me. No one should think for a minute that the majority leader has been unwilling to live up to his word in any particular.

I would like to address several questions to the majority leader, if I might.

First, could the distinguished majority leader give his assurances that this body will be given the opportunity to fully debate the issue of abortion at the earliest reasonable date possible during the 98th Congress?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, I can give that assurance. Indeed, the Senator from Utah has been very fair to me, and I think the very least I can do and the Senate can do is to assure him that sometime early next year, meaning in the spring, shortly after we convene, and as soon as we can arrange it within reason and at a suitable time to him, that we will call up this or a similar amendment and deal with it.

That poses some other complications, as he is aware of, that I am prepared to deal with as well if he wishes to pursue the matter.

Mr. HATCH. All right.

Would it be possible for him to assure that it not be called up prior to February 15?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, I can do that, too. I do not know yet what the schedule next year is going to be. I spoke to the Speaker of the House this afternoon, and we have had some preliminary discussions about whether we would be in session after the election and, if so, when we would return and when we would, in fact, get down to work in January. But I can certainly assure the Senator that I would not propose to schedule that prior to February 1.

Mr. HATCH. But sometime before or in the spring?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

(Mr. GORTON assumed the chair.)

Mr. HATCH. Could we be assured that we will have every reasonable opportunity to debate this matter, every reasonable opportunity for Members of this body to address this issue, and every reasonable opportunity to proceed to a vote on the substance of a proposed constitutional amendment on the subject of abortion? I would like a reasonable time to try to break any filibuster, if that is the case.

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, I agree with the Senator in making the commitment that we should have debate on the issue. I will embrace all the requirements and rules necessary to see that that happens.

I would fully expect that the Senator could pursue his debate freely, as could other Senators, and we would make very effort to bring the matter to a conclusion by a vote on the merits.

Mr. HATCH. Could we be assured that this debate will not take place under circumstances where a pending recess or some other pending legislative commitment plays an effective constraint on the opportunity for such debate? Certainly, I will cooperate with the majority leader in trying to work around any emergencies or any difficulties that could arise.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it would be my intention to consult with the Senator from Utah and with, perhaps, the Senator from Oregon and others who would be on the other side, as we did in this case, to try to arrange a mutually agreeable time and circumstance. In this case, as I indicated earlier, the debt limit seemed to be the favorite vehicle for carrying this debate and it was scheduled on that basis.

But we have been on this bill now August 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20; and September 8, 9, 10, 13, 14, and 15, and this is a long time. So this debate has not been constrained by time. Indeed, we have had problems getting people over here to talk about it.

But I can assure the Senator that, just as we have in this case, I would schedule this matter so that it was at a mutually agreeable time and it would not be up against any artificial deadline or circumstance that would circumvent or circumscribe the fullness of debate.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate that. As the distinguished majority leader knows, a constitutional amendment cannot be added to the debt ceiling. But I agree there has been sufficient time, and the distinguished majority leader has allowed sufficient cloture votes on the Helms amendment. There has been sufficient time to debate the Helms proposal at least.

Mr. President, I assume that there will be a fair amount of notice before the proposed amendment is called to the floor next year. The distinguished majority leader has always given me that courtesy.

There is another matter, Mr. President, that I hope the distinguished majority leader will be willing to discuss with me. This is the only constitutional amendment or piece of legislation on the issue of abortion which has ever gone through the full committee process. We have made a substantial record, which I think even the distinguished Senator from Oregon has admitted is a fair and balanced record on this matter.

So if I am unable to bring the amendment through the committee process next year, because of time constraints early in the session, may I have the assurances of the distinguished Senator that we will be able to use rule XIV to get it on the calendar so that the distinguished majority leader can call it up?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it has always seemed an anomaly to me that the rules provide, on one hand, that all bills go to committee, as rule XXV does, and, on the other hand, that rule XIV provides if objection is made to the proceeding beyond first reading of the bill that after the second legislative day it goes on the calendar. I am not now proposing to argue the merits of that but, as I say, it always seemed like a procedural anomaly of sorts. But it is there and I do not dispute it.

The Senator's question is: Would I assist him in getting a contitutional amendment on abortion on the calendar if he does not get it out of committee in a timely way? The answer to that is, yes. If the Senator wishes to avail himself of his right under rule XIV, which he is perfectly at liberty to do and which no one can stop him from doing, I will be happy to cooperate with him in seeing that he has full opportunity under rule XIV to do so.

There is no hidden meaning in that. It simply means if the Senator wants to put this on the calendar by rule XIV procedures, he can do so and I will make no effort to prevent it, as I have not in the past on other measures.

Mr. HATCH. The reason I raised that at this time is I would not want anybody to think we are trying to take advantage anywhere. We are giving full warning, inasmuch as we have not had, as a result of procedural and other difficulties, the time to bring up Senate Joint Resolution 110 and fully debate it at this time. Members should be put on notice that if I cannot proceed through the committee process within a reasonable period, we are going to invoke rule XIV. I appreciate the distinguished majority leader's willingness to help me on that matter.

Would my friend, the distinguished majority leader, recognize that there might be discretion on the part of the Senator from Utah, working with other Members of this body and interested outside organizations, to introduce a proposed amendment that may vary in substance from the precise amendment proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 110?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, my commitment to the Senator from Utah to attempt to schedule this matter in the spring after the 1st of February is a commitment to do so in respect to a constitutional amendment that he may offer dealing with abortion, and I would not presume to judge the contents. There is no requirement that it be identical in form to this measure. I extend that offer and that assurance on the basis of whatever the Senator may judge is appropriate and whatever may come out of committee or whatever he may try to take to the calendar under rule XIV.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the majority leader. I am concerned because we have been trying to debate the issue of abortion in the context of the Helms amendment to the debt ceiling bill now for a considerable period of time. It appears to me that the proposed constitutional amendment would not, in the present time context, in the remaining few days of the Senate, be given sufficient time. There would not be sufficient time to fully debate these issues.

So, with the assurance of my distinguished friend from Tennessee, the distinguished majority leader, that he has given today—and I am very grateful to him for extending these—I will observe that next spring will see the first full debate in the U.S. Senate since Roe on the issue of abortion as a matter of public policy. We will have a full and complete debate, with or without filibusters, and attempt to resolve this issue at that time.

I believe that we may have enough votes on the floor of the Senate to possibly invoke cloture on this matter. I am uncertain of that. As I have candidly remarked earlier, I do not believe that we have the requisite two-thirds votes on this constitutional amendment at this time.

Therefore, I feel that to continue to force the majority leader to allow a debate at this particular time, under these circumstances, with the pressures that are on this body, would not be in the best interest of this amendment. It would be counterproductive. So, with that, I have chosen to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I am especially grateful to him for this generous act. It would be my intention, then, Mr. President, and I do now withdraw my motion to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. PACKWOOD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, just so the RECORD is clear on this, it has not been the Hatch amendment that has caused our problem. We came very close to a unanimous-consent agreement which would have allowed a vote on the Hatch constitutional amendment and the Helms amendment as written at the time it was then written, and it fell apart through no fault of the Senator from Utah. Indeed, he has followed every proper procedure. He has gone through committee, and he is attempting to amend the Constitution with a constitutional amendment, which is the proper way to go. I do not agree with the substance of his amendment, but I congratulate him again for the meticulous hearings that he has held.

But I do want the RECORD to be clear that, while we do not want the Hatch constitutional amendment coming up today while we are dealing with the Helms amendment—and I think I can speak for those who share my view—we would be prepared to vote on the Hatch amendment as written on Friday or Monday, with 4 hours debate on each side.

I will not go further than that, because I am not going to agree to time agreements on things I do not know. But indeed, if we want to debate and vote on this subject, I want the RECORD to indicate that I have not stood in the way of that on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I have never understood that to be the case. I have never thought that of the distinguished Senator from Oregon. But it was my clear understanding that whenever Senate Joint Resolution 110 was brought up, that there would be a filibuster on the amendment.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Maybe I can clarify that. That would be today, because we are in the midst of the Helms amendment.

Mr. HATCH. I understand that.

Mr. PACKWOOD. When we were within 10 seconds of a unanimous-consent agreement here one night on both the Hatch amendment and the Helms amendment, the amendment of the Senator from Utah being a constitutional amendment, the objection finally came from the Senator from North Carolina because of the wording of his statutory amendment. At that stage there was no objection.

But for that objection, we would have had a vote on the Hatch amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. The Senator from Oregon is correct in saying that he would not object nor would others associated with him object to a time agreement to vote on the Hatch amendment today, tomorrow, Saturday, or Monday. But I must say, standing at this desk, that I know of others who would. Indeed, I believe there are Members on both sides of the aisle, perhaps, who have already indicated they would object to unanimous consent to proceed to this item. It would require a motion and the motion perhaps would be filibustered. I know the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) has indicated to me that he would filibuster. But for the information of the Senator from Oregon, there are other Senators also.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I wanted to be clear that the reason the agreement fell apart was not on that night because of objections to the Hatch amendment.

Mr. BAKER. That is absolutely correct. I commend both the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Oregon for their exchange which reflected what happened, that we did get close to an agreement. Nothing involved in the Hatch amendment stood in the way. By the same token, I want everyone to understand I am not assigning blame. It is just one of those things that happens in the course of almost every day's activities in the Senate when our hopes and aspirations with respect to time agreements are sometimes thwarted. It did not work.

The Senators are correct. Nothing involved in the Hatch amendment caused it to fall apart. Nothing asserted by the Senator from Oregon caused it to fall apart, nor the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. It has been my understanding that the motion to proceed itself would be filibustered. I want to reiterate that I do not think this involved the distinguished Senator from Oregon. It has been my understanding that this amendment would be filibustered with regard both to the motion to proceed and with regard to the amendment itself. If I am incorrect on that, I would like to reconsider and proceed to a vote. If we can agree to a time limit, that will be fine with me. That is all I have ever wanted.

Mr. BAKER. If the Senator will yield, I agree absolutely with that. I will tell the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Utah I will pursue that again to see if it is possible to do so. But the last reading I had, which was today, indicated to me that Members other than the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Connecticut had lodged notice of their intention to object to unanimous consent to proceed to this item and at least one other Senator had indicated his desire to speak at length on the motion.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate what the majority leader has said. I want to make it crystal clear that the only reason I am willing to withdraw this constitutional amendment today is because it is clear that there would be a filibuster on Senate Joint Resolution 110, and that a time agreement could not be reached. Otherwise, I would just as soon debate this, vote it up or down, and let the chips fall where they may. I know, having filibustered myself on occasion, that if I wanted to prevent this amendment from coming up, I could prevent it for the rest of this session of Congress. I have no doubt about it. I have no doubt others could do the same at this stage in the session.

I am unwilling to demean this amendment. I am unwilling to go through a charade, if all we are doing is wasting the time of the Senate and not ever going to have a substantive vote on the amendment. That is why I consider it so vital to get this agreement for early next year. If there is a filibuster, I want time to break it, and if I break it, I want time to have an up or down vote on the substantive amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, for whatever it is worth—and I do not know what it is worth, maybe nothing—I think the Senator from Utah is not only correct in his decision but I think it is a wise decision to make from the standpoint of ultimate success for his amendment. I think his chances are far better under the circumstances described—and which I have acknowledged in this colloquy—after February 1 than now. But just as he was told that there would be an objection, I have been told that there would be an objection; just as he was told there would be extensive debate on the motion to proceed, I have been told that. I do not know that it ever does any good to identify Senators except to say that it is not confined just to the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Connecticut.

I think the Senator from Utah exercised good judgment from the standpoint of getting the best shot he can have to pass this amendment. That is what he is trying to do, and he is doing it with skill and dedication. I am going to do everything I can to see that he gets an absolutely fair shuffle. I think his judgment not to pursue the matter at this time but instead under the circumstances outlined for February of next year is correct. I think it is a wise judgment to make. I think this would be proper.

Mr. HATCH. It has never been my understanding that the Senator from Oregon was going to filibuster this amendment. He has been willing to go forward with it. He and I have chatted a number of times about this. He has always been willing to go forward with it. I think he would be in favor of an up or down vote. I do not know just how many votes we would have gotten. I believe that we may have done quite well, although not the requisite two-thirds. I appreciate that.

We had an agreement, a unanimous-consent agreement, to vote this up or down after an 8-hour time limit but it failed because of the objection of another Member.

The debate early next year will be the first unencumbered, full substantive debate on the public policy of abortion in this body. I look forward to it.

Mr. BAKER. I will say, Mr. President, in conclusion, that I will make an effort once more to schedule this for Friday, Saturday, or Monday. But based on the information I have previously been given from other Senators and their staffs, I think the chances of doing that are remote.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished Senator. I would like to talk about the amendment and what we will be trying to do early next year when this is considered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not know who has the floor, but may I say that there will be a vote at 5 o'clock under rule XXII against further debate on the Helms amendment. I would remind Senators it will occur promptly at 5 o'clock today.

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am as sorry as Senator HATCH is that the Hatch human life amendment was not debated and voted on today, nor will it be addressed before the end of the year. This is a disappointment to all those who worked hard to have a meaningful abortion debate in the 97th Congress.

Mr. President, one of my first actions as a U.S. Senator was to cosponsor a constitutional amendment to protect unborn children. I commend Senator HATCH, chairman of the Subcommittee on the Constitution for holding extensive and productive hearings on the Hatch human life amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 110. After holding 9 days of hearings and taking testimony from over 70 witnesses the Subcommittee on the Constitution voted favorably to report out the resolution. Later on March 10, 1982, the full Senate Judiciary Committee favorably reported out Senate Joint Resolution 110. This is the first proposed pro-life amendment to receive subcommittee and full committee support.

Mr. President, the constitutional issues and legal effects of this constitutional amendment have been discussed previously both in the subcommittee hearings and here on the Senate floor. I would like to briefly review them now. First, there is no disagreement that a legitimate congressional response to a Supreme Court decision with which the Congress disapproves is passage of a constitutional amendment. There are several precedents for overturning decisions of the Supreme Court by constitutional amendment. For example, the 11th amendment to the Constitution was ratified in order to prevent any person from suing a State in Federal court. It was adopted after the Supreme Court took jurisdiction of just such a case, Chisholm against Georgia (1793). Further the 14th amendment passed in response to the infamous Supreme Court decision, Dred Scott against Sanford (1857) in which the court found that black individuals were noncitizens under the Constitution and, as such, were not fully entitled to the protection of the Constitution. Later, the 16th amendment establishing a Federal income tax overrode Pollock against Farmer's Loan & Trust Company (1895) which held that a Federal tax on income derived from properties was unconstitutional. And more recently the 26th amendment, giving 18 year olds the right to vote in Federal and State elections overruled the Court's decision under Oregon against Mitchell (1970) which declared the provisions of the Voting Rights Act unconstitutional.

Second, two provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 110 generate the legal effects of this legislation. The first section of Senate Joint Resolution 110 states "A right to an abortion is not secured by the Constitution." This provision overrules Roe against Wade, its companion case, Doe against Bolton, and its progeny to the extent that they held that the constitutional right to privacy creates the right to an abortion. Any Federal or State court decisions relying on Roe or Doe or upon a constitutionally founded "right to an abortion" would be reversed to the extent that the existence of such a right was a necessary predicate to the holding. However this amendment is not self-executing—it must be implemented through legislation passed by Congress or the States. Decisionmaking authority currently with the Judiciary would be restored to legislative branch—Federal and State legislatures to the extent they choose to use it.

The second provision of the amendment states:

> The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to restrict and prohibit abortion provided that a provision of a law of a State which is more restrictive than a conflicting provision of a law of Congress shall govern.

The plenary power granted to the Congress and the States is more than an enforcement provision. Both are given power and authority to pass whatever legislation they deem appropriate to restrict and prohibit abortions. Since this power is discretionary, neither the Congress nor the States are required to legislate. Therefore, implementation of the amendment is not guaranteed. The proviso clause is intended to resolve any unforeseen conflicts between State and Federal laws following the adoption of this amendment. When a State and Federal law conflict, the supremacy clause will be operative except when one of the two laws is more restrictive. In this case, the more restrictive law will prevail.

Adoption of the proposed human life federalism amendment, by allowing States and the Congress to legislate restrictions on abortion, more closely reflects national sentiment on the issue. Presently, due to the Supreme Court decision of Roe against Wade, a woman by invoking the right to privacy has a virtually unlimited right to have a legal abortion. As the Subcommittee on the Constitution has observed, no significant legal barriers of any kind whatsoever exist today for a woman to obtain an abortion for any reason during any stage of her pregnancy. While a minority of Americans do support abortion on demand, most people do not.

In his testimony before the subcommittee, Professor Adamek presented results of recent public opinion polls on the issue of abortion. He found that neither the opponents of all abortion nor the advocates of unrestricted abortion can claim agreement with the majority of the American people. The population can be divided into three groups: 22 percent oppose legalized abortion in virtually all circumstances, 55 percent oppose legalized abortion except for certain hardship cases such as rape, incest, the likelihood of a defective baby, or to save the life of the mother; and 23 percent want abortion to remain legal in all circumstances.

It is not surprising that the heated debate on the abortion issue has not subsided in 10 years since the current law on abortion does not reflect the opinion of 75 percent of Americans on the issue. In fact, since Roe against Wade legislatures in 19 States have petitioned Congress to call a constitutional convention to propose an antiabortion amendment and 23 State legislatures have passed memorials or requests for Congress to propose an antiabortion-related amendment to the Constitution.

Since our present abortion law is unacceptable to a large majority of Americans, the question is how the current law should be changed. The proposed human life amendment provides a valid answer. This amendment restores decisionmaking authority to the legislative branch, thereby reenfrancising all Americans interested in finding a solution to the abortion controversy. This amendment does not take an all-or-nothing approach. Rather, each of the State legislatures could enact abortion laws according to the directives of its citizenry.

I therefore encourage my colleagues to approve this amendment so that we can reestablish abortion laws that will once again enjoy the support of a majority in our country.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is recognized.

Mr. HATCH. I ask permission that I may proceed with remarks with regard to Senate Joint Resolution 110.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on January 22, 1973, the U.S. Supreme Court handed down a decision that has since generated social division in this Nation virtually without precedent. In the case of Roe against Wade, a majority of seven on the court identified for the first time a right to abortion within the terms of the 14th amendment to the Constitution. The nature of this right, outlined in great detail in Justice Blackmun's opinion, resulted in the overturning of laws on abortion in each of the 50 States of the Union.

Prior to the Roe decision, 31 States of the Union had enacted statutes that totally protected unborn human life from the time of conception. Of the remaining 19 States that permitted aborton under limited circumstances, abortion was legal only, as a general rule, where necessary to protect the life of the mother, in cases of rape, or incest, or in cases where there was a likelihood that a child would be born with a substantial mental or physical deformity.

In only four States did anything approximating abortion on demand exist and in each of these States there were temporal limits to such a right. The most permissive of these provisions was probably that existing in the State of New York in which abortions without restrictions were permitted until only the sixth month of pregnancy.

As a result of Roe, however, a new regime was created in this country on the abortion issue—a regime more permissive with respect to abortion than had existed in any 1 of the 50 States prior to January 22, 1973. As a result of the Roe decision, a right to abortion was effectively established for the entire term of a pregnancy for virtually any reason—whether for sake of personal finances, whether for sake of social convenience, or whether for sake of individual lifestyle.

Despite misconceptions on this issue, there is relatively little informed disagreement that Roe has established a national policy on abortion without constitutional or legal restrictions of any significant kind. Let me briefly review the substance of this decision. During the first trimester of pregnancy, the plenary right to abortion is made express by the terms of Roe. As the Court stated:

For the stage prior to approximately the end of the first trimester of pregnancy, the abortion decision and its effectuation must be left to the medical judgement of the pregnant woman's physician.

Thus, absolutely no limitation can be placed upon the abortion decision during this period. During the second trimester, however, the court recognized a public interest in abortion, an interest in protecting and preserving the health and safety of the mother. This public interest may be expressed through governmental requirements that abortions be performed within hospitals, clinics, or other licensed facilities. As the Supreme Court again stated in Roe:

For the stage subsequent to approximately the end of the first trimester, the state in promoting its interest in the health of the mother, may, if it chooses, regulate the abortion procedure in ways that are reasonably related to maternal health.

During the second trimester, however, there remains an absence of any legislative authority to protect the unborn child. The sole authority is to insure the medical safety of the procedures of abortion.

During the final trimester of pregnancy—or approximately at the point at which the fetus reaches "viability"—a public interest finally arises in protecting the unborn life. As the Court stated in Roe,

For the stage subsequent to viability, the state, in promoting its interest in the potentiality of human life may, if it chooses, regulate and even proscribe, abortion except where it is necessary, in appropriate medical judgment, for the preservation of the life or health of the mother.

While the general rule established by the Court in Roe might seem at last to permit some measure of protection for the unborn during the final trimester, this rule was effectively consumed by the exception—the exception in cases where the mother's "life or health" were involved. The critical element was the term "health of the mother."

In the companion case of Doe against Bolton, a case handed down the same day as Roe, the Court defined the concept of "health of the mother" as a medical judgment to be made,

In the light of all the factors—physical, psychological, and the woman's age—relevant to the well-being of the patient.

In other words, to quote Prof. John Noonan of the University of California Law School, the absolute and plenary right to abortion was curbed during the final trimester only by the "necessity of a physician's finding that she needed an abortion." It would be a rare physician who would be incapable of defending an abortion decision on the grounds that in his best medical judgment the well-being of the mother demanded it.

As Professor Noonan has summarized the nature of the restrictions placed upon the abortion right in Roe and Doe.

For the nine months of life within the womb, the child was at the pregnant woman's disposal—with two restrictions. She must find a licensed clinic after month three; and after her child was viable, she must find an abortionist who believed she needed an abortion.

Thus, I believe that it is clear that there are no significant legal barriers of any kind that exist within the United States today to a woman obtaining an abortion for any reason during any stage of her pregnancy. We can disagree, of course, upon whether or not this is good public policy but I do not believe that we can disagree that this is an accurate description of the present state of affairs in this country.

It is this rule of abortion on demand imposed upon a citizenry whose values were sharply at variance that has created nearly a decade of intense divisions and passions on the issue of abortion. During this decade, the social views of a relatively small number of individuals have reigned as the law of the land immune from even the most modest efforts at reform. In judicial decisions since Roe and Doe. The Supreme Court has amplified upon these decisions by striking down State statutes to require the consent to an abortion by the father of the unborn, statutes to require parental consent to abortions performed upon minors, statutes to insure that pregnant woman are fully apprised of alternatives to abortion, and statutes to protect live-born fetuses. The right to abortion, articulated for the first time by the Court in 1973, has proven since then to be one of the most absolute and, dare I say, impregnable rights within the Constitution. Apparently, there is virtually nothing that can effectively counterbalance this new right.

It is in response to Roe and Doe, and in response to the debate that has occurred in this country since these decisions, that I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 110, the proposed human life federalism amendment, last fall. Following introduction, 9 days of hearings were held on this measure by the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on the Constitution. These hearings, in my view, were thorough and balanced hearings developed by the distinguished Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), and myself. On December 16 of last year, the subcommittee voted favorably to report this measure to the full Judiciary Committee, with several amendments. On March 10, the human life federalism amendment was favorably reported by the full Senate Judiciary Committee. Senate Joint Resolution 110 is the only pending measure on the subject of abortion to have gone through the regular committee process. It is the first legislation ever on the subject of abortion to be reported out of a committee of either House of Congress.

The objective of the proposed amendment is relatively simple—it would largely restore the status quo that existed in this country prior to Roe against Wade. It would overturn Roe against Wade by declaring simply that no "right of abortion" was secured by the Constitution, and clarify that the States were fully restored in their legislative authority with respect to this issue. While the authority of the Federal Government to legislate on the subject of abortion prior to the abortion decisions is a bit more difficult, I note that there are many in this body, including the distinguished Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) who believed that such authority existed. Clearly, there was some measure of authority in this regard derived from the commerce clause and elsewhere in the Constitution. Senate Joint Resolution 110 would establish concurrent authority to legislate in the State and Federal Governments on the subject of abortion.

Unlike most other proposed amendments on the subject of abortion—amendments which I would personally support—the human life federalism amendment would not obligate the States or Congress to legislate; it would simply restore to them the authority to do so. By deconstitutionalizing the issue of abortion, the proposed amendment would allow the legislative branches of Government a wide range of options in this area. While by the terms of the proposed amendment, the States or Congress, if they chose, could totally prohibit abortion or could totally maintain the status quo of abortion on demand, they would also be in the position to undertake legislative action that fell somewhere between these all-or-nothing propositions. For example, they could take the following actions,

First, they could place restrictions of some form upon late-term abortions;

Second, they could impose obligations upon physicians to attempt to save the lives of fetuses capable of surviving an abortion;

Third, they could place limitations upon genetic engineering and other experimental and medical research involving the use of human embryos and fetuses;

Fourth, they could require that women contemplating abortions be fully apprised of the risks of abortion and the alternatives to abortion;

Fifth, they could require some form of parental consent to abortions performed upon minors;

Sixth, they could require some form of spousal consent to abortions;

Seventh, they could establish some minimum waiting period before nonemergency abortions or require some form of professional consultation prior to an abortion;

Eighth, they could establish rights of refusal to perform abortions by physicians or nurses, or in entire hospitals;

Ninth, they could limit the trafficking or commerce in abortifacient devices;

Tenth, they could prohibit abortion generally subject to certain well-defined exceptions and safeguards; or Eleventh, they could undertake any other form of restriction or regulation upon the abortion procedure.

In other words, the human life federalism amendment would remove the abortion debate from the extremes. No longer would this debate occur in the present context of either preserving abortion on demand, or outlawing abortion. No longer would this debate take place in the context of only two alternatives—total legalization or total prohibition.

Let me not fail to clarify my own views on the abortion issue. I am one of those who believes that abortion involves the taking of an innocent life. I am one of those who believes that abortion is a heinous procedure in which a mother allows her child's life to be terminated. I am one of those who believes that abortion is immoral—for philosophical reasons, for medical reasons, for humanitarian reasons, and—dare I say—even for religious reasons. I believe that the fetus feels pain, that it feels agony, that it feels the violence done to its body by abortion. I have supported in the past and continue to support constitutional amendments that would largely outlaw abortion.

At the same time, I believe strongly that this Nation must overcome the divisions that have wracked it since the abortion decisions. We cannot achieve this if the abortion debate continues only in the context of black and white alternatives. As deeply as I regret the fact, it is clear to me that there is no consensus in this country that views abortion in the same way that I personally view abortion. There is no consensus in this country that abortion under virtually all circumstances is wrong. I intend to continue whatever efforts I can to inform people about the immorality of abortion, and I hope that someday a consensus may emerge that is closer to my own point of view. It does not, however, exist today.

At the same time, I believe just as strongly that there is no consensus in behalf of the policy of abortion on demand that has been imposed by the Supreme Court. While the people of this Nation do not see abortion as a black, neither do they see it as a white. Public opinion poll after public opinion poll has demonstrated that the great mainstream in this country opposes abortion on demand, just as they oppose efforts to outlaw all abortion. They do not favor what the Supreme Court has given this country—limitless abortion for limitless reasons.

Perhaps the foremost objective of the proposed human life federalism amendment is to facilitate the development of a social consensus on the so-far intractable issue of abortion. The abortion issue, if it is to be elevated into one of constitutional proportions, should be elevated only through the normal consensus-building process of article V's amending provisions rather than through the process of judicial reinterpretation.

By removing the abortion controversy from the Federal Judicial Department, the human life federalism amendment would place the abortion debate within those institutions of government far better equipped to deal with this issue—the elected, representative branches of government. Because they cannot control the specific types of cases that come before them and because they are limited in their ability to fashion compromise solutions to difficult issues, the courts are an inappropriate place within which to debate abortion.

The all-or-nothing legalization of abortion on demand by Roe has done nothing but exacerbate the tensions already created by the abortion controversy. Unlike most legislative solutions in which some element of deference is paid to all major political or social or occupational groupings, the abortion issue was resolved by a small group of seven men who were totally able to disregard the passionately held views of a large segment of the American people. They did this not in response to the unequivocal demands of the U.S. Constitution, but through a decision whose jurisprudence and whose textual and historical foundations are at least as suspect as the policies that it fostered.

Senate Joint Resolution 110 would reenfranchise all the American people in fashioning a solution to the abortion controversy or, if not a solution, at least an equilibrium. This can only be done by placing this issue back within the representative branches of government where it should have remained all along, the representative branches of government where this decisionmaking responsibility was contained for the first two centuries of our Nation's existence.

If the result of doing this is that difficult legislative compromises are reached through bitter sessions of negotiation and give-and-take—compromises that are not entirely satisfactory to those on either end of the spectrum—then the issue of abortion will have been dealt with in the same manner that most other difficult matters are dealt with in a democratic system of government.

If the social divisions that have beset this country since the Roe and Doe decisions are to eventually be overcome. They will have to be overcome through a process in which all shades of opinion are considered and weighed, not simply those of a small minority of the citizenry. There is no more appropriate forum in a free society for this to be done than within the representative, legislative branches of government.

I respectfully ask those of my colleagues who disagree with me, what are the alternatives? What are the long term alternatives to something along the lines of Senate Joint Resolution 110? Can we accept a status quo imposed by a court that is so totally at odds with the deeply held views of so many citizens in this country? Can we accept a status quo in which the laws adopted by the legislatures of every State in the Union are casually overturned? Can we accept a status quo on as divisive an issue as abortion in which one point of view, one responsible point of view, is so totally ignored?

Mr. President, I respectfully suggest that we cannot accept this status quo. For the sake of the country, we must work out some other solution. It may not be a solution that I would prefer, or one that all of my friends in the right-to-live community would prefer, but we must work toward some consensus on this issue. The human life federalism amendment will permit that consensus to be pursued. Alone among the major proposals on this subjects, it will allow the development of a solution that reflects mainstream opinion in this country.

The human life federalism amendment is not a complicated proposal. It is straightforward in its approach. There are a number of questions, however, that have frequently been raised about it that I would like to address briefly. I also refer my colleagues to the committee report on the amendment, S. Rept. 97-465, which I believe offers a thorough and comprehensive overview of this measure.

IS IT APPROPRIATE TO OVERTURN CONSTITUTIONAL DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT?

While there are differences among Members of this body about legitimate congressional responses to High Court decisions of which Congress disapproves, there is no disagreement that Congress is fully empowered to propose amendments to the Constitution in response to such decisions. With respect to constitutionally based decisions of the Supreme Court, I personally believe that this is the only legitimate response. There is certainly ample precedent for such a response.

On four prior occasions, the Constitution was amended in response to particular Court decisions. The 11th amendment, prohibiting the Federal judicial power from being exercised in suits by citizens of a State against another State, was ratified in response to an action by the Supreme Court in accepting jurisdiction over such a case. Chisholm v. Georgia 2 U.S. 419 (1793). The 14th amendment, in circumstances similar to the present case, was ratified in response to the infamous Dred Scott case finding that black individuals were noncitizens under the Constitution and, as such, not fully entitled to its protections. Scott v. Sandford 60 U.S. 393 (1857). The 16th amendment, permitting the imposition of a Federal income tax, was ratified in response to a Court decision finding that an unapportioned—by State—tax violated the Constitution, Pollock v. Farmer's Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429; 158 U.S. 601 (1895). Finally, the 26th amendment, according 18-year-olds the right to vote in Federal and State elections, was ratified following the Court's decision that Congress lacked the authority to impose such an obligation upon the States through a statute, Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112 (1970). In addition, serious efforts at constitutional amendment have been made in response to court decisions on the subject of child labor laws and State legislative apportionment requirements, Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251 (1918); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

SHOULD ISSUES OF INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS BE SUBJECT TO THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESSES?

A frequent subject of criticism of the proposed amendment has been the notion that basic questions of individual rights should not be decided by a majority vote. The distinguished Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) was especially articulate in offering this point of view.

As an abstract proposition, I indeed agree with this. I imagine that few of our colleagues would disagree with this, whatever their perspective on the abortion matter. The fundamental rights of individuals should not be determined by referendum.

The problem, of course, is that few can agree on what precisely these "fundamental rights" are with respect to the abortion issue. Critics of the proposed amendment in the so-called "pro-choice" movement see these as the rights of the pregnant woman to determine whether or not to carry a pregnancy to term, while critics in the so-called "pro-life" movement see this as the even more fundamental right of the unborn to life itself.

In other words, there is just as much disagreement on the issue of what fundamental "rights" are involved here as there is on the issue of the morality of abortion itself. It thus begs the question to criticize the immediate amendment as one restricting individual rights. It all depends on one's perspective. While I personally believe that the paramount right involved in the abortion dilemma is the right of the unborn to live, I can only conclude that there is an absolute disagreement on this threshold question.

The purpose of Senate Joint Resolution 110 then is not to resolve the persistent question of which of these competing rights ought to be given precedence but rather to establish a balancing process for determining how this conflict will be resolved in the context of individual circumstances. In short, this balancing process is going to be one that occurs within the normal balancing process of legislative bodies.

IS NOT ABORTION A PRIVATE MATTER THAT OUGHT TO BE RESOLVED BY THE WOMAN HERSELF?

As with the question of abortion as a fundamental, individual right, the question of abortion as a purely private affair begs the basic question involved in the abortion debate. It is precisely because opponents of abortion perceive another human being to be involved in the abortion decision, that is, the unborn child, that they reject the characterization of abortion as a purely "private" matter. To allow abortion-related issues to be resolved according solely to one's own conscience is no more acceptable to those who hold this view than to allow any other physically abusive action to be judged by individual standards. As one witness testified during last year's hearings:

The death of any of our fellow humans cannot be a "private" matter subject only to the values, or lack of them, of the one who seeks or causes his or her death.

No simplistic formulation about the proposed amendment interfering with individual rights, or with decisions appropriately left to the individual, can obscure the basic truth that these propositions themselves implicitly accept the premises of a single side of the abortion debate. Only the proposed constitutional amendment can serve to facilitate a genuine resolution of the indisputably difficult issues involved in this controversy.

Mr. President, the Supreme Court's decision in Roe against Wade has been one of the most strongly criticized court decisions in the history of the country. It has been criticized not only by those who disagree with its substantive policy results, but by a host of responsible constitutional scholars who reject its jurisprudence. While the committee report discusses this in far more detail, let me simply offer some brief observations from some of these constitutional scholars. None of them, so far as I know, is or has been opposed to the policies fostered by Roe, but simply to the process by which it reached its decision.

John Hart Ely, dean of the Stanford Law School and formerly Harvard law professor, has stated that Roe is:

A very bad decision . . . it is bad because it is bad constitutional law, or rather because it is not constitutional law and gives almost no sense of an obligation to try to be . . . what is frightening about Roe is that this superprotected right to abortion is not inferable from the language of the constitution, the framers' thinking respecting the specific problem in issue, any general value derivable from the provisions they included, or the nation's governmental structure . . . at times the inferences the court has drawn from the values the constitution marks for special protection have been controversial, even shaky, but never before has its sense of an obligation to draw one been so obviously lacking.

Prof. Archibald Cox, former Solicitor General of the United States, has similarly remarked:

Neither historian, layman, nor lawyer will be persuaded that all the details prescribed in Roe v. Wade are part of either natural law or the constitution.

Prof. Richard Epstein of the University of Chicago Law School has observed that:

Neither the mass nor the antiquity of the sources cited by the court in Roe can conceal their essential irrelevance to the constitutional inquiry on abortion.

The late Alexander Bickel of the Yale Law School commented after the Court's decision:

One is left to ask why. The Court never said. It refused the discipline to which its function is proper subject.

He proceeded to describe Justice Blackmun's opinion as more akin to a "model statute" than to a constitutional judicial decision.

Prof. Harry Wellington, former dean of the Yale Law School described the decision as "pickwickian" and concluded that:

The Court had no mandate to create new morality when elaborating the concept of liberty in the fourteenth amendment.

Prof. Arthur Miller of the Harvard Law School said of Roe against Wade:

The Supreme Court found a right to abortion without pointing to any specific words in the text of the constitution.

Perhaps the most telling criticism to the decision came in several unusually harsh dissents. Justice Byron White stated:

I find nothing in the language or history of the Constitution to support the court's judgement. The Court, simply, fashions a new constitutional right for pregnant mothers and with scarcely any reason or authority for its action invests that right with sufficient substance to override most state abortion statutes. The upshot is that the people and the legislatures of the 50 states are constitutionally disentitled to weigh the relative importance of the fetus on the one hand against a spectrum of possible impacts on the mother on the other hand. As an exercise of raw judicial power, the court perhaps has authority to do what it does today; but in my view its judgement is an improvident and extravagant exercise of the power of judicial review which the constitution extends to the court.

Also in dissent, Justice Rehnquist observed:

The decision here to break the term of pregnancy into three distinct terms and to outline the permissible restrictions the state may impose in each one, for example, partakes more of judicial legislation than it does of a determination of the intent of the drafters of the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. President, clearly there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction with the Roe against Wade decision that has little to do with the policy substance of that decision. If Congress is ever going to exercise its article V authority to overcome a bad Supreme Court decision, it is difficult to think of a more appropriate decision with which to begin.

Once more, I ask my colleagues to ask themselves how we are going to resolve the abortion dilemma. I see no evidence, whatsoever, that the passions on this issue have subsided with the passing of years. Indeed, if anything, concern about the fruits of Roe has grown in the time since the court handed down its decision. Until everyone in this country is allowed input into public policy on this issue, I am convinced that we are going to see continuing divisions in this country on the abortion issue—ugly divisions that raise ugly issues about social class and religion. I hope that my colleagues will appreciate the virtues of the proposed amendment, an amendment that does not direct any substantive policy result but which simply alters the focus of decisionmaking responsibility.

Mr. President, whatever happens to the immediate amendment, the debate in this country on abortion is going to continue. I see no evidence whatsoever that it is going to continue at anything less than the level which has characterized past debate. It is long overdue that we recognize that this debate ought to take place among the democratically elected representatives of the people, not solely in the context of periodic Federal court decisions. Whatever the view of my colleagues on abortion, I hope that they will recognize that this amendment is important for reasons that have nothing to do with abortion and a great deal to do with the exercise of authority in a free society.

Mr. President, again I am disappointed that we could not have had a thorough debate and a vote up and down on this issue. While I acknowledge that we did not have 67 votes, I do think that we did have a significant number of votes. I do believe we could have invoked cloture, but it would have been difficult in the present timeframe. There is virtually no way that we would have come to a final substantive vote on this issue. As a matter of fact, we probably would have spent most of the time arguing about the motion to proceed. I do not consider that a substantive debate.

Next year, in approximately 5 or 6 months, we will be able to have a full and fair substantive debate on the first constitutional proposal on abortion ever to be approved by a committee of Congress. It will be the first such debate since the Roe against Wade decision nearly 10 years ago on the issue of abortion as public policy that is, of course, the substance of the present understanding between myself and the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain material related to this matter.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROE V. WADE

The U.S. Supreme Court's most consequential decision concerning the matter of abortion came in 1973 in Roe v. Wade.[1] That case involved the challenge by a pregnant single woman (under the pseudonym of Jane Roe) to the State of Texas' criminal abortion statute. That statute made it a crime to procure, or attempt to procure, an abortion, except on medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother. It was typical of the kind of statute which had been in effect in many States for over a century. Alleging that she was unmarried and wished to have an abortion performed by a competent, licensed physician, but that she was unable to get a legal abortion because her life did not appear to be threatened by continuation of the pregnancy, the plaintiff challenged the statute as unconstitutional on a number of theories, including abridgement of her right of personal privacy under various constitutional provisions.

Before addressing itself to the constitutional questions, the Court embarked upon a review of the history of abortion from ancient to modern times. After considering abortion practices among the ancient Persians, Greeks, and Romans, it concluded that ancient religion did not bar abortion.[2] With respect to the Hippocratic Oath's famous promise, "I will not give to a woman an abortive remedy," the Court, after examining the views on abortion of various Greek thinkers, concluded that the abortion clause of the Oath represented not the prevailing view of all ancient physicians but only of a small segment of Greek opinion. Its popularity in later times was attributable, the Court found, to its being in agreement with the emerging teachings of Christianity.[3]

With respect to the common law of England, the Court found, based upon recent reexamination of the precedents that, despite the influential statement of Coke that abortion of a woman quick with child was "a great misprision, and no murder," abortion was never a common-law crime even with respect to a quick fetus.[4] After tracing the development of the statutory law of England and the United States respecting abortion from the early 19th century to recent times—a development of gradually increasing criminal liability until the late sixties and early seventies—the Court concluded that, "at least with respect to the early stage of pregnancy, and very possibly without such a limitation, the opportunity to make this choice (to have an abortion) was present in this country well into the 19th century."[5]

Footnotes at end of article.

The Court also reviewed the positions of various national professional groups (the American Medical Association, the American Public Health Association, and the American Bar Association) regarding abortion. The views of the AMA during the 19th century, the Court found, tended to coincide closely with the increasingly restrictive legislation against abortion. The views of all three organizations, it was shown, had become more permissive toward abortion by the early 1970s.[6]

The Court gave special consideration to the historical bases for enactment of the 19th century criminal abortion laws. It found no basis for concluding that such laws were the product of a Victorian social concern to discourage illicit sexual conduct. But it did find an important basis for enactment of these laws to have been concerned with abortion as a medical procedure and its potentially hazardous effects on women. It found these effects to have been lessened in modern times. Accordingly, it recognized a somewhat diminished interest of the state in restricting the availability of abortion on that ground, one which, in effect, corresponded to the degree of risk involved.

"Any interest of the State in protecting the woman from an inherently hazardous procedure, except when it would be equally dangerous for her to forego it, has largely disappeared."[7]

With respect to the State's interest in the protection of prenatal life, the Court indicated that, "recognition may be given to the less rigid claim that as long as at least potential life is involved, the State may assert interests beyond the protection of the pregnant woman alone."[8]

After this preliminary groundwork, the Court addressed itself to the principal aspect of the case. Invoking the right of privacy, to which it has given recognition in earlier cases as a right implicit in various other constitutional provisions, the Court pointed out that the right extended to activities relating to such areas as marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships and child rearing. Leaving open the precise constitutional basis of this right, the Court held that it "is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy."[9] As justification for this expansion of the right of privacy, the Court set forth factors relating to the "detriment" that the State would impose on the woman by entirely denying this choice to the woman, including "the distress, for all concerned, associated with the unwanted child . . ."[10] The Court nevertheless indicated that this right was not absolute, and that at some point interests of the State could become sufficiently compelling to permit it to regulate some of the factors governing the abortion decision.[11]

The Court considered two arguments offered to establish a compelling State interest justifying incursion upon the abortional freedom which the Court had just recognized as a facet of the right of privacy. The first of these was the contention that the fetus is a "person" within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. The Court indicated that, "if this suggestion of personhood is established, the plaintiff's case, of course, collapses, for the fetus' right to life would then be guaranteed specifically by the Amendment."[12]

The Court, however, found the argument to be without merit. Based upon the use of the term "person" throughout the Constitution, as well as its observation that throughout the major portion of the 19th century prevailing abortion practices were "far freer than they are today," the Court concluded that the unborn were not "persons" within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment.[13]

The second argument which the Court considered was the contention that, apart from the Fourteenth Amendment, life begins at conception and the State has a compelling interest in protecting life from and after conception. Focusing primarily on the failure of the various disciplines of medicine, theololgy, and philosophy to agree on when life begins, the Court declined to resolve the question, thus leaving the argument to fail by virtue of the Court's own declination to address the threshold issue.[14]

The Court finally estabilised the parameters of the abortion liberty. The Court recognized the State as having an "important and legitimate interest in preserving and protecting the health of the pregnant woman," an interest which becomes "compelling" enough to permit some State regulation of abortion only at approximately the end of the first trimester.[15] After that point the State may enact regulations to preserve the health of the woman (by, for example, licensing abortion facilities).

The Court also found that the State has an "important and legitimate interest in protecting the potentiality of human life," and that this interest becomes "compelling" only at the point of "viability," because "the fetus then presumably has the capability of meaningful life outside the mother's womb."[16] After this point the State may restrict abortion or even prohibit it, "except where it is necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother."[17]

This recognition of a "compelling" State interest after "viability" has been viewed by some as a significant limitation upon the abortion liberty described in Roe. But in the accompanying case of Doe v. Bolton,[18] the Court defined "health" in such an expansive manner as to swallow up the State interest seemingly recognized in Roe. In Doe the Court stated: ". . . the medical judgement may be exercised in the light of all factors—physical, emotional, psychological, familial, and the woman's age—relevant to the well-being of the patient. All these factors may relate to health. This allows the attending physician the room he needs to make his best medical judgement."[19]

In Professor Noonan's words, the Court ruled that "after her child was viable, she must find an abortionist who believed she needed an abortion."[20]

JURISPRUDENCE OF ROE

The protection of human life is the foremost duty of government. The Declaration of Independence asserts that all men are endowed with an inalienable right to life, and that it is in order to secure this right that governments are instituted among men. Honoring this commitment, the Constitution provides in both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments that no person may be deprived of life without due process of law.

As a result of new scientific evidence offered to them during the 19th century relating to the nature of human reproduction, legislatures of the several States recognized the biologically human nature of the human fetus throughout pregnancy,[1] and eradicated the common law distinction between the "quickened" and "unquickened" fetus. These legislatures thus adopted criminal laws prohibiting the performance of abortion throughout the term of pregnancy.[2] These abortion laws, enacted in the same era as the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, acted, as with that Amendment, to affirm Thomas Jefferson's exhortation that "(t)he care of human life and happiness, and not their destruction, is the first and only legitimate object of good government."[3]

Since the decision of the Supreme Court in Roe v. Wade, however, the Congress and the States have been stripped of power to protect prenatal human life. Careful scrutiny of this decision by leading constitutional scholars such as Archibald Cox, John Hart Ely and Richard A. Epstein makes it quite clear that the fault of Roe v. Wade lies not in the Constitution but in the Supreme Court's interpretation of it. Three principal themes emerge from the criticisms leveled against Roe: that the right to abortion proclaimed by Roe has little or no basis in the Constitution; that the Court provides little or no reasoned basis for its conclusion that prenatal life is beyond the power of the State to protect; and that Roe represents an extreme example of constitutional jurisprudence by which the judiciary assumed the role of a "super-legislature," imposing its view of wise public policy under the guise of constitutional interpretation.

BASIS IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

The first charge levied by scholars against Roe v. Wade is that, in the words of Professor John Hart Ely, Roe is: "a very bad decision . . . It is bad because it is bad constitutional law, or rather because it is not constitutional law and gives almost no sense of obligation to try to be."[4]

Professor Archibald Cox echoes this opinion when he asserts that: "neither historian, layman, nor lawyer will be persuaded that all the details prescribed in Roe v. Wade are part of either natural law or the Constitution."[5]

It is important to note as well what these scholars are not saying. They are not criticizing the Court for taking a controversial position on a sensitive issue nor are they disputing the morality of legalized abortion. As a necessary consequence of its position in the legal system, the Supreme Court is often confronted with difficult questions in the context of legal dispute. In the words of Professor Ely, these "difficult questions yield controversial answers."[6] In most cases, however, the Constitution provides some guidance for the proper resolution of even the most controversial of these decisions. For example, the Fourth Amendment guarantees to all citizens, the innocent and guilty alike, freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures. This overriding value leads to controversial decisions involving restraints on police officers in the apprehension of criminals. While all may not agree with the Court's particular application of the Fourth Amendment, Professor Ely points out, one cannot easily make the claim that the Court's decision lacks any foundation in the Constitution.[7]

In the case of Roe v. Wade, however, the claim is entirely justified, for the Constitution "simply says nothing, clear or fuzzy, about abortion."[8] Nor is there any support whatever in the legislative history of the Constitution to warrant the conclusion that it was intended to secure a "right to an abortion."[9]

The Court's purported "history of abortion regulation"[10] likewise offers no support for the finding within the Fourteenth Amendment of a right to abortion. As Professor Richard A. Epstein has explained, "neither the mass nor the antiquity of the sources cited by the Court can conceal their essential irrelevance to the constitutional inquiry" on abortion.[11] The only aspect of history that would have been relevant to the Court's task is a history of the genesis, purpose and adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. But as Dean Joseph O'Meara has pointed out, Roe v. Wade contains "not a syllable" on this important question.[12]

Nevertheless, Roe declares that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment confers a right of privacy which includes the right of a woman to abort her offspring if she so chooses. Nowhere in the decision does the Court define the right of privacy; its only discusison of the subject is an assertion that the Constitution does not confer "an unlimited right to do with one's body as one pleases."[13] Yet if the right of privacy does not entitle one to do with one's own body what one pleases, how can it be said to protect activity that ends the life of another member of the human species? Even if the human fetus is not a person in the whole sense of the law, Ely emphasizes, "it is certainly not nothing."[14] Ely's aphorism illustrates an essential truth that should have been obvious to the Court—that "there is nothing private about an abortion."[15]

Although the right of privacy is not mentioned in the text of the Constitution, many legal scholars would agree that the courts may find such a right in the general values which certain specific provisions of the Constitution aim to protect. However, these scholars also stress that the right of privacy must be carefully defined and limited; thus, Professor Ely writes that it is entirely proper for a court to infer a general right of privacy, "so long as some care is taken in defining the sort of right the inference will support."[16]

Roe, however, provides neither a definition for the right to privacy nor an explanation of how that right is implicated by restrictions upon abortion. Rather, the Court simply declares that the right "is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy."[17] Apparently, the Court thinks that this outcome is supported by the detriment imposed upon the pregnant woman by statutes which prohibit her from aborting her child. As Professor Ely notes, these detriments "ought to be taken very seriously." But, he adds, all this "has nothing to do with privacy in the Bill of Rights sense or any other the Constitution suggests." [18] Whatever one's philosophical views on this issue, it is generally agreed that the Consitiution does not provide such a unrestricted "right to privacy."

THE LIFE AND PERSONHOOD OF THE HUMAN FETUS

The discussion in Roe v. Wade of the physiological and legal status of the fetus is the most confusing portion of the opinion. The question of when life begins, the Court says, is beyond the competence of the judiciary to answer.[20] Nevertheless, the Court effectively answers that question for the legislatures and citizens of 50 States, declaring that the States may only protect unborn life after "viability." In the United States, therefore, human life—in the sense of an individual whose rights may be protected by the community—as a practical matter does not begin until at least the seventh month of pregnancy. Indeed, all existence prior to live birth is here given the status of, at most, "potential" life; and Doe v. Bolton has established that the "potential" life of even a viable unborn child cannot be regarded as comparable under the law to the emotional or social "health" of his or her mother.[21]

The Court's conclusion in this regard does not follow from any of the discussion in its opinion. That discussion attempts to answer three questions, and concludes: (1) that the unborn are not "persons" as that word is used in the Fourteeth Amendment of the United States Constitution;[22] (2) that under the common law, the unborn are not "persons in the whole sense";[23] and (3) that the question of when human life begins has been a matter of great controversy among theologians and philosophers with no consensus among them.[24] Consideration of each of these questions is necessary to demonstrate how the Court erred in addressing them, and to illustrate their inconclusiveness with respect to the question of whether the State may act to protect the human fetus.

The Court offers two reasons for concluding "that the word 'person' as used in the Fourteenth Amendment does not include the unborn": (1) that uses of "person" elsewhere in the Constitution do not have a prenatal application;[25] and (2) that "throughout the major portion of the 19th century prevailing legal abortion practices were far freer than they are today." [26]

The first reason is unpersuasive because in none of the clauses cited by the Court does the Constitution attempt to define what a "person" is. Rather, these provisions—which include the eligibility rquirements for Federal office, the apportionment or representatives, the Extradiction and Fugitive Slave Clauses of Article IV—act only to restrict for particular purposes a broad class of persons. For example, a person must be 25 to be a Representative, 30 to be a Senator, and 35 to be the President.[27] These clauses, as Professor John D. Gorby has explained, "suggest only that there are persons, 24 years of age and younger, who are not qualified for the House, Senate or Presidency." [28] They do not imply that those less than 24 years of age are non-persons, nor do they suggest that they have become persons at birth or at any other particular stage of their development. Professor Gorby added that the other provisions cited by the Court are similarly irrelevant on this issue.[29] The Court's essay on this subject offers nothing to support the conclusion that "person" in the Fourteenth Amendment applies only post-natally.

The Court also suggests that no case has specifically held the unborn to be persons under the Fourteenth Amendment.[30] All this proves is a fact already know to all observers of Roe v. Wade: that the question of the constitutional status of the unborn was before the Supreme Court for the first time.[31] Moreover, as Professor Dellapenna notes, "it is difficult to visualize another context in which the question of fetal personhood could be presented. One hundred and five years without such a question being decided is not surprising when one recalls that minors were first held protected by that amendment in 1967." [32]

Thus, the Court effectively dodged the issue of fetal personhood by citing a lack of controlling precedent. The failure to address the question more fully is difficult to rationalize if, as the Court opined, the appellant's case would collapse if the unborn were held to be persons.

Finally, there is ample reason to believe that the Court's assertion of the relative availability of legal abortion during the 19th century is simply not accurate. Leading authorities are in agreement that it was a common law crime to administer any drug or perform any operation for the purpose of causing a miscarriage unless such operation were necessary to save the life of the woman.[33] During the 19th century Americans gradually codified and strengthened the common law prohibition of abortion,[34] and as Justice Rehnquist noted in his dissenting opinion, at the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868, "there were at least 36 laws enacted by state or territorial legislatures limiting abortion." [35] At least 19 of these had been passed by 1850. Nevertheless, the Court "observ(ed) . . . that throughout the major portion of the 19th century prevailing legal abortion practices were far freer than they are today." [36] As Professor Gorby concludes, if Justice Blackmun meant by this cryptic statement "that abortion was neither criminal nor subject to penal sanction—either by statute or at common law—he was wrong."[37]

With respect to the Court's denial of constitutional rights to the unborn, Professor Ely observes that "it is most intriguing" to compare the canons of construction used in reaching this conclusion with those employed in identifying the "right to an abortion" itself.[38] In making the latter holding, the Court clearly employed a high degree of imagination and innovation in construing a never-before-identified "right to an abortion" within the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (and perhaps elsewhere within the Constitution). In making the former conclusion, the Court employed a sort of dogged literalism, in finding that "person" could not possibly have contemplated the inclusion of the unborn.[39] Without taking sides on the appropriate method of judicial construction, I (in agreement with Professor Ely) nevertheless note that the alternating theories of construction employed by the Court in Roe suggest that there may have been something more involved in that decision than purely neutral criteria for constitutional interpretation.

The Court's holding that the Fourteenth Amendment could not possibly have been intended to protect the unborn may conflict with the plain meaning of the word "person," and quite possibly, with the intent of the Fourteenth Amendment. In order to decide whether an individual is protected under the Fourteenth Amendment, Congressman John Bingham of Ohio, its principal Framer, declared in 1867, "the only question to be asked of the creature claiming its protection is this: Is he a man?" [40] The Court's observations notwithstanding, this question has consistently been answered in the affirmative by American courts and legislatures with regard to the unborn.[41] Thus, in the words of Professor Noonan:

"The Fourteenth Amendment expressly declaring that no State shall "deprive any person of life" without due process of law appeared to guarantee the protection of all human beings. The Supreme Court in a stirring dictum had declared that "one's right of life" depends on the "outcome of no election." The right to life, put beyond electoral caprice, appeared to be secured by the due process clause. No student of language, no one faithful and attentive to the words of the Constitution could have supposed that the very clause which seemed to secure life could be turned inside out to mandate destruction of the States' life-protective measures . . . . The Congressmen who proposed and ratified the Fourteenth Amendment approved legislation banning abortion in the federal territories. The State legislatures which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment left in force strict statutes against abortion. How amazed these Congressmen and legislatures would have been to have been told that the Amendment they adopted could be read to eradicate the criminal laws safeguarding life. From the date of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868 until January 22, 1973, the traditions of the American people assured the protection of life in the womb . . ." [42]

As Professor Ely notes, even if the unborn do not have rights under the Fourteenth Amendment, this is irrelevant to the question of whether a State may restrict abortion, for "it has never been held or even asserted that the state interest needed to justify forcing a person to refrain from an activity, whether or not that activity is constitutionally protected, must implicate either the life or the constitutional rights of another person. Dogs are not "persons in the whole sense" nor have they constitutional rights, but that does not even mean the state cannot prohibit killing them: It does not mean the state cannot prohibit killing them in the exercise of the First Amendment right of political protest."[43]

Thus, I believe that the Court's finding of non-personhood of the unborn was a highly tenuous one. In any event, this finding in no way mandates the Court's conclusion that the States lack any compelling interest in protecting the lives of these unborn.

The common law

The theme of "personhood" was further discussed by the court in its observation that the unborn were not considered "persons in the whole sense" under the common law.[44] This observation is as tenuous as the Court's denial of personhood under the Constitution. The Court simply failed to view the history of restrictions upon abortion in perspective, with abortion first as a violation of canon and common law, then, after the demise of canon law jurisdiction over civil matters, as a common law crime,[45] and as a statutory offense.[46]

The phrase, "persons in the whole sense," is also misleading, for many categories of human beings were not given full rights under the common law—for example, infants, women and slaves. Yet, it does not follow that the common law did not protect the lives of these human beings. The unborn, Professor Epstein notes, were for many purposes regarded as persons by the common law; furthermore, he emphasizes;

"It remains true that recent judicial trends have expanded, not limited, their rights." [47]

For example, the Court "acknowledged that unborn children have been recognized as acquiring rights or interests by way of inheritance or other devolution of property, and have been represented by guardians." [48]

In the realm of tort law, the uninterrupted trend of recent decades has been to discard the old rules and to allow the unborn child standing to sue for injuries sustained in utero. Dean Prosser has noted that:

"All writers who have discussed the problem have joined in condemning the old rule, and in maintaining that the unborn child in the path of an automobile is as much a person in the street as the mother." [49]

Thus, in terms of development of the law, the Court would have placed itself well within the mainstream by recognizing the legal "personhood" of the unborn. Instead, it chose to go against this mainstream by refusing to recognize the trend of the law's development.

The beginning of human life

It is important to distinguish between Roe v. Wade's holding regarding the personhood of the unborn under the Fourteenth Amendment, and the Court's subsequent discussion of theories on the beginning of human life. On the first question, the Court squarely held that "the word 'person,' as used in the Fourteenth Amendment, does not include the unborn." [50] This conclusion disposed of any argument that the State might be permitted or obligated under the Amendment to protect the life of the unborn.

The second argument proposed by the State defendants in Roe v. Wade was that, apart from any duty under the Fourteenth Amendment, the State has a compelling interest in protecting life "from conception." [51] The Court's response here was the now famous declaration:

"We need not resolve the difficult question of when life begins. When those trained in the respective disciplines of medicine, philosophy and theology are unable to arrive at any consensus, the judiciary, at this point in the development of man's knowledge, is not in a position to speculate as to the answer." [52]

The Court, however, did more than speculate as to the answer. Philosophers, theologians and physicians, Professor Epstein notes, "do not have, or pretend to have, the power to decide this question for us all." [53] But, as a practical matter, the Supreme Court exercised such a power in Roe v. Wade, deciding that only one theory of prenatal life would be reflected in American constitutional law: that life begins at viability, when the fetus "has the capability of meaningful life outside the mother's womb." [54] It is only at this point, fixed elsewhere in the opinion at about 24-28 weeks,[55] that the State may even begin to balance the interest in the life of the fetus against the social or emotional "well being" of the mother. This conclusion rests upon the Court's determination that until birth, "the fetus, at most, represents only the potentiality of life." [56] No other "theory of life," the Court holds, may be adopted by the State to limit the right to abortion.[57]

In considering this conclusion, one looks in vain for any reasoning from constitutional or legal (or scientific) principle. The Court discusses a variety of views which have surfaced in history on the question of when human life begins, and notes that many of these disagreed with the views that life begins at conception.[58] However, as Professor Epstein notes, none of the arguments on this question turn, or can be made to turn, on the language of the Constitution.[59] Thus, he concludes, the Court's declaration that no State may adopt a theory of life which infringes on the availability of abortions prior to the seventh month of pregnancy characterizes Roe as an arbitrary decision based on naked political preferences.[60] In effect, the Court decided that the State may only enforce a theory of life that is consistent with the view that life begins at viability.[61] Thus, the Court has indeed decided, for the purposes of the law, when life begins. And it did so on grounds that have no relation to the Court's function in the constitutional system of government. In recommending proposal of the immediate amendment, I take no position on the question of when human life begins but only a position on the manner in which public debate on this question has been foreclosed by the Court's action.

Conclusion

This section has attempted only to portray some flavor of the jurisprudential criticism that has been directed at the Roe and Doe decisions. In large part, this criticism has come from individuals who do not look with disfavor upon the substantive policies generated by these decisions. They simply question how these policies came suddenly to be mandated by a Constitution that had never been thought prior to 1973 to contain anything approaching the "rights" set forth in Roe and Doe. As professor Ely again has observed:[62]

"What is frightening about Roe is that this super-protected right (to abortion) is not inferable from the language of the Constitution, the Framers' thinking respecting the specific problem in issue, any general value derivable from the provisions they included, or the Nation's governmental structure . . . At times the inferences the Court has drawn from the values the Constitution marks for special protection have been controversial, even shaky, but never before has its sense of an obligation to draw one been so obviously lacking."

As Professor Epstein has similarly concluded, the Roe decision is "symptomatic of the analytical poverty possible in constitutional litigation." [63]

Among other constitutional scholars who have been sharply critical of the jurisprudence in Roe are the late Alexander Bickel of the Yale Law School, Arthur Miller of the Harvard Law School, Harry Wellington, former Dean of the Yale Law School, and Archibald Cox, former Solicitor General of the United States.[64]

Perhaps even more compelling criticism of the Roe decision, however, has come from the Justices themselves who were in dissent in that case. In a dissent far stronger than normally seen on the Supreme Court, Justice White stated:

"I find nothing in the language or history of the Constitution to support the Court's judgment. The Court simply fashions a new constitutional right for pregnant mothers and, with scarcely any reason or authority for its action invests that right with sufficient substance to override most existing State abortion statutes. The upshot is that the people and the legislatures of the 50 States are constitutionally disentitled to weigh the relative importance of the continued existence and development of the fetus, on the one hand, against a spectrum of possible impacts on the mother, on the other hand. As an exercise of raw judicial power, the Court perhaps has authority to do what it does today; but in my view its judgment is an improvident and extravagant exercise of the power of judicial review which the Constitution extends to this Court." [65]

Justice Rehnquist similarly observed:

"The decision here to break the term of pregnancy into three distinct terms and to outline the permissible restrictions the State may impose in each one, for example, partakes more of judicial legislation than it does of a determination of the intent of the drafters of the Fourteenth Amendment." [66]

While fully respecting the authority of the Supreme Court to interpret the provisions of the Constitution, this Committee recognizes also the authority reposed in Congress under Article V of the Constitution to amend that document in response to what it views as wrongful or inappropriate decisions (see infra Section XI). To this end, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary in this Report recommends that the Constitution be so amended to overcome the effects of Roe v. Wade and its progeny and to restore authority in the legislative branches of government over the practice of abortion.

No elaborate discussion is required to expose the glaring non sequitur in the Court's argument. Plainly the fact that some family matters are constitutionally protected does not demonstrate that abortion is constitutionally protected. Nor does the added fact that abortion laws disadvantage pregnant women, establish their invalidity. Legal restrictions are placed on family autonomy in fields ranging from divorce to euthanasia despite the heavy costs thereby exacted from the individuals concernd.

[37] Gorby at 15. If, instead, the Court meant that abortion regulations in the nineteenth century were less restrictive than those of 1973, it was also wrong. Abortion statutes in force in 1973 in at least 21 States were the same as those in effect in 1868. To the extent that other statutes became more restrictive, this occurred in response to the growing awareness of the life of the unborn from the time of conception, that is, that the fetus was "quick" or alive, from that first moment. Many legislatures and jurists were already aware of this. A Pennsylvania court in 1850 wrote: "The moment the womb is instinct with embryo life, and gestation has begun, the crime [of abortion] may be perpetrated." Mills v. Commonwealth, 13 Pa. 630, 633-34 (1850). The Alabama Court of Appeals, interpreting a statute passed in 1840, wrote: "The statute's manifest purpose is to restrain after conception an unwarranted interference with the course of nature in the propagation and reproduction of human kind. . . . We are forced to concede that when in the red-hot furnace of vitality two germs, male and female, are brought together, that fuse themselves into one, a new being, crowned with humanity and and mentality, comes into life. If this be true, does not the new being, from the first day of its uterine life, acquire a legal and moral status that entitles it to the same protection as that guaranteed to human beings in extrauterine life. . . ?" Trent v. State, 15 Ala. App. 485, 496, 73 So. 834, 836 (1916).

It would seem to be clearly inconsistent with that aim to hold that a human being can be deprived of the most basic right, the right to live, by the expedient of defining him as a nonperson." Rice at 1069.

[39] See also Gorby at 22-24 and sources cited therein: "Concerning the function of the Fourteenth Amendment and the role of the word 'person' in the amendment, it can be said that the immediate political concern of the second half of the 1860s was to secure rights and freedoms and to ensure equal protection for former slaves. More generally, however, the amendment was designed to secure to all persons the fundamental rights of man, which generally include life, liberty or property, by providing the adjective right of access to the courts. There is nothing in the function of the fourteenth amendment to suggest that its scope or purpose is to protect only the born. And to the extent that an unborn can be the owner of property and is living, a Fourteenth Amendment purpose exists in the case of the unborn just as surely as it does with a born person who owns property and possesses 'life'," Gorby at 24 (footnotes omitted).

"Bingham stated that, notwithstanding the fact that life had never 'been protected, and is not now protected, in any State of the Union by the statute law of the United States,' such a fact is not determinative of the existence of the right, for it is expressly protected in the Constitution." As Destro notes. Murphy and Smith make it clear that, in abortion statutes passed prior to the Fourteenth Amendment, "the destruction of the unborn child was, itself, the gravamen of the crime of abortion." Destro at 1276. As medicine advanced the knowledge of human embryology and fetology, legislatures passed statutes to protect unborn life before and after "quickening," thus recognizing the humanity of the unborn throughout the term of pregnancy. [60] "[The Court] conceded that the 'potential' life of the unborn child must be taken into account in order to make the constitutional rules to govern abortions. But is there not a potential life in the unborn child from the moment of conception? And, if so, how do we take its measure? It makes no sense to hold in conclusionary terms that 'by adopting one theory of life, Texas may [not] override the rights of the pregnant woman that are at stake.' That formulation of the issue begs the important question because it assumes that we know that the woman's rights must prevail even before the required balance takes place. We could as well claim that the Court, by adopting another theory of life, has decided to override the rights of the unborn child which the law of Texas tries to protect. The Justice simply cannot strike the balance . . . unless he has some theory of life of his own which shows that there is no 'compelling' interest [in the life] of the unborn child. His exhaustive history of the abortion question indicates quite clearly that there is no consensus on the question, and it is simple fiat and power that gives his position its legal effect." The Wages of Crying Wolf: A Comment on Roe v. Wade*

(By John Hart Ely)

The interests of the mother and the fetus are opposed. On which side should the State throw its weight? The issue is volatile; and it is resolved by the moral code which an individual has.[1]

In Roe v. Wade,[2] decided January 22, 1973, the Supreme Court—Justice Blackmun speaking for everyone but Justices White and Rehnquist[3]—held unconstitutional Texas' (and virtually every other state's[4]) criminal abortion statute. The broad outlines of its argument are not difficult to make out:

1. The right to privacy, though not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution, is protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[5]

2. This right "is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy.[6]

3. This right to an abortion is "fundamental" and can therefore be regulated only on the basis of a "compelling" state interest.[7]

4. The state does have two "important and legitimate" interests here,[8] the first in protecting maternal health, the second in protecting the life (or potential life[9]) of the fetus.[10] But neither can be counted "compelling" throughout the entire pregnancy: Each matures with the unborn child.

These interests are separate and distinct. Each grows in substantiality as the woman approaches term and, at a point during pregnancy, each becomes "compelling."[11]

5. During the first trimester of pregnancy, neither interest is sufficiently compelling to justify any interference with the decision of the woman and her physician. Appellants have referred the Court to medical data indicating that morality rates for women undergoing early abortions, where abortion is legal, "appear to be as low as or lower than the rates for normal childbirth."[12] Thus the state's interest in protecting maternal health is not compelling during the first trimester. Since the interest in protecting the fetus is not yet compelling either,[13] during the first trimester the state can neither prohibit an abortion nor regulate the conditions under which one is performed.[14]

6. As we move into the second trimester, the interest in protecting the fetus remains less than compelling, and the decision to have an abortion thus continues to control. However, at this point the health risks of abortion begin to exceed those of childbirth. "It follows that, from and after this point, a State may regulate the abortion procedure to the extent that the regulation reasonably relates to the preservation and protection of maternal health."[15] Abortion may not be prohibited during the second trimester, however.[16]

7. At the point at which the fetus becomes viable[17] the interest in protecting it becomes compelling,[18] and therefore from that point on the state can prohibit abortions except—and this limitation is also apparently a constitutional command, though it receives no justification in the opinion—when they are necessary to protect maternal life or health.[19]

I

A number of fairly standard criticisms can be made of Roe. A plausible narrower basis of decision, that of vagueness, is brushed aside in the rush toward broader ground.[20] The opinion strikes the reader initially as a sort of guidebook, addressing questions not before the Court and drawing lines with an apparent precision one generally associates with a commissioner's regulations.[21] On closer examination, however, the precision proves largely illusory. Confusing signals are emitted, particularly with respect to the nature of the doctor's responsibilities[22] and the permissible scope of health regulations after the first trimester.[23] The Court seems, moreover, to get carried away on the subject of remedies: Even assuming the case can be made for an unusually protected constitutional right to an abortion, it hardly seems necessary to have banned during the first trimester all state regulation of the conditions under which abortions can be performed.[24]

By terming such criticisms "standard," I do not mean to suggest they are unimportant, for they are not. But if they were all that was wrong with Roe, it would not merit special comment.[25]

II

Let us not underestimate what is at stake: Having an unwanted child can go a long way toward ruining a woman's life.[26] And at bottom Roe signals the Court's judgment that this result cannot be justified by any good that anti-abortion legislation accomplishes. This surely is an understandable conclusion—indeed it is one with which I agree[27]—but ordinarily the Court claims no mandate to second-guess legislative balances, at least not when the Constitution has designated neither of the values in conflict as entitled to special protection.[28] But even assuming it would be a good idea for the Court to assume this function, Roe seems a curious place to have begun. Laws prohibiting the use of "soft" drugs or, even more obviously, homosexual acts between consenting adults can stunt "the preferred life styles"[29] of those against whom enforcement is threatened in very serious ways. It is clear such acts harm no one besides the participants, and indeed the case that the participants are harmed is a rather shaky one.[30] Yet such laws survive,[31] on the theory that there exists a societal consensus that the behavior involved is revolting or at any rate immoral.[32] Of course the consensus is not universal but it is sufficient, and this is what is counted crucial, to get the laws passed and keep them on the books. Whether anti-abortion legislation cramps the life style of an unwilling mother more significantly than anti-homosexuality legislation cramps the life style of a homosexual is a close question. But even granting that it does, the other side of the balance looks very different. For there is more than simple societal revulsion to support legislation restricting abortion:[33] Abortion ends (or if it makes a difference, prevents) the life of a human being other than the one making the choice.

The Court's response here is simply not adequate. It agrees, indeed it holds, that after the point of viability (a concept it fails to note will become even less clear than it is now as the technology of birth continues to develop[34]) the interest in protecting the fetus is compelling.[35] Exactly why that is the magic moment is not made clear: Viability, as the Court defines it,[36] is achieved some six to twelve weeks after quickening.[37] (Quickening is the point at which the fetus begins discernibly to move independently of the mother[38] and the point that has historically been deemed crucial—to the extent any point between conception and birth has been focused on.[39] But no, it is viability that is constitutionally critical: the Court's defense seems to mistake a definition for a syllogism.

"With respect to the State's important and legitimate interest in potential life, the 'compelling' point is at viability. This is so because the fetus then presumably has the capacity of meaningful life outside the mother's womb."[40]

With regard to why the state cannot consider this "important and legitimate interest" prior to viability, the opinion is even less satisfactory. The discussion begins sensibly enough: The interest asserted is not necessarily tied to the question whether the fetus is "alive," for whether or not one calls it a living being, it is an entity with the potential for (and indeed the likelihood of) life.[41] But all of arguable relevance that follows[42] are arguments that fetuses (a) are not recognized as "persons in the whole sense" by legal doctrine generally[43] and (b) are not "persons" protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.[44]

To the extent they are not entirely inconclusive, the bodies of doctrine to which the Court adverts respecting the protection of fetuses under general legal doctrine tend to undercut rather than support its conclusion.[45] And the argument that fetuses (unlike, say, corporations) are not "persons" under the Fourteenth Amendment fares little better. The Court notes that most constitutional clauses using the word "persons"—such as the one outlining the qualifications for the Presidency—appear to have been drafted with postnatal being in mind. (It might have added that most of them were plainly drafted with adults in mind, but I suppose that wouldn't have helped.) In addition, "the appellee conceded on reargument that no case can be cited that holds that a fetus is a person within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment."[46] (The other legal contexts in which the question could have arisen are not enumerated.)

The canons of construction employed here are perhaps most intriguing when they are contrasted with those invoked to derive the constitutional right to an abortion.[47] But in any event, the argument that fetuses lack constitutional rights is simply irrelevant. For it has never been held or even asserted that the state interest needed to justify forcing a person to refrain from an activity, whether or not that activity is constitutionally protected, must implicate either the life or the constitutional rights of another person.[48] Dogs are not "persons in the whole sense" nor have they constitutional rights, but that does not mean the state cannot prohibit killing them: It does not even mean the state cannot prohibit killing them in the exercise of the First Amendment right of political protest. Come to think of it, draft cards aren't persons either.[49]

Thus even assuming the Court ought generally to get into the business of second-guessing legislative balances, it has picked a strange case with which to begin. Its purported evaluation of the balance that produced anti-abortion legislation simply does not meet the issue: That the life plans of the mother must, not simply may, prevail over the state's desire to protect the fetus simply does not follow from the judgment that the fetus is not a person. Beyond all that, however, the Court has no business getting into that business.

III

Were I a legislator I would vote for a statute very much like the one the Court ends up drafting.[50] I hope this reaction reflects more than the psychological phenomenon that keeps bombardiers sane—the fact that it is somehow easier to "terminate" those you cannot see—and am inclined to think it does: that the mother, unlike the unborn child, has begun to imagine a future for herself strikes me as morally quite significant. But God knows I'm not happy with that resolution. Abortion is too much like infanticide on the one hand, and too much like contraception on the other, to leave one comfortable with any answer; and the moral issue it poses is as fiendish as any philosopher's hypothetical.[51]

Footnotes at end of article.

Of course, the Court often resolves difficult moral questions, and difficult questions yield controversial answers. I doubt, for example, that most people would agree that letting a drug peddler go unapprehended is morally preferable to letting the police kick down his door without probable cause. The difference, of course, is that the Constitution, which legitimates and theoretically controls judicial intervention, has some rather pointed things to say about this choice. There will of course be difficult questions about the applicability of its language to specific facts, but at least the document's special concern with one of the values in conflict is manifest. It simply says nothing, clear or fuzzy, about abortion.[52]

The matter cannot end there, however. The Burger Court, like the Warren Court before it, has been especially solicitous of the right to travel from state to state, demanding a compelling state interest if it is to be inhibited.[53] Yet nowhere in the Constitution is such a right mentioned. It is, however, as clear as such things can be that this right was one the framers intended to protect, most specifically [54] by the Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV.[55] The right is, moreover, plausibly inferable from the system of government, and the citizen's role therein, contemplated by the Constitution.[56] The Court in Roe suggests an inference of neither sort—from the intent of the framers,[57] or from the governmental system contemplated by the Constitution—in support of the constitutional right to an abortion.

What the Court does assert is that there is a general right of privacy granted special protection—that is, protection above and beyond the baseline requirement of "rationality"—by the Fourteenth Amendment,[58] and that that right "is broad enough to encompass" the right to an abortion. The general right of privacy is inferred, as it was in Griswold v. Connecticut,[59] from various provisions of the Bill of Rights manifesting a concern with privacy, notably the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against unreasonable searches, the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination, and the right, inferred from the First Amendment, to keep one's political associations secret.[60]

One possible response is that all this proves is that the things explicitly mentioned are forbidden, if indeed it does not actually demonstrate a disposition not to enshrine anything that might be called a general right of privacy.[61] In fact the Court takes this view when it suits its purposes. (On the same day it decided Roe, the Court held that a showing of reasonableness was not needed to force someone to provide a grand jury with a voice exemplar, reasoning that the Fifth Amendment was not implicated because the evidence was not "testimonial" and that the Fourth Amendment did not apply because there was no "seizure." [62]) But this approach is unduly crabbed. Surely the Court is entitled, indeed I think it is obligated, to seek out the sorts of evils the framers meant to combat and to move against their twentieth century counterparts.[63]

Thus it seems to me entirely proper to infer a general right of privacy, so long as some care is taken in defining the sort of right the inference will support. Those aspects of the First, Fourth and Fifth Amendments to which the Court refers all limit the ways in which, and the circumstances under which, the government can go about gathering information about a person he would rather it did not have.[64] Katz v. United States,[65] limiting governmental tapping of telephones, may not involve what the framers would have called a "search," but it plainly involves this general concern with privacy.[66] Griswold is a long step, even a leap, beyond this, but at least the connection is discernible. Had it been a case that purported to discover in the Constitution a "right to contraception," it would have been Roe's strongest precedent.[67] But the Court in Roe gives no evidence of so regarding it,[68] and rightly not.[69] Commentators tend to forget, though the Court plainly has not,[70] that the Court in Griswold stressed that it was invalidating only that portion of the Connecticut law that proscribed the use, as opposed to the manufacture, sale, or other distribution of contraceptives. That distinction (which would be silly were the right to contraception being constitutionally enshrined) makes sense if the case is rationalized on the ground that the section of the law whose constitutionality was in issue was such that its enforcement would have been virtually impossible without the most outrageous sort of governmental prying into the privacy of the home.[71] And this, indeed, is the theory on which the Court appeared rather explicitly to settle:

"The present case, then, concerns a relationship lying within the zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees. And it concerns a law which, in forbidding the use of contraceptives rather than regulating their manufacture or sale, seeks to achieve its goals by means having a maximum destructive impact upon that relationship. Such a law cannot stand in light of the familiar principle, so often applied by this Court, that 'a governmental purpose to control or prevent activities constitutionally subject to state regulation may not be achieved by means which sweep unnecessarily broadly and thereby invade the area of protected freedoms.' NAACP v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288, 307. Would we allow the police to search the sacred precincts of marital bedrooms for telltale signs of the use of contraceptives? The very idea is repulsive to the notions of privacy surrounding the marriage relationship."[72]

Thus even assuming (as the Court surely seemed to) that a state can constitutionally seek to minimize or eliminate the circulation and use of contraceptives, Connecticut had acted unconstitutionally by selecting a means, that is a direct ban on use, that would generate intolerably intrusive modes of data-gathering.[73] No such rationalization is attempted by the Court in Roe—and understandably not, for whatever else may be involved, it is not a case about governmental snooping.[74]

The Court reports that some amici curiae argued for an unlimited right to do as one wishes with one's body. This theory holds, for me at any rate, much appeal. However, there would have been serious problems with its invocation in this case. In the first place, more than the mother's own body is involved in a decision to have an abortion; a fetus may not be a "person in the whole sense," but it is certainly not nothing.[75] Second, it is difficult to find a basis for thinking that the theory was meant to be given constitutional sanction: Surely it is no part of the "privacy" interest the Bill of Rights suggests.[76]

"[I]t is not clear to us that the claim . . . that one has an unlimited right to do with one's body as one pleases bears a close relationship to the right of privacy . . . ." [77]

Unfortunately, having thus rejected the amici's attempt to define the bounds of the general constitutional right of which the right to an abortion is a part,[78] on the theory that the general right described has little to do with privacy, the Court provides neither an alternative definition [79] nor an account of why it thinks privacy is involved. It simply announces that the right to privacy "is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy." Apparently this conclusion is thought to derive from the passage that immediately follows it:

"The detriment that the State would impose upon the pregnant woman by denying this choice altogether is apparent. Specific and direct harm medically diagnosable even in early pregnancy may be involved. Maternity, or additional offspring, may force upon the woman a distressful life and future. Psychological harm may be imminent. Mental and physical health may be taxed by child care. There is also the distress, for all concerned, associated with the unwanted child, and there is the problem of bringing a child into a family already unable, psychologically and otherwise, to care for it. In other cases, as in this one, the additional difficulties and continuing stigma of unwed motherhood may be involved." [80]

All of this is true and ought to be taken very seriously. But it has nothing to do with privacy in the Bill of Rights sense or any other the Constitution suggests.[81] I suppose there is nothing to prevent one from using the word "privacy" to mean the freedom to live one's life without governmental interference. But the Court obviously does not so use the term.[82] Nor could it, for such a right is at stake in every case. Our life styles are constantly limited, often seriously, by governmental regulation; and while many of us would prefer less direction, granting that desire the status of a preferred constitutional right would yield a system of "government" virtually unrecognizable to us and only slighty more recognizable to our forefathers.[83] The Court's observations concerning the serious, life-shaping costs of having a child prove what might to the thoughtless have seemed unprovable: That even though a human life, or a potential human life, hangs in the balance, the moral dilemma abortion poses is so difficult as to be heartbreaking. What they fail to do is even begin to resolve that dilemma so far as our governmental system is concerned by associating either side of the balance with a value inferable from the Constitution.

But perhaps the inquiry should not end even there. In his famous Carolene Products footnote, Justice Stone suggested that the interests to which the Court can responsibly give extraordinary constitutional protection include not only those expressed in the Constitution but also those that are unlikely to receive adequate consideration in the political process, specifically the interests of "discrete and insular minorities" unable to form effective political alliances.[84] There can be little doubt that such considerations have influenced the direction, if only occasionally the rhetoric, of the recent Courts. My repeated efforts to convince my students that sex should be treated as a "suspect classification" have convinced me it is no easy matter to state such considerations in a "principled" way. But passing that problem, Roe is not an appropriate case for their invocation.

Compared with men, very few women sit in our legislatures, a fact I believe should bear some relevance—even without an Equal Rights Amendment—to the appropriate standard of review for legislation that favors men over women.[85] But no fetuses sit in our legislatures. Of course they have their champions, but so have women. The two interests have clashed repeatedly in the political arena, and had continued to do so up to the date of the opinion, generating quite a wide variety of accommodations.[86] By the Court's lights virtually all of the legislative accommodations had unduly favored fetuses; by its definition of victory, women had lost. Yet in every legislative balance one of the competing interests loses to some extent; indeed usually, as here, they both do. On some occasions the Constitution throws its weight on the side of one of them, indicating the balance must be restruck. And on others—and this is Justice Stone's suggestion—it is at least arguable that, constitutional directive or not, the Court should throw its weight on the side of a minority demanding in court more than it was able to achieve politically. But even assuming this suggestion can be given principled content, it was clearly intended and should be reserved for those interests which, as compared with the interests to which they have been subordinated, constitute minorities unusually incapable of protecting themselves.[87] Compared with men, women may constitute such a "minority"; compared with the unborn, they do not.[88] I'm not sure I'd know a discrete and insular minority if I saw one, but confronted with a multiple choice question requiring me to designate (a) women or (b) fetuses as one, I'd expect no credit for the former answer.[89]

Of course a woman's freedom to choose an abortion is part of the "liberty" the Fourteenth Amendment says shall not be denied without due process of law, as indeed is anyone's freedom to do what he wants. But "due process" generally guarantees only that the inhibition be procedurally fair and that it have some "rational" connection—though plausible is probably a better word[90]—with a permissible governmental goal.[91] What is unusual about Roe is that the liberty involved is accorded a far more stringent protection, so stringent that a desire to preserve the fetus's existence is unable to overcome it—a protection more stringent, I think it fair to say, than that the present Court accords the freedom of the press explicitly guaranteed by the First Amendment.[92] What is frightening about Roe is that this super-protected right is not inferable from the language of the Constitution, the framers' thinking respecting the specific problem in issue, any general value derivable from the provisions they included,[93] or the nation's governmental structure. Nor is it explainable in terms of the unusual political impotence of the group judicially protected vis-a-vis the interest that legislatively prevailed over it.[94] And that, I believe—the predictable[95] early reaction to Roe notwithstanding ("more of the same Warrent-type activism"[96])—is a charge that can responsibly be leveled at no other decision of the past twenty years.[97] At times the inferences the Court has drawn from the values the Constitution marks for special protection have been controversial, even shaky, but never before has its sense of an obligation to draw one been so obviously lacking.

IV

Not in the last thirty-five years at any rate. For, as the received learning has it, this sort of thing did happen before, repeatedly. From its 1905 decision in Lochner v. New York[98] into the 1930's the Court, frequently though not always under the rubric of "liberty of contract," employed the Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth and Fifth Amendments to invalidate a good deal of legislation. According to the dissenters at the time and virtually all the commentators since, the Court had simply manufactured a constitutional right out of whole cloth and used it to superimpose its own view of wise social policy on those of the legislatures. So indeed the Court itself came to see the matter, and its reaction was complete:

"There was a time when the Due Process Clause was used by this Court to strike down laws which were thought unreasonable, that is, unwise or incompatible with some particular economic or social philosophy. In this manner the Due Process Clause was used, for example, to nullify laws prescribing maximum hours for work in bakeries, Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), outlawing 'yellow dog' contracts, Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1 (1915), setting minimum wages for women, Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923), and fixing the weight of loaves of bread, Jay Burns Baking Co., v. Bryan, 264 U.S. 504 (1924). This intrusion by the judiciary into the realm of legislative value judgments was strongly objected to at the time . . . . Mr. Justice Holmes said,

"I think the proper course is to recognize that a state legislature can do whatever it sees fit to do unless it is restrained by some express prohibition in the Constitution of the United States or of the State, and that Courts should be careful not to extend such prohibitions beyond their obvious meaning by reading into them conceptions of public policy that the particular Court may happen to entertain."

. . . The doctrine that prevailed in Lochner, Coppage, Adkins, Burns, and like cases—that due process authorizes courts to hold laws unconstitutional when they believe the legislature has acted unwisely—has long since been discarded. We have returned to the original constitutional proposition that courts do not substitute their social and economic beliefs for the judgment of legislative bodies, who are elected to pass laws.[99]

It may be objected that Lochner et al. protected the "economic rights" of businessmen where Roe protects a "human right." It should be noted, however, that not all of the Lochner series involved economic regulation;[100] that even those that did resist the "big business" stereotype with which the commentators tend to associate them; and that in some of them the employer's "liberty of contract" claim was joined by the employee, who knew that if he had to be employed on the terms set by the law in question, he could not be employed at all.[101] This is a predicament that is economic to be sure, but is not without its "human" dimension. Similarly "human" seems the predicament of the appellees in the 1970 case of Dandridge v. Williams,[102] who challenged the Maryland Welfare Department's practice of limiting AFDC grants to $250 regardless of family size or need. Yet in language that remains among its favored points of reference,[103] the Court, speaking through Justice Stewart,[104] dismissed the complaint as "social and economic" and therefore essentially Lochneresque.

"[W]e deal with state regulation in the social and economic field, not affecting freedoms guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. . . . For this Court to approve the invalidation of state economic or social regulation as 'overreaching' would be far too reminiscent of an era when the Court thought the Fourteenth Amendment gave it power to strike down state laws 'because they may be unwise, improvident, or out of harmony with a particular school of thought.' . . . That era long ago passed into history. . . .

"To be sure, the cases cited . . . have in the main involved state regulation of business or industry. The administration of public welfare assistance, by contrast, involves the most basic economic needs of impoverished human beings. We recognize the dramatically real factual difference between the cited cases and this one, but we can find no basis for applying a different constitutional standard. . . . It is a standard . . . that is true to the principle that the Fourteenth Amendment gives the federal courts no power to impose upon the States their views of wise economic or social policy." [105]

It may be, however—at least it is not the sort of claim one can disprove—that the "right to an abortion," or noneconomic rights generally, accord more closely with "this generation's idealization of America" [106] than the "rights" asserted in either Lochner or Dandridge. But that attitude, of course, is precisely the point of the Lochner philosophy, which would grant unusual protection to those "rights" that somehow seem most pressing, regardless of whether the Constitution suggests any special solicitude for them. The Constitution has little to say about contract,[107] less about abortion, and those who would speculate about which the framers would have been more likely to protect may not be pleased with the answer. The Court continues to disavow the philosophy of Lochner.[108] Yet as Justice Stewart's concurrence admits, it is impossible candidly to regard Roe as the product of anything else.[109]

That alone should be enough to damn it. Criticism of the Lochner philosophy has been virtually universal and will not be rehearsed here. I would, however, like to suggest briefly that although Lochner and Roe are twins to be sure, they are not identical. While I would hesitate to argue that one is more defensible than the other in terms of judicial style, there are differences in that regard that suggest Roe may turn out to be the more dangerous precedent.

All the "superimposition of the Court's own value choices" talk is, of course, the characterization of others and not the language of Lochner or its progeny. Indeed, those cases did not argue that "liberty of contract" was a preferred constitutional freedom, but rather represented it as merely one among the numerous aspects of "liberty" the Fourteenth Amendment protects, therefore requiring of its inhibitors a "rational" defense.

"In our opinion that section . . . is an invasion of the personal liberty, as well as of the right of property, guaranteed by that Amendment. Such liberty and right embraces the right to make contracts for the purchase of the labor of others and equally the right to make contracts for the sale of one's own labor; each right, however, being subject to the fundamental condition that no contract, whatever its subject matter, can be sustained which the law, upon reasonable grounds, forbids as inconsistent with the public interests or as hurtful to the public order or as detrimental to the common good.[110]

"Undoubtedly, the police power of the State may be exerted to protect purchasers from imposition by sale of short weight loaves. . . . Constitutional protection having been invoked, it is the duty of the court to determine whether the challenged provision has reasonable relation to the protection of purchasers of bread against fraud by short weights and really tends to accomplish the purpose for which it was enacted.[111]

Thus the test Lochner and its progeny purported to apply is that which would theoretically control the same questions today: whether a plausible argument can be made that the legislative action furthers some permissible governmental goal.[112] The trouble, of course, is they misapplied it. Roe, on the other hand, is quite explicit that the right to an abortion is a "fundamental" one, requiring not merely a "rational" defense for its inhibition but rather a "compelling" one.

A second difference between Lochner et al. and Roe has to do with the nature of the legislative judgments being second-guessed. In the main, the "refutations" tendered by the Lochner series were of two sorts. The first took the form of declarations that the goals in terms of which the legislatures' actions were defended were impermissible. Thus, for example, the equalization of unequal bargaining power and the strengthening of the labor movement are simply ends the legislature had no business pursuing, and consequently its actions cannot thereby be justified.[113] The second form of "refutation" took the form not of denying the legitimacy of the goal relied on but rather of denying the plausibility of the legislature's empirical judgment that its action would promote that goal.

"In our judgment it is not possible in fact to discover the connection between the number of hours a baker may work in the bakery and the heathful quality of the bread made by the workman.[114]

"There is no evidence in support of the thought that purchasers have been or are likely to be induced to take a nine and a half or a ten ounce loaf for a pound (16 ounce) loaf, or an eighteen and a half or a 19 ounce loaf for a pound and a half (24 ounce) loaf; and it is contrary to common experience and unreasonable to assume that there could be any danger of such deception."[115]

The Roe opinion's "refutation" of the legislative judgment that antiabortion statutes can be justified in terms of the protection of the fetus takes neither of these forms. The Court grants that protecting the fetus is an "important and legitimate" government goal,[116] and of course it does not deny that restricting abortion promotes it.[117] What it does, instead, is simply announce that that goal is not important enough to sustain the restriction. There is little doubt that judgments of this sort were involved in Lochner et al.,[118] but what the Court said in those cases was not that the legislature had incorrectly balanced two legitimate but competing goals, but rather that the goal it had favored was impermissible or the legislation involved did not really promote it.[119]

Perhaps this is merely a rhetorical difference, but it could prove to be important. Lochner et al. were thoroughly disreputable decisions, but at least they did us the favor of sowing the seeds of their own destruction. To say that the equalization of bargaining power or the fostering of the labor movement is a goal outside the ambit of a "police power" broad enough to forbid all contracts the state legislature can reasonably regard "as inconsistent with the public interests or as hurtful to the public order or as detrimental to the common good"[120] is to say something that is, in a word, wrong.[121] And it is just as obviously wrong to declare, for example, that restrictions on long working hours cannot reasonably be said to promote health and safety.[122] Roe's "refutation" of the legislative judgment, on the other, is not obviously wrong, for the substitution of one nonrational judgment for another concerning the relative importance of a mother's opportunity to live the life she has planned and a fetus's opportunity to live at all, can be labeled neither wrong nor right. The problem with Roe is not so much that it bungles the question it sets itself,[123] but rather that it sets itself a question the Constitution has not made the Court's business. It looks different from Lochner—it has the shape if not the substance of a judgment that is very much the Court's business, one vindicating an interest the Constitution marks as special—and it is for that reason perhaps more dangerous. Of course in a sense it is more candid than Lochner.[124] But the employment of a higher standard of judicial review, no matter how candid the recognition that it is indeed higher, loses some of its admirability when it is accompanied by neither a coherent account of why such a standard is appropriate nor any indication of why it has not been satisfied.

I do wish "Wolf!" hadn't been cried so often. When I suggest to my students that Roe lacks even colorable support in the constitutional text, history, or any other appropriate source of constitutional doctrine, they tell me they've heard all that before. When I point out they haven't heard it before from me, I can't really blame them for smiling.

But at least crying "Wolf!" doesn't influence the wolves; crying "Lochner!" may. Of course the Warren Court was aggressive in enforcing its ideals of liberty and equality. But by and large, it attempted to defend its decisions in terms of inferences from values the Constitution marks as special.[125] Its inferences were often controversial, but just as often our profession's prominent criticism designed not to address them on their terms and contented itself with assertions that the Court was indulging in sheer acts of will, ramming its personal preferences down the country's throat—that it was, in a word, Lochnering. One possible judicial response to this style of criticism would be to conclude that one might as well be hanged for a sheep as a goat: So long as you're going to be told, no matter what you say, that all you do is Lochner, you might as well Lochner. Another, perhaps more likely in a new appointee, might be to reason that since Lochnering has so long been standard procedure, "just one more" (in a good cause, of course) can hardly matter. Actual reactions, of course, are not likely to be this self-conscious, but the critical style of offhand dismissal may have taken its toll nonetheless.

Of course the Court has been aware that criticism of much that it has done has been widespread in academic as well as popular circles. But when it looks to the past decade's most prominent academic criticism, it will often find little there to distinguish it from the popular. Disagreements with the chain of inference by which the Court got from the Constitution to its result, if mentioned at all, have tended to be announced in the most conclusory terms, and the impression has often been left that the real quarrel of the Academy, like that of the laity, is with the results the Court has been reaching and perhaps with judicial "activism" in general.[126] Naturally the Court is sensitive to criticism of this sort, but these are issues on which it will, when push comes to shove, trust its own judgment. (And it has no reason not to: Law professors do not agree on what results are "good," and even if they did, there is no reason to assume their judgment is any better on that issue than the Court's.) And academic criticism of the sort that might (because it should) have some effect—criticism suggesting misperceptions in the Court's reading of the value structure set forth in the document from which it derives its authority, or unjustifiable inferences it has drawn from that value structure—has seemed for a time somehow out of fashion, the voguish course being simply to dismiss the process by which a disfavored result was reached as Lochnering pure and simple. But if the critics cannot trouble themselves with such details, it is difficult to expect the Court to worry much about them either.

This tendency of commentators to substitute snappy dismissal for careful evaluation of the Court's constitutional inferences—and of course it is simply a tendency, never universally shared and hopefully on the wane—may include among its causes simple laziness, boredom and a natural reluctance to get out of step with the high-steppers. But in part it has also reflected a considered rejection of the view of constitutional adjudication from which my remarks have proceeded. There is a powerful body of opinion that would dismiss the call for substantive criticism—and its underlying assumption that some constitutional inferences are responsible while others are not—as naive. For, the theory goes, except as to the most trivial and least controversial questions (such as the length of a Senator's term), the Constitution speaks in the vaguest and most general terms;[127] the most its clauses can provide are "more or less suitable pegs on which judicial policy choices are hung."[128] Thus anyone who suggests the Constitution can provide significant guidance for today's difficult questions either deludes himself or seeks to delude the Court. Essentially all the Court can do is honor the value preferences it sees fit, and it should be graded according to the judgment and skill with which it does so.[129]

One version of this view appears to be held by President Nixon. It is true that in announcing the appointment of Justices Powell and Rehnquist, he described a "judicial conservative"—his kind of Justice—as one who does not "twist or bend the Constitution in order to perpetuate his personal political and social views."[130] But the example he then gave bore witness that he was not so "naive" after all.

"As a judicial conservative, I believe some court decisions have gone too far in the past in weakening the peace forces as against the criminal forces in our society. . . . [T]he peace forces must not be denied the legal tools they need to protect the innocent from criminal elements."[131]

That this sort of invitation, to get in there and Lochner for the right goals, can contribute to opinions like Roe is obvious. In terms of process, it is just what the President ordered.

The academic version of this general view is considerably more subtle. It agrees that the Court will find little help in the Constitution and therefore has no real choice other than to decide for itself which value preferences to honor, but denies that it should necessarily opt for the preferences favored by the Justices themselves or the President who appointed them. To the extent "progress" is to concern the Justices at all, it should be defined not in terms of what they would like it to be but rather in terms of their best estimate of what over time the American people will make it [132]—that is, they should seek "durable" decisions.[133] This, however, is no easy task, and the goals that receive practically all the critics' attention, and presumably are supposed to receive practically all the Court's, are its own institutional survival and effectiveness.[134]

Whatever the other merits or demerits of this sort of criticism, it plainly is not what it is meant to be—an effective argument for judicial self—restraint. For a Governor Warren or a Senator Black will rightly see no reason to defer to law professors on the probable direction of progress; even less do they need the Academy's advice on what is politically feasible; and they know that despite the Court's history of frequent immersion in hot water,[135] its "institutional position" has been getting stronger for 200 years.

Roe is a case in point. Certainly, many will view it as social progress. (Surely that is the Court's view, and indeed the legislatures had been moving perceptibly, albeit too slowly for many of us, toward relaxing their anti-abortion legislation.) [136] And it is difficult to see how it will weaken the Court's position. Fears of official disobedience are obviously groundless when it is a criminal statute that has been invalidated.[137] To the public the Roe decision must look very much like the New York Legislature's recent liberalization of its abortion law.[138] Even in the unlikely event someone should catch the public's ear long enough to charge that the wrong institution did the repealing, they have heard that "legalism" before without taking to the streets. Nor are the political branches, and this of course is what really counts, likely to take up the cry very strenuously: The sighs of relief as this particular albatross was cut from the legislative and executive necks seemed to me audible. Perhaps I heard wrong—I live in the Northeast, indeed not so very far from Hyannis Port. It is even possible that a constitutional amendment will emerge, though that too has happened before without serious impairment of the Position of the Institution. But I doubt one will: Roe v. Wade seems like a durable decision.

It is, nevertheless, a very bad decision. Not because it will perceptibly weaken the Court—it won't; and not because it conflicts with either my idea of progress [139] or what the evidence suggests is society's [140]—it doesn't. It is bad because it is bad constitutional law, or rather because it is not constitutional law and gives almost no sense of an obligation to try to be.[141]

I am aware the Court cannot simply "lay the Article of the Constitution which is invoked beside the statute which is challenged and . . . decide whether the latter squares with the former." [142] That is precisely the reason commentators are needed.

"[P]recisely because it is the Constitution alone with warrants judicial interference in sovereign operations of the State, the basis of judgment as to the Constitutionality of state action must be a rational one, approaching the text which is the only commission for our power not in a literalistic way, as if we had a tax statute before us, but as the basic charter of our society, setting out in spare but meaningful terms the principles of government.[143]

"No matter how imprecise in application to specific modern fact situations, the constitutional guarantees do provide a direction, a goal, an ideal citizen-government relationship. They rule out many alternative directions, goals, and ideals." [144]

And they fail to support the ruling out of others.

Of course that only begins the inquiry. Identification and definition of the values with which the Constitution is concerned will often fall short of indicating with anything resembling clarity the deference to be given those values when they conflict with others society finds important. (Though even here the process is sometimes more helpful than the commentators would allow.) Nor is it often likely to generate, fullblown, the "neutral" principle that will avoid embarrassment in future cases.[145] But though the identification of a constitutional connection is only the beginning of analysis, it is a necessary beginning. The point that often gets lost in the commentary, and obviously got lost in Roe, is that before the Court can get to the "balancing" stage, before it can worry about the next case and the case after that (or even about its institutional position) it is under an obligation to trace its premises to the charter from which it derives its authority. A neutral and durable principle may be a thing of beauty and a joy forever. But if it lacks connection with any value the Constitution marks as special, it is not a constitutional principle and the Court has no business imposing it. [146] I hope that will seem obvious to the point of banality. Yet those of us to whom it does seem obvious have seldom troubled to say so.[147] And because we have not, we must share in the blame for this decision.

[10] The suggestion that the interest in protecting prenatal life should not be considered because the original legislative history of most laws restricting abortion concerned itself with maternal health, see 93 S. [19] 93 S. Ct. at 732. (Thus the statutes of most states must be unconstitutional even as applied to the final trimester, since they permit abortion only for the purpose of saving the mother's life. See id. at 709.) This holding—that even after viability the mother's life or health (which presumably is to be defined very broadly indeed, so as to include what many might regard as the mother's convenience, see 93 S. Ct. at 755 (Burger, C.J., concurring)); United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), must, as a matter of constitutional law, take precedence over what the Court seems prepared to grant at this point has become the fetus's life, see p. 924 infra—seems to me at least as controversial as its holding respecting the period prior to viability. (Typically, of course, one is not privileged even statutorily, let alone constitutionally, to take another's life in order to have his own life, much less his health.) Since, however, the Court does not see fit to defend this aspect of its decision at all, there is not a great deal that can be said by way of criticism.

[20] The Court's theory seems to be that narrow grounds need not be considered when there is a broad one that will do the trick: "This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to consider the additional challenge to the Texas statute asserted on grounds of vagueness." 93 S. Ct. at 732. Compare id. at 710 n.3, 710–11; Doe v. Bolton, 93 S. Ct. at 747; Roe v. Wade, 314 F. Supp. 1217 1223 (N.D. Tex. 1970); cases cited 93 S. Ct. at 727; and United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), bearing in mind that the Supreme Court lacks jurisdiction to "construe" a state statute so as to save it from the vice of vagueness.

[21] See also Doe v. Bolton, 93 S. Ct. 739 (1973).

[22] Apparently doctors are expected or at least can be required despite the decisions, to exercise their best "medical" or "clinical" judgment (and presumably can be prosecuted if they perform abortions conflicting with the judgment). 93 S. Ct. at 747. But cf. United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62, 97 (Stewart, J., dissenting in part). But if it is unconstitutional to limit the justifications for an abortion to considerations of maternal life and health, what kind of "medical judgment does the Court have in mind? See Stone, Abortion and the Supreme Court, Modern Medicine (forthcoming 1973): "[T]here are no clear medical indications for abortion in the vast majority of cases. Where there are no indications, there is no room for clinical judgment."

[24] The state can require that the abortion be performed by a doctor, but that is all. But see note 117 infra. Even after the first trimester, the limits on state regulation of the conditions under which an abortion can be performed are extremely stringent. see Doe v. Bolton, 92 S. Ct 739 (1973)

[25] With respect to the capital punishment litigation too, the Court rejected a narrow ground of invalidation one term only to come back with a coup de main the next. Compare McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183 (1971) with Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972). Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), has something of a "guidebook" quality about it. See Dershowitz & Ely, Harris v. New York: Some Anxious Observations on the Candor and Logic of the Emerging Nixon Majority, 80 Yale L.J. 1198, 1210 (1971). United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967), to take but one example, has always struck me as a case where the Court starting from the entirely valid realization that trials cannot be fair if lineups are not, went a bit far in limiting the appropriate remedies. And of course many opinions have emitted confusing signals respecting what is henceforth permissible. See, e.g., pp. 929–30 infra.

[26] The child may not fare so well either. Of course the Court requires of the mother neither sort of showing, though it may be hoping the doctors will do so. But cf. note 22 supra.

It is also probably the case, although this is the sort of issue where reliable statistics and comparisons are largely unobtainable, that a number of women have died from illegal abortions who would have lived had they been able to secure legal abortions. It is a strange argument for the unconstitutionality of a law that those who evade it suffer, but it is one that must nevertheless be weighed in the balance as a cost of antiabortion legislation. The Court does not mention it, however; and given the severe restrictions it places on state regulation of the conditions under which an abortion can be performed, it apparently did not appreciably inform its judgment.

[28] See pp. 926–37 infra. Even where the Constitution does single out one of the values for special protection, the Court has shown an increasing tendency to avoid balancing, or at least to talk as though it were. See Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969). See also United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258, 268 n.20 (1967); but see Note, Less Drastic Means and the First Amendment, 78 Yale L. J. 464, 467-68 (1969). See also United States v. [30] The claim that the participants are injuring their health seems at least as plausible respecting abortion. Cf. note 117 infra. To the extent that the use of soft drugs and homosexual activities interfere with the lives of those other than the participants, those interferences can be dealt with discretely.

[31] Cf. Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 551-53 (1961), (Harlan, J., dissenting), quoted in part in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 499 (1965) (Goldberg, J., concurring), distinguishing laws proscribing homosexual acts (even those performed in the home) as not involving the "right" at stake in those cases.

[33] Nor is the Court's conclusion that early abortion does not present serious physical risk to the woman involved shared by all doctors. Cf. note 117 infra.

[34] It defines viability so as not to exclude the possibility of artificial support, 93 S. Ct. at 730, and later indicates its awareness of the continuing development of artificial wombs. Id. at 731. It gives no sign of having considered the implications of that combination for the trimester program the Constitution is held to mandate, however.

[35] Albeit not so compelling that a state is permitted to honor it at the expense of the mother's health. See note 19 supra.

The relevance of this observation is not explained. It is, moreover, of questionable validity: This line is drawn beyond quickening, beyond the point where any religion has assumed that life begins, beyond the time when abortion is a simple procedure, and less. It is also beyond the point which would have satisfied many who, like myself, were long term supporters of the right to abortion. Stone, supra note 22.

[41] Logically, of course, a legitimate state interest in this area need not stand or fall on acceptance of the belief that life begins at conception or at some other point prior to live birth. In assessing the State's interest, recognition may be given to the less rigid claim that as long as the least potential life is involved, the State may assert interests beyond the protection of the pregnant woman alone. 93 S. Ct. at 725. See also id. at 730: We need not resolve the difficult question of when life begins. When those trained in the respective disciplines of medicine, philosophy, and theology are unable to arrive at any consensus, the judiciary, at this point [sic] in the development of man's knowledge, is not in a position to speculate as to the answer.

The Texas statute, like those of many states, had declared fetuses to be living beings.

[42] The opinion does contain a lengthy survey of "historical attitudes" toward abortion, culminating in a discussion of the positions of the American Medical Association, the American Public Health Association, and the American Bar Association. Id. at 715-24. (The discussion's high point is probably reached where the Court explains away the Hippocratic Oath's prohibition of abortion on the grounds that Hippocrates was a Pythagorean, and Pythagoreans were a minority. Id. at 715-16.) The Court does not seem entirely clear as to what this discussion has to do with the legal argument, id. at 709, 715, and the reader is left in much the same quandary. It surely does not seem to support the Court's position, unless a record of serious historical and contemporary dispute is somehow thought to generate a constitutional mandate.

[45] [T]he traditional rule of tort law had denied recovery for prenatal injuries even though the child was born alive. That rule has been changed in almost every jurisdiction. In most States recovery is said to be permitted only if the fetus was viable, or at least quick, when the injuries were sustained, though few courts have squarely so held. In a recent development, generally opposed by the commentators, some States permit the parents of a stillborn child to maintain an action for wrongful death because of prenatal injuries. Such an action, however, would appear to be one to vindicate the parents' interest and is thus consistent with the view that the fetus, at most, represents only the potentiality of life. Similarly, unborn children have been recognized as acquiring rights or interests by way of inheritance or other devolution of property, and have been represented by guardians ad litem. Perfection of the interests involved, again, has generally been contingent upon live birth. In short, the unborn have never been recognized in the law as persons in the whole sense. Id. at 731 (footnotes omitted).

[48] Indeed it is difficult to think of a single instance where the justification given for upholding a governmental limitation of a protected right has involved the constitutional rights of others. A "free press-fair trial" situation might provide the basis for such an order, but thus far the Court has refused to approve one. See Ely, Trial by Newspaper & Its Cures, Encounter, March 1967, at 80-92.

In the Court's defense it should be noted that it errs in the other direction as well, by suggesting that if a fetus were a person protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, it would necessarily follow that appellants would lose. 93 S. Ct. at 728. Yet in fact all that would thereby be established is that one right granted special protection by the Fourteenth Amendment was in conflict with what the Court felt was another; it would not tell us which must prevail.

[49] See United States. v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 376-77 (1968). And if you don't like that example, substitute post offices for draft cards.

[50] I would, however, omit the serious restrictions the Court puts on state health regulation of the conditions under which an abortion can be performed, and give serious thought—though the practical difference here is not likely to be great—to placing the critical line at quickening rather than viability. See note 40 supra.

[51] Some of us who fought for the right to abortion did so with a divided spirit. We have always felt that the decision to abort was a human tragedy to be accepted only because an unwanted pregnancy was even more tragic. Stone, supra note 22.

[52] Of course the opportunity to have an abortion should be considered part of the "liberty" protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. See p. 935 infra.

[56] See Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U.S. (6 Wall.) 35 (1867); C. Black, Structure and Relationship in Constitutional Law (1969). The Court seems to regard the opportunity to travel outside the United States as merely an aspect of the "liberty" that under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments cannot be denied without due process. See Zeme v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 14 (1965). Cf. p. 935 infra.

[57] Abortions had, of course, been performed, and intermittently proscribed, for centuries prior to the framing of the Constitution. That alone, however, need not be dispositive. See p. 929 infra & note 97 Infra.

[58] The Court does not seem entirely certain about which provision protects the right to privacy and its included right to an abortion. Appellant would discover this right in the concept of personal "liberty" embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause; or in personal, marital, familial, and sexual privacy said to be protected by the Bill of Rights or its penumbras . . . or among those rights reserved to the people by the Ninth Amendment . . . 93 S. Ct. at 715.

This right of privacy, whether it be founded in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon state action, as we feel it is, or, as the District Court determined, in the Ninth Amendment's reservation of rights to the people, is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. Id. at 727. This inability to pigeonhole confidently the right involved is not important in and of itself. It might, however, have alerted the Court to what is an important question: whether the Constitution speaks to the matter at all.

[60] See NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958), relied on the Griswold, 381 U.S. at 483. The Roe Court's reference to Justice Goldberg's concurrence in Griswold for the proposition that "the roots of" the right of privacy can be found in the Ninth Amendment 93 S. Ct. at 726, misconceives the use the earlier opinion made of that Amendment. See 381 U.S. at 492-93. A reference to "the penumbras of the Bill of Rights," 93 S. Ct. at 726, can have no content independent of a description of some general value or values inferable from the provisions involved (and therefore assignable to their penumbras). See San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. United States, 93 S. Ct. 611 (1973) (finding no privacy interest in records a taxpayer had turned over to her accountant) decided thirteen days earlier.

[63] [T]the proper scope of [a constitutional provision], and its relevance to contemporary problems, must ultimately be sought by attempting to discern the reasons for its inclusion in the Constitution, and the evils it was designed to eliminate. United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437, 442 (1965). See also Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 373 (1910); Reich, Mr. Justice Black and the Living Constitution, 76 Harv. L. [64] Cf. Fried, Privacy, 77 Yale L.J. 475 (1968). The Third Amendment, mentioned in Griswold though not in Roe, surely has this aspect to it as well, though it probably grew in even larger measure out of a general concern with the pervasiveness of military power.

[68] The Roe opinion does not rely on the obvious contraception-abortion comparison and indeed gives no sign that it finds Griswold stronger precedent than a number of other cases. See 93 S. Ct. at 726-27; note 79 infra. In fact it seems to go out of its way to characterize Griswold and Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), as cases concerned with the privacy of the bedroom. See 93 S. Ct. at 730; note 79 infra. It is true that in Eisenstadt the Court at one point characterized Griswold as protecting the "decision whether to bear and beget a child," 405 U.S. at 453, but it also, mysteriously in light of that characterization, pointedly refused to decide whether the earlier case extended beyond use, to the distribution of contraceptives. Id. at 452-53. Nor is there any possibility the refusal to extend Griswold in this way ill-considered; such an extension would have obviated the Eisenstadt Court's obviously strained performance respecting the Equal Protection Clause.

[69] Admittedly the Griswold opinion is vague and openended, but the language quoted in the text at note 72 infra seems plainly inconsistent with the view that it is a case not about likely invasions of the privacy of the bedroom but rather directly enshrining a right to contraception.

[71] Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), cited by the Court in Roe, might also be rationalized on such a theory, cf. id. at 565, though it reads more like a "pure" First Amendment case concerned with governmental attempts at thought control.

[73] See also Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 548–49, 553–54 (1961) (Harlan, J., dissenting). That the Court in Griswold saw fit to quote Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 630 (1886), is also significant. See 381 U.S. at 484–85 n.*. See also United States v. Grunewald, 233 F.2d 556, 581–82 (2d Cir. 1956) (Frank, J., dissenting).

The theory suggested in Poe v. Ullman, supra, at 551–52 (Harlan, J., dissenting), extending heightened protection to activities (though it turns out to be some activities, note 31 supra) customarily performed in the home, is also inappicable to Roe.

[74] Of course in individual cases the government might seek to enforce legislation restricting abortion, as indeed it might seek to enforce any law, in ways that violate the Fourth Amendment or otherwise intrude upon the general privacy interest the Bill of Rights suggests. The Court does not suggest, however, that the laws at issue in Roe are in any sense unusually calculated to generate such intrusions.

[78] The Court's rejection of the "non-paternalism" argument is of course underlined by the health regulations it is prepared to allow during the second trimester, before the interest in protecting the fetus is cognizable. See p. 921 supra.

[79] The Court does assert that only personal rights that can be deemed "fundamental" or "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty," Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319, 325 (1937), are included in this guarantee of personal privacy. They also make it clear that the right has some extension to activities relating to marriage, Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12 (1967), procreation, Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541–42 (1942), contraception, Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438, 453–54 (1972); id. at 460, 463–65 (White, J., concurring), family relationships, Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166 (1944), and child rearing and education, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 535 (1925), Meyer v. Nebraska, [262 U.S. 390, 399 (1923)].

93 S. Ct. at 726–27. The Palko test was stated and has heretofore been taken as a definition (of questionable comtemporary vitality) of due process generally, not of privacy. Loving was a case involving explicit racial discrimination and therefore decidable (and decided) by a rather straightforward application of the Equal Protection Clause. See Ely, supra note 28, at 1230. And while the Loving Court did, inexplicably, append a reference to due process, it did not mention privacy. Skinner invalidated the Oklahoma criminal sterilization act's distinction between larcenists and embezzlers. Although it too did not allude to privacy, it did suggest it was applying a higher equal protection standard than usual. Why it did so is unclear. "Faced with the possibility of a finding of cruel and unusual punishment and the virtual certainty of invalidation under the clause proscribing ex post facto laws, the state declined to argue the case on the theory that the . . . Act was a penal statute, and therefore tried to justify the distinction in 'regulatory terms,'" Ely, supra, at 1235 n.101. That being so, the state was unable to come up with even a plausible justification for the distinction. Eisenstadt was a case applying "traditional" equal protection standards, albeit in a less than satisfactory way. See Note, Legislative Purpose, Rationality, and Equal Protection, 82 Yale L.J. 123 (1972). The passage cited by the Court in Roe reiterated Griswold's conclusion that privacy interests are threatened by a ban on the use of contraceptives, but declined to decide whether its rationale should be extended to restrictions on distribution. See p. 930 supra. Prince upheld the application of a child labor law to Jehovah's Witness children distributing religious literature. It did, however, reiterate the conclusion of Pierce and Meyer that family relationships are entitled to special protection. Those two cases are products of "the Lochner era," see pp. 937–43 infra. The vitality of the theory on which they rested has been questioned, Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 105–06 (1968), and the Court has attempted to recast them as First Amendment cases. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 482 (1965); cf. Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 533–34 (1961) (Harlan, J., dissenting). Even reading the cases cited "for all that they are worth," it is difficult to isolate the "privacy" factor (or any other factor that seems constitutionally relevant) that unites them with each other and with Roe. So the Court seems to admit by indicating that privacy has "some extension" to the activities involved, and so it seems later to grant even more explicitly.

The pregnant woman cannot be isolated in her privacy. She carries an embryo and, later, a fetus. . . . The situation therefore is inherently different from marital intimacy, or bedroom possession of obscene material, or marriage, or procreation, or education, with which Eisenstadt, Griswold, Stanley, Loving, Skinner, Pierce, and Meyer were respectively concerned. 93 S. Ct. at 730.

[81] It might be noted that most of the factors enumerated also apply to the inconvenience of having an unwanted two-year-old, or a senile parent around. Would the Court find the constitutional right or privacy invaded in those situations too? I find it hard to believe it would; even if it did, of course, it would not find a constitutional right to "terminate" the annoyance—presumably because "real" persons are now involved. But cf. p. 926 supra & note 48 supra. But what about ways of removing the annoyance that do not involve "termination"? Can they really be matters of constitutional entitlement?

[85] This is not the place for a full treatment of the subject, but the general idea is this: Classifications by sex, like classifications by race, differ from the usual classification—to which the traditional "reasonable generalization" standard is properly applied—in that they rest on "we-they" generalizations as opposed to a "they-they" generalization. Take a familiar example of the usual approach, Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483 (1955). Of course few legislators are opticians. But few are optometrists either. Thus while a decision to distinguish opticians from optometrists will incorporate a stereotypical comparison of two classes of people, it is a comparison of two "they" stereotypes, viz. "They [opticians] are generally inferior to or not so well qualified as they [optometrists] are in the following respect(s), which we find sufficient to justify the classification: . . ." However, legislators traditionally have not only not been black (or female); they have been white (and male). A decision to distinguish blacks from whites (or women from men) will therefore have its roots in a comparison between a "we" stereotype and a "they" stereotype, viz. "They [blacks or women] are generally inferior to or not so well qualified as we [whites or men] are in the following respect(s), which we find sufficient to justify the classification: . . ."

The choice between classifying on the basis of a comparative generalization and attempting to come up with a more discriminating formula always involves balancing the increase in fairness which greater individualization will produce against the added costs it will entail. It is no startling psychological insight, however, that most of us are delighted to hear and prone to accept comparative characterizations of groups that suggest that the groups to which we belong are in some way superior to others. (I would be inclined to exclude most situations where the "we's" used to be "they's," cf. Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726 (1963), and would therefore agree that the unchangeability of the distinguishing characteristic is indeed relevant, though it is only part of the story.) The danger is therefore greater in we-they situations that we will overestimate the validity of the proposed stereotypical classification by seizing upon the positive myths about our own class and the negative myths about theirs—or indeed the realities respecting some or most members of the two classes—and too readily assuming that virtually the entire membership of the two classes fit the sterotypes and therefore that not many of "them" will be unfairly deprived, nor many of "us" unfairly benefitted, by the proposed classification. In short, I trust your generalizations about the differences between my gang and Wilfred's more than I do your generalizations about the differences between my gang and yours.

Of course most judges, like most legislators, are white males, and there is no particular reason to suppose they are any more immune to the conscious and unconscious temptations that inhere in we-they generalizations. Obviously the factors mentioned can distort the evaluation of a classification fully as much as they can distort its formation. But all this is only to suggest that the Court had chosen the right course in reviewing classifications it has decided are suspicious—a course not of restriking or secondguessing the legislative cost-benefit balance but rather of demanding a congruence between the classification and its goal as perfect as practicable. When in a given situation you can't be trusted to generalize and I can't be trusted to generalize, the answer is not to generalize—so long as a bearable alternative exists. And here, the Court has recognized, one does—the alternative of forcing the system to absorb the additional cost that case by case determinations of qualification will entail. Legislatures incur this cost voluntarily in a great many situations, and courts have on other occasions forced them to do so where constitutionally protected interests will be threatened by an imperfectly fitting classification. The unusual dangers of distortion that inhere in a we-they process of comparative generalization, the Court seems to have been telling us in the racial classification cases, also demand that we bear the increased cost of individual justice.

[87] If the mere fact that the classification in issue disadvantages a minority whose viewpoint was not appreciated by a majority of the legislature that enacted it were sufficient to render it suspect, all classifications would be suspect.

[88] Even if the case could be made that abortion is an issue that pits the interests of men against those of women, that alone would not bring it within a theory that renders suspect classifications based on generalizations about the characteristics of men and women. And even if there were some way to expand the theory (and I confess I cannot see what judicial remedy would be appropriate were the theory so expanded, but see note 85 supra, third paragraph) to cover all "interests of men versus interests of women" situations, it will take some proving to establish that this is one: [D]ecisions in society are made by those who have power and not by those who have rights. Husbands and boy friends may in the end wield the power and make the abortion decision. Many women may be forced to have abortions not because it is their right, but because they are forced by egocentric men to submit to this procedure to avoid an unwanted inconvenience to men. Stone, supra note 22.

[89] It might be suggested that legislation restricting abortion had been kept on the books by the efforts of an intense minority and did not represent the will of most legislative majorities. Though I am aware of no basis for inferring this is any truer here than it is with respect to other sorts of legislation, see also note 86 supra, it is the sort of claim that is hard to disprove. (The phenomenon described at pp. 946–47 infra, one of relief that the issue has been taken out of the political arena, is a very different matter.) In any event it is not the Court's job to repeal such legislation. In the first place there is nothing unusual, and I was not aware there was anything wrong, with an intense minority's compromising on issues about which it feels less strongly in order to garner support on those it cares most about. Moreover, precisely because the claims involved are difficult to evaluate, I would not want to entrust to the judiciary authority to guess about them—certainly not under the guise of enforcing the Constitution. Leaving aside the arguable case of a law that has been neither legislatively considered nor enforced for decades, see A Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch 143–56 (1962), the Court should rest its declaration of unconstitutionality, if any, on more than a guess about how widespread and intense the support for the law "really" is.

[90] The claimed connection is often empirical, causal or normative. About all that does not seem to become involved is formal logic. See p. 941 infra; Ely, supra note 28, at 1237–49.

[91] Even this statement of the demands of "substantive due process" is too strong for many Justices and commentators, who deny that any such doctrine should exist. See, e.g., pp. 937–38 infra.

[92] See Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972).

[93] See pp. 928–33 supra. Necessarily, a claim of this sort can never be established beyond doubt; one can only proceed by examining the claims of those values he thinks, or others have suggested, are traceable to the Constitution. It is always possible, however, that someone will develop a general theory of entitlements that encompasses a given case and plausibly demonstrate its constitutional connections. It is also possible that had the constitutional right to an abortion been developed as constitutional doctrines usually are—that is incrementally, rather than by the quantum jump of Roe—the connection of the first step with the Constitution, and that of each succeeding step with its predecessor, would have seemed more plausible. I cannot bring myself to believe, however, that any amount of gradualism could serve to make anything approaching the entire inference convincing.

[94] The thing about permitting disparity among state laws regulating abortion that I find most troubling is not mentioned by the Court, and that is that some people can afford the fare to a neighboring state and others cannot. Of course this situation prevails with respect to divorce and a host of other sorts of laws as well. I wish someone could develop a theory that would enable the Court to take account of this concern without implying a complete obliteration of the federal system that is so obviously at the heart of the Constitution's plan. I have not been able to do so. See note 87 supra.

[97] Of course one can disagree with the lengths to which the inferences have been taken; my point is that the prior decisions, including those that have drawn the most fire, at least started from a value singled out by, or fairly inferable from, the Constitution as entitled to special protection. Whatever one may think of the code of conduct laid down in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), the Constitution does talk about the right to counsel and the privilege against self-incrimination. Whatever one may think of the strictness of the scrutiny exercised in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), the Eighth Amendment surely does indicate in a general way that punishments are to be scrutinized for erratic imposition ("usual") and severity disproportionate to any good they can be expected to accomplish ("cruel").

Note that the claim in the text has to do with the capacity of the earlier decisions to be rationalized in terms of some value highlighted by the Constitution, not with the skill with which they were in fact rendered. It is now pretty generally recognized, for example, that the various "wealth discrimination" cases could better have been defended in terms of the constitutional attention paid explicitly or implicitly or implicitly to the "goods" whose distribution was in issue—the right to vote and the assurance of fair judicial procedures. See, e.g., Michelman, Foreword: On Protecting the Poor Through the Fourteenth Amendment, 83 Harv. L. Rev. 7 (1969). Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964), is a badly articulated opinion. Its only response to the argument made by Justice Stewart—that since an equal protection claim was involved, a rational defense of a disparity among the "weights" of votes should suffice—was simply to announce that the goals Justice Stewart had in mind were off limits. See Ely, supra note 28, at 1226-27. But even Justice Stewart could not take the equal protection mold too seriously, for he added he would not approve a plan that permitted "the systematic frustration of the will of a majority of the electorate of the State." Lucas v. Colorado Gen. Assembly, 377 U.S. 713, 753-54 (1954) (footnote omitted). Such a plan, however, could be quite "rational" in terms of the sort of goals Justice Stewart had in mind, goals that in other contexts would count as legitimate. Obviously Justice Stewart had in mind, goals that in other contexts would count as legitimate. Obviously Justice Stewart was moved to some extent by the notion that a system whereby a minority could perpetuate its control of the government was out of accord with the system of government envisioned by the framers. See also Kramer v. Union Free School District No. 15, 395 U.S. 621, 628 (1969) (Warren, C.J., for the Court). This was what moved the Court too, though much further. And though the Court did not give the reason, there is one: a fear that by attempting to apply Justice Stewart's "in between" standard it would become embroiled in unseemly "political" inquiries into the power alignments prevalent in the various states. See Deutsch, Neutrality, Legitimacy, and the Supreme Court: Some Intersections Between Law and Political Science, 20 Stan. L. Rev. 169, 246-47 (1968); cf. note 89 supra; but cf. Mahan v. Howell, 41 U.S.L.W. 4277 (U.S. Feb. 20, 1973). Though the point is surely debatable, the impulse is understandable, and the fight in Reynolds, like that in Miranda, turns out to be not so much over the underlying values as over the need for a "clean" prophylactic rule that will keep the courts out of messy factual disputes.

In his concurrence in Roe, Justice Stewart lists ten cases to prove that "the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment covers more than those freedoms explicitly named in the Bill of Rights." 93 S. Ct. at 734. His point is obviously that the freedoms involved were given protection above and beyond the ordinary demand for a "rational" defense and therefore Roe is just more of the same. It is not. Schware v. Bd. of Bar Examiners, 353 U.S. 232 (1957); Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500 (1964); and Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1958), are all obviously rationalizable as First Amendment cases and indeed have since been so rationalized. Concerning Schware, see Griswold v. The general philosophy of constitutional adjudication, however, is the same. See text at notes 106-07 supra. Having established to his present satisfaction that the Due Process Clause extends unusual substantive protection to interests the Constitution nowhere marks as special, but see note 97 supra, he provides no further assistance respecting the difficult questions before the Court, but rather defers to the Court's "thorough demonstration" that the interests in protecting the mother and preserving the fetus cannot support the legislation involved. But see pp. 922-26 supra.

I suppose the Court's defense of its unusual reaction to the scientific data would be that the case is unusual, in that it involves a "fundamental" interest. It should be noted, however, that even a sure sense that abortion during the first trimester is asfer than childbirth would serve only to blunt a state's claim that it is, for reasons relating to maternal health, entitled to proscribe abortion; it would not support the inference the Court draws, that regulations designed to make the abortion procedure safer during the first trimester are impermissible. See 93 S. Ct. at 732.

[119] And even those cases that interlaced such claims with indications of a balancing test, see note 118 supra, sowed the seeds of their own reversal. See text at notes 120-21 infra. A claim that X weighs mor than Y will have little persuasive or precedential value if it is bracketed with an indefensible assertion than Y is nothing.

[121] Wrong, that is, if one assigns to the words anything resembling their ordinary meanings. see, e.g., Daniel v. Family Insurance Co., 336 U.S. 220, 224 (1949). One can of course argue that states should also have governments of few and defined powers, that they should not be vested with broad authority to go after whatever they regard as evils. But the Federal Constitution imposes no such restraint, and according to the test accepted even at the time of Lochner such authority, at least as a matter of federal constitutional law, does exist.

[122] It is possible, of course, that I am here timebound, and that the wrongness of Lochner et al. is obvious only because a half century of commentary has made it so. While I cannot rebut this, I am inclined to doubt it. In those decisions the Court stated the applicable tests in language much the same as would be used today—language the dissents cogently demonstrated could not be reconciled with the results. That views with which one disagrees can be reasonable nonetheless was a concept hardly new to lawyers even in 1900.

unavoidable obligation to give "principled" content to the facially inscrutable Equal Protection Clause. See pp. 948-49 infra. Virtually everyone agrees that classifications by race were intended to be and should be tested by a higher than usual standard, and that at least some others—though the nature and length of the list are seriously disputed—are sufficiently "racelike" to merit comparable treatment. See, e.g., Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365 (1971). The problem thus becomes one of identifying those features of racial classifications that validly compel the deviation from the usual standard, and in turn those classifications that share those features.

Abortion*, The New Republic, Feb. 10, 1973, at 9: [I]f the Court's guess concerning the probable and desirable direction of progress is wrong, it will nevertheless have been imposed on all 50 states, and imposed permanently, unless the Court itself should in the future change its mind. Normal legislation, enacted by legislatures rather than judges, is happily not so rigid, and not so presumptuous in its claims to universality and permanence.

[141] In judicial review, the line between the "juridical" and the "legislative" mode does not run between "strict constructionists" and competing theorists of constitutional interpretation. Rather, it divides constructionists and non-constructionists, those who do and those who do not see judicial review as a task of construing the living meaning of past political decisions—a division in which the alternating libertarianism and conservatism of the late Justices Black and Harlan were on the same side. I might have made (even more) explicit that the action around which the search for the "principled" approach is to be centered should be one—and, to paraphrase myself, I have trouble seeing the example I chose as controversial in this regard—whose impermissibility is established by values traceable to the Constitution.

But discerning constitutional principles afresh is one thing; developing them, no matter how neutral and durable, is quite another. An institution charged with looking after a set of values the rest of us have entrusted to it is significantly different from one with authority to amend the set.

THE "RIGHT" TO AN ABORTION, THE SCOPE OF 14TH AMENDMENT "PERSONHOOD," AND THE SUPREME COURT'S BIRTH REQUIREMENT

(By John D. Gorby*)

I. INTRODUCTION

The one theme which permeates the United States Supreme Court's 1977 abortion pronouncements is that the United States Constitution does not and the federal judiciary should not preclude legislative regulation of some aspects of the abortion problem. Indeed, the decisions almost suggest that the essential nature of American society is democratic. The Supreme Court's 1979 decision holding unconstitutional a Pennsylvania statute requiring physicians performing abortion to attempt to preserve the life of the aborted fetus, if the fetus "may be viable," does not suggest the contrary, since it appears to be based on the due process concept of vagueness as applied in criminal cases and not upon any substantive expansion of the right to abort.[2] In Maher v. Roe,[3] the Court noted: "We should not forget that 'legislatures are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts.' "[4] One paragraph later, the Court held that "the Constitution does not require a judicially imposed resolution of these difficult issues."[5] Similar language was used in Poelker v. Doe.[6]

"Although the Mayor's personal position [opposition] on abortion is irrelevant to our decision, we note that he is an elected official responsible to the people of St. Louis. His policy of denying city funds for abortions such as that desired by Doe is subject to public debate and approval or disapproval at the polls. We merely hold, for reasons stated in Maher, that the Constitution does not forbid a State or city, pursuant to democratic processes, from expressing a preference for normal childbirth as St. Louis has done."[7]

In spite of Mr. Justice Powell's suggestion in Maher that "[o]ur conclusion signals no retreat from Roe of the cases applying it,"[8] one wonders if those words of reassurance are to be taken with the same degree of seriousness as the assurance of Mr. Justice Blackmun in Roe v. Wade[9] that the Supreme Court was not reviving substantive due process.[10] Indeed, the dominant democratic theme of Maher v. Roe,[11] Poelker v. Doe[12] and Beal v. Doe,[13] the bitterness expressed by the dissenters[14] (all previous members of the Roe Majority),[15] the compulsion of the author of Roe to dissent,[16] and the continuing efforts to change Roe with a constitutional amendment cause one to wonder if the majority in Colautti would not have preferred to have followed the spirit of the dissenting opinions in Roe and left the entire abortion problem in the hands of the state legislatures. This approach, at least on the surface, would be consistent with recent suggestions that the judiciary return to the fourteenth amendment its intended "procedural" as opposed to "substantive" significance, defer to the "spirit of our democracy" in matters not controlled by the fourteenth amendment as originally intended, and not "govern" under the guise of interpreting the Constitution.[17]

A legislative solution to the abortion problem is necessarily based upon the premise that the Constitution is neutral about abortion and does not impose a solution, one way or another.

In this article, the existence of such a premise is denied. More specifically, this author concludes (1) that the Constitution is not neutral about abortion and does indeed impose a solution on the abortion question; (2) that, as Justice Blackmun conceded in Roe, if the fetus is a person under the fourteenth amendment, "the [plaintiff's] case, of course, collapses, for the fetus' right to life would then be guaranteed specifically by the [fourteenth] [a]mendment;"[18] and (3) that the concept of "person" in the fifth and fourteenth amendments includes unborn human life.[19] It thus follows that the solution to the abortion problem set forth in Roe[20] as well as that suggested by Justices White and Rehnquist in dissent[21] are constitutionally unsound, both solutions permitting the violation of the fetus' constitutionally protected right to life without due process of law. More positively, there is substantial historical support for the notion that the due process clause was designed to guarantee access of all persons to the courts for the protection of fundamental rights,[22] that those fundamental rights refer to "life, liberty and property,"[23] and that the unborn human being, as an individual living human being, is a person under the Constitution and is entitled to access to the courts to protect his fundamental right to life.

Since Roe v. Wade is the only case in which the Supreme Court has considered the scope of constitutional "personhood" in the context of pre-birth stages of human development and is the only Supreme Court pronouncement on the subject, [24] a criticism of Roe will serve as a departure point for this discussion as to whether or not the fetus falls within the scope of the constitutional concept.[25]

II. THE SCOPE OF CONSTITUTIONAL PERSONHOOD: THE PRIMARY ISSUE IN THE ABORTION CONTROVERSY

That the Supreme Court accepted the scope of constitutional personhood as the primary issue in Roe is reflected in its statement that "[t]he appellee [Texas] and certain amici argue that the fetus is a 'person' within the language and meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . If this suggestion of personhood is established, the appellant's case, of course, collapses, for the fetus' right to life would then be guaranteed specifically by the [Fourteenth] Amendment." [26] No one has openly quarreled with the Roe Court on this point, and with good reason. The right to life represents a fundamental value in the constitutional order. Not only do both the fifth and fourteenth amendments explicitly mention "life" in their respective due process clauses, [27] but common sense dictates that the right to life is a condition precedent to the enjoyment and exercise of all other fundamental rights, including Mr. Justice Douglas' "absolute" first amendment rights; [28] it is the necessary foundation upon which all other human rights are built.[29] After all, only the living can enjoy the freedom of speech, the right peaceably to assemble, the right of assistance of counsel, the right of privacy, or even the right to decide to have an abortion. Mr. Justice Brennan expressed the idea simply in Furman v. Georgia: [30] "An executed person has indeed 'lost the right to have rights.'" [31] And as a general rule, only those who feel that their "right to life" is secured will dare exercise other fundamental rights.

Historically, an important purpose of American civil government has been to protect fundamental rights. Thus, history also supports the Roe majority reasoning that if the fetus is a person, and thus entitled to the right of life, the Court has an obligation to protect that right. John Locke, whose influence on the thinking of the founders of this nation is well known, wrote of the natural rights to life and property and that "civil government is the proper remedy for the inconveniences of the state of nature, which must certainly be great where men may be judges in their own case." [32] This principle, applied to the abortion problem, suggests that, if the unborn does enjoy a natural right to life,[33] the protection of that right should not be completely entrusted to the pregnant woman since her self-conceived interests may conflict with those of the unborn and since she could not be expected to be a fair "judge in [her] own case." [34] The solution to this problem, according to Locke, would be civil government as is the case for all conflicts between the rights of one and the interests of another. These basic ideas found their way into the Declaration of Independence in the clause to which the people of this nation so frequently rededicated themselves during the recent bicentennial year:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all Men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness—That to secure these Rights, Governments are instituted among Men, . . . that whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these Ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its Foundation on such Principles. . . ." [34a]

Just fifteen years later, on December 15, 1791, at a time when natural rights theories were still dominant in American legal thought, "life" was explicitly included in the fifth amendment's due process clause.[35]

Although natural law fell out of vogue during the nineteenth century,[36] the importance of the right to life in modern political and social theory has remained nearly unscathed as evidenced by the Third Article of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which states: "Everyone has the right to life," [37] the Second Article of the European Human Rights Convention [38] and the arguments to abolish capital punishment expressed by Mr. Justice Brennan in Furman v. Georgia.[39] "The country has debated whether a society for which the dignity of the individual is the supreme value can, without a fundamental inconsistency, follow the practice of deliberately putting some of its members to death." [40] He also wrote that "[d]eath is a unique punishment in the United States. In a society that so strongly affirms the sanctity of life, not surprisingly the common view is that death is the ultimate sanction." [41]

Since the Court in Roe recognized the right to life issue as crucial and was fully aware of the rank of this right in the hierarchy of fundamental legal values, one would certainly expect the Court to have carefully and thoroughly studied and analyzed the scope of constitutional personhood as well as the nature of the unborn [42] to determine on the most rational basis possible whether the unborn falls within that scope. As the next section shows, the Court did no such thing.

III. THE PRIMARY ISSUE IN THE HANDS OF THE SUPREME COURT

A. Procedural background of Roe v. Wade: The unborn's "day in court"

In 1970 and in early 1971, a number of abortion cases had been appealed to the United States Supreme Court from Wisconsin,[43] Texas,[44] Georgia,[45] Louisiana,[46] Illinois [47] and North Carolina.[48]

The Illinois case was unique in that Dr. Bart Heffernan of Chicago had been appointed guardian ad litem to represent the interests of the unborn. As a result, only in the Illinois case, where standing had been recognized, was the unborn permitted to directly participate through his representative in a series of lawsuits which were to have a profound impact on his legal and constitutional rights.[49] The Supreme Court, however, set the Texas (Roe v. Wade) and Georgia (Doe v. Bolton) cases, but not the Illinois case, which was also pending before the Court, for oral arguments on December 13, 1971. Since the parties to the Roe and Doe cases were, on the one side, physicians and women challenging the constitutionality of the respective state anti-abortion statutes and, on the other side, the attorneys general defending their states' statutes, the fetus was not directly represented in the December 13, 1971, hearings. Because only seven justices heard the oral arguments, Justices Black and Harlan having left the Court one month earlier, no decisions were handed down and the cases were set for rehearing in October, 1972. In the meantime, the attorneys for the fetus, whose guardian was an actual party only in the Illinois case and had filed an amicus brief [50] one year earlier in both the Texas and Georgia cases, filed in the Supreme Court a motion for oral argument, which was denied in the summer of 1972. Shortly thereafter, they moved to consolidate for oral arguments at the rehearing the Illinois case (Doe v. Scott) [51] with the Texas (Roe) and Georgia (Doe) cases. This motion was also denied.[52] As a result, the fetus, not having been represented in the crucial hearings before the justices, never enjoyed his "day in court." [53]

The Supreme Court had every opportunity to hear arguments presented by the representative of the fetus that it was a "constitutional person." However, the Court chose not to take advantage of this occasion.

Before the Supreme Court on October 11, 1972, Texas argued that a fetus is a person, but quickly backed away from the logic of this position, arguing instead that the abortion problem can "be best decided by a legislature." [54] A legislative solution is in the best interests of the state since it maximizes state authority. The legislature, however, has never been permitted in Supreme Court jurisprudence to determine who is and who is not entitled to enjoy fundamental constitutional rights. Thus, in the end, Texas argued to enhance its authority and interests, not fetal rights.

One should not lightly conclude from the Supreme Court's holding in Roe that the concept of "person" has no prenatal significance, that the unborn was not, after all, entitled to a "day in court." Such a conclusion assumes the outcome. Furthermore, it would be sound only if one is willing to assume that the adversary process is not essential to sound judicial decision-making—an assumption hardly compatible with the common law tradition. To a great degree, judicial decisions are made legitimately only if there is an opportunity for vigorous advocacy, an opportunity not allowed the fetus in the cases thus far in which his right to personhood or, expressed differently, its right to even have rights, has been adjudicated.

B. The Supreme Court's opinion on the merits: The unborn, birth and constitutional personhood

(1) The Initial Constitutional Issue Is the Scope of Constitutional Personhood, Not "When Life Begins"

"We need not resolve the difficult question of when life begins. When those trained in the respective disciplines of medicine, philosophy, and theology are unable to arrive at any consensus, the judiciary, at this point in the development of man's knowledge, is not in a position to speculate as to the answer." [55]

Although the Supreme Court in Roe expressed concern about its ability to "resolve the difficult question of when life begins." [56] the initial constitutional dilemma the Court faced was not the factual question of when life begins but rather the legal question of the scope and meaning of the concept of "person" in the fourteenth amendment, i.e., whether the concept means living humans, individual humans, born humans, rational humans, wanted humans, humans capable of "meaningful," [57] any combination thereof or something else. In other words, what does the term "person" as used in the fourteenth amendment mean? What values was it designed to protect? If, for example, it means all individual, living human beings, which is this writer's position,[58] the factual issue whether the fetus is an individual, living human being is presented for decision. If "life" in the biological sense is irrelevant to membership in the class of constitutional persons or if birth is an essential criterion to membership in this constitutional class, the Court in Roe was correct, for then it need not "speculate as to the answer [of when life begins]." [59] On the other hand, if the real problem facing the Court was a "proof problem," i.e., how to prove that a fetus has "life," simple judicial restraint should require the Court not to exclude the fetus from constitutional protection as a matter of law by creating a birth requirement as it did in Roe but rather to leave the ultimate question of constitutional personhood in the fetus unanswered, remand the case and ask for more "proof" on the factual question.[60]

(2) How the Supreme Court Approached the Interpretation of "Person" as Used in the Fourteenth Amendment

As stated by the Supreme Court and conceded by all parties, no prior case had been found in which the United States Supreme Court had addressed itself to the question of whether the term "person" as used in the fourteenth amendment has prenatal application.[61] Thus, for all practical purposes, the question was being presented for the first time. In absence of precedent, the only legal materials with which the Court had to work were the constitutional provisions themselves.

In Roe the Court, in interpreting the scope of "person" in the fourteenth amendment, applied in a very general sense only two of the several possible methods of construction.[62] The Court first considered the term "person" as used in other contexts in the Constitution and then considered the history of abortion legislation throughout the nineteenth century.

(a) The Supreme Court's consideration of the use of the term "person" in other contexts in the Constitution

In approximately 500 words Mr. Justice Blackmun discussed the use of the term "person" in other clauses in the Constitution and concluded that the term "has application only postnatally." [63] With this short essay he attempted to resolve the most important issue raised in the case. A brief look at these other clauses reveals that they do not provide an answer to the question of the scope of constitutional personhood. In the clauses mentioned by the Court, the concept of "person" was broad and undefined and the function of the specific constitutional clause was to limit the broader class of persons for a particular purpose. For example, for a person to be qualified to be a representative, a senator or the President, he must be twenty-five, thirty and thirty-five years of age, respectively. Quite obviously there are some who are persons but do not meet these special qualifications for a particular office. The fact that a 24-year-old is not qualified for these offices suggests only that there are "persons" who are not qualified for the House, Senate of the Presidency. The clause suggests that 24-year-olds are persons; it does not suggest when the 24-year-old became a "person," or that he became a person at birth or at any other particular state of his development. An identical criticism can be made of Mr. Justice Blackmun's apportionment clause [64] and extradition clause [65] arguments.[66] Whatever significance the use of "person" in other contexts in the Constitution has for the resolution of this problem, it seems to argue against the Court's conclusion, since all clauses mentioned restrict for particular purposes a broad class of persons. These clauses do not define "person." In any case, this approach offers nothing to support the Court's conclusion that "person" has only postnatal meaning.[67]

(b) The Supreme Court's use of history

(i) The Supreme Court's argument concerning criminality of abortions during the nineteenth century

Mr. Justice Blackmun observed in Roe that "throughout the major portion of the nineteenth century prevailing legal abortion practices were freer than they are today" [68] and was thus "persuade[d] . . . that the word 'person,' as used in the Fourteenth Amendment, does not include the unborn." [69]

There is reason to believe that Mr. Justice Blackmun's premise concerning nineteenth century abortion practices is not valid. Briefly, the following quotes should provide some insight into the accuracy of the Supreme Court's statements about the legal status of abortion during the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Sir Edward Coke wrote in 1628:

"If a woman be quick with childe, and by a potion or otherwise killeth it in her wombe; or if a man beat her, whereby the childe dieth in her body, and she is delivered of a dead childe, this is a great misprision and no murder; but if the childe be born alive, and dieth of the potion, battery or other cause, this is murder." [70]

The Supreme Court was fully aware of this passage [71] as well as a similar one by Blackstone,[72] but concluded that "[a] recent review of the common-law precedents argues, however, that those precedents contradict Coke and that even post-quickening abortion was never established as a common law crime." [73] The Supreme Court supported this conclusion by citing with apparent approval a 1971 law review article by abortion proponent Cyril Means who, according to Justice Blackmun, suggested that Coke "may have intentionally mistated the law" possibly because he had "participated as an advocate in an abortion case in 1601" [74] and because of his desire to assert common law jurisdiction over an offense traditionally an ecclesiastical crime.[75]

Although it is possible that Coke was still zealously advocating his client's case twenty-seven years later when he published his Institutes in 1628, or was attempting to play politics, this cynical explanation hardly pinpoints why Sir William Blackstone, over a century later, repeated in substance the views of Sir Edward Coke in his Commentaries of the Laws of England.[76] It also does not explain the following comment by Professor Perkins, a foremost authority on the common law of crimes and uninvolved—as far as this winter is aware—in abortion polemics:

"[I]t was a common law misdemeanor to administer any drug or medicine or to perform an operation on a woman pregnant with a quick child for the purpose of causing a miscarriage, and thereby causing the child to be born dead unless such operation was necessary to save the life of the woman." [77]

This explanation also does not indicate why a Pennsylvania court in 1850 wrote: "The moment the womb is instinct with embryo life, and gestation has begun, the crime may be perpetrated. . . . There was therefore a crime at common law sufficiently set forth and charged in the indictment." [78] It likewise fails to explain why at least four other states reached identical conclusions with respect to a quickened fetus.[79] It also is not supported by the fact that, at the time when the fourteenth amendment was ratified in 1868, nearly every state had criminal legislation proscribing abortion.[80] Exactly what Mr. Justice Blackmun meant with his statement that "abortion practices were freer (in the nineteenth century) than today" is unclear. If he meant that abortion was neither criminal nor subject to penal sanction—either by statute or at common law—he was wrong.

(ii) The Supreme Court's argument concerning the purpose of nineteenth century abortion legislation

Justice Blackmun implied that the purpose of the anti-abortion legislation of the nineteenth century was in protecting "the woman's health rather than in preserving the embryo and fetus." [81] The Court cited a New Jersey statute, construed by an 1858 New Jersey Supreme Court case, to support this idea.[82] The history of anti-abortion legislation In New Jersey indicates that the United States Supreme Court misunderstood the statute.[83] Beyond that, however, the evidence to the contrary is quite overwhelming; this evidence clearly shows that there was considerable concern during the nineteenth century in protecting the fetus. The Supreme Court neglected to mention eleven decisions expressly stating that the protection of the life of the unborn was at least one of the purposes for the nineteenth century abortion statutes [84] and that nine others implied the same notion.[85]

The Court also failed to mention Blackstone's famous statement that "Life is . . . a right inherent by nature in every individual; and it begins in contemplation of law as soon as an infant is able to stir in the mother's womb." [86] Blackstone's first American editions appeared in 1771 and have helped explain the attitude of nineteenth century America towards unborn life. According to Harvard Law Professor Charles Haar:

"Blackstone supplied a real need in this country. Without a trained bar, lacking a tradition of learning and of legal education, America found his exposition overwhelming in force. It is powerful and direct. Its emphasis on natural law fitted in with the peculiar environment of law in America. Because of the Commentaries English common law became also the common law of the United States. To the link of the common language was added that of the common legal principles. The Commentaries were a conduit of the ideas of Locke and Montesquieu to the framers of the Federal and state constitutions. They attained the position of an oracle of law on which lawyers for generations cut their teeth; mastery of Blackstone was deemed an adequate preparation for the practice of law." [87]

A brief look at the law books used by nineteenth century law students testifies to the influence of Blackstone on nineteenth century thought. It was common for a law professor to make at least one of his contributions to legal education, and to the development of the law, by editing and commenting upon Blackstone.[88] Furthermore, Blackstone and Kent, who echoed Blackstone's words,[89] were cited as authority by those who sponsored the Civil Rights Act of 1866 as well as the fourteenth amendment.[90] The Civil Rights Act of 1866 is of considerable importance to this study since, as Professor

Berger points out in his Government by Judiciary, the "key to [the] meaning [of the privileges or immunities clause of the fourteenth amendment] is furnished by the immediately preceding Civil Rights Act of 1866, which, all are agreed, it was the purpose of the [fourteenth] [a]mendment to embody and protect." [91]

The development of nineteenth century medical ethics seems to parallel the legal principles of Blackstone. Very influential during the early nineteenth century was Thomas Percival's Medical Ethics in which the following was written: "To extinguish the first spark of life is a crime of the same nature, both against our maker and society, as to destroy an infant, a child, or a man." [92] These views explain in part the condemnation of abortion as the destruction of "human life" by the American Medical Association at its 1859 annual meeting.[93]

Further support for the idea that nineteenth century America was concerned with preserving the life of the fetus is ironically found in Botsford v. Union Pacific Railroad,[94] the very case which the Supreme Court cited in Roe as its landmark right to privacy case. Although the Botsford Court acknowledged a common law right to privacy which precluded a court without statutory authority from ordering a medical examination of a female plaintiff in a personal injury case,[95] it pointed out that one of two exceptions to this common law right of privacy was the writ de ventre inspiciendo. With this writ, the state was empowered to examine whether a woman convicted of a capital crime and sentenced to be executed was quick with child, thus overcoming her right to privacy. If she was, execution would be stayed until after the birth of the child. Here, the common law not only acknowledged a right to life in the fetus but also recognized precedence of this right over the common law right of privacy.

In light of the above it seems hard to suggest—as did the majority in Roe—that the concerns of the nineteenth century were exclusively about the pregnant woman and not the unborn, and difficult to argue—as did the majority in Roe—that the purpose of nineteenth century abortion legislation was in protecting "the woman's health rather than in preserving the embryo and fetus." Indeed, the preservation of the fetus appears to have been a major purpose. Moreover, even those courts which have indicated that preservation of maternal health was a purpose for enacting the anti-abortion statute did so against a background in which abortion of at least a quickened fetus was considered a common law crime.[96]

If Justice Blackmun meant that an unquickened fetus may not have enjoyed protection under the common law, he should have said that. The correlation, however, would be that the quickened fetus did enjoy criminal law protection, a fact which argues against the Court's conclusion that constitutional personhood has no prenatal application.[97]

In oral argument before the Roe court [98] as well as in the Roe majority opinion,[99] the Supreme Court seemed impressed by the historical fact that no case had been found in which the pregnant woman was prosecuted for allowing an abortion to be performed on herself and by the fact that the punishment for conviction under the abortion statutes was much milder than the punishment for homicide. The Court found this to suggest that the fetus was not considered a person, as was the victim in a homicide. Such a conclusion is simply not warranted since there are other valid explanations. For example, if a 12-year-old intentionally kills a born individual in Illinois, no crime has been committed since the child is not legally responsible. No one could suggest that the victim of the act was not a person because the killer was not or could not be prosecuted. If a 15-year-old intentionally kills another, but is proceeded against under the Juvenile Court Act, one could hardly argue that the victim is not a person. The explanation for this legal phenomenon is that there are special circumstances surrounding the commitment of an act, circumstances which the lawmaker may properly and reasonably consider in formulating means to protect state interests and values—in the examples given, the age and assumed immaturity of the actor; in the abortion situation, the assumed stresses on the woman burdened by an unwanted pregnancy. These factors may justify and explain different treatment of the woman or even the physician in the abortion context, just as they justify or explain different treatment of the child of tender years or even of one who kills another under severe provocation.

Although in modern jurisprudence constitutional history alone has not been allowed to dispose of every question of constitutional interpretation, this brief historical background casts doubt on the soundness of two of the Supreme Court's critical conclusions in Roe v. Wade: (1) that abortion was not considered a crime by most of those who supported the fourteenth amendment in 1868;[100] and (2) that the purpose of the anti-abortion laws was solely to protect the woman's health and not the life of the fetus. In addition, it casts doubt on the Court's holding that the concept of "person" does not embrace the unborn. The effect of this doubt surely is to augment the obligations of the Supreme Court to account for a requirement of birth as a condition precedent for membership in the class of constitutional persons.

(3) The Supreme Court Concluded that Constitutional Personhood Begins at Birth

Based upon the Court's conclusions concerning the postnatal use of "person" in the fourteenth amendment and upon its understanding of the history of the criminality of abortions, the Court implied, although did not explicitly state,[101] that birth is the point at which constitutional personhood begins. This conclusion becomes apparent from several other statements made in the opinion. Only one of these statements, however, will be discussed. According to the Roe opinion, the legal value of the unborn is, prior to viability, insignificant—if it exists at all—when it conflicts with a woman's right to privacy, which the Supreme Court in Roe found "includes the abortion decision."[102] Nevertheless, after viability, the state has an "important and legitimate interest in potential life."[103] This pronouncement means that any legal protection for the life of the unborn after viability depends upon whether the state "chooses" to assert its interest in protecting fetal life.[104] In other words, the existence of legal protection for the fetus at this stage of human development depends upon the mercy or interests of the state, not upon any notion of an inherent, inalienable right to life or upon a corresponding duty incumbent upon the state to protect such rights.[105] Thus, unless the Court had assumed that constitutional personhood begins at birth, this decision marks a radical departure from the liberal political philosophy of which the Constitution is a manifestation.[106] Surely the Court did not intend to suggest that the right to life of a person depends upon whether the state finds it worthwhile or expedient to allow that person to live. Assuming no far-reaching disavowal of the fundamental liberal tradition, one must conclude that the Court decided for all practical purposes that birth is a constitutional requirement for membership in the class of constitutional "persons."

(4) Two Approaches the Supreme Court Did Not Use in Interpreting "Person:" The Plain Meaning of the Term and the Function of the Term

A primary and certainly a very common method of construing a document is to give the words their natural and ordinary meaning.[107] A study of two of the most complete and authoritative dictionaries in the English language, The Oxford English Dictionary of 1970 and Webster's Third New International Dictionary, as well as the 1828 and 1865 editions of Daniel Webster's An American Dictionary of the English Language, are illuminating. All relevant definitions define "person" in terms of humanness, individual humanness, and the state of being a human being.[108] "Human" is defined in these dictionaries in terms of "man."[109] And "man" is defined in terms of "humanness" or in terms of individual membership in the human race.[110] Thus, the circle of definitions is complete. Neither the word "birth" nor anything relating to birth is mentioned, either directly or indirectly, in any of the numerous and varying definitions of "person," "human" or "human being," or "man." It is therefore understandable why the Court did not pursue the "ordinary usage" or "plain meaning" path to interpretation; nothing in these definitions state, mention, suggest or even imply that birth is part of, related to, or a condition precedent to personhood. In short, it offers no support for its birth requirement for personhood.

Concerning the function of the fourteenth amendment and the role of the word "person" in the amendment it can be said that the immediate political concern of the second half of the 1860s was to secure rights and freedoms and to ensure equal protection for former slaves.[111] More generally, however, the amendment was designed to secure to all persons the fundamental rights of man, which generally include life, liberty or property by providing the adjective right of access to the courts.[112] There is nothing in the function of the fourteenth amendment to suggest that its scope or purpose is to protect only the born. And to the extent that an unborn can be the owner of property[113] and is living,[114] a fourteenth amendment purpose exists in the case of the unborn just as surely as it does with a born person who owns property and possesses "life."[115]

IV. THE BIRTH REQUIREMENT, AVOIDANCE OF THE "LIFE" ISSUE, JUDICIAL SCIENCE AND ARBITRARINESS

There is nothing in the Consitution itself or in its history which even suggests—to say nothing about requires—that constitutional personhood begins at birth. If anything, the contrary is true. Most probably the term indicates and was understood to mean an individual human being [116]—a classification for which birth does not appear to be a criterion. Are there perhaps other rational factors not directly related to the Constitution or its history which would justify the Court's reaching beyond the strict realm of positive jurisprudence and creating a birth requirement as an essential requisite for membership in the class of constitutional persons?

A. By Selecting Birth as an Essential Requisite of Constitutional Personhood the Supreme Court Evaded the "Life" Issue

Quoted earlier was a statement by Mr. Justice Blackmun to the effect that the judiciary should not speculate as to "when life begins" when philosophers, theologians and physicians themselves cannot, he claims, arrive at a consensus.[117] By grafting a birth requirement upon the concept of constitutional personhood, the Supreme Court hoped to avoid the necessity of making a judicial determination of "when life begins."[118] Is a Court justified in selecting an essentially arbitrary factor as a requisite to constitutional personhood to avoid the dilemma of deciding "when life begins," a quandry which, according to Mr. Justice Blackmun, philosophers, theologians and even physicians cannot resolve

B. The Principles of Legal Science Do Not Require the Supreme Court to Avoid the "Life" Issue

(1) Justice Holmes' Dissent in Lochner and the "Life" Issue

Perhaps the Court's reluctance to "speculate" about "when life begins" results from its expressed desire to follow "Mr. Justice Holmes' admonition in his now-vindicated dissent in Lochner v. New York"[119] that the individual opinions of the justices "ought not to conclude [the Court's] judgment upon the question whether statutes embodying them conflict with the Constitution."[120] What Justice Holmes seems to have said is that the justices should not sit as superlegislators and declare statutes unconstitutional which they do not like. He was not suggesting that judges should hesitate to discharge their responsibility as judges, even if this involves making difficult, and often unpopular, legal and factual determinations. After all, constitutional provisions have a legal meaning and scope regardless of what the various schools of philosophy and theology may think or even what the majority of people in a democracy thinks. Indeed, a primary purpose of a catalogue of fundamental human rights, such as the Bill of Rights, in a constitutional document is to protect those fundamental rights from the whims, predispositions or excesses of those who administer the state—and from a possible tyranny of the majority. And it is certainly the judges' responsibility to conscientiously construe those constitutional provisions. Were this not so, the predispositions or whims of administrators of state, whether executive or judicial, or the building of a majority consensus that, for example, "blacks" were not "citizens" as in Dred Scott,[121] or that non-Aryans were not full persons as in Nazi Germany, would be dispositive of the question of whether individual members of these minority groups are entitled to protection under the "person" concept of the Constitution. Such a solution would rub against the grain of the entire human rights movement—a movement based on the idea that there are certain fundamental rights which ought to exist by virtue of being a living human being and for no other reason[122]—as well as against the purpose of the fourteenth amendment.[123] Mr. Justice Holmes did not express a contrary idea in Lochner. In fact, in the paragraph following the one in Lochner quoted by Mr. Justice Blackmun, Mr. Justice Holmes wrote:

"I think that the word "liberty," in the Fourteenth Amendment is perverted when it is held to prevent the natural outcome of a dominant opinion, unless it can be said that a rational and fair man necessarily would admit that the statute proposed would infringe fundamental principles as they have been understood by the traditions of our people and our law."[124]

In spite of its promise to bear Holmes' famous dissent in mind, the Roe Court struck down a statute which was the "natural outcome of a dominant opinion,"[125] that is, the product of the domocratic process. But what is more important, the Texas abortion statute actually implemented, rather than infringed, "fundamental principles as they have been understood by the traditions of our people and our law."[126] Mr. Justice Holmes' admonition in Lochner, unheeded in Roe, simply means that the Constitution should be construed according to fundamental legal principles, not the personal predilection of judges.

(2) The Judiciary and the "Life" Issue in Non-Abortion Cases

The Court implied in the statement "when life begins"[127] that it would be improper for the judiciary to speculate as to the answer to such an inquiry. It is noteworthy that the Federal Constitutional Court of Western Germany, a court which enjoys the power of judicial review of the constitutionality of statutory enactments[128] and which occupies in the German political structure a position comparable to the United States Supreme Court, did not feel so inadequate when faced with the question whether the constitutional provision "Jeder hat das Recht auf Leben" (Everyone has the right to life) includes the unborn. In striking down a statute which allowed abortion on demand during the first trimester of pregnancy after the mother had undergone counseling, the German Constitutional Court wrote:

"In construing Article 2, Paragraph 2, Sentence 1, of the Basic Law, one should begin with its language: "Everyone has the right to life. . . ." Life, in the sense of historical existence of a human individual, exists according to definite biological-physiological knowledge, in any case, from the 14th day after conception (nidation, individuation). . . . The process of development which has begun at that point is a continuing process which exhibits no sharp demarcation and does not allow a precise division of the various steps of development of the human life. The process does not end even with birth; the phenomena of consciousness which are specific to the human personality, for example, appear for the first time a rather long time after birth. Therefore the protection of Article 2, Paragraph 2, Sentence 1, of the Basic Law cannot be limited either to the "completed" human being after birth or to the child about to be born which is independently capable of living. The right to life is guaranteed to everyone who "lives;" no distinction can be made here between various stages of the life developing itself before birth, or between unborn and born life. "Everyone" in the sense of Article 2, Paragraph 2, Sentence 1, of the Basic Law is "everyone living;" expressed in another way: every life possessing human individuality; "everyone" also includes the yet unborn human being."[129]

The sense of judicial humbleness expressed by the United States Supreme Court in Roe has prevented neither the English courts from deciding in a will construction case that "an infant en ventre sa mere [in its mother's womb], who by the course and order of nature is then living, comes clearly within the description of 'children living at the time of his decease' "[130] nor the American courts from reaching similar conclusions.[131] It has not prevented the courts from allowing recoveries in tort for prenatal injuries as did the California District Court of Appeal when it noted:

"The respondent asserts that the provisions of Section 29 of the Civil Code are based on a fiction of law to the effect that an unborn child is a human being separate and distinct from its mother. We think that it is an established and recognized fact by science and by everyone of understanding."[132]

It did not discourage the Illinois Supreme Court in a wrongful death case in which the fetus was born dead from quoting with approval the following from a New York case:

"To hold, as a matter of law, that no viable fetus has any separate existence which the law will recognize is for the law to deny a simple and easily demonstrable fact. This child, when injured, was in fact, alive and capable of being delivered and of remaining alive, separate from its mother."[133]

Nor did it discourage the Illinois Supreme Court in that case from allowing a wrongful death recovery, as have the majority of state supreme courts which have ruled upon the question of the scope of "person" in wrongful death statutes.[134] It also did not discourage the State's Attorney of Cook County, Illinois, or the State's Attorney of Will County, Illinois, from requesting that the Grand Jury return a murder indictment for the killing of a viable but unborn child.[135] In fact, the Grand Jury in the Cook County case was instructed by the State's Attorney to return a true bill only if it made a finding that the fetus was alive at the time it was shot, and died as a result of the shooting. Based upon the testimony of a pathologist, a true bill for murder was returned.[136]

In short, in areas not so politically volatile as abortion, the judiciary has not hesitated to take notice of, to consider and to hold that "life" exists before birth. In fact, Roe is actually unique, representing one of the few instances in which a court has refused to take cognizance of established scientific data concerning the nature of the unborn human being.

C. One of the Consequences of the Birth Requirement Is That the Nature of the Fetus as Viewed by Science Becomes Irrelevant

Regarding the nature of the unborn as viewed by science and his qualifications for constitutional personhood, the Supreme Court in Roe merely acknowledged its awareness of the "well-known facts of fetal development."[137] Under the dictates of the logic of the Court's birth requirement, the Supreme Court apparently felt that mere acknowledgment sufficed, and this was perhaps mentioned only to resolve any doubt one might entertain concerning the Court's awareness of these facts. The problem is, however, that the essential characteristics of man as viewed by science, characteristics which may show that the fetus is not, in any important aspect, essentially different from an infant, have become constitutionally irrelevant. Some of the more striking of these characteristics are reviewed below.

(1) Individuality[138]

The "individuality" of corporations played a primary role in the Supreme Court's holding that corporations were "persons" within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment[139] and was specifically emphasized in the West German Constitutional Court's decision that "everyone" in the Basic Law means "every life possessing human individuality." [140] Accordingly, one would think that the United States Supreme Court, presumably desirous of basing its decisions on the results and logic of scientific inquiry and rational assessment of those results, would be interested in the scientific facts that the unborn is a genetically unique individual from the moment conception is completed,[141] has an individual circulatory system,[142] is psychologically individual,[143] and is very largely in charge of the pregnancy while the mother is merely a passive carrier.[144] However, the Supreme Court's birth requirement attempts to render these facts, universally accepted as such by the scientific community, legally irrelevant.

(2) "Cogito, Ergo Sum" [145]

If this classic idea of the rational nature of man were the key to fourteenth amendment personhood,[146] the Court should be interested to know that electro encephalographic waves have been detected from the brains of 43- to 45-day old fetuses and that conscious experience is possible soon after that date; [147] that the human fetus develops consciousness and self-awareness at approximately the twenty-eighth week of pregnancy; [148] and that the unborn hears and recognizes his mother's voice before birth.[149] One might also wonder why the American Bar Association's carefully worked out definition of death ("irreversible cessation of total brain function") [150] applies to only one end of the life spectrum. Here again, the Court's birth requirement attempts to render these factors irrelevant.

(3) Ability to Live Outside the Mother's Womb

For reasons which are not completely clear, the Supreme Court decided that, although not important for constitutional personhood, viability is an important criterion for the state's assertion of a compelling interest. In other words, the state can assert its interest in keeping the fetus alive at "viability," which the Court defined as the point at which the fetus is "potentially able to live outside the mother's womb, albeit with artifical aid." [151] The Court then noted that "[v]iability is usually placed at about seven months (twenty-eight weeks) but may occur earlier, even at twenty-four weeks."[152] Here, the Supreme Court, for reasons neither apparent nor offered, utilized scientific data in determining when a state's interest in the unborn becomes compelling enough to preclude the abortion but, because of its creation of the birth requirement, rendered the same or similar data irrelevant in its determination when the right to have constitutional rights begins. Considering that the Court placed such emphasis on the viability concept, it perhaps should be of interest that in a study of 650,000 live births in New York City, over twenty percent of the children born at less than twenty weeks gestational age survived the neonatal period.[153] The Court's figures accordingly appear to be unsound. Beyond the soundness of the data, however, the Court's decision means that prematurely born children are entitled to all the constitutional protections whereas their counterparts, who are equally individual, older, more competent and better able to survive outside a mother's womb but not fortunate enough to have been prematurely born, are without constitutional protection.

D. The Birth Requirements Is Arbitrary

It appears that the Supreme Court simply created the birth requirement, a requirement which appears to find no support in either the Constitution itself or in its history. Nor is support for the birth requirement found in any original reasoning by the Court. The failure of the Supreme Court to offer an explanation for its birth requirement causes one to wonder what it is about the nature of birth that makes other factors, such as those relating to the biological, intellectual and psychological nature of the fetus, of no constitutional significance. As a consequence of the Court's birth requirement, such scientific data, assuming it could be proved, as the fact that the fetus "lives," is an "individual," is a "human being" and is essentially identical to a born infant in all scientifically provable aspects have been rendered irrelevant.

This result is surprising, especially since the Supreme Court has, at least in recent years, been rather receptive in its decision-making to the methods, principles and findings of scientifically respectable disciplines other than law. Brown v. Board of Education [154] provides perhaps the best known example. There, the Supreme Court in its desire to "look . . . to the effect of segregation itself on public education" [155] felt no hesitation in using the behavorial sciences to determine the scope and application of the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment.

Brown, of course, is not unique. Since Louis Brandeis established the tradition by filing his now famous brief,[156] attorneys have attempted with considerable success to persuade judges by means of materials and data from disciplines other than the law. If, for example, members of a newly found tribe were intentionally and arbitrarily killed and their killers, upon being tried for homicide, raised the defense that the victims of the killing were not "persons" under the homicide statute, one would certainly expect the court to consider such nonlegal data as whether the members of the tribe were genetically human, biologically human, and possessed of human rationality (physiological and psychological) when it determined whether the members were entitled to protection under the criminal homicide provisions.[157]

It is precisely this tradition, a tradition of keeping judicial decisions compatible with the logic of rational assessment and scientific inquiry, which makes the Supreme Court's reluctance to give recent scientific and medical data concerning the unborn careful consideration in its decision very difficult to accept. Obviously the Roe Court was simply following Chief Justice Burger's admonition in Eisenstadt v. Baird [158] that the "commands of the Constitution cannot fluctuate with the shifting tides of scientific opinion" [159] because the Court in Roe did place considerable emphasis on scientific opinion in its determinations that abortion during the first trimester is safer than childbirth [160] and that viability occurs at a particular moment (twenty-four to twenty-eight weeks).[161] Whatever may have been the Court's reasoning, the effect of its birth requirement has been to render irrelevant a rational assessment of scientific data about pre-birth stages of human development as well as a scientific inquiry into the nature of pre-born human life.

V. UNWANTED PREGNANCY IN PERSPECTIVE

In light of the indications of the Maher, Poelker and Beal cases that the Court may well be retreating from Roe and of the temptation which must surely face the judiciary at this point to allow the abortion problem to be resolved legislatively, a careful study of the protections which the Constitution provides the fetus is required. The purpose of this article has been not only to explore the soundness of the birth requirement created by the Supreme Court in Roe as a requisite to membership in the class of constitutional "persons" but also to call for a reexamination of the whole issue. In brief, there is considerable evidence which suggests that the unborn is and should be considered a constitutional person, thus entitled to fourteenth amendment protections. If this be true, both the Roe holding as well as a legislative solution permitting abortions for reasons other than a threat to the life of the mother would have the effect of violating the unborn's right to due process of law. It would thus follow that both the judicial solution set forth in Roe and the legislative solution are constitutionally unsound.

A holding that the fetus is a constitutional person would have the effect of overruling Roe v. Wade and its progeny. The legal consequences would not, however, be as far-reaching as Roe itself, which had the effect of declaring century-old criminal abortion statutes invalid, cutting deeply into assumed rights of husbands [162] and parents,[163] and creating the possibility of required, at least via legislation, public financing of abortion.[164] On the other hand, the consequence of the Roe decision to the aborted fetus is severe and final. This result, of course, is of no great concern to the rule of law, unless the unborn does meet the criteria of constitutional personhood and the Court either because of poor reasoning or because of some unstated reason arbitrarily denied the unborn the constitutional protections due it or unless the fourteenth amendment is inadequate as a legal device to protect the fundamental rights of all members of the human family, the avowed purpose of the drafters of the fourteenth amendment. In either case, there is reason for concern, for the legal order has failed. Perhaps society has failed as well by not providing other solutions which were acceptable to women facing unwanted pregnancies. Professor John Ely obviously had a point when he wrote that "having an unwanted child can go a long way toward ruining a woman's life." [165] No one is denying the personal tragedy or the hardships involved in an unwanted pregnancy. The solution, however, should turn on what is being sacrificed to avert the tragedy and hardships. These are hard decisions.

To put these hard decisions in their proper perspective, it must be borne in mind that constitutional protection of fundamental rights never takes place in a social vacuum. Rather, the protection of the fundamental rights of one necessarily requires personal sacrifices of some significance by those against whom the right is enforced. For example, when the Illinois Supreme Court and the United States federal district court enforced the first amendment right of the American Nazi Party to march in Skokie, a sacrifice on the part of the Jewish population in Skokie was necessarily involved. Similarly, an order requiring desegregation in certain neighborhoods may have the effect of substantially reducing the market value of the property holdings of those already in the neighborhood, and the privilege against self-incrimination may, and occasionally does in the instance of a killer set free, later result in the sacrifice of the life of an innocent person. To be emphasized here is that the fundamental human rights theory necessarily implies sacrifices. All the great judicial decisions in this area have thus been hard decisions. And the problem of the right to life of the fetus must be viewed in this context.

But courts as well as people have faced difficult problems before and have resolved them with dignity and intellectual honesty. Such was the problem in the famous case of United States v. Holmes,[166] where, following a shipwreck, the sailors threw fourteen passengers overboard to lighten a sinking lifeboat, and Regina v. Dudley & Stephens,[167] where two seamen starving after twenty days in an open boat, killed a youthful companion and fed on his flesh until they were rescued. In both of these cases the doctrine of necessity was raised as a defense to the men's actions. And "necessity" there was—nothing less than the lives of those later accused of homicide were at stake. These were hard decision for the courts, harder than the abortion decision because rarely is "necessity" in the abortion situation of the magnitude of that facing Holmes and Dudley and Stephens. Nonetheless, the courts held that "necessity cannot justify killing."

Is that what is involved in the abortion controversy? Is abortion an act of killing? The West German Federal Constitutional Court concluded that it was[168] and sought to resolve the abortion problem in a manner consistent with its understanding of the values involved and their authoritative legal principles. In its concluding paragraphs, the West German Federal Constitutional Court wrote:

"The parliamentary discussions about the reform of the abortion law have indeed deepened the insight that it is the principal task of the state to prevent the killing of unborn life through enlightenment about the prevention of pregnancy on the one hand as well as through effective promotional measures in society and through a general alteration of social concepts on the other." [169]

Would not such an approach be much more compatible with the deepest values and the authoritative ideals of this society?

[1] The decisions in Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438. Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, and Poelker v. Doe, 432 U.S. 519, were announced by the Supreme Court on June 20, 1977, in Beal, the Court held that a state participating in the Medicaid Program is not required by Title XIX of the Social Security Act to fund the costs of nontherapeutic abortions, in Maher, the Court held, inter alia, that the Constitution imposes no obligation on the states to pay pregnancy related expenses and that a state does not violate equal protection by funding the costs of prenatal expenses but not nontherapeautic abortions because of the State's strong and legitimate interest in encouraging normal childbirth; in Poelker, the Court held that a city does not violate equal protection by excluding nontherapeutic abortions from public hospitals since the Constitution does not forbid a state or city from expressing a preference for normal childbirth.

[2] Colautti v. Franklin, 99 S. Ct. 675 (1979), decided January 9, 1979. Arguably Colautti does limit legislative authority in the abortion area in spite of the Courts's claim that it reaffirms the principles of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973), and Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976), 99 S. Ct. at 682. In Roe the Court had observed that, in the medical and scientific communities, the fetus is considered viable if it is "potentially able to live outside the mother's womb, albeit by artificial aid," Roe, 410 U.S. at 160, whereas in Colautti the Court wrote that "[v]iability is reached when, in the judgment of the attending physician on the particular facts of the case before him, there is reasonable likelihood of the fetus' sustained survival outside the womb, with or without artificial support." 99 S. Ct. at 682. The change, if any, in the substantive law is in the degree of probability of survival required and in the focus on the particular fetus as opposed to the fetus in the abstract.

Wade and Doe v. Bolton—by a substantial majority and with some emphasis, I had thought—said they could not do directly. Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. at 462 (1977) (citations omitted).

[19] The Supreme Court in Maher v. Roe held that the state could assert an interest in what it termed "potential human life." The term "potential human life" appears to have been carefully chosen, because, by concluding that the state has an interest in potential human life, the Supreme Court hoped to avoid the necessity of deciding at least in the context of the Maher case when human life begins, a problem the solution to which, according to Mr. Justice Blackmun in Roe, has evaded philosophers, theologians and unfortunately also physicians throughout the centuries, See Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. at 159. Since this paper is concerned with the scope of the "person" concept in the Constitution as opposed to those matters in which the states may assert an interest—and since the proofs are replete that embryoes and fetuses of human beings are, at least from the biological perspective, human and living—the term "unborn human life" is used. For an excellent and detailed discussion of the biological proofs, see Krimmel and Foley, Abortion: An Inspection into the Nature of Human Life and Potential Consequences of Legalizing Its Destruction, 46 U. Cin. L. Rev. 725 (1977).

[23] Id. at 20. Professor Berger writes: The "privileges or immunities" clause was the central provision of the Amendment's § 1, and the key to its meaning is furnished by the immediately preceding Civil Rights Act of 1866 . . . which, all are agreed, it was the purpose of the Amendment to embody and protect. The objectives of the Act were quite limited. The framers intended to confer on the freedmen the auxiliary rights that would protect their "life, liberty, and property,"—no more. For the framers those words did not have the sprawling connotations later given them by the Court but, instead, restricted aims that were expressed in the Act. The legislative history of the Amendment frequently refers to "fundamental rights," "life, liberty, and property," and a few historical comments will show the ties between the two.

[24] Cf. Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393 (1857). Dred Scott was decided prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment and involved a construction of the notion of "citizen" in the Constitution, not "person." Although the case had the effect of excluding a human group from enjoyment of constitutional privileges and immunities, a decision which resulted in profound tragedy, it did not deal with the scope of the "person" concept. In this context it is interesting to note that, despite the Court's holding in Dred Scott, slaves were considered to be persons under the criminal law and were held responsible under the criminal law as well as entitled to its protections. See, e.g., J. KENT, COMMENTARIES ON AMERICAN LAW 253–55 (12th ed. 1973). See also State v. Jones, 2 Miss. (1 Walker) 39 (1820). It thus follows that the concept of "persons" in general legal usage was somewhat broader than the concept of "citizen," both terms being used in section one of the fourteenth amendment. It is also noteworthy that the Supreme Court has held that the phrase in the first section of the fourteenth amendment ("All persons born within the United States . . . are citizens of the United States") was designed to overturn Dred Scott and establish citizenship in the Negro. See Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873).

[27] It is interesting to note in this connection the contention that due process of law is the constitutional protection of the right to life. Cf. Bedau, The Right to Life, 52 THE MONIST 562 (1968). However, at the time of the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, due process was probably understood to provide both a procedure to protect such rights as "life, liberty, or property" and the only legally proper method of limiting those rights. See note 23, supra.

[35] As indicated earlier, due process, rather than creating the rights explicitly mentioned in the fifth amendment and later in the fourteenth amendment, actually provided a constitutionally acceptable means of limiting the rights. According to the prevailing political theories, the rights mentioned were natural rights which preexisted the Constitution.

[42] The possibility exists that in the Court's eyes the major issue was not the scope of constitutional personhood as stated but rather other far-reaching problems. Some indication of this is given in the Roe opinion itself. At the end of the opinion, Mr. Justice Blackmun wrote: "This holding, we feel, is consistent . . . [inter alia] . . . with the demands of the profound problems of the present day." 410 U.S. at 165. Although he did not specifically identify these "profound problems," Mr. Justice Blackmun provided at least a hint by mentioning at the beginning of the opinion that "population growth, pollution, poverty, and racial overtones tend to complicate and not to simplify the problem." 410 U.S. and 116. If the Court's concern was to resolve or alleviate these "profound problems" by allowing population reduction via the sacrifice of unborn humans, the Court should have said so and allowed the matter to be debated on the merits of that issue rather than presenting the problem of Roe in terms of construing several potentially conflicting clauses of the Federal constitution which guarantee individual rights. Although such an underlying concern could perhaps explain a poorly reasoned decision by a court on the stated issues, this commentary accepts the Court's statement of issues and proceeds accordingly.

Bolton* case that the fetus was not a "person," the district court noted in a footnote that it "does not postulate the existence of a new being with federal constitutional rights at any time during gestation." 319 F. For reason unknown, this dismissal was not appealed by the guardian ad litem and consequently the fetus' interests were not represented before the Supreme Court in either the Roe v. Bolton cases.

[56] Although Mr. Justice Blackmun emphasized his uncertainty about "when life begins," it is difficult to determine from his opinion in Roe exactly what role this uncertainty played in the Court's conclusion that the fetus is not a constitutional person. Clearly, his unncertainty was a major factor in the Court's conclusion that the state's interest in unborn human life prior to viability was not compelling enough to overcome the woman's right to privacy. 410 U.S. at 162-64. As the text at notes 117-18, infra, suggests, an attempt to avoid deciding this factual question may explain at least in part the Court's birth requirement.

[58] The reasons for this belief are suggested throughout this paper. In general, the Bill of Rights as well as subsequent amendments to the United States Constitution are to be understood as setting forth as fundamental values of state certain fundamental human rights in a positive form or as a statement of an American declaration of the rights of man, at least against the state. The idea of human rights is based upon the notion that certain rights obtain by virtue of being human and may be conditioned upon no other requirement. An attempt to restrict entitlement to those rights by the creation of criteria other than mere humanness is incompatible with the idea of "human rights;" an attempt to restrict entitlement to those rights by definition is jurisprudentially permisible only if such definitions are totally rational and non-arbitrary. The fundamental issues, as suggested in the text accompanying this footnote, are: (1) Is the unborn human? (2) Is the unborn living? and (3) Is the unborn an individual entity? Since the purpose of this article is much more to expose the Supreme Court's arbitrariness in resolving the "person" issue than to develop the writer's personal views, these views have been reduced to a footnote.

[62] The commonly accepted approaches to the construction of legal documents very generally include interpreting the term at issue in good faith according to (1) the natural and ordinary meaning of the term: (2) the context of the whole document in which the term is found; (3) the historical background, including preparatory work; and (4) the function to be attributed to the term.

[64] U.S. CONST. art. I, § 2, cl. 3. The apportionment clause restricted those to be counted in the census to "free persons," "exclud[ed] Indians not taxed" and included "three fifths of all other persons." In Roe Justice Blackmun asked whether a fetus had ever been counted in a census. 410 U.S. at 157 n.53. This quip appears to have been inspired by Professor Means' law review article entitled The Phoenix of Abortional Freedom: Is a Penumbral or Ninth Amendment Right About to Arise from the Nineteenth-Century Legislative Ashes of a Fourteenth-Century Common-Law Liberty? 17 N.Y.L.F. 335, 402-03 (1971) [hereinafter cited as Means]. In this article, published on the eve of the first oral arguments in Roe and with the obvious intent to influence the outcome of the abortion cases before the Supreme Court, Professor Means attempted to deal not only with the briefs and written arguments of the parties but with those of the amici as well. It is important to note that constitutional personhood in other contexts in the Constitution is not considered to be restructed by the use of the term "person" in the apportionment clause or by the political compromises made at the time of formulating the Constitution in the late eighteenth century. Whatever the clause's value, it offers no guidance in construing the word "person" in the fifth or fourteenth amendments.

It is interesting that the apportionment clause uses the term "free persons," which suggests that there are "persons" who are not "free." The Dred Scott decision dealt with the question of citizenship, not personhood; see note 24, supra.

[65] U.S. CONST. art. IV, § 2, cl. 2. The extradition clause provides that a "person charged . . . with Treason, Felony, or other crime . . . shall . . . be delivered up." This clause also restricts a broad and general class of "persons" for a particular purpose, in this case, those subject to extradition. It does imply that there are "persons" who do not qualify for extradition; it does not imply that those who do not qualify for extraditions are non-persons nor does it imply when this personhood began.

[66] Mr. Justice Blackmun's primary point is, to an extent, valid. Regarding most constitutional references to "persons," the concern is with postnatal matters. But does it follow that blacks or "Indians not taxed" under seven years of age are not "persons?" A member of that class would be given three-fifths of a count in the census (or none, in the case of the untaxed Indian); would be too young to run for Congress, the Senate or the Presidency; and under the common law of crimes would be incapable of committing treason, a felony, or "other crime" and thus would not be subject to extradition. This, of course, does not reflect the present state of the law. Young blacks and Indians, whether taxed or not, are clearly "persons" under the Constitution. The scope of "person" in the fourteenth amendment has never been held to be limited by eighteenth century political compromises. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court's examples certainly suggest that possibility.

[67] In fact, a glance at section one of the fourteenth amendment itself could arguably suggest that "person" has prenatal significance. The phrase in section one is "persons born or naturalized in the United States . . . are citizens of the United States." Obviously, there are persons who are not naturalized, for "naturalized" functions as an adjective which restricts the class of persons to those who qualify for citizenship. By the same reasoning, "born" functions as an adjective, limiting the class of persons to those who qualify for citizenship. Although this argument may appear superficial and, of course, does not preclude the possibility that the term "born" must be read "born . . . in the United States" as opposed to being born elsewhere, it does involve the use of person in section one of the fourteenth amendment—the very provision being construed—and it surely offers as much support for a "prenatal" construction as the Roe Court's analysis of the use of person does for its birth requirement.

[73] 410 U.S. at 135. Mr. Justice Blackmun appears again to have relied on the study of Cyril Means, discussed at note 64, supra. Means argued that abortion during the fourteenth century was a "liberty" and cited two cases (The Twinslayer's Case and The Abortionist's Case) in support. Means at 335-50. Even if these two cases do reflect the state of the common law during the fourteenth century (and there is good reason to believe they do not, see Destro, Abortion and the Constitution: The Need for a Life-Protective Amendment, 63 CALIF. L. REV. 1267-73 D(1975)), it is difficult to understand how abortion could be considered a "liberty" when it was clearly a crime and punishable as such by the ecclesiastical courts. See Means at 346-48 and note 64, supra. To draw a rough analogy, if possession of cannabis were not a federal offense, would it follow that possession of cannabis is a "liberty?" Would possession also be a liberty if possession were punished by our state courts? It is significant to remember that during the fourteenth century it was commonly claimed that the law applied by the ecclesiastical courts had been "received" by the state and thus obtained its authority by being essentially a part of the law of England. See generally F. MAITLAND, ROMAN CANON LAW IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND (1898). Maitland himself was not convinced that there had really been a "reception" of canon law. See F. MAITLAND, Essay on William Lyndwood, in ROMAN CANON LAW IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND (1898). Nevertheless, to the extnt that everyone was subject to the canon law, that punishment of considerable severity for its violation was inflicted, that canon law was generally considered to be a "part" of English law, and that abortion was a "crime," it is very dificult to understand the "liberty" argument advanced by Means. Moreover, even if abortion were not a common law offense during the fourteenth century, the writings of Bracton (thirteeth century), Coke (seventeenth century), Hale (seventeeth century), Blackstone (eighteenth century), and Kent (nineteeth century), all of whom believed that abortion of a quickened fetus was a crime, were instrumental in formulating the attitudes of the drafter of the fourteenth amendment toward unborn human life. There is no indication that eithteenth and nineteenth century American believed that the abortion of a quickened fetus was a "liberty." Both the cases and the commentaries suggest the contrary. With respect to the issue of whether the word "person" includes the "unborn," the ideas of eighteenth and nineteenth century America are crucial, not those of fourteenth century England. As the accompanying text points out, nineteenth century America clearly believed that an abortion of a quickened fetus was a crime. And, as the nineteenth century courts pointed out. The purpose of the common law offense was to protect unborn human life. See notes 78–80, 82–85, infra, and accompanying text.

[82] The case cited by the United States Supreme Court is State v. Murphy, 27 N.J.L. 112 (1858); however, the history of the law on abortion in New Jersey during the nineteenth century actually argues against Mr. Justice Blackmun's conclusions in this regard. In State v. Cooper, 22 N.J.L. 52 (1849), the Supreme Court of New Jersey formulated the issues to be whether an attempt to procure an abortion of an unquickened fetus with the mother's consent "be at all an offense or not, and whether the child be in esse, so that any crime can be committed against its person." Id. at 54. The Court emphasized that an abortion of a quick child, even with the mother's consent, was an offense at common law. In support of this, the Court cited Blackstone's comment that "[l]ife begins in contemplation of law as soon as an infant is able to stir in the mother's womb." Id. The Court then noted that "[i]t is not material whether, speaking with physiological accuracy, life may be said to commence at the moment of quickening, or at the moment of conception, or at some intervening periods. In contemplation of law life commences at the moment of quickening, at the moment when the embryo gives the first physical proof of life, no matter when it first received it." Id. (second emphasis added). The Court then concluded that the "offense of procuring an abortion seems, by the ancient common law writers, to be treated only as an offense against life." Id. As a result, the Cooper Court held that, under the common law, if the woman consented and the child had not quickened, there was no common law offense. The entire discussion of the Court, it must be emphasized, centered around the question of whether the abortion of an unquickened fetus could be a crime. (There was no mention made of the health of the mother by the Cooper Court.) The Court then invited the legislature, "if the good of society requires that the evil [meaning, this writer believes, no legal protection for the unquickened fetus] should be suppressed by penal inflictions," to enact legislation. Id. at 58. "This decision," it is noted in the official reporter, "induced the legislature to amend the criminal code, so as to make the offense in question a crime." Id.

[83] The statute required that the offender intend "to cause and procure the miscarriage of the woman then pregnant with child." State v. Murphy, 27 N.J.L. at 113 (emphasis added). What this statute accomplished was to protect the unquickened child. Were the purpose merely to protect the woman's health, the legislature would not have required that actual pregnancy be established as a material element of the offense. It is true, as Mr. Justice Blackmun wrote in Roe, that the New Jersey Supreme Court in Murphy stated that the purpose of the statute was "to guard the health and life of the mother against the consequences of [attempts to procure abortions.]" 27 N.J.L. at 114. However, Mr. Justice Blackmun failed to mention (1) that an abortion of a quickened child was already a crime at common law in New Jersey; (2) that at least one effect of the statute was to make an abortion of an unquickened child a crime in New Jersey; (3) that before the crime could be committed, the woman must be actually pregnant with either an unquickened or quickened child; and (4) that the inducement for enacting the statute was the holding in Cooper in which the only "evil" discussed was the failure of the common law to provide protection of an unquickened fetus.

According to the Kansas Comp. Laws of 1879, abortion of a quick fetus was manslaughter (Comp. Laws 1879, c. 31, p. 329) whereas an abortion of a non-quick fetus was a misdemeanor (Comp. Laws 1879, c. 31, p. 332). In State v. Miller, 90 Kan. 230, 133 P. 878 (1913), the Supreme Court of Kansas commented on the purpose of the latter statute by writing that the statute "carries the facial evidence of the legislative intent to cover the criminal machinations and devices of the abortionist in order to protect the pregnant woman and the unborn child." See Dougherty v. People, 1 Colo. 514 (1872); Nash v. Meyer, 54 Idaho 283, 31 P.2d 273 (1934); State v. Alcorn, 7 Idaho 599, 64 P. 1014 (1901); State v. Watson, 30 Kan. 281, I P. 770 (1883); Joy v. An example of the influence of Blackstone on the thinking of Americans just prior to the enactment of the fourteenth amendment in 1868 can be found in the following statement by Abraham Lincoln: "The more I read [of Blackstone's Commentaries], the more intensely interested I became. Never in my whole life was my mind so thoroughly absorbed. I read until I devoured them." Id. Cf. Bedau, The Right to Life, 52. THE MONIST 550 (1968). An example of Blackstone's influence on the attitude of the judiciary to unborn human life is also reflected in an 1820 Mississippi case in which the court held that a slave was a person under the criminal law and entitled to its protections and that a slave owner could be prosecuted for the murder of his slave. The court wrote: The taking away of the life of a reasonable creature under the King's peace, with malice aforethought, express or implied, is murder at common law. Is not the slave a reasonable creature, is he not a human being, and the meaning of this phrase reasonable creature is a human being, for the killing a lunatic, an idiot, or even a child unborn, is murder, as much as the killing a philosopher, and has not the slave as much reason as a lunatic, an idiot or an unborn child. State v. [95] Elevating a common law right to a constitutional right, as did the Supreme Court in Roe with the right to privacy, raises an additional point. In Botsford the Supreme Court simply asked whether it had the authority to order an examination of the woman without statutory authority and concluded it did not. The implication, of course, is that with statutory authority, the Court would be so empowered. In short, the Court recognized the predominance of statutory law over common law. Indeed, subsequent to Botsford, nearly every state, either by statute or court rule, had permitted a court to order physical examinations of injured plaintiffs in personal injury cases. Thus, the right to privacy in this context has given way to a legislatively determined greater need. By elevating the right to a constitutional level, the legislature loses, except under compelling circumstances, the power to limit the right. Botsford thus may stand for the notion that there is a common law right to privacy. It does not, however, stand for the notion that this right prevails over any legislative determinations that the right must yield to what it considers to be more important values, such as was the case with the criminal abortion laws.

[97] Quickening refers to the mother's awareness of the movement of the fetus in the womb; it thus reflects maternal sensitivity, not fetal competence, and thus also tends to be an arbitrary point at which to commence constitutional personhood. One possible reason why "quickening" may have been important in criminal law is because at that point it would be possible through the mother's testimony or by reports of a mother's statements to determine if the fetus were in fact alive at the time of the infliction of the criminal act. With such testimony, one could establish the corpus delecti of the crime. See note 82, supra, for a discussion of State v. Cooper, 22 N.J.L. 52 (1849). As the New Jersey Supreme Court in Cooper points out, quickening is important in law because "at the moment the embryo gives the first proof of life." 22 N.J.L. at 54.

[100] It should be noted that the legislatures which ratified the fourteenth amendment also, within the same general time frame, enacted the abortion statutes of the nineteenth century.

[101] Was the Court's failure to explicitly state that constitutional personhood begins at birth intentional? Although this paper proceeds on the assumption that constitutional personhood begins at birth, is it possible that in the minds of the justices there are perhaps additional conditions precedent to obtaining constitutional personhood? Can some indication of this be found in the Court's statement that the state's compelling interest in protecting the unborn begins at viability because then the fetus "has the capability of meaningful life outside the mother's womb?" 410 U.S. at 163. What does "meaningful life" mean? That life is possible outside the mother's womb? That there is potential for survival? Or does it suggest something entirely different, something related, for example, to intellectual ability, financial ability, physical ability, to the capability of being happy, normal, loyal, healthy, or perhaps to the state of being wanted or loved or to whether a "meaningful" contribution to society can be made? Interestingly enough, since Roe, and likely as a consequence of Roe, serious suggestions have been made to postpone legal protections until even beyond birth. See. e.g., Nobel Prize Winner James Watson's statement that "most birth defects are not discovered until birth. . . . [If] a child were not declared alive until three days after birth, all parents could be allowed the choice [to preserve the child's life] that only a few are given under the present system." [107] Although the history of constitutional decision-making suggests that the "plain meaning" approach is only one of numerous methods of interpretation, this principle of interpreting according to the literal meaning has been frequently applied by constitutional courts. In Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438, 444 (1977), the Court wrote: "The starting point in every case involving construction of a statute is the language itself." See also E. CRAWFORD, STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION 315 (1940), where he wrote: "[T]he intention of the legislature is to be primarily ascertained from the language used in the statute, and if the language is plain and unambiguous, it must be given a literal meaning." See also Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U.S. 662, 670 (1889), where the Court wrote: If the words convey a definite meaning, which involves no absurdity, nor any contradiction of the other parts of the instrument, then that meaning, apparent on the face of the instrument, must be accepted, and neither the courts nor the legislature have the right to add to it or take from it. Even though scholars look upon the "plain meaning" approach as a relatively unsophisticated one and as one which distracts a person from the more important analysis of function and history, the Court has not hesitated to use "plain meaning" as an approach to construction, particularly when it serves its purposes. See, e.g., Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. at 444.

[108] THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY (1970) provides the following relevant definitions of "person." "II. An individual human being; a man, woman, or child. IV. Law. A human being (natural person)." WEBSTER'S THIRD NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY provides these relevant definitions: "I. a) an individual human being: c) a human being as distinguished from an animal or thing: 8. a being characterized by conscious apprehension, rationality, and a moral sense: 9. a living individual unit. . . ." Noah Webster's AN AMERICAN DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE (1828) provided the following pertinent definitions of "person:" "1. An individual human being consisting of body and soul. We apply the word to living beings only, possessed of a rational value: the body when dead is not called a person. It is applied alike to a man, woman or child. 'A person is a thinking intelligent being'—Locke; 2. A man, woman or child, considered as opposed to things, or distinct from them; 3. A human being, indefinitely, one; a man." The 1865 version of Noah Webster's AN AMERICAN DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE defined "person" as follows: "3. The corporeal manifestation of a soul; the outward appearance, expression, & c., body. 4. A living soul; a self-conscious being; a moral agent; especially a living human being; a man, woman, or child; an individual of the human race. 'We must consider what person stands for; which, I think, is a thinking, intelligent being, that has reason and reflection, and can consider itself as itself, the same thinking thing in different times and planes.'—Locke 5. A human being spoken of indefinitely; one; a man."

[109] Since most of the definitions use the term "human" or "human being" to define "person," the possibly relevant definitions of "human" are given. THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY (1970) defines "human" as "1. Of, belonging to, or characteristic of man; 2. Of the nature of man. . . ." WEBSTER'S THIRD NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY defines "human" as "1. a) of or relating to man; characteric of man 3. characteristic of or relating to man in his essential nature. . . ." N. WEBSTER, AN AMERICAN DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGUE (1828) defined "human being" as follows: "1. Belonging to man or mankind; pertaining or relating to the race of man; 2. Having the qualities of a man." The 1865 version defined "human" as follows: "1. Belonging to man or mankind; having the qualities or attributes of a man; pertaining or relating to the race of man; 2. A human being; one of the race of man."

[110] Since "human" is often defined in terms of "man," relevant definitions of "man" are provided. THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY (1970): "I. 1. A human being (irrespective of sex or age). . . ." WEBSTER'S THIRD INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY: "1. a) A member of the human race; a human being; 2. b) a bipedal primate mammal (homo sapiens) . . . distinguished by notable development of the brain with a resultant capacity of articulate speech and abstract reasoning, marked erectness of body carriage . . . 2. c) Individual; one." N. WEBSTER, AN AMERICAN DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE (1828) defined "man" as follows: "1. Mankind; the human race; the whole species of human beings; beings distinguished from all other animals by the powers of reason and speech, as well as by their shape and dignified aspect. 7. An individual of the human species." The 1865 version defined "man" as follows: "1. An individual of the human race; a human being; a person. 3. The human race; mankind; the totality of man."

[118] It is interesting to note in this regard that in Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977), the Supreme Court in discussing the existence and legitimacy of a state interest in encouraging birth, as opposed to abortion, once again avoided decision on the "life" issue. In Maher the Court finessed the issue by concluding that the state had an interest in "potential human life," thus making a decision about the existence of life at a particular stage unnecessary in the context of asserting state interests. 432 U.S. at 478-80.

[120] Id. Justice Holmes' argument is applicable to a similar argument made by proponents of abortion in the numerous debates on the topic. For example, at the 1975 Pierce Debates at the University of Chicago, Sybella Fritzsche, for the pro-abortion side, said: I do not believe that nine wisemen in Washington hold the truth. In our society, there is not necessarily one common binding standard for all of us, and I think the Court paid attention to that fact. They admitted that there was no absolute Truth that they could find. The Chicago Maroon,, Apr. 29, 1975. The weakness of this argument is that "in our society there . . . is one common binding standard for all of us," and that standard is the Constitution. Otherwise, our society would face the problem of the tyranny of the majority. Moreover, the "nine wiseman in Washington," not theologians, physicians or even the majority of the American people, are charged with its interpretation or the responsibility of determining its meaning and scope.

Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1972). If appellants are correct in their claim, the existence of human rights would be dependent upon the whims of the entity empowered to define "human." Moreover, the pro-abortionist claim that abortional freedom is a victory for human rights accordingly rests on a most fickle basis.

[126] Id. See generally text accompanying notes 55-115, supra. The fact that the Roe case has had ramifications beyond its direct impact on criminal abortion statutes into such areas as a father's interests in his unborn child and parents' authority to control the moral development of their minor children (see, e.g., Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1975); Baird v. Bellotti, 428 U.S. 132 (1975); Wynn v. Scott, 449 F. Supp. 1302 (N.D. Ill. 1978), appeal dismissed, direct appeal improper, 99 S. Ct. 49 (1978), appeal docketed, No. 78-1262 (7th Cir. (1978)) suggests again, although indirectly, that the decision was contrary to the "fundamental principles as they have been understood by the traditions of our people and our law." At the time of the enactment of the fourteenth amendment, fathers were generally entitled to a custody of children following divorce. J. KENT, COMMENTARIES ON AMERICAN LAW (pt. IV) 205 (12th ed. 1973). Yet Roe and Danforth state that the father cannot even prevent the destruction of his unborn child. Nevertheless, parents have both the duty and the right to maintain and educate their children. To support this idea Kent noted the following: (c) In the case of The Commonwealth v. Armstrong, in the session of the peace of Lycoming county, Pennsylvania, in 1842, Mr. Justice Lewis, the president judge, decided, after a learned examination of the subject, that a minister of the gospel had no right, contrary to the express commands of the father, to receive an infant daughter, under the immediate guardianship of the father, from the church to which the father belonged, and in which the child was baptized and instructed, and initiate it, by baptism, into another church of a different denomination. It was held to be the right and the duty of the father, not only to maintain his infant children, but to instruct their minds in moral and religious principles, and to regulate their consciences by a course of education and discipline. All interference with the parental power and duty, except by the courts of justice, when that power is abused, is injurious to domestic subordination, and to the public peace, morals, and security. Parents, says a distinguished jurist on natural law, have the right by the law of nature to direct the actions of their children, as being a power necessary to their proper education. It is the will of God, therefore, that parents should have and exercise that power. Nay, he observes, parents have the right to direct their children to embrace the religion which they themselves approve. J. KENT, COMMENTARIES ON AMERICAN LAW (pt. IV) 203 (12th ed. 1973).

Roe, Danforth and perhaps Bellotti suggest that the exercise of such control over a minor child's decision to abort is unconstitutional. Does the child's right to privacy also include a right to engage in sexual relations without interference of the parents or the state? To marry at a tender age without consent of parents or court? Does it suggest, for example, that all statutory rape laws are unconstitutional? (Statutory rape laws certainly have a "chilling effect" on the minor's access to the adult population for sexual gratification.) Such possibilities for the right of privacy certainly suggest an inconsistency with fundamentals long "understood by the tradition of our people and our law."

WEBER, HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY 309 (1899)), but also reflective of the notion of man as a "rational animal." Glanville Williams was possibly thinking along these lines when he suggested the "seventh month as the beginning of legal protection for the fetus," since "until the brain is formed there can be no mind" and since "electric potential (brain waves) are discernible in the seventh month." G. WILLIAMS, THE SANCTITY OF LIFE AND THE CRIMINAL LAW 231 (1970). He even suggested that this solution would "practically eliminate the present social problem of abortion." Id. at 232. As the accompanying text points out, "brain waves" are now discernible at six weeks, before most abortions are performed. Thus, the "brain wave" approach would not appeal to the pro-abortionists.

A LAWYER LOOKS AT ABORTION

(By Lynn D. Wardle and Mary Anne Q. Wood)

HOW ROE V. WADE CHANGED THE LAW

In 1970 an unmarried pregnant woman filed a suit in the federal district court in Dallas, Texas, challenging the constitutionality of the Texas criminal abortion laws. Texas had adopted a statute prohibiting abortion in 1854. Originally, the statute prohibited abortions both before and after quickening. In 1856 this law was amended to include a therapeutic exception to allow abortions when the woman's life would be endangered by continuation of the pregnancy. In 1879 the law was again amended, this time to prohibit attempting or aiding an abortion. After that, however, the statue remained virtually unchanged and when "Jane Roe" (the woman wished to remain anonymous, so she used this pseudonym) filed her law suit 91 years later, Texas law still prohibited abortion "except when procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."

The plaintiff alleged in her complaint that she wanted to have an abortion performed by a doctor, but that her life was not endangered by the pregnancy, and that she could not afford to travel to another state where such abortions were legal. She argued that the Texas abortion laws were unconstitutional because they abridged her right of personal privacy, and she asked the court to officially restrain the local district attorney from enforcing the Texas abortion prohibition.

After motions were filed, the three-judge federal district court ruled that the Texas abortion laws were unconstitutionally vague and overbroad. The court held that the abortion restrictions infringed the "fundamental right of single women and married persons to choose whether to have children," and declared that they could not be enforced. The court entered a declaratory judgment for the plaintiffs but denied, as unnecessary, their request for a formal order enjoining enforcement of the abortion laws.

Both the defendant (Wade, the local district attorney) and the plaintiffs (Roe and other parties who had joined her suit) immediately appealed the judgment to the United States Supreme Court.

The case was argued twice before the Supreme Court. On January 22, 1973, the Court announced its decision in Roe v. Wade affirming, by a vote of 7-2, the ruling of the lower court that the Texas abortion laws were unconstitutional. Justice Harry Blackmun (who had represented the world-famous Mayo Clinic when he was a practicing lawyer) wrote the opinion for the Court.

Justice Blackmun began his opinion with a lengthy historical statement to prove that "the restrictive criminal abortion laws in effect in many of the states today are of relatively recent vintage." He examined three reasons which might "explain historically" the enactment of strict abortion laws in the nineteenth century: (1) to discourage illicit sexual relations, (2) to protect maternal health, and (3) to protect prenatal life. He rejected the first justification as being unworthy of serious consideration; he noted that medical advances making early abortion possibly safer to the mother than childbirth rendered the second consideration legitimate only "when an abortion is proposed at a later stage of pregnancy", and he recognized "that as long as it least potential life [of the fetus] is involved, the state may assert interests beyond the protection of the pregnant woman alone."

The opinion then cited prior judicial decisions which ostensibly had recognized an emerging, constitutionally protected right of privacy (sheltered by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment) and concluded: "This right of privacy . . . is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy." But the right to choose an abortion is not absolute, the Court declared. State abortion restrictions can be sustained when they are necessary to protect a compelling state interest.

Applying this standard of review to the Texas abortion laws, the Court first considered the argument that the fetus is a "person" within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. If the unborn are "persons," with a constitutionally protected "right of life," the Court noted, that would provide a "compelling" justification for the Texas abortion laws. However, examining the various usages of the word "person" in the Constitution and noting the history of the nineteenth-century abortion practices, the Court concluded that "the word 'person' as used in the Fourteenth Amendment, does not include the unborn."

The Court examined two other potentially compelling state interests—the state interest in protecting maternal health and in protecting the human life of the unborn. Because the risk to maternal health of first-trimester abortions "may be lower than mortality in childbirth," the Court concluded that any state interest in the health of the mother would provide compelling justification for abortion regulation only after the end of the first trimester of pregnancy. And because the Court perceived "a wide divergence of thinking" among theologians, philosphers, and physicians about when life begins, it concluded that the state interest in protecting the "potential life" of the unborn would become compelling only after the fetus became viable (suggested to be after 24-28 weeks of gestation) "because the fetus then presumably has the capability of meaningful life outside the mother's womb."

Therefore, the Court affirmed the district court's declaratory judgment that the Texas abortion laws were unconstitutional. The fatal flaws in the Texas laws were that they made no distinction between abortions performed early in the pregnancy and those performed later, and that they permitted abortions only when necessary to save the mother's life (without any explicit exception for her "health").

While only two Justices dissented from the Court's judgment, three other Justices filed separate concurring opinions. Mr. Justice Stewart's concurring opinion emphasized that the Court's decision was founded upon the doctrine of substantive due process, and that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protected "freedom of personal choice in matters of marriage and family life."

Chief Justice Burger agreed with the conclusion that the Texas statutes improperly prohibited the "performance of abortions necessary to protect the health of pregnant women, using the term health in its broadest medical context." He went on to state that he did not "read the Court's holding . . . as having the sweeping consequences attributed to them by the dissenting Justices."

Mr. Justice Douglas agreed that a pregnant woman has a fundamental right to "make the basic decision whether to bear an unwanted child." While the state also has a legitimate interest in protecting the woman's health and the life of the fetus "after quickening," he reasoned, any regulatory measures must be narrowly drafted and confined to the specific areas of compelling legislative concern.

Two vigorous dissenting opinions were filed. Mr. Justice White could find "nothing in the language or history of the Constitution" to support the Court's action, which he characterized as "an exercise of raw judicial power." Mr. Justice Rehnquist stressed that the policy analysis upon which the Court had based its decision was "far more appropriate to a legislative judgment than to a judicial one."

In the companion case, Doe v. Bolton, the Court (by the same vote, with the same justices concurring and dissenting) upheld another lower court's declaration that the Georgia abortion law, which had been revised in 1968 to follow the Model Penal Code's recommended abortion provisions, was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court's ruling in this case effectively meant that the liberalized Model Penal Code abortion provisions were unconstitutional.

The only appeal before the Court in Doe v. Bolton was the appeal of the plaintiffs, who had won a declaratory judgment that most, but not all, of the Georgia law was unconstitutional, but whose request for an official injunction had been denied. The Supreme Court confirmed and expanded the victory of these abortion-law opponents. While some of their privacy, vagueness, and equal-protection arguments were rejected, the Court agreed that the hospital accreditation requirements, abortion review committee requirements, mandatory medical consultation (two-doctor concurrence) provisions, and residency requirements were unconstitutional since they applied throughout pregnancy and were not justified by any compelling state interest (at least before viability).

Few, if any, other judicial opinions have had such revolutionary impact on life and law in the United States as Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton. As noted in Chapter One, the practical consequences of these two Supreme Court decisions have been enormous. Equally significant have been the effects they have had on existing abortion laws and on constitutional doctrine. Four of these legal consequences deserve specific consideration here.

First, the Court resorted to the doctrine of "substantive due process" in order to decide that a woman's decision to have an abortion is a "fundamental" constitutional right. Of course, the Constitution, particularly the Bill of Rights, explicitly mentions several rights, deemed "fundamental," which historically have been given special protection by the courts. These include freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, freedom from unreasonable search and seizure, and some others. But freedom of abortion is not mentioned anywhere in the Constitution or in any of its amendments.

To find that a pregnant woman has a "fundamental" constitutional right to choose to have an abortion, the Court in Roe v. Wade cited the Fourteenth Amendment, which protects all persons against deprivation of their "liberty" without due process of law. "Liberty" is a very broad term. Previous Supreme Court decisions had interpreted this term to include constitutional protection for certain "zones of privacy" including personal decisions relating to marriage, procreation, childrearing, and contraception. The Court in Roe v. Wade concluded that a woman's decision whether or not to have an abortion was an equally important matter that deserved special judicial protection under the Fourteenth Amendment as a fundamental constitutional right.

This particular justification for giving special judicial protection to activities not specifically described in the Constitution is not new. In fact, for many years it was well known, and severely criticized. At one time, laissez-faire capitalism was deemed to be a special, albeit unmentioned, constitutionally protected "liberty." Between 1890 and 1934 the United States Supreme Court invalidated over two hundred progressive economic and social regulations (e.g., child labor laws, minimum wage laws, and employee health and safety regulations) because they interfered with "economic due process," that is, with laissez-faire capitalism. Eventually, this resort to substantive due process evoked enormous scholarly criticism and political pressure, and ultimately the Supreme Court not only abandoned this doctrine but tried to bury the carcass.

But substantive due process did not stay buried. In 1965 the Court resorted to the same type of reasoning to invalidate a relatively unpopular Connecticut law restricting use of contraceptives. And in Roe v. Wade, as Justice Stewart emphasized in his concurring opinion, there was no doubt that the Court was resurrecting substantive due process in its most potent form.

Second, by giving the right to choose abortion the specific status of a fundamental constitutional right, the Court substantially altered the respective roles of the legislature and the judiciary in supervising this activity. Fundamental rights analysis (i.e., substantive due process) seems to invite, and excuse, exceptional judicial activism.

When a court examines the constitutionality of a statute or a rule, it is exercising the power of judicial review. There are several different standards or "tests" which may be applied under judicial review. When someone claims that his or her participation in an ordinary activity is unconstitutionally restrained, the standard of judicial review is modest. The Court presumes the restrictive law or rule is constitutional, and if it finds that the law is "rationally related" to a "legitimate" governmental objective, it will uphold the law. However, if someone claims that the law interferes with their exercise of a "fundamental" constitutional right, then the standard of review is much stricter. Laws infringing upon fundamental constitutional rights will only be upheld if they are "narrowly drafted" and "necessary" to effectuate a"compelling state interest." The permissible purposes of legislation are fewer and the scope of appropriate legislative innovation is much narrower when the law infringes upon a fundamental constitutional right. The judiciary is much more aggressive in reviewing state regulation of fundamental constitutional rights. Thus, by declaring that a pregnant woman's decision regarding aboriton was part of a new fundamental constitutional right of privacy, the Supreme Court gave the courts a substantially greater role (and, conversely, left legislatures and administrative agencies substantially less authority) to regulate abortion.

Laws which unduly burden activities that are specifically mentioned in the Constitution (speech, exercise of religion, etc.) have been subject to a strict standard of judicial review for many years. Because those rights are specifically mentioned in the Constitution, legislators are forewarned that they are fundamental rights and that their legislative prerogatives in dealing with such activities are limited. But Roe opened up an entire new field for judicial governance.

Third, Roe v. Wade substantially affected federal-state relations in regard to abortion regulation. Historically, the states had the primary role in dealing with abortion. As long as there had been American states, the states had exercised the power to prohibit abortion. Laws regulating abortion differed from state to state and, by 1970, there were significant differences between them. The "rational relation" standard of judicial review allowed, if not encouraged, this diversity. So long as a rule or statue was rationally related to a legitimate state interest it would be upheld. And there were many legitimate state interests (i.e., maternal health, prenatal life, and the historic value of respect for life) that rationally could be supported by a wide variety of abortion laws.

But in Roe v. Wade the Supreme Court constitutionalized abortion. Constitutional law is the supreme law of the land. By making the abortion decision a constitutionally protected fundamental right, the regulation of abortion became subject to the strict compelling state interest standard of judicial review by federal courts. The compelling state interest test of judicial review allows little room for deviation from the constitutional standard. Thus, the rational abortion laws in effect in all 50 states were overridden by the new, fundamental constitutional right of abortion privacy, which was entirely created and wholly defined by the federal judiciary. Accordingly, ultimate responsibility for abortion regulation shifted from the legislative branches of the various state governments to the judicial branch of the federal government.

Finally, the Supreme Court dramatically altered the substance of the existing abortion laws. It effectively invalidated (totally or in part) the abortion laws in effect in all 50 states. For not only were the nineteenth-century abortion laws, like those of Texas, which only allowed abortions when a woman's life was endangered, declared unconstitutional, but laws based on the modern liberal approach of the Model Penal Code, like those of Georgia, were effectively declared unconstitutional. Even routine medical regulations applicable to abortion, again like those of Georgia, were nullified.

The Court was aware that it was effectively erasing all of the abortion laws in the country. Therefore, it outlined a model of permissible abortion regulation—which may be called the "trimester rules" because they are tied to the three trimesters of pregnancy—as follows:

"(a) For the stage prior to approximately the end of the first trimester, the abortion decision and its effectuation must be left to the medical judgment of the pregnant woman's attending physician.

"(b) For the stage subsequent to approximately the end of the first trimester, the State, in promoting its interest in the health of the mother, may, if it chooses, regulate the abortion procedure in ways that are reasonably related to maternal health.

"(c) For the stage subsequent to viability, the State in promoting its interest in the potentiality of human life may, if it chooses, regulate and even proscribe, abortion except where it is necessary, in appropriate medical judgment, for the preservation of the life or health of the mother."

For purposes of judicial review, the trimester rules created some important rebuttable presumptions regarding whether or not a compelling state interest is present. Roe provided that during the first trimester it must be presumed that there is not a compelling state interest for any type of abortion regulation. After the end of the first trimester, it is presumed that the state has a compelling interest for some medical regulation of abortion in order to protect maternal health. And after viability, it is presumed that the state has a compelling interest for regulations designed to protect fetal life, also. However, in each instance the presumption is rebuttable. The Roe trimester rules complement the strict standard of judicial review required under the Roe doctrine of abortion privacy.

It is popularly believed that Roe legalized abortion on demand only during the first trimester. This is not true, for the Court held in Roe that a woman's decision whether or not to have an abortion could not be regulated at all before viability, that is, before five-to-seven months' gestation. The end of the first trimester is only significant in that it marks the point at which the state may presumably regulte the medical aspects of abortion (i.e., regulate how and where the abortion procedure may be safely performed). (See Chapter Nine.) But during the second trimester, until viability, the state may not restrict or interfere with the right of the woman to choose to have an abortion for any reason, or for no reason whatever. And even after viability, the Supreme Court said, the state cannot prohibit abortions necessary to save the life or health of the mother. (See Chapter Ten). Thus, the Court effectively mandated legalized abortion on demand until viability, and, depending on the interpretation of "health," possibly afterward as well.

Roe and Doe did not mark the end of the abortion law revolution. The right of abortion privacy created by the Court in those two cases has been the subject of massive and intense litigation since 1973. More than 250 reported federal court decisions, and numerous state court cases, have expanded this new abortion right to extremes that were imagined by few, if any, a decade ago. So revolutionary have been the effects of Roe and its progeny that the public controversy over abortion no longer concerns whether broader exceptions to the old rule prohibiting abortion should be recognized by state legislators, but whether any exceptions to the rule of legalized abortion on demand will be permitted by the federal courts.

In the chapters that follow, federal judicial responses to specific questions and issues that have risen in the wake of Roe are examined. While these chapters demonstrate some of the extent to which the Roe doctrine has been carried, they contain only a sampling of the issues and cases; they describe only the tip of this judicially created iceberg.

THE SUPREME COURT AND ABORTION

Since Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton were decided by the Supreme Court there has been a virtual eruption of abortion litigation in the federal courts. Approximately 250 federal court opinions have been reported in cases dealing with a great variety of abortion issues and have spawned an enormous body of law. A brief review of the federal court decisions applying this protean doctrine of constitutional law will illustrate.

All criminal laws prohibiting abortion before viability are unconstitutional and invalid. So are all criminal laws prohibiting abortion after viability that do not make exception for abortions necessary to save the life or health of the mother. State laws allowing post-viability abortions only when there is a threat to the mother's physical health, have also been stricken.

Laws requiring that abortions be performed by doctors are permissible, but some requiring more specific qualifications have been invalidated. Laws regulating the facilities in which abortions are performed during the first trimester often have been invalidated, and some laws requiring second-trimester abortions to be performed in hospitals also have been struck down. Some courts have held that abortion clinics can be required to meet ordinary medical health and sanitation requirements, but other courts have held that such restrictions are not applicable to first-trimester abortion clinics. Laws requiring a second medical opinion or committee approval for pre-viability abortions are invalid. Ordinary medical record keeping and reporting requirements are not unconstitutional, but if they ask too much information or do not preserve confidentiality, they have been declared to be invalid.

Restrictions on the type of abortion procedures that can be used in pre-viability abortions have been consistently invalidated by federal courts. State attempts to establish uniform, objectively applicable definitions of viability have been invalidated unless they merely repeat general conceptual statements contained in Supreme Court opinions, and even some of these have been invalidated. Laws requiring doctors to determine whether the unborn child is viable before performing an abortion have been invalidated by some courts, including the Supreme Court. So have laws requiring doctors to obtain second opinions before post-viability abortions for the purpose of preserving maternal life or health. Even laws requiring that the abortion of a viable child be performed by the method least likely to injure or kill the child have been struck down.

When the child is aborted alive, of course, he or she is entitled to the same constitutional guarantees as the woman on whom the abortion is performed (or the physician performing the abortion). Still, state laws requiring the attendance of a second physician to protect the interests of post-viability fetuses aborted alive have been invalidated by some courts. Additionally, statutory provisions for the termination of the rights of parents who approve the performance of nontherapeutic abortions have generally been invalidated, although a requirement that a local child protection agency or court be notified in the case of such an abortion has been upheld. Most laws prohibiting fetal experimentation on children aborted alive have been upheld. One statute that extended the protection of state murder laws to children aborted alive, by including them in the definition of "individuals" was invalidated.

State laws requiring that the physician performing an abortion obtain the written informed consent of the women have been upheld, or stricken, depending on the specificity required. Laws requiring only that the woman give her informed consent, without attempting to define what that means, have usually been upheld, but requirements of disclosure of specific risks of abortion or the facts of fetal development generally have been invalidated. The courts are split on whether or not state laws requiring a brief waiting period between the initial decision to have an abortion and the performance of the abortion are valid; most courts, however, have struck down such requirements.

Laws requiring spousal consent to abortion are unconstitutional. Courts are split on whether or not laws requiring spousal notification prior to an abortion are permissible. Parental consent requirements are also unconstitutional, but parental notification requirements are not, at least as applied to unemancipated minors.

Medical personnel cannot legally be forced to participate in abortions against their objections, and laws so providing are valid. It is generally held that private hospitals can refuse to perform elective abortions, and state statutes affirming or protecting that right have been held to be valid. But it is not clear that public hospitals have the same right. The Supreme Court has upheld the restrictive abortion policy of one public hospital, but that case has been distinguished (i.e., its precedential weight avoided because of factual distinctions absent in the other cases) by some lower courts.

It is now clear that neither the Constitution nor the federal Medicaid Act requires the public funding of elective or nonlifesaving abortions. But state laws attempting to avoid the indirect subsidizing of abortions by refusing to give family planning grants to abortion-performing or -referring organizations have been invalidated.

Laws prohibiting the advertising of abortion are unconstitutional. Residency requirements applicable to women seeking abortions are unconstitutional. Some zoning ordinances restricting the location of abortion clinics have been invalidated; others have been upheld. Some regulations governing the disposition of aborted fetuses have been sustained; others have been struck down.

This new and rapidly growing body of law has generated confusion, public controversy, and professional criticism. The preceding chapters have noted some of these criticisms. But perhaps even more important than the unreasonable holdings of some courts in specific cases on particular issues are the broader, systemic problems created by the abortion decisions. Two general institutional dangers are posed by the abortion cases. They concern the shift in the constitutional balance of powers, and the decline in quality and craftsmanship of federal judicial decision making.

The shift in the constitutional balance of powers

The Constitution is the supreme law of the land. It prevails over any other source of law that conflicts with it.

In Roe v. Wade the Supreme Court held that a woman's right to decide whether or not to have an abortion free from governmental coercion is a fundamental right embedded in the Constitution. Of course, that is not literally true. The Constitution itself does not really guarantee any such right. The word "privacy" does not appear in the Constitution; neither does the word "abortion." Nothing in the text of the Constitution or in the history of its creation suggests that the states are powerless to prohibit or restrict abortion. Nevertheless, such is presently the law because that is what a majority of the members of the Supreme Court said the Constitution means. That is why some legal scholars believe that the most dangerous result of the abortion decisions is not the substantive rule of law created by the Court, but, rather, the potential shift in the constitutional balance of governmental powers.

The United States constitutional system is predicated on the concept that a concentration of governmental power in any one department or level of government is dangerous. Thus, the drafters of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights not only reserved to the states all sovereign powers now expressly delegated to the federal government, they also carefully divided the powers of the federal government between the legislative, executive, and judicial branches. Of those three branches, the judiciary was considered by the founding fathers to be "the least dangerous," primarily because it would only interpret, not create, legal policy.

Ironically, in many social controversies the judiciary makes the final decision and, therefore, exercises what is potentially the most powerful influence. The role of the courts to speak the final word on many controversial issues derives from the well-established authority of the judiciary to interpret the Constitution. One of the greatest sources of constitutional strength, and one of the most important reasons of its continued viability, is the generality of the language of the Constitution. All of the most prominent constitutional provisions are lacking in the kind of specificity that gives the answers to particular questions in specific situations. And this gives rise to the necessity for someone, some branch of the government, to determine what these broad, general constitutional provisions mean as they apply to specific cases.

For almost two centuries, since the landmark decision in Marbury v. Madison, the function of pouring specific content into the broad generalities of the Constitution has belonged to the courts. There are two basic reasons why the judiciary has exercised this power of constitutional interpretation. First, the Constitution is part of the nation's law, and interpretation of law is the traditional function of the courts. Judges are trained to interpret laws. Thus, judges are probably better suited to interpret the Constitution than are legislators or executive officers of the government. Second, the courts have a constitutionally imposed responsibility to check and restrain the excesses of the democratically elected branches of government. The Constitution itself contains certain explicit limitations on the rights and powers of government, probably the most famous being the Bill of Rights. It has long been recognized that in a pure democracy minority groups and interests may not be adequately protected against the "tyranny of the majority." Since federal judges are appointed, not popularly elected, and their appointments are for life, they are somewhat insulated from the pressures of the popular will. Thus, they have a special role in protecting institutional minorities and enforcing constitutional restrictions on the powers of the democratic branches of the government.

The power of the federal courts to interpret the Constitution is not unrestricted, however. The power to say what the Constitution means is subject to important limitations. In his first inaugural address, Abraham Lincoln probably expressed the reason for these limitations as well as anyone:

"If the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions[,] the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal."

The most powerful check on the power of the Supreme Court to interpret the Constitution is the right of the people to amend the Constitution and thereby overturn any constitutional interpretation made by the Supreme Court. But the amending processes established by Article Five of the Constitution are extremely difficult to invoke. In fact, during the entire history of the nation, constitutional interpretations by the Supreme Court have been overturned by the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution only four or five times.

Article Three of the Constitution also gives Congress substantial power to regulate and determine the jurisdiction of the federal courts. But respect for the independence of the federal judiciary is so deeply rooted in political traditions that Congress has rarely exercised its power to restrict federal jurisdiction.

The separation of powers in the Constitution is the source of a more pragmatic restraint on judicial license. Under the Constitution, the federal judiciary is dependent upon the other branches of government if it is to function effectively. Apart from judges' salaries (which constitutionally may not be reduced during a judge's term of office), the federal judicial system depends entirely upon appropriations from Congress to perform it functions. And it depends upon the executive branch to carry out and enforce its decrees.

More important than the formal constitutional limitations on judicial power of interpretation are the restraints imposed by judges upon themselves. For while the interests of good government require that the judiciary have far-reaching power to interpret the Constitution, the interests of good government do not require that this power always be exercised to the fullest extent. Indeed, perhaps the highest manifestation of respect for power is the willingness not to use it. Federal courts have historically exercised great self-restraint in reviewing the constitutionality of legislation out of deference to the coequal dignity and constitutional responsibilities of the other branches of government.

The extraordinary record of self-restraint by the federal judiciary, especially the remarkable tradition of deference to basic policy decisions made by the legislatures, is due primarily to federal judges' respect for and commitment to the democratic principles which underlie the constitutional system of government. Still, the right of nonelected judges to overturn policy decisions made by elected representatives of the people is built into the Contitution; yet, if not exercised with sober restraint, it would violate the fundamental principle of self-government and weaken respect for the political neutrality of the judiciary, which is a key source of judicial power and authority in a democracy. It is to their credit that the federal courts, historically, have generally honored these principles. But it is on this very point that the Supreme Court has received its most severe criticism for its abortion decisions. The principle of self-government teaches that the people, through their elected representatives, should be able to establish social policy regarding abortion, and the Supreme Court abortion decisions in large measure contradict this democratic ideal.

Why should the United States Supreme Court, instead of state legislatures, establish social policy regarding abortion? Three primary justifications have been offered. First, it has been suggested that judicial action was necessary to prevent state legislatures from exceeding their constitutional authority. But constitutional history solidly refutes this notion. The states have had, and have exercised, the power to prohibit abortion for two centuries, both before and after the Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment (with its due process guarantee) were adopted. Nor was judicial intervention necessary because the states had enacted new, excessive abortion restrictions. State abortion laws were more liberal in 1973 than they had been a century earlier when the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, and for a half-dozen years immediately preceding Roe the unbroken and rapidly growing trend of state legislative reform had not been to tighten abortion restrictions, but to substantially relax them.

Second, another established exception to the rule of judicial deterence to the will of the legislative majority is when judicial action is necessary to protect the rights of a minority group that is unable to protect its own interests in the political arena. Thus, in a famous footnote in a Supreme Court opinion, Justice Stone rhetorically suggested that judicial action to overturn legislation constitutionally would be proper to block invidious "statutes directed at particular religious, national or racial minorities" because "prejudice directed against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities."

In the abortion context, however, it seems that the label "discrete and insular minority" would best apply to the unborn. They are the group of human beings least capable of protecting themselves in the political arena. Unlike most other "discrete and insular minorities," such as religious or ethnic minorities, the unborn cannot vote, lobby, or exercise any political influence. They cannot even speak for themselves to plead their own cause. Yet this particular minority was the victim, not the beneficiary, of judicial intervention in the abortion cases. Not only did the Supreme Court turn its own back on these outcasts in Roe and Doe, but it also effectively ordered all other branches of government to refrain from protecting them. (In this sense, Roe and Doe represent a deviation from the liberal ideals of the American judicial tradition, reminiscent of such past judicial disasters as Dred Scott v. Sanford, which ruled that blacks were neither citizens nor persons, and Plessy v. Ferguson, which emasculated the Fourteenth Amendment by approving direct and invidious racial discrimination.)

Of course, if the rights of the unborn are disregarded, a plausible argument can be made that poor women burdened with unwanted pregnancies are a discrete and insular minority, whose interests the Court was protecting when it decided Roe. But the prerequisite for this position is, to say the least, troubling.

Third, it has been suggested that judicial action was necessary because religious entanglement was so great that the democratic processes were "frozen" against abortion. But the phenomenal successes that the abortion law reformers achieved in such a short time—actually persuading more than a third of the states to liberalize their abortion laws in the space of only six years—belies such an argument.

The above arguments notwithstanding, there is no real constitutional justification for the Supreme Court having usurped the right to establish social policy regarding abortion. Thus, distinguished law professor John Hart Ely chastised the Court "not so much [because] it bungles the question it sets itself, but rather [because] it sets itself a question the Constitution has not made the Court's business." Many judges, especially in the early years after Roe was decided, have echoed this concern. In response to a survey by a political science professor in 1975 and 1976, 165 federal judges and 84 state court judges expressed their discomfort with the abortion decisions. "Most judges in both samples labeled Roe v. Wade massive 'judicial legislation.'"

This is a serious criticism. In effect, the Supreme Court has been accused of exceeding the limits of its constitutional authority and of violating the constitutional principle of separation of powers by "legislating" social policy. That is probably why Justices White and Rehnquist refused to join in the judgment or the opinion of the majority in the abortion cases. Justice White succinctly articulated his objection when he dissented in Roe and Doe.

"With all due respect, I dissent. I find nothing in the language or history of the Constitution to support the Court's judgments. The Court simply fashions and announces a new constitutional right for pregnant women and, with scarcely any reason or authority for its action, invests that right with sufficient substance to override most existing state abortion statutes. The upshot is that the people and the legislatures of the 50 States are constitutionally disentitled to weigh the relative importance of the continued existence and development of the fetus, on the one hand, against a spectrum of possible impacts on the mother, on the other hand. As an exercise of raw judicial power, the Court perhaps has authority to do what it does today; but in my view its judgment is an improvident and extravagant exercise of the power of judicial review that the Constitution extends to this Court."

The departure from accepted standards of judicial conduct in the abortion cases

No citizens have been more distressed over the abortion decisions of the Supreme Court than admirers and defenders of the federal judical system. Many of these professionals have been deeply disturbed because the abortion decisions represent a departure from the accepted standards of performance, professionalism, and integrity in the federal judical system.

As a landmark decision of the U.S. Supreme Court, Roe v. Wade set a poor standard of professional craftsmanship and decision-making practices for the entire federal judicial system. The influence of that poor standard can be seen in many of the 250 or so other federal court opinions dealing with abortion.

The first and fundamental professional failing in the abortion decisions is the absence of credible legal analysis in the opinions. This is a crucial defect, for one primary characteristic of the judicial decision-making process that distinguishes it from those of the executive and legislative is the resort to and articulation of principled legal analysis to support conclusions. Professor Herbert Wechsler, in his classic dissertation on neutral principles, declared that "the virtue or demerit of a judgment turns . . . entirely on the reasons that support it and their adequacy to maintain any choice of values it decrees. . . ." Former California Supreme Court Chief Justice Roger Traynor put it this way: "A judge must do more than decree; he must reason every inch of the way."

The opinions of the Supreme Court in Roe and Doe lack this sort of principled or disciplined analysis. Thus, Professor Alexander Bickel Chastised the Supreme Court for failing to explain why the Consititution required the Court to reach its extreme result. "One is left to ask why. The Court never said. I refused the discipline to which its function is properly subject. It simply asserted the result it reached." Professor Richard Epstein observed that the Court's opinion was so poorly written that "[w]hat seemed to make sense as a matter of principle to a lot of people and a lot of lawyers is all of a sudden suspect." And Professor Archibald Cox declared: "My criticism of Roe v. Wade is that the Court failed to establish the legitimacy of the decision by not articulating a precept of specific abstractness to lift the ruling above the level of political judgment." In short, the opinions in Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton fall below the acceptable standards of the federal judiciary and the legal profession.

Roe and Doe are so poorly reasoned that it has been difficult to the lower courts to give consistent application of those cases, especially in the early years. In this respect, Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton have clearly lowered the standard of performance of the lower federal courts. Judicial craftsmanship and credible legal analysis are in large measure absent in most of the early, and some of the recent, lower court abortion decisions. Fortunately, credible legal analysis is more common in abortion decisions today, but still some courts are satisfied to employ mere rhetorical slogans instead of disciplined legal analysis to justify their conclusions.

The lower courts have also mimicked the doctrinalism of the Supreme Court. Thus, when new issues have arisen, they have tended to follow the example of the High Court by going to extremes. In fact, Roe v. Wade has become the touchstone for an increased resort to judicial activism. The judicially created constitutional doctrine of "privacy," read in light of Roe and Doe, could constitute virtually a carte blanche for federal judges to legislate almost anything under the pretext of interpreting the Constitution.

Since the Court gave no satisfactory justification in Roe and Doe for invalidating historic state abortion laws, some lower courts have turned to a result-oriented approach to dealing with abortion cases. That is, the analytical ambiguities and the absence of disciplined judicial analysis in the Supreme Court abortion decisions have seemed to convey the message that the result, not the reasoning, is all that really matters. And the results in the Supreme Court case have obviously been hostile to almost all attempts to regulate or restrict abortion.

This, in turn, is related to the problem of excessive resort to stare decisis (adherence to precedents) to resolve new issues concerning abortion. Properly followed, the doctrine of stare decisis insures that litigants with the same claims will be treated equally by the courts and that the administration of the ruling) in prior opinions is stultifying. And if the claims raised in a current case are not the same as those ruled on in an earlier one, it is a perversion of stare decisis to say that the issue in the later case is closed by the former decision.

The lower federal courts, especially in the early years, have displayed a tendency to cite Roe as the dispositive authority on significantly different issues than those involved in Roe. Instead of independently analyzing unprecedented issues, some courts have cited the Supreme Court abortion dicisions and said something like: "We do not need to independently examine this issue, for the result in this case is dictated by the Supreme Court's decision in Roe v. Wade." Such excessive resort to the doctrine of stare decisis is troubling because it causes decay or stagnation of the law and creates a substantial threat to the validity and viability of the law. The failure of lower federal courts to candidly examine, evaluate, criticize, and limit the Roe doctrine of abortion privacy has contributed to much of the extremism in the substantive content of the doctrine of abortion privacy as it has developed in the federal courts.

Related to the inappropriate invocation of stare decisis is the paucity of criticism or cautionary limitation of the Roe doctrine of abortion privacy by the lower courts. In light of the fact that the federal courts that considered the legality of abortion before Roe v. Wade were divided almost evenly, and in light of the extensive scholarly criticism of Roe and the political controversy that it has generated, the infrequency of dissents-in-principle or criticism of the excesses of Roe within the federal judicial system is surprising. It is also disturbing, for the "sheltering" of legal doctrines from the internal process of criticism and refinement within the judicial system leads to institutional instability and the crystalization of unreality in the law.

Finally, in the last two or three years there has developed a new and very serious problem in the abortion cases. This is the problem of the misuse of the Civil Rights Act provision authorizing courts to award attorneys' fees to prevailing parties.

The well-established American rule on awarding attorney's fees is that each side must bear its own legal expenses unless the parties have (1) otherwise agreed (as in a contract providing for recovery of legal fees), (2) the losing party has been guilty of bad faith, or (3) a statute explicitly authorizes the awarding of attorneys fees to the prevailing party. Obviously the first exception does not apply in abortion cases because the litigants have not contracted with each other that the prevailing party is entitled to recover attorneys fees. Likewise, the second exception does not apply. The sincerity of the litigants, the complexity of the issues, and the uncertainty of the law have provided ample justification for good faith abortion litigation. (In only one reported case did a federal court find that the position of the losing—pro-life—side was so unjustified that attorneys fees should be awarded under the bad faith exception, and on appeal the Supreme Court not only vacated that award but adopted the very substantive position which had been the basis for the lower court's finding of bad faith.)

Recently, however, several federal courts have awarded attorneys' fees to abortion activists who have succeeded in their lawsuits to invalidate certain abortion regulations or restrictions under the third exception. For instance, in one case three abortionist physicians and their abortion clinic brought suit against the Kentucky law that mandated a 24-hour waiting period prior to abortion, and required all abortions after the end of the first trimester to be performed in hospitals. The lower court held that both requirements were unconstitutional. The defendants in the case were the state of Kentucky and three pro-life physicians who voluntarily intervened in the case to defend the statute. After invalidating the law, the lower court ordered the defendants—including the three doctors—to pay the plaintiffs $38,564.55 in attorneys fees under the Civil Rights Act.

This incident is troubling for several reasons. First, an award of attorneys fees in a suit brought to establish and determine social policy on a controversial contemporary issue is tenuous under the legislative history or language of the Civil Rights Act. It is doubtful that the civil rights law was intended to be used in this context at all.

Second, to order good faith losing litigants to pay their opponent's attorneys fees smacks of penalizing groups and individuals for attempting to exercise their right of political expression. When the issue of abortion policy was decided in the legislature one side would win and the other side would lose, but each side would have to bear their own expenses of that battle. Political winners did not claim that they were entitled to public reimbursement for the expenses of the contest. If the winning side had attempted to force the losing side to pay the winning side's expenses, not only would the citizenry have been outraged, but the federal courts would have acted immediately to protect the First Amendment rights of the losers. But now that the right to resolve this issue has been taken away from the legislatures by the federal courts, some federal courts themselves, through their award of attorneys' fees, are doing just that. They are penalizing those who attempt to express their opinion and influence the establishment of political policy. And they are exercising their "discretion" to financially punish state legislatures for guessing wrong about future rulings of the federal courts on very complicated abortion issues, when the federal courts themselves have frequently been unable to correctly apply the abortion doctrine. The awarding of attorneys' fees in abortion litigation is unwise as a matter of public policy, and questionable as a matter of legislative interpretation.

The law of abortion in the United States is in need of reform. The primary problems with the current doctrine of abortion law include: (1) the federal courts have taken extreme and often inflexible positions on specific issues, such as the permissibility of specific and informed-consent requirements, parental and spousal participation consent requirements, second-trimester abortion facility restrictions, and numerous others; (2) the judiciary has created and constitutionalized a legislative social policy issue in derogation of the constitutional separation of powers and has abandoned a vulnerable and defenseless class—the unborn; and (3) the courts have largely departed from established judicial standards of professionalism and craftsmanship. The legal and political methods of achieving reforms in these areas are considered in the remaining chapters.

A PRIVATE CHOICE: ABORTION IN AMERICA IN THE SEVENTIES

(By John T. Noonan, Jr.)

The makers of the Constitution of the United States do not appear to have contemplated the subject of abortion. There is no mention of it by name or by circumlocution in the original articles or in the Bill of Rights or in any of the later amendments. If a Martian were told to examine the document carefully for a clue to the framers' intention regarding abortion, he would have to admit himself baffled. The Constitution, within its four corners, says nothing.

A Martian with a sense of history might say, "Tell me what the laws and practices and beliefs were when the Constitution was made. From them I shall infer what was intended by the framers." He would find

1. that in 1789, when the original articles were adopted, Blackstone was the bible of American lawyers, and Blackstone taught that a "person" was one "like us" who had been "formed by God" in the womb

2. that abortion, although not widely practiced because of medical difficulties in doing it safely, was a crime at common law if the pregnancy had reached the stage where movements by the child were perceptible; and if the child in the womb was injured by an abortifacient, was born alive, and died from his injury, the crime was murder

3. that the articles gave the new government no power to disturb the administration of the common law by the states

4. that in 1790, when the first ten amendments or Bill of Rights was adopted, the common law and the beliefs expressed by Blackstone were unchanged

5. that the Fifth Amendment declared the life, liberty, and property of no person should be taken by the national government except by due process of law

6. that the Ninth Amendment declared that all powers not expressly conferred upon the national government belonged to the People, thereby leaving to the People the protection of life, liberty, and property through the legislatures and courts of each state

7. that "the most important burst of anti-abortion legislation in the nation's history" occurred between 1860 and 1880, and that the Fourteenth Amendment, adopted in 1868, belongs to that era of American politics

8. that in 1868, when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, the common law made abortion a crime after quickening, and a number of states, including such leading Northern states as Connecticut and Pennsylvania, made abortion a crime from conception

9. that in the 1860s the federal territories of Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and Nevada had all made it a crime to abort "a woman then big with child," and such territorial legislation was subject to the approval of the same congressmen who adopted the Fourteenth Amendment

10. that the Fourteenth Amendment imposed upon each state the obligation already imposed upon the national government not to take life, liberty, or property without due process of law

So informed, our Martian might reason: What the framers knew to be a crime at common law in the states when they made the Constitution, they did not intend to legalize; indeed the protection afforded the unborn at common law accorded with their view of the protection to be afforded persons. When the Framers reserved to the People all powers not expressly conferred upon the nation, they did not intend to disable the People from legislating to protect life; indeed, in the distribution of governmental power intended by the founders, the states were to protect life by the ordinary laws against murder, manslaughter, and abortion.

By the time the Fourteenth Amendment was enacted, our Martian would observe, every state employed the sanction of the criminal law to regulate abortion. Surely the authors of the amendment must have approved or at least accepted this practice; for nothing in their language, or in any of the debates surrounding the adoption of the amendment, suggested that the amendment aimed at the abolition of the abortion laws of the federal territories and all the states. Indeed, our Martian might suspect, the states, now under constitutional obligation not to take life without due process, might have a constitutional obligation to have laws regulating abortion.

Certainly, he would conclude, the obligation not to limit liberty without due process of law could not affect an abortion law. In a hundred ways, he could observe, the laws of the states impair your liberty. You cannot walk at will on your neighbor's grass, you cannot keep your children at will from school, you cannot sleep with your father's wife, you cannot practice surgery without a license or perform it on a minor without the parent's consent, you cannot refuse to support the child you have conceived. In these and many other ways, liberty of private action is curtailed. It is curtailed by "due process of law," and such curtailment has never been supposed to be unconstitutional. The laws restricting abortion do not appear to differ in kind from the laws restricting trespass and incest or the laws requiring the support and education of one's children or the laws regulating surgery. There is nothing in the text of the Fourteenth Amendment to suggest that there is a liberty which no process of law may touch, restrict, or regulate. So, the Martian would conclude from the clues of history, the articles and amendments of the American Constitution do not forbid the governmental regulation of abortion.

The Martian, however, if he came to earth in the bicentennial year of the American Republic, would be wrong. For the Constitution of the United States means not only what its words say or its framers intended. It is a document, like the scriptures of a religion, whose words are sacred, but whose meaning changes as it is reinterpreted in the light of changing circumstances. Its interpreters control its meaning.

The process of interpretation is often beneficent. The framers could never have thought of television when they guaranteed the freedom of speech, but interpretation now makes that freedom include freedom to communicate electronically. The framers did nothing to provide counsel to a defendant too poor to afford a lawyer even when they adopted the Sixth Amendment guaranteeing the right to counsel. Interpretation has made that guarantee include the right of a poor man, in some circumstances, to have his lawyer furnished by the government. The Constitution has expanded beyond its letter and beyond the practice of the day it was made. When such expansion is true to the most fundamental purposes of the framers, it may be called a true development of their thought.

Every citizen is, to a degree, an interpreter of the Constitution; the President and the Congress have to be, and the courts are in a special way. By its own decisions, accepted by nearly everyone, the final interpreter is the Supreme Court of the United States. What the Supreme Court determines to be the law is the law of the land. What the Supreme Court says the Constitution means is what the Constitution means.

Such a conclusion, of course, is not as absolute as it appears. The Supreme Court can be wrong. What the Supreme Court says the Constitution means can do violence to every criterion of history and logic. Instead of developing the purposes of the framers, the Court can subvert them. The Supreme Court can find in the term "liberty" in the Fourteenth Amendment the liberty of a factory owner to work his employees more than ten hours a day, and the Court can be outrageously wrong in so finding. But the law of the land, the meaning of the Constitution as a legal document, will be what the Court says the meaning is, until it admits its error or is corrected by a constitutional amendment.

A decision of the Supreme Court, then, is the last word on the meaning of the Constitution—for the time being. The interpretation offered by the Court can last only as long as the Court is convinced that the interpretation is correct. The Court's conviction of its own correctness does not depend solely on its own precedents; otherwise there would be no change and no reversals of direction by the Court. Like it or not, the Court is engaged in an exchange with its critics, in which its critics always have the power to persuade the Court that it was wrong, or the power to persuade the President to appoint successor justices who believe the Court was wrong, or the power to persuade the country to adopt an amendment to the Constitution correcting the error of the Court.

At one time the Court thought that "liberty" in the Constitution prevented regulation by the state of the terms of employment, because any regulation interfered with the self-evident liberty of each man to set his own terms for his own work. It was contrary to the Constitution for a state to say a man could not dispose of his own body by agreeing to work ten hours a day. Twelve years later the Court said that the Constitution permitted such regulation of liberty. The change occurred not because the words of the Constitution changed but because critics persuaded the Court that it was wrong.

In the matter of abortion the words of the Constitution did not change, but on January 22, 1973, its meaning did. On that day Justice Harry Blackmum found in the Ninth Amendment's reservation of power to the People or in the Fourteenth Amendment's reference to liberty—he was not entirely sure in which—a liberty to consent to an abortion. On that date the Constitution come to mean that abortion was an American freedom.

THE SUPREME COURT AND EVOLVING PRINCIPLE

(By Alexander M. Bickel)

(Alexander M. Bickel was Sterling Professor of Law at Yale University until his death in November, 1974 (at age 49). A one-time law clerk to Justice Felix Frankfurter (1952), he was generally regarded as an influential authority on matters of constitutional law (he was chief counsel for The New York Times in the Pentagon Papers case). This article is taken from his posthumously-published book, The Morality of Consent (reprinted with permission of Yale University Press, © 1975 by Joanne Bickel.)

Since few principles are inscribed sharply in the Constitution itself, the Supreme Court speaking in the name of the Constitution fills, in part, the need for middle-distance principles that [Edmund] Burke described. It proffers, with some important exceptions, a series of admonitions, an eighteenth-century checklist of subjects; it does this cautiously and with some skepticism. It recognizes that principles are necessary, have evolved, and should continue to evolve in the light of history and changing circumstance. That—and not Hugo Black's—is the Constitution as the Framers wrote it. And that is what it must be in a secular democratic society, where the chief reliance for policy-making is placed in the political process.

The Constitution, said Justice Holmes in a famous dissent in 1905,[1] "is made for people of fundamentally differing views." Few definite, comprehensive answers on matters of social and economic policy can be deduced from it. The judges, themselves abstracted from, removed from political institutions by several orders of magnitude, ought never to impose an answer on the society merely because it seems prudent and wise to them personally, or because they believe that an answer—always provisional—arrived at by the political institutions is foolish. The Court's first obligation is to move cautiously, straining for decisions in small compass, more hesitant to deny principles held by some segments of the society than ready to affirm comprehensive ones for all, mindful of the dominant role the political institutions are allowed, and always anxious first to invent compromises and accommodations before declaring firm and unambiguous principles.

Yet in the end, and even if infrequently, we do expect the Court to give us principle, the limits of which can be sensed but not defined and are communicated more as cautions than as rules. Confined to a profession, the explication of principle is disciplined, imposing standards of analytical candor, rigor, and clarity. The Court is to reason, not feel, to explain and justify principles it pronounces to the last possible rational decimal point. It may not itself generate values, out of the stomach, but must seek to relate them—at least analogically—to judgments of history and moral philosophy. We tend to think of the Court as deciding, but more often than not it merely ratifies or, what is even less, does not disapprove, or less still, decides not to decide. And even when it does take it upon itself to strike a balance of values, it does so with an ear to the promptings of the past and an eye strained to a vision of the future much more than with close regard to the present. Burke's description of an evolution meets the case: to produce noting wholly new and retain noting wholly obsolete. The function is canalized by the adversary process, which limits the occasions of judgment and tends to structure issues and narrow their scope to manageable proportions.

In 1905, when Holmes wrote the Lochner dissent, the justices were grinding out annual answers to social and economic questions on the basis of personal convictions of what was wise—derived, as it happens, from the laissez-faire philosophy of Herbert Spencer. That would not do, Holmes told them, and it did not, although it took thirty years for a majority of the justices to see it, and Holmes was gone by then. None has reread Herbert Spencer into the Constitution since, but in the 1960s a majority of the justices, under Earl Warren, again began to dictate answers to social and sometimes economic problems. The problems were different—not regulation of economic enterprise, not labor relations, but the structure of politics, educational policy, the morals and mores of the society. And the answers were differently derived, not from Spencer's Social Statics, but from fashionable notions of progress. Again, it may take time before the realization comes that this will not do.

On January 22, 1973, the Supreme Court, paying formal tribute to Holmes's 1905 dissent but violating its spirit, undertook to settle the abortion issue.[2] In place of the various state abortion statutes in controversy and in flux, the Supreme Court prescribed a virtually uniform statute of its own. During the first three months of pregnancy, the Court decreed, a woman and her physician may decide on an abortion quite free of any interference by the state, except as the state requires the physician to be licensed; during the second three months the state may impose health regulations, but not forbid abortion; during the last three months, the state may if it chooses forbid as well as regulate. That may be a wise model statute, although there is considerable question why the Court foreclosed state regulation of the places where the abortion is to be performed. The state regulates and licenses restaurants and pool halls and Turkish baths and God knows what else in order to protect the public; why may it not similarly regulate and license abortion clinics, or doctors' offices where abortions are to be performed?

But if the Court's model statute is generally intelligent, what is the justification for its imposition? If this statute, why not one on proper grounds of divorce, or on adoption of children? Medical evidence, the Court tells us now, shows that abortions during the first three months of pregnancy present no great risk. Well and good. It is also clear that the fetus is not a life in being at the early stages of pregnancy, is not entitled to constitutional protection, and the Constitution cannot be construed to forbid abortion. Well and good again. But the fetus is a potential life, and the Court acknowledges that society has a legitimate interest in it. So has the individual—the mother, and one would suppose also the father; an interest that may be characterized as a claim to personal privacy, which in some contexts the Constitution has been found to protect. The individual's interest, here, overrides society's interest in the first three months and, subject only to health regulations, also in the second; in the third trimester, society is preeminent.

One is left to ask why. The Court never said. It refused the discipline to which its function is property subject. It simply asserted the result it reached. This is all the court could do because moral philosophy, logic, reason, or other materials of law can give no answer. If medical considerations only were involved, a satisfactory rational answer might be arrived at. But, as the Court acknowledged, they are not. Should not the question then have been left to the political process, which in state after state can achieve not one but many accommodations, adjusting them from time to time as attitude change? It is astonishing that only two dissented from the Court's decision, although Justice Potter Stewart noted in his agreement, presumably with some discomfort, that the decision joined the long line of earlier cases imposing judicially made social policy to which Holmes had objected.[3] The dissenters were Justices Byron White and William Rehnquist. The Court's decision was an "extravagant exercise" of judicial power, said Justice White,[4] it was a legislative rather than judicial action, suggested Justice Rehnquist.[5] So it was, and if the Court's guess on the probable and desirable direction of progress is wrong, that guess will nevertheless have been imposed on all fifty states. Normal legislation, enacted by legislatures not judges, is happily less rigid and less presumptuous in claims to universality and permanence. The claim to universality and permanence is illusory, in any case, for the ongoing political process which follows upon the declaration of law is another discipline the Court is subject to. Yet the Court is not excused in transgressing all limits, in refusing its own prior discipline, for in its initial process of law formation the Court is not under the discipline of the political process. Neither the Court nor its principles directly originate there. The discipline is subsequent.

THE SUPREME COURT AND ABORTION

(By Archibald Cox)

(Archibald Cox has been (since 1965) the Samuel Williston Professor of Law at the Harvard Law School. While he is best known to the general public as the first Watergate Special Prosecutor, he is generally considered, in legal circles, as one of the foremost living authorities on constitutional law. He served as Solicitor General of the U.S. (under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson) from 1961-65. This article is excerpted from his new book, The Role of the Supreme Court in American Government (see pp. 51-55, 112-14, and 117-18; Copyright © 1976 by Oxford University Press, Inc.), and is reprinted here with permission.)

In each of the abortion cases [1] a pregnant young woman was reluctant to bear the child for some personal reason involving no serious danger to life or health. In each case she lived in a State in which it would be a crime for a doctor to perform the abortion, either under a nineteenth-century law making it a crime to "procure an abortion" except "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother," or under a modern statute liberalizing the grounds for abortion but still not as permissive as the particular case would require. In each instance the young woman asked a court to enjoin the State authorities from prosecuting any doctor who might abort her, upon the ground that the threat of prosecution under the statute interfered with her exercising a form of personal liberty secured by the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee against deprivation without due process of law.

How should such a case be decided? Justice Frankfurter, Judge Learned Hand, and the other apostles of judicial self-restraint would have no trouble upholding the constitutionality of the statutes. At most, they would have said, the courts may do no more under the Due Process Clause than invalidate a law that no one could rationally believe to be related to some public interest; and no one could sensibly claim that an anti-abortion law fails this test. Justice Black would have reached the same conclusion. He had dissented in an earlier case holding that a married couple has a constitutional right to use contraceptives saying:

"I do not believe that we are granted power by the Due Process Clause or any other constitutional provision or provisions to measure constitutionality by our belief that legislation is arbitrary, capricious or unreasonable, or accomplishes no justifiable purpose, or is offensive to our own notions of "civilized standards of conduct" . . . The use by federal courts of such a formula or doctrine or whatnot to veto federal or state laws simply takes away from Congress and States the power to make laws based upon their own judgment of fairness and wisdom and transfers that power to this Court for ultimate determination . . .[2]

The Supreme Court, by a 7-2 vote, nevertheless held the anti-abortion laws unconstitutional. The Constitution, the Court said, guarantees "certain areas or zones of privacy." Having an abortion because of personal preference is an aspect of privacy. Since privacy is a "fundamental right," any State interference must be justified by some "compelling interest." That interest, the opinion continues, cannot be in the "life" of the foetus because no one cay say except by arbitrary definition when "life" begins; nor can it be the interest in "potential life" prior to the seventh month of pregnancy, for until then the foetus has no capacity for independent existence. The necessary compelling interest cannot be found in the health of the mother during the first six months of pregnancy, because medical statistics show that the dangers to health are greater in childbirth than in abortion; but the State may regulate abortion procedures during the third three months in the interest of health because of the statistically higher risks to health in that period. Oddly, but possibly because counsel did not stress the point, the opinion fails even to consider what I would suppose to be the most compelling interest of the State in prohibiting abortion; the interest in maintaining that respect for the paramount sanctity of human life which has always been at the centre of western civilization, not merely by guarding "life" itself, however defined, but by safeguarding the penumbra, whether at the beginning, through some overwhelming disability of mind or body, or at death.

Finding the medical case against abortion unpersuasive, the Court laid down three rules:

(1) During the first three months of pregnancy the State must leave the decision whether to have an abortion, and when and how to carry it out, to the woman and her doctor.

(2) During the second three months the State may not forbid abortion but may regulate the procedure.

(3) The State may prohibit abortion after six months except when necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother.

For one concerned with the proper role of the Supreme Court in American government and more particularly with the debate over judicial activism the abortion cases have three-fold significance:

First, the decisions plainly continue the activist, reforming trend of the Warren Court. They are "reforming" in the sense that they sweep away established law supported by the moral themes dominant in American life for more than a century in favour of what the Court takes to be the wiser view of a question under active public debate.

Second, the Justices read into the generalities of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment a new "fundamental right" not remotely suggested by the words. Because they found the right to be "fundamental" the Justices felt no duty to defer to the value judgments of the people's elected representatives, current as well as past. They applied the strict standard of review applicable to repression of political liberties.

Third, three Justices in the seven-man majority were appointed by President Nixon as "strict constructionists": Chief Justice Berger, Justice Blackmun who wrote the opinion of the Court, and Justice Powell. Only one Nixon appointee dissented. There are ample signs that the Berger Court will not respond to new libertarian and egalitarian values with all the enthusiasm of its predecessor, and also that it is more worried by some of the complexities, cross-currents, and needs for accommodation that refuse to yield to optimistic generalizations. A court more concerned with the preservation of old substantive values than the articulation of a new spirit will find fewer occasions for rendering activist decisions. Still, the abortion cases strongly suggest that the new Justices are not restrained by a modest conception of the judicial function but will be activists when a statute offends their policy preferences.

In the end, therefore, one comes to the question: has the Court swung around the circle back to the method which led to equating Due Process with the economics of laissez-faire? Is there any general principle which authorizes the Court to substitute its judgment for the result of the political process when dealing with abortion but not with hours of work? To read liberty of abortion into the Fourteenth Amendment but not liberty of contract? If not, which judicial method was right and which wrong? Before one proposes to judge by results and not by method, one has also to ask how a purely eclectic, result-oriented approach would affect the Court's standing and utility.

What are we to say of the Supreme Court's decision holding that the Due Process Clause forbids a State to interfere with a woman's right to an abortion? What of the judicial method?

My colleague John Ely criticizes the abortion decision on the ground that there is nothing in the Constitution that marks freedom to have an abortion as something special: "A neutral and durable principle may be a thing of beauty and a joy forever. But if he lacks connection with any value the Constitution marks as special it is not a constitutional principle and the Court has no business imposing it."[3]

My own view is less rigid. I find sufficient connection in the Due Process Clause. All agree that the clause calls for some measure of judicial review of legislative enactments, and from that point forward all must be done by judicial construct with no real guidance from the document. Nothing in the document dictates reading the federal Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment as either a source or a limitation of fundamental values, nor does the document suggest restrained review in some cases and strict review in others. The Court's persistent resort to notions of substantive due process for almost a century attests the strength of our natural law inheritance in constitutional adjudication, and I think it unwise as well as hopeless to resist it.

My criticism of Roe v. Wade is that the Court failed to establish the legitimacy of the decision by not articulating a precept of sufficient abstractness to lift the ruling above the level of a political judgment based upon the evidence currently available from the medical, physical, and social sciences. Nor can I articulate such a principle—unless it be that a State cannot interfere with individual decisions relating to sex, procreation, and family with only a moral or philosophical State justification: a principle which I cannot accept or believe will be accepted by the American people.[4] The failure to confront the issue in principled terms leaves the opinion to read like a set of hospital rules and regulations, whose validity is good enough this week but will be destroyed with new statistics upon the medical risks of childbirth and abortion or new advances in providing for the separate existence of a fetus. Neither historian, layman, nor lawyer will be persuaded that all the details prescribed in Roe v. Wade are part of either natural law or the Constitution. Constitutional rights ought not to be created under the Due Process Clause unless they can be stated in principles sufficiently absolute to give them roots throughout the community and continuity over significant periods of time, and to lift them above the level of the pragmatic political judgments of a particular time and place.

Constitutional adjudication depends, I think, upon a delicate, symbiotic relation. The Court must know us better than we know ourselves. Its opinions may, as I have said, sometimes be the voice of the spirit, reminding us of our better selves. In such cases the Court has an influence just the reverse of what Thayer feared; it provides a stimulus and quickens moral education. But while the opinions of the Court can help to shape our national understanding of ourselves, the roots of its decisions must be already in the nation. The aspirations voiced by the Court must be those the community is willing not only to avow but in the end to live by. For the power of the great constitutional decisions rests upon the accuracy of the Court's perception of this kind of common will and upon the Court's ability, by expressing its perception, ultimately to command a consensus.

When Judges Wink, Congress Must Not Blink

(By Prof. Basile J. Uddo,[1] From Human Life Review, Summer, 1979)

(Note.—Basile J. Uddo is an associate professor at Loyola University School of Law in New Orleans. This article is based on his extended treatment of the subject ("A Wink from the Bench: The Federal Courts and Abortion") which appeared in the "Tulane Law Review," February 1979 (Vol. 53, No. 2).)

When Sarah Weddington delivered those remarks at a national conferenced on abortion she gave us an insight into how the whole judicial involvement in abortion got its start: with a wink from the bench! Of course it's not surprising that Roe v. Wade[2] has its roots in such a non-decorous exchange between judge and counsel since without a strong shove by the judiciary Roe v. Wade—on its merits—would never have gotten off the ground. But, as clear as it is that personal judicial preferences created a constitutional impetus for the abortion decisions few would have predicted that the progeny of those ill-conceived decisions would have been more illegitimate, and evidence of even greater judicial bias. Today, however, it is clear that the federal judiciary's treatment of abortion litigation is uniquely accommodating to the pro-abortion position.[3] In virtually every instance—from the most minor state abortion regulation, to the more significant congressional attempts to limit federal expenditures for abortions—federal judges have shown an uncanny ability to torture the constitution into a pro-abortion document. The ensuing examples are only the tip of a very large iceberg, so large that the time clearly has come for Congress to limit the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts in abortion cases.[4]

I. THE PROBLEM

A. General regulations

After 1973 nearly every state attempted to respond to Roe v. Wade by finding those areas where the court might permit some degree of regulation of the abortion issue. Unfortunately, those areas were relatively narrow and would only accommodate certain state interests in maternal health and "potential" human life. Unlike the personal right created to protect the woman's decision to abort, no right—at any stage of pregnancy—was recognized in the fetus. Ostensibly the state had certain protectable interests in the fetus—more illusory than real—which it could promote, but the fetus itself had no rights.

The first state regulations dealt with procedural matters: the who, when, and where of the abortion. Virtually all of these regulations have been swept away by federal courts, and usually in a manner inconsistent with traditional federal practice. For example, a Utah statute was completely invalidated despite a severability clause that would ordinarily be used to separate valid from invalid provisions.[5] Moreover, the court justified its action by an appeal to what it perceived to be an impermissible "motive" on the part of Utah lawmakers. This kind of legislative mind-reading or motive analysis has always been disfavored in constitutional adjudication.[6]

Other cases relied less upon motive than upon an absurdly literal reading of Roe and Doe. Ironically one such case occurred in Chicago, a city recently shocked by the Chicago Sun Times' reports chronicling the "grisly" acts of what they called the abortion profiteers.[7] One wonders how much of that horror story would have been avoided had not the Seventh Circuit winked at reality when it invalidated certain board of health regulations that would have required abortion clinics to meet some minimal standards.[8] For its part the Seventh Circuit, through Judge Sprecher, felt that the abortion cases had effectively placed first trimester abortions beyond regulation. Hence the regulations, which among other things required an elevator large enough to accommodate a stretcher so that a hemorrhaging woman could be more safely and effectively transported to emergency care, were unconstitutional.

Another area treated mischievously (and incorrectly) by the Supreme Court was the question of viability. Here the Court selected a notion devoid of any biological significance[9] and converted it into a crucial point in deciding when a state may "protect" a fetus. Perhaps Justice Blackmun perceived the weakness in his argument and sought some comfort in a flexible definition of viability; one that encouraged states to regulate around this flexibility. Unfortunately the lower federal courts have not perceived the need for this approach.

Minnesota is one of several examples of a state that was rebuffed by the federal courts when its legislatures tried to define viability as that point at which a fetus is "able to live outside the womb even though artificial aid may be required." The state statute also said that "[d]uring the second half of its gestation period a fetus shall be considered potentially 'viable.'" Other parts of the law required a physician to certify that in his judgment an abortion on a potentially viable fetus was necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother, and required certain precautions for the possible survival of a fetus so aborted. A three-judge federal panel rejected this definition of viability and chose instead to give inflexible significance to Roe's ambivalent reference to twenty-four weeks as a possible point of viability.[10]

"Using 24 weeks as the earliest point of viability places a decision to teminate pregnancy between 20 and 24 weeks in the second part of the Roe test. Thus at any point prior to 24 weeks and subsequent to approximately the end of the first trimester, the state may regulate only insofar as such regulations are related to maternal health".[11]

So the mere mention of twenty-four weeks by the Supreme Court converts a number into a talisman capable of overriding the deliberation and fact-finding of the Minnesota legislature, which reached an eminently rational and supportable conclusion. Consider, if you will, this testimony from a similar case:

"Mr. MORRIS. Doctor, as one who performs abortions I want to read you a sentence and ask you what it means to you. The sentence is, 'Viability means capability of a fetus to live outside the woman's womb albeit with artificial aid' ". . . .

Dr. MECKLENBERG. I would agree with that definition of viability. I think that it has been current. I think it is a definition that takes into account medical progress, the fact that it is constantly changing. My perusal of the medical literature would lead me to believe that potential or comtinued life exists as early as 20 weeks—not in the current edition of Eastman's Obstetrics Book, but in the previous edition, the earliest report a survivor was reported as a delivery at 20 weeks gestation. In my own experience I have—the earliest survival that I have had is a patient who was 21 weeks from the time of conception or 23 weeks from the first day of her menstrual period. The child is a year and a half old and normal.[12] [Emphasis added.]

Yet, Judge Benson concludes in the Minnesota case that "[i]n any event, under present technology, it [viability] does not arise prior to 24 weeks" (emphasis added).[13] That conclusion, in light of reality, is befitting a Lewis Carroll conundrum.

The special animus that many lower federal judges have shown toward abortion regulations is starkly demonstrated in a Missouri case, Doe v. Poelker,[14] where an official policy against performing elective abortions in St. Louis city-owned public hospitals was promulgated by Mayor John H. Poelker, and challenged by the plaintiff "Jane Doe." In the process of invalidating the regulation the Eighth Circuit Court panel committed a multitude of methodological and analytical mistakes, not the least of which was to conclude that somehow Roe v. Wade had converted the constitution into a document that prohibited a state from preferring childbirth to abortions by financing the former but not the latter. Had they stopped at that one might excuse the opinion as misguided, but two of the three-man panel—Judges Ross and Talbot Smith—continued on to punish Mayor Poelker.

Contrary to the common law and American federal authority, the court awarded attorney's fee to the plaintiffs. The court's justification for ignoring the clear rule against such action was the rarely invoked exception for instances where "the losing party has 'acted in bad faith, vexatiously, wantonly, or for oppressive reasons.' "[15] Now there is no doubt such an exception does exist, but its use here is unheard of! First, the exception is only to be invoked by the district court, not the appellate court, as it was here, unless the appellate court was affirming the lower court.[16] Here the Eighth Circuit was reversing the lower court. So the action was legitimate at the outset. But, even if the appellate court could so act it is clear that the exercise of this power is limited to exceptional cases. As one commentator has explained the "bad faith" exception: "But only in exceptional cases and for dominating reasons of justice can the exercise of the power... be justified."[17]

Unfortunately, even if by some magic this could have been called such an exceptional case the judges would still be wrong for going on. The question of attorney's fees was never raised at trial; it was first raised on appeal. Therefore, there was no fact-finding on the point in the record, no notice to the defendant Poelker, nor was there opportunity for proper argument on the point before any court. This sort of thing is simply not done, it violates all notions of fundamental fairness. Winking would be a compliment for what these judges had to engage in to reach their result. The Supreme Court recognized as much in a rare reversal of the Eighth Circuit's pro-abortion result.[18]

B. Spousal or parental consent

Another area left explicitly undecided in Roe and Doe, and therefore subject to state regulation, was the matter of spousal or parental consent as a prerequisite to an abortion. Regrettably, state regulations in this area have also fallen victim to the federal courts.

Spousal consent provisions suffered the more immediate and devastating treatment. In Florida, for example, a moderate requirement for spousal consent would not have applied if the husband was voluntarily living apart from the wife or the woman's life was at stake. Yet, it was declared unconstitutional.[19] More amazing than the result is the Fifth Circuit's opinion affirming the lower court's rejection of this provision. The state had asserted an interest in the marriage relationship as one justification for the consent requirement—an interest traditionally recognized. Yet, Judge Lewis Morgan speaking for the panel rather summarily concluded that this interest was narrow and did not extend to "intrafamilial decision-making processes with regard to child-bearing decisions," and therefore the "state's societal interest in this aspect of the marriage relationship [was] not sufficiently 'compelling' to justify the statute."[20] Can this be so? Is the state's interest limited only to formulation and dissolution of the relationship? Yet, long ago the Supreme Court confirmed that the state's interest extends to the need to protect the "regularity and integrity of the marriage relation."[21] So marriage as an institution—rather than as the accidental cohabitation of two individuals—is a valid concern of the state. Consequently, can the court so easily dismiss Florida's asserted interest? Surely Florida can require that important decisions affecting marriage—adoption, artificial insemination, voluntary sterilization, and, yes, abortion—be forestalled in the absence of unanimity. The Roe court did not say otherwise, but the Fifth Circuit plowed fresh turf and said it for them.

On the point of the possible independent rights of the father the opinion writer somewhat frighteningly reasoned that because the fetus is not a person and therefore not a child, then "a fortiori" the father's interest in the fetus is less significant than his interest in live born children, and accordingly less weighty than the woman's right to abort. Now for all the mischief that the Roe court did, it held no more than that the Constitution does not use the word "person" in a prenatal sense and that therefore a fetus is not a "person" under the Fourteenth Amendment. As bad as that is it does not go as far as the Fifth Circuit in deducing that a pre-born child is not a child for whom a father may feel and express affection and protection.[22] Clearly a father can quite reasonably be as interested in his child in utero as in his postnatal children, and there is nothing in constitutional law or logic that can support the conclusion that this interest is somehow less weighty than the mother's interest in a dead baby. Yet, once again, with mere words, and another wink at reality, the father becomes a menacing and unwelcomed interloper in the exclusive domain of woman and physician.

Some courts have been mildly more sensitive to the roles of parents in the decision to abort made by a minor daughter. The sensitivity is, however, limited, where it exists at all. A prime example is the continuing judicial battle over a Massachusetts statute that requires an unmarried woman under eighteen years of age to obtain the consent of her parents prior to an abortion.[23] The statute precludes a parental veto by also providing that "If one or both of the mother's parents refuse such consent, consent may be obtained by an order of a judge of the superior court for good cause shown, after such hearing as he deems necessary."[24] Surely a reasonable scheme, right? Bill Baird, whom the court called "a pioneer and advocate for the availability of abortions,"[25] among others, thought not.

Their challenge found support in the opinion of Judge Aldrich who in a most perplexing manner admits that the role of the parent in such a matter would be important and helpful, but yet, he strikes down the statute because "an appreciable number [of parents] are not [supportive], for a variety of reasons."[26] By adopting this view he effectively rejected the long tradition of viewing the parent as the one responsible for the nurture and care of the child.[27] As the Supreme Court once said of parents: "those who nurture [the child] and direct his destiny have the right, coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare him for additional [e.g., religious, moral, and patriotic] obligations."[28] Judges Aldrich and Freedman winked at that tradition and decided instead that hired abortionists were better suited for this role. A devilish substitution indeed, but doubly so in light of what we know about so-called abortion "counseling."

"The counseling . . . occurs entirely on the day the abortion is to be performed . . . . It lasts for two hours and takes place in groups that include both minors and adults who are strangers to one another . . . . Counseling is typically limited to a description of abortion procedures, possible complications, and birth control techniques . . . .

"The abortion itself takes five to seven minutes . . . . The physician has no prior contact with the minor, and on the days that abortions are being performed at the [clinic], the physician . . . may be performing abortions on many other adults and minors . . . . On busy days patients are scheduled in separate groups, consisting usually of five patients . . . . After the abortion [the physician] spends a brief period with the minor and others in the group in the recovery room . . . ."[29]

The Supreme Court, on appeal, gently reined in the district judges and admonished them to allow the state's highest court to "construe" the statute before deciding its constitutionality—something they should have done on their own. After the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court construed the statute as permitting nothing more than parental consultation,[30] the district court reconsidered, but found it nonetheless unconstitutional. In the process the same two judges, over the strong dissent of Judge Julian, did violence to ordinary judicial procedures and analysis. One of these transgressions deserves special mention.

Because the plaintiffs had asked for a preliminary injunction against the enforcement of the consent statute every lawyer worth his salt knows that the plaintiffs would have to prove a substantial likelihood of prevailing on the merits, and that without the injunction they would suffer irreparable harm. The district panel, most benevolently, seemed to relieve these plaintiffs of that duty. Judge Julian demonstrated as much when he pointed out the weaknesses in each of the plaintiffs' three major arguments on the merits and thereby destroyed any substantial likelihood of success.[31] But, more poignantly, the Julian dissent focused clearly on the requirement of irreparable harm.

"Where is the harm of members of the plaintiff class of Massachusetts minors? . . . Surely, requiring the minor to comply with minimal legal procedures, though perhaps inconvenient, or even unpleasant, does not constitute irreparable harm or injury to the minor. Only in the instance where the minor's parents and a state judge concur that an abortion would not be in the best interest of the adolescent girl would she be precluded from having an abortion. Certainly enforcement of a state statute which prevents a minor from undergoing a surgical procedure which is found by both her parents and the Court to be contrary to her own best interests, cannot sensibly be said to cause her irreparable harm.[32]

Certainly it cannot, but a majority of this three-judge court did not act sensibly.

Judge Julian also pointed out that the other plaintiffs, abortionists-physicians, would suffer only some loss of income "from the loss of business of some minors who forego having abortions, or who decide under parental guidance to have the operation at a facility other than [the plaintiffs']." [33] Clearly not ruinous or irreparable harm. In bold contrast, Judge Julian described well the true irreparable harm in this case:

"The action of this Court . . . removes for an indefinite period the only legal barrier in this state against the exploitation of pregnant adolescents by operators of unregulated and unsupervised abortion facilities who may be motivated by concerns which are far removed from the minor's own best interest. The stay granted by the majority is legally unjustified and does not serve the best interests of either the minor or the public." [34]

Consequently, two federal judges have managed to delay indefinitely the effect of a statute, enacted in November 1974, which was intended to protect vulnerable pregnant minors at a most crucial time. In the process, these judges have advanced the rather startling assumption that abortion clinics and hired abortionists are better able to protect the minor's interest than are her parents, or a state court. Why the court was so willing to assume the worst about parents and the best about abortion clinics—all contrary to the judgment of the people of Massachusetts—is indeed perplexing. The recalcitrance of this court is only thinly disguised as constitutional law.

C. Federal funds and the Hyde amendment

Perhaps the most disturbing example of how overbearing some federal courts have become in the area of abortion is the recent treatment of the Hyde Amendment by one federal judge in Brooklyn—Judge John F. Dooling.

In 1976 Congress attached an amendment to its Department of Labor/Health, Education and Welfare appropriations bill that specifically withheld any appropriation of funds for the payment of elective abortions under state Medicaid programs. The amendment carries the name of its original sponsor Representative Henry Hyde, and reads: "None of the funds contained in this Act shall be used to perform abortions except where the life of the mother would be endangered if the fetus was carried to term." [35] One of several attempts to enjoin this amendment was brought before Judge Dooling in the Eastern District of New York.[36]

The plaintiffs, among whom were included the American Civil Liberties Union and Planned Parenthood of America, asked not only that the Hyde Amendment be declared unconstitutional, but that the judge order the U.S. Treasury to reimburse states for elective abortions. The plaintiffs—and ultimately Judge Dooling—seemed undeterred by the fact that the U.S. Constitution specifically prohibits the drawing of money from the Treasury unless properly appropriated by Congress. Specifically article I, section 9, clause 7 provides "No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law." [37] Clearly, even if the judge found some basis for invalidating the Hyde Amendment, he had no constitutional authority to order the government to pay. Undaunted, and with an embarrassing paucity of constitutional authority, Judge Dooling decided that the plaintiffs would probably prevail at trial because the amendment was, for him, unconstitutional. Perhaps his reasoning is best illustrated by the following statement:

"Divisions between sober and God-fearing people so deep and equal deny to civil authority any power to intervene by direction or indirection, either to compel abortion as a measure of population control or to deny medical assistance to the needy who act on their own beliefs. When the power of enactment is used to compel submission to a rule of private conduct not expressive of norms of conduct shared by the society as a whole without substantial division it fails as law and inures as oppression." [38]

So, while it is oppression for substantial numbers of taxpayers to conscientiously object to the funding of abortions with their money, it is not oppression to compel their contributions to such abortions. Or, as John Noonan has said so well: "Judge Dooling adopted the argument of Planned Parenthood that, as the morality of abortion was disputed by 'Godfearing people,' the government would be required to be neutral. And 'neutrality' meant the government should be on Planned Parenthood's side and pay for abortions!" [39]

Having decided that the plaintiffs' case had merit and should be set for trial Judge Dooling showed little additional concern for the "appropriations" problem—a problem that another federal judge saw as crucial and insurmountable.[40] Consequently, Judge Dooling decided that the funds for abortions had been appropriated and that the Hyde Amendment was simply a restriction on "the circumstances in which the funds can be used to pay providers of lawful abortional services." [41] Consequently, if the Hyde "restriction" is declared unconstitutional, as he thought it would be, the already appropriated funds would simply be freed. "Payment of funds [would] follow, but not by an act equivalent to appropriation." [42]

Now to reach this conclusion Judge Dooling had to do quite a bit of winking of his own. Most notably he had to wink at the rather clear congressional rules and traditions that provide that amendments to appropriation bills are considered part of the bill and thus a limit on the appropriation itself.[43] When the Hyde Amendment was offered under House Rule XXI,[44] the Holman Rule, it was accepted as "being germane to the subject matter of the bill" and as "retrench[ing] expenditures by . . . the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill." [45] Hence, the Hyde Amendment must be read as an explict statement by Congress that no funds have been appropriated for the proscribed purpose, i.e., elective abortions. To invalidate the amendment and order payment—as Judge Dooling did—is nothing short of judicial usurpation of a power textually committed to Congress.

In an effort to bolster his misguided analysis of the appropriations question, Judge Dooling relied heavily upon United States v. Lovett.[46] He felt Lovett supported the proposition that "the section [was] a constraint on the use of appropriated funds, and, if the constraint [was] one that [could not] be lawfully imposed for constitutional reasons, as it was in Lovett, then there [was] no bar to the payment of the money for abortional services"[47] (emphasis added). Unfortunately, Judge Dooling had certainly misread Lovett, which did not involve the rejection of one portion of an appropriations act to reach funds otherwise appropriated by the act. Rather, Robert Lovett, an executive assistant to the governor of the Virgin Islands, and two other government employees were considered "subversives" by the Un-American Activities Committee. Because the government refused to fire them, Congress in the Urgent Deficiency Appropriations Act of 1943 [48] prohibited payment of their salaries. The three continued to work for the government and sued for their compensation in the Court of Claims. That court decided that the claimants were entitled to the money but did not order Congress to appropriate the funds.[49] The Supreme Court affirmed, and held the salary prohibition an unconstitutional Bill of Attainder, but again, no order was made to appropriate or pay funds. Unlike Judge Doolings's order, the Supreme Court respected the separation of powers and merely acknowledged compensation was due. It did not reach back to the appropriation, stripped of the salary prohibition, and order payment as though the funds had been appropriated and illegally constrained. In fact, the plaintiffs would never have been compensated had not the House—after a long debate—subsequently voted 99-98 [50] to pay the amount due under the Supreme Court decision. Clearly, Judge Dooling misunderstood Lovett.

Perhaps Judge Dooling's mistake would deserve less attention had he not taken two additional steps that seem particularly inappropriate. First Judge Dooling found irreparable harm sufficient to enjoin the Amendment despite an earlier order by a three-judge panel (of which Judge Dooling was a member) enjoining the State of New York from refusing to fund elective abortions.[51] That injunction was still in effect and adequately assured that no harm, much less irreparable harm, could come to indigent women seeking free elective abortions in Judge Dooling's state. Second, and more surprising, Judge Dooling's order operated on the Secretary of HEW throughout the United States, a result presumably requiring a showing of irreparable harm in each state. Yet the opinion refers to only one affidavit from a New Mexico official stating that state would not pay for unreimbursed abortions.[52] Thus, in one fell swoop a single federal judge in Brooklyn had managed to thwart the expressed will of Congress—formulated after long, tedious months of difficult deliberation—throughout the entire country!

D. Roe as the Portal to Infanticide

As bad as all of these examples are the worst is yet to come. The thinking that underlies a South Carolina case, Floyd v. Anders,[53] makes Roe and Doe the portal to blatant infanticide. In that case, as the court describes it, "Louise, a young, pregnant woman wished an abortion because her expectancy interfered with her hopes and plans to go to college." [54] (And some still dare to argue that we do not have abortion on demand). Either because she lied or miscalculated, Louise understated her stage of pregnancy by eight weeks when she sought a clinic abortion. Dr. Floyd, "a physician specializing in abortions," [55] discovered the mistake prior to performing the abortion and informed the patient that being twenty weeks pregnant a hospital procedure was necessary. Five weeks later, Louise was admitted to a hospital and Dr. Floyd, knowing her stage of pregnancy, undertook a prostaglandin abortion, which produced a live male child.[56] The child, having been transferred to the hospital neonatal intensive care unit lived for twenty days before he died.

The state prosecutor sought and received grand jury indictments against Dr. Floyd for murder and performing an illegal abortion. Dr. Floyd turned to the federal courts to stop the South Carolina criminal prosecution. There he found three friends in Judges Haynsworth, Russell and Chapman, who were willing to wink at something called the "abstention doctrine."[57] That doctrine in short prohibits federal judges from interfering with state criminal prosecutions for all but the most extraordinary reasons. Judge Haynsworth thought he had such a reason because in his words, "it clearly appears that the state prosecutor was not proceeding in good faith."[58] Many federal judges, you see, are all too prone to ascribe bad faith to anyone who dares question the absolute propriety of abortion on demand.

Well much can be said about this bending of ordinary procedure, but all that need be said is that Judge Haynsworth and company were clearly wrong. As one scholar of federal procedure has said of the exception so blithely used by these judges:

"Although later Supreme Court decisions have not shed a great deal of additional light on the exceptions to Younger, [the case strengthening the abstention doctrine] what the Court has done confirms that the Court is right when it describes them as 'these narrow exceptions.'

"There is no case since Younger was decided in which the Court has found that the exception for bad faith or harassment was applicable." [59]

It is quite clear that bad faith must be clearly, extraordinarily, and affirmatively shown for a federal court to ignore the strength of the abstention doctrine. The few district court cases that have found such bad faith have consistently dealt with extremes, e.g., 100 obscenity prosecutions against the same defendants with multiple acquittals; seizing a film four times without judicial determination of its obscene nature, and similar instances of harassment.[60]

Here the South Carolina prosecutor was bringing a single prosecution against a man implicated in the death of a live-born infant: infanticide if you will. Here there is no doubt that a 20 day old died due to "numerous complications which arose from the child's premature birth." [61] While I am not implying Dr. Floyd's criminal guilt, which should be decided at a proper trial, is it plausible to suggest that under the circumstances the prosecution was clearly in bad faith for moving toward such a trial? Where is the bad faith? Well, according to the three-judge panel, through Clement Haynsworth, Jr., it inheres in the statement that "the prosecutor had not read the opinion in Roe v. Wade," [62] but had relied upon other reports and a digest prepared by a law student. From this the conclusion was reached that the prosecutor must be charged with the knowledge of what that case says, and according to Haynsworth's analysis of Roe, such knowledge would argue against any good faith prosecution of Floyd. Of course this is all nonsense, for even if one had never heard of Roe v. Wade, the facts of this case make it quite clear that a living child was untimely forced from his mother's womb and that action, in the opinion of the pathologist who performed the autopsy, ultimately caused the child's death. No one could seriously argue that Roe v. Wade clearly allows that sort of thing, or that one would be acting in bad faith to prosecute the doctor responsible. Common sense, if nothing else, revolts at the suggestion. Yet, that it what these judges tell us.

Their mistake is in their bizarre reading of the clearly misguided words of the abortion decisions. Consider if you will some of Judge Haynsworth's statements:

"Seemingly, the child was not viable in the sense that he could live indefinitely outside his mother's womb. . . ." [63]

Well it may come as a shock to the good judge but none of us can live "indefinitely" outside our mother's womb. Moreover, such was not the requirement of Roe: viability means "potentially able to live outside the mother's womb, albeit with artificial aid" [64] (emphasis added). Consider also this statement:

"Indeed, the Supreme Court declared the fetus in the womb is neither alive nor a person within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment." [65]

What audacity! Can the judge really believe that the Court, any court, could declare someone not alive? How could that declaration be explained to that child who struggled to stay alive for those twenty days; what sort of word game will deny the fact of his brief life cut short by Dr. Floyd, who forced him into that struggle before his time? Of course, Roe made no such declaration. Perhaps these judges did not read Roe either.

Finally, the judge says:

"Had he but read the [Roe] opinion . . ., he would have known that the fetus in this case was not a person whose life state law could legally protect." [66]

Again nonsense! This was primarily a murder prosecution and therefore not dependent upon any trimester/viability argument.[67] The state's interest here is not dependent upon Roe or any other case. The child was born alive and died allegedly because of what the doctor did—if that is not legally murder the South Carolina courts are perfectly capable of so deciding without the interference of three federal judges. The Supreme Court said as much when it vacated the Haynsworth judgment.[68]

If none of the prior examples of excessive and mischievous federal court involvement concern the reader, this last case certainly should. For these three judges, without dissent, made a bold and blatant leap from acceptance of abortion to the horrors of infanticide. They ignored ordinary procedures and unhesitatingly thrust themselves into a state murder prosecution and pretended that there was some legitimacy in their attempts to shield an ordinary criminal defendant from the consequences of his acts simply because the matter of abortion is involved.

II. THE RESPONSE

Having said all of this, is the conclusion that we are stuck with a federal judiciary that has been overly accommodating to the pro-abortion position, and all is lost? The answer is clearly, no. Among the many signs of wisdom that our forefathers incorporated into the Constitution there is Article III. It reads in part that "[t]he judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." [69] That latter phrase has for all time been understood to mean that Congress may grant, retain, remove, or restrict the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts of this country. The Supreme Court has on several occasions concurred in this view [70] and has recently—and almost offhandedly—done so again.

In U.S. v. American Friends Service Comm.,[71] two Quakers sought to express their conscientious objections to war by having their employer, a religious organization, cease withholding a percentage of wages under IRS regulations. The percentage was based upon the amount of federal revenue ascribed to military purposes. The employer complied, but continued to pay the full amount due to the government. Subsequently, the employer sued for a refund of amounts paid but not withheld. The employees joined in this suit, and requested, on their behalf, an injunction against IRS enforcement of its regulations. Their principal argument admitted their liability for the taxes, but objected to the "deprivation of their right to free exercise of religion under the First Amendment since [the withholding scheme] did not allow them to bear witness to their beliefs by refusing to voluntarily pay a portion of their taxes." [72] The district court [73] accepted this argument and enjoined the enforcement of the withholding provision against the employer.

The Supreme Court, with only one dissent, reversed this judgment, not on its merits, but because a jurisdictional limitation divested the courts of any power over the matter. The Anti-Injunction Act [74] provides that "no suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court by any person, whether or not such person is the person against whom such tax was assessed. . . . " This jurisdictional limitation, imposed by Congress on all courts, was upheld even over the strong First Amendment argument:

"[D]ecisions of this Court make it unmistakably clear that the constitutional nature of a taxpayer's claim, as distinct from its probability of success, is of no consequence under the Anti-Injunction Act." [75]

Eight members of the Court, in this per curiam opinion, respected Congress' authority to limit or restrict federal court jurisdiction.

Of course this is just a more recent example of the long-standing attitute of the Court to jurisdictional limitations imposed by Congress. One much more apropos is the Norris-La Guardia Act,[76] wherein Congress severely limited federal court jurisdiction in matters concerning labor relations—an area where federal courts had shown an anti-labor bias for many years. In fact the circumstances and events leading up to the Norris-La Guardia Act bear a discomforting similarity to those now developing in the abortion debate.

As with abortion, the problems leading up to the labor limitation began with several questionable—and subsequently discredited—Supreme Court and lower federal court opinions,[77] which set the stage for continual federal court involvement in labor-management relations. Prominent among these opinions [78] was one which applied the Sherman Act [79] to labor unions, and produced the anomalous result that an act primarily directed toward the social and economic ramifications of the concentration of capital became an act used most often against labor. The result was devastating to labor unions because it gave the courts the opportunity to thwart crucial union activities (e.g., strikes) by use of the dreaded labor injunction.

Subsequent attempts to correct the problem legislatively were often successful until those enactments reached the hostile courts, where they were invalidated or emasculated. This continuing era of harsh judicial intervention came to be known as a time of "government by injunction." [80] The critics of this era, both in and out of labor, were strong, but frustrated. Their voices sound very much as do the voices of critics of the present trend in abortion cases. One such voice was that of Senator Norris:

"This case and the others which I have enumerated illustrate the necessity of passing a law which cannot be nullified even by judges who have no sympathy with those who toil when their interests conflict with great aggregations of wealth. It brings to our minds the almost superhuman importance of an untarnished judiciary. A perfect law can be nullified by an unfair and biased judge." [81]

Hear also Mr. O.K. Fraenkel, a member of the New York Bar:

"Federal courts have, in too many instances, proved to be champions of capital against labor; they should show a greater regard for the realities of the situation.

"The courts, swayed by their conceptions of desirable social ends, have limited strike activities by decisions based on the doctrines of unlawful purpose and improper means. Too often they have been blind to the obvious fact that the definition of the scope of these two doctrines involves declarations of policy, ordinarily a task for the legislature rather than themselves." [82]

The problem of almost totally pro-management judicial involvement did not end until the Norris-La Guardia Act severely limited federal court jurisdiction and firmly reasserted the policy role of the Congress and states in matters of labor relations. The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Act in Lauf v. E. G. Shinner & Co.,[83] and the long and damaging era of government by injunction began to, and eventually did, subside.

So it is clear that Congress acted wisely and well in retrieving labor relations from the clutches of a hostile judiciary. Today the problem has arisen anew in the area of abortion. Congress has the power, in fact the duty, to speak firmly and clearly in this matter, and to end a similar era of government by injunction and declaration. Congress should not be deterred by cries of "opening the floodgates" or "judicial independence." The Constitution itself wisely gives this power to Congress and it was certainly intended to be used. As Alexander Hamilton said in his Federalist Paper No. 80:

"From this review of the particular powers of the federal judiciary, as marked out in the constitution, it appears, that they are all conformable to the principles which ought to have governed the structure of that department, and which were necessary to the perfection of the system. If some partial inconveniencies should appear to be connected with the incorporation of any of them into the plan, it ought to be recollected that the national legislature will have ample authority to make such exceptions and to prescribe such regulations as will be calculated to obviate or remove these inconveniencies.[84]

The political processes are capable of assuring that this power not be abused;[85] they have done so for over 200 years. And besides, why recoil from a legitimate use of congressional power because of the theoretical possibility of future abuse, when not to act continues to countenance a current judicial abuse. The time has come, Congress must not blink!

Tort law has followed a similar rule. In discussing recovery for injury to a fetus Dean Prosser has said:

"Most of the cases allowing recovery have a involved foetus which was then viable . . . . Many of them have said, by way of dictum, that recovery must be limited to such cases, and two or three have said that the child, if not viable, must at least be 'quick.' But when actually faced with the issue for decision, almost all of the jurisdictions have allowed recovery even though the injury occurred during the early weeks of pregnancy, when the child was neither viable nor quick."

The three-judge panel also relied upon another exception to Younger that would allow interference, but only if it was to enjoin the enforcement of a statute "flagrantly and patently violative of express constitutional prohibitions, in every clause sentence and paragraph, and in whatever manner and against whomever an effort might be made to apply it," Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. at 53-54 (1971), quoting Watson v. Buck, 313 U.S. 387 (1941). The problem is that the Court hopelessly confused this separate exception with the bad faith exception to create in essence a third, easier to apply, exception. Consequently, the court was able to satisfy itself that abstention was not necessary without giving attention to the actual constitutionality to the Carolina law. The judges simply ignored the much heavier burden, imposed upon them by Younger, which requires clear and compelling reasons for applying either of the exceptions.

That case did not redefine or overrule the Roe definition, but merely accepted the Missouri definition as one perhaps more liberal than that advanced in Roe. That Roe definition of potential ability to live outside of the mother, albeit with artificial aid, was clearly reaffirmed, not rewritten in Danforth.

[67] In addition Roe made it quite clear that a state does have a compelling interest in a fetus' life during the third trimester, and can proscribe elective abortions in viable fetuses during that time. So even beyond the murder prosecution it is entirely possible—probable in fact—that the South Carolina abortion statute could be construed consistent with the abortion decisions and serve as a basis for proscribing abortions of the type performed in this case.

TESTIMONY OF NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT PROTECTING UNBORN HUMAN LIFE

INTRODUCTION

The National Conference of Catholic Bishops has testified before Congressional subcommittees on two previous occasions on the subject of abortion and the need for a Human Life Amendment: on March 7, 1974, before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary; and on March 24, 1976, before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Committee on the Judiciary.

Neither in 1974 nor in 1976 was any version of a Human Life Amendment reported out of committee and voted on by Congress. As a result, this issue has not yet been brought before the state legislatures for their own determination. It is our fervent hope that this subcommittee and this Congress will show their respect for the democratic process by making it possible for the elected representatives of the American people to consider such a constitutional amendment.

In our previous testimony we have commented on a great many aspects of the abortion debate.

In 1974, we presented a wealth of evidence on the humanity and dignity of the unborn child. We pointed to the American legal tradition which recognizes the inherent right to life of all human beings, and noted that until the Supreme Court stripped virtually all legal protection from the unborn child, the life of that child was seen as deserving of legal protection. We noted the virtually absolute character of the right to abortion created by the Court, which gave the unborn child no recourse or appeal under the law. The conclusion reached in that testimony was:

"After much consideration and study, we have come to the conclusion that the only feasible way to reverse the decision of the Court and to provide some constitutional base for the legal protection of the unborn child is by amending the Constitution. Moreover, this is a legal option consistent with the democratic process. It reflects the commitment to human rights that must be at the heart of all human law, international as well as national, and because human life is such an eminent value, the effort to pass an amendment is a moral imperative of the highest order."

On March 24 of this year, the NCCB Administrative Committee voted unanimously to reaffirm this 1974 statement.

In 1976, our testimony concentrated on reactions to the Supreme Court's abortion decisions and on the early effects those decisions had on law and society. By that time, many distinguished legal scholars, representing a wide variety of views on abortion itself, had criticized the 1973 decisions as having little or no basis in the Constitution or in American legal history. Preliminary statistics suggested that legalization did increase the number of abortions performed by making abortion more easily available and more socially acceptable. This situation produced its own threats to women's lives and health while failing to put an end to illegal abortions.

The abortion mentality was already helping to erode some physicians' respect for human life in other spheres, most noticeably in the treatment of handicapped newborns who could be classified as falling below someone's standard of "meaningful humanhood." At that time we condemned as patronizing and sometimes punitive the attitude that "abortion is good enough for the poor," as well as the general tendency to see the quick and violent "solution" of abortion as the answer to a variety of social ills which have their own appropriate and infinitely more humane solutions. We renewed our criticism of the abortion decisions themselves, observing that they had created a "new legalism . . . destructive of the human spirit." The Supreme Court had imposed this "new legalism" by replacing the facts about the beginnings of human life with new legal fictions and by failing even to recognize many of the individual and social values at stake in public policy decisions on abortion. By isolating the pregnant woman in her "right of privacy," the court had done a disservice both to her and to her child, cutting them off from the familial and societal bonds which can support and encourage life-affirming attitudes.

We responded to the claim that laws restricting abortion constitute an establishment of religion or a denial of religious freedom, pointing out that the idea of abortion as an affirmative good is a novelty created by the Supreme Court and not one maintained by any major religious denomination. While noting the complexity of the abortion issue and agreeing that it has moral and religious dimensions, we reasserted our conviction that legal protection for the unborn child can be based on a respect for human dignity and fundamental human rights commonly held by people of good will regardless of their religious affiliation.

Without repeating our 1974 and 1976 testimony in detail, we wish to take this opportunity to reaffirm our continued adamant opposition to the current public policy on abortion and our conviction that a constitutional amendment is necessary to correct this unjust and destructive policy. Over the past five years, there have been a number of developments which strengthen the case on behalf of an amendment. In addition, the arguments put forth to defend legalized abortion have changed in some ways, requiring new responses. These recent developments will be noted during the course of this testimony, which will address four important aspects of the abortion controversy:

First, the central issue of the human dignity of the unborn child, with special emphasis on the complementary roles which scientific evidence and ethical insight can play in appreciating this dignity.

Second, a review of Western and specifically American legal traditions on human rights and the protection of unborn human life, with comments on the ways in which the reasoning of the Supreme Court's abortion decisions distorted and weakened those traditions.

Third, the legal and social effects of Roe v. Wade upon American life.

Fourth, the issue of the relationship between law and morality as it applies to the abortion issue.

THE HUMAN DIGNITY OF THE UNBORN CHILD

In 1974 and 1976, we cited a wealth of scientific literature to show that individuated human life begins at conception—that is, that a unique human individual comes into existence when male sperm and female ovum successfully unite, and that all subsequent stages of development are simply phases in the continuous process of maturation into an adult human being. No new evidence has been found to contradict this simple fact, and a great deal of evidence has accumulated to confirm it. The testimony presented on this matter before the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers on April 23 of this year presents a small sample of the evidence available. The Federal government itself officially acknowledges the biological facts on this point. A 1979 publication of the Department of Health and Human Services reports:

"Life is a constantly evolving process that begins with conception and continues until death. Movement through time necessitates change and therefore is synonymous with life itself; the opposite state is stasis and death. . . . With the passage of time, the human organism grows from a single cell to a fully developed adult. . . . Life begins when a male sperm unites with a female egg. The new life created by this union starts as a single cell. . . . In relation to the total life span of the individual, the early developmental years are short and serve as the foundation for the remainder of one's life span. The needs of a child in the support of this growth and development begin before birth and continue throughout the growth years until maturity is reached."[1]

The development of new biological techniques has served to underscore the fact that new human life begins at conception. Despite the lack of a moral and legal consensus on the advisability of human in vitro fertilization experiments, there is consensus on one point: Baby Louise Brown, born in England in 1978, attracted so much publicity because her life as an individual began in a laboratory rather than in her mother's fallopian tubes. There is little point in claiming that this new life is a part of the mother's body, when it is technically possible to transfer the developing embryo into another woman's body and may soon be possible to bring a child to maturity using an "artificial womb." It is clear that from the moment of fertilization, there exists a new individual who requires nothing but a hospitable environment in which to direct its own growth and development.

Perhaps even more interesting than the strictly scientific evidence on the life of the unborn child, however, is the newfound status of the unborn child in medical practice. In 1974, when Dr. Bernard Nathanson first publicly admitted his "increasing certainty" that he had "presided over 60,000 deaths" as director of the world's largest abortion clinic, he did not attribute his new attitude to newly discovered scientific evidence that life begins at conception, for he knew that such evidence had existed for more than a century. Rather, the unborn child's humanity had been brought home to him in a new way by his experience as the director of a new perinatology unit at St. Luke's Hospital Center in Manhattan. Here, Dr. Nathanson was able to study the child in the womb for extended periods of time, to chart his or her development, to locate and correct medical problems—in short, to treat the child as a patient, and thus to realize that the child in the womb is as much a member of the human community as is a newborn infant or a mature adult. Based on his medical experience and his own thoroughly secular medical ethic, Dr. Nathanson has now concluded that legal protection should be restored to the unborn child.[2]

Dr. Nathanson's medical experiences have now been duplicated many times over. The new specialties of fetology and perinatology have advanced at a tremendous rate. Amniocentesis, fetoscopy and high-resolution sonography allow us to observe the development of the unborn child and the onset of possible medical problems long before birth. The prescribing of drugs and nutritional programs for children still in the womb is becoming commonplace, and the specialty of prenatal surgery is coming into its own.[3]

Such recent medical developments add an important human dimension to what might otherwise seem like rather abstract scientific evidence on the beginnings of human life. As Dr. John C. Fletcher noted in an editorial in The Journal of the American Medical Association, physicians are now being confronted in new ways with the inescapable reality of the unborn child as a human patient in need of care and support.[4] Our developing prenatal technologies are stripping away the veil of ignorance which some would like to maintain with regard to the humanity of this child, forcing physicians and society as a whole to appreciate the continuity between life before and after birth. Unless our society wants to be blind to the point where it can ignore the increasingly obvious status of the unborn child as a member of the human family, it must come to grips with the fact that the abortion debate is not over "when life begins". Rather, the core of the issue concerns the intrinsic dignity and value of life already in existence. We are faced with a moment of decision which cannot be avoided: We must decide whether every human being in need of medical care will be approached with instinctive concern or with the detached eye of the technician who is equally ready to cure or to kill in accordance with the whim of family or society.

The temptation to evade this all-important decision is pressing. To face the decision honestly is to admit that acceptance of abortion is a violation of the physician's most sacred vow in all circumstances "to help or at least to do no harm." Some have therefore tried to claim that science has nothing to say about the point when a human being's life begins because such terms as "human life" and "human being" have only a religious or metaphysical rather than a scientific meaning. They attempt to dissolve the ethical dilemma of abortion by re-defining the word "human" in terms of various functional abilities which make human beings worthy of respect and protection. Having concluded, then, on the basis of their own value systems, that life before birth is either valueless or of less value than the social benefits of legal abortion, they reason backward from this conclusion to deny that pre-natal life is "fully human."[5]

This evasion is not a new phenomenon by any means, for it was described in 1970 by the journal California Medicine:

"The reverence of each and every human life has been a keystone of Western medicine, and is the ethic which has caused physicians to try to preserve, protect, repair, prolong, and enhance every human life.

"Since the old ethic has not yet been fully displaced, it has been necessary to separate the idea of abortion from the idea of killing which continues to be socially abhorrent. The result has been a curious avoidance of the scientific fact, which everyone really knows, that human life begins at conception, and is continuous, whether intra- or extra-uterine, until death. The very considerable semantic gymnastics which are required to rationalize abortion as anything but taking a human life would be ludicrous if they were not often put forth under socially impeccable auspices. It is suggested that this schizophrenic sort of subterfuge is necessary because, while a new ethic is being accepted, the old one has not yet been rejected."[6]

We take some consolation in the fact that the "new ethic" for medicine has apparently still not caught on completely, since "semantic gymnastics" are still necessary; but we can only regret the confusion created when such tactics are used to avoid facing the facts.

Such attempts to deny the humanity of the unborn betray a lack of understanding of the social and moral dilemma confronting our society. We do not claim that unborn children have all the physical and social abilities proper to adults, any more than we would claim that newborn children possess all such physical and social abilities. We do claim that each human individual comes into existence at conception, and that all subsequent stages of development in which such abilities are acquired are just that—stages of growth and development in the life cycle of an individual already in existence. Each abortion destroys the life of an individual human being at an early stage in his or her development. Recognition of these facts does not automatically settle the moral and legal issue of abortion, but it does focus attention directly on the fundamental question involved: Will we treat human life as having inherent dignity and worth, or will we treat it in accordance with a sliding-scale of value in which the right to life is a privilege granted only to those with certain functional abilities?

As spiritual leaders and as representatives of an ethical tradition concerned with this question for centuries, we can give only one response to it. That response was succinctly summed up by the assembled Catholic bishops of the world at the Second Vatican Council, when they ranked abortion, murder and infanticide as "offenses against life itself" and declared that such offenses "debase the perpetrators more than the victims and militate against the honor of the creator."[7] Our witness on this point is rooted in a commitment to the sanctity of life which reaches to every level of our convictions as Christians, as believers in God the Creator, and as human beings.

As Christians we look to the gospel of Jesus Christ as our norm for faith and action. In Jesus we see that God has a special concern for the most lowly and despised human beings, and we see that each human being has infinite worth as a brother or sister of Jesus who is called to eternal life with God. Jesus is presented to us in the gospels as the paradigm of human dignity who calls to our consciences with the challenge: "As you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me" (Mt. 25:40). At the same time we are forced to admit that, in comparison with this perfect example of humanity, each of us is a very imperfect specimen indeed; and we therefore deny that we or any human being can sit in judgment upon another and proclaim him or her to be "not fully human." The New Testament parable of the Good Samaritan teaches us that no Christian can sit back and ask "Who is my neighbor?" in an attempt to define limits to his or her obligations with respect to others. Rather, each of us has, in the words of the Second Vatican Council, "an inescapable duty to make ourselves the neighbor of every man, no matter who he is."[8] This duty moves us not only to condemn abortion as the killing of our neighbor, but also to reach out to the pregnant woman with assistance and support both for her and for her child, offering life-giving alternatives to abortion and seeking the help of private agencies and of government in responding to this human need. Finally, the gospel calls us to a mission of forgiveness and reconciliation with regard to the woman who has had an abortion. Christ teaches us that the Father's mercy is always available and without limit. It is our duty to witness to this mercy toward all.

As heirs to the Judeo-Christian spiritual and ethical tradition which recognizes one Creator as Lord of all, we proclaim with Pope John Paul II that "all human life—from the moment of conception and through all subsequent stages—is scared, because human life is created in the image and likeness of God." [9] God is not the Lord only of some lives or of some stages of life, but as the Author of life itself, he is intimately concerned with the life of evey human being from its very beginning. The ethical tradition common to all Christians has always recognized this, condemning abortion at every stage despite occasional philosophical speculations concerning the time of "ensoulment." [10] Our Protestant brethren in particular have argued that speculations about "ensoulment" or "personhood" do not change the character of abortion as the destruction of a nascent human life called into existence by God.[11] We share the conviction that the deliberate destruction of innocent human life is the violation of God's commandment and the usurpation by man of divine authority over life and death. We believe that no human person has dominion over life and death, and therefore that no human individual or government has the right or the authority to dispense with unborn human life as it pleases.

Finally, as human beings committed to the common good of our society and the promotion of justice in the human community, we reject abortion as the killing of one who shares in our common humanity. Because the unborn child is undeniably a fellow human being, he or she deserves the same respect and the same protection as any other member of the human family. Simple human justice demands this much, as does the Golden Rule that calls on all human beings to treat others as they would have themselves treated. From a purely human viewpoint, therefore, the promotion of abortion is the prelude to the disintegration of all human dignity. It is the promotion of a selective justice, in which only the powerful can survive.

At every level of our convictions—as Christians, as religious leaders, and as concerned human beings—we believe the Supreme Court's abortion decisions constitute an egregious offense against human dignity. We do not suggest that every aspect of our religious convictions on this point can or should be represented in the law. But we defend our right to speak on matters of public policy precisely as religious leaders concerned with the moral and spiritual welfare of our society. We maintain that no human authority can abrogate to itself the power to classify some human lives as devoid of value, because no human authority gives human life its value. Any law which directly violates the divine law and the inherent rights of human beings, as the Supreme Court's decisions have done in this case, is itself unworthy of human respect.

Western Traditions on Human Rights and the Unborn Child

Having stated our conviction that the protection of the unborn child is a demand which our common humanity makes upon us, we also wish to emphasize that this conviction is in complete harmony with our commitment as American citizens to the defense of fundamental human rights. On this point, it is important to remember both the United States' traditional commitment to inherent human rights in general and its legislative record with respect to the protection of unborn human life.

At the root of Western jurisprudence, and especially of American law, is the conviction that governments must act according to certain commonly held moral principles and respect certain inherent rights if their laws are to be considered valid. This conviction is not restricted to one particular religious denomination, or to one particular theory concerning "natural law," but is Western civilization's alternative to arbitrary, unjust, or totalitarian government. It was in recognition of government's responsibilities to a higher law that the founders of our nation claimed the right to revolt against what they considered an unjust system of colonial law. This recognition is also what justifies America's criticism of violations of human rights by certain foreign governments. Without adherence to the idea of a higher law, all such condemnation of injustice is meaningless, because there is no independent standard by which the most abhorrent practices and policies of a legally constituted authority can be considered as either just or unjust. If human rights are grounded in human dignity, then they cannot be freely bestowed and removed by government. Instead, they call out to be recognized because they exist prior to any particular government. Laws which violate or ignore these rights therefore do not truly remove them, but instead render themselves invalid.

The articulation of such rights has been the intent of some of our most revered national and international documents. The right to life is proclaimed as the most fundamental of all rights, and is recognized as existing equally in all human beings regardless of their condition. Our Declaration of Independence recognizes the right to life as inherent and unalienable from the first moment of each human being's existence when it proclaims that "all men are created equal" with respect to this right. The fifth amendment to our Constitution states that no person shall be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law. The 13th and 14th amendments attempt to strengthen the protection of human life and to assure that no class of human beings will ever again be deprived of legal protection in the United States. The United Nations' International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides that "every human being has the inherent right to life," and implicitly recognizes the rights of the unborn child by rejecting the use of the death penalty upon pregnant women. The UN's Declaration of the Rights of the Child is more explicit, stating that "the child, by reason of his physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth." Here the mental and physical immaturity of the unborn, so often used as arguments in favor of abortion in the current American debate, are seen precisely as reasons for providing especially strong protection to the unborn because of their helplessness and greater need for the care of others. The American Convention on Human Rights, proposed by the Organization of American States in 1969 provided: "Every person has the right to have his life respected. This right shall be protected by law and, in general, from the moment of conception. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life." [12]

The presumption in favor of legal protection for the unborn child created by this human rights tradition is a strong one. Since the unborn child is now recognized more clearly than ever before as a member of the human race in science and medicine, such a tradition calls on legislators to protect the right of life of the unborn child as they protect the rights of other human beings. Indeed, the only sure means for avoiding such a conclusion is to deny that membership in the human race is sufficient reason in and of itself for being considered worthy of legal protection, and thus ultimately to deny that the idea of inherent human rights is relevant to the law. This denial should be familiar to those who recall the history of the degrading institution of slavery in America and the consititutional remedies which were necessary in order to put an end to it. The same denial can be found more recently in Nazi Germany's ideal of the absolute sovereignty of the state over the individual, and in the concept of "life devoid of value" by which it gave official sanction to a program for eliminating those considered medically or socially undesirable.[13]

Beginning in 1972, this denial has also played a role in federal court decisions dealing with abortion in the United States. In that year the highest court in the state of New York admitted that the unborn were "human" and "unquestionably alive", but ruled that there was no obligation to protect them because "it is not true that the legal order corresponds to the natural order." In dissent, Judge Adrian Burke focussed directly upon this questionable disjunction between fact and law, citing the Declaration of Independence to argue that human beings are created with inherent rights. These rights, claimed Judge Burke, could not simply be over-ruled by the state in the name of whatever happens to pass for enlightened social policy at any particular time.[14] But in January of 1973 the U.S. Supreme Court accepted the approach suggested by the majority opinion in this case, handing down the first in a series of rulings in which the concept of the inherent dignity of all human beings has been denied its proper role in the law.

Many have failed to notice this feature of the 1973 abortion decisions, because they think that the Supreme Court merely found itself unable to determine which of several views on the beginnings of human life is correct. In fact, the Court said that it "need not resolve the difficult question of when life begins," and implied that it could reasonably ignore the claims of the Texas state legislature that life begins at conception, because the question of whether someone was actually a living member of the human race was not determinative of legal status as a person.[15] This position was made more explicit by a federal judge in Rhode Island later in 1973, when he cited the Supreme Court's decisions as the basis for his ruling that the existence of human life at conception is "irrelevant" to the question of public policy on abortion.[16] The result of such decisions has been the creation of a new area of law in which the natural and legal orders are separated with a thoroughness hitherto unknown in the United States, with the possible exception of early American law dealing with slavery. This is the "new legalism" which we discussed in our 1976 testimony. While claiming to promote the freedom of physicians to practice good medicine, the Supreme Court substituted legal fictions such as "meaningful life" in place of the medical facts about abortion and unborn life.

In its 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court attempted to show that this approach to the unborn child has some basis in American legal history. American legislators, it claimed, granted little or no protection to the unborn child prior to the 19th century, and they never considered themselves as obliged to acknowledge a particular set of biological facts concerning the beginnings of life. But after eight years of research and reflection, American legal scholars and historians are still finding previously undiscovered ways in which the court's historical argument on this score is faulty.[17]

In part, the court's historical statements in Roe v. Wade can now be seen as relying on incomplete information. For instance, its claim that there were no civil statutes against abortion until the 19th century ignored laws of the 15th through 18th centuries regulating midwifery, in which abortions performed for any reason were prohibited.[18] More often, the Court's historical arguments involved an apparent misunderstanding of the way in which the law in each historical period has interacted with contemporaneous scientific knowledge and medical realities. Thus it mentioned that abortion was considered a crime only after "quickening" for some centuries, but it failed to appreciate that this subjective sensation on the part of the pregnant woman was given undue importance because of the primitive state of medical technology at that time.[19] The Court discussed medieval speculations concerning "delayed animation," grossly misrepresented them as having been Catholic "dogma" until the 19th century, failed to note that the Church's moral teaching always condemned abortion at every stage, and seemed oblivious of the fact that the philosophical speculations in question were based partly on Aristotelian biological ideas now totally obsolete.[20] Similarly, the Court noted the role of the American Medical Association in enacting new abortion laws in the 19th century, but simply juxtaposed its statements with the AMA's pro-abortion statements of the 1960s instead of looking carefully at the reasons behind those statements.[21] In 1859, when the AMA urged American legislatures to enact much stricter laws against abortion, it based its stance specifically on scientific evidence that human life begins at conception. In 1871, the AMA could quote with approval from Archbold's Criminal Practice and Pleadings:

"It was generally supposed that the foetus becomes animated at the period of quickening; but this idea is exploded. Physiology considers the foetus as much a living being immediately after conception as any other time before delivery, and its future progress but as the development and increase of those constituent principles which it then received. It considers quickening as a mere adventitious event, and looks upon life as entirely consistent with the most profound foetal repose and consequent inaction. Long before quickening takes place, motion, the pulsation of the heart, and other signs of vitality, have been distinctly perceived, and, according to approved authority, the foetus enjoys life long before the sensation of quickening is felt by the mother. Indeed, no other doctrine appears to be consonant with reason or physiology but that which admits the embryo to possess vitality from the very moment of conception." [22]

This position has never been contradicted by more recent AMA statements; instead, its statement of fact has been subordinated to a subjective view of social progress which has little to do with the AMA's scientific competence. A recognition of developing medical knowledge is also behind the Catholic Church's decision in the 19th century to treat all abortions from conception on as equally serious crimes against human life in the context of canon law.[23]

In other words, the history of Western law on abortion had demonstrated a clear trend toward greater and greater protection for the unborn child, based on the perceived need for such legislation and on the developing medical knowledge at a given point in time concerning life's beginnings. The Supreme Court's documentation in Roe v. Wade juxtaposed differing laws on the matter from different historical periods and argued that these differences create an irreducible pluralism which the Court cannot resolve—as though it were forced to give equal attention, for example, to modern medical knowledge and ancient Stoic philosophy.[24]

Roe v. Wade's treatment of constitutional "personhood" is another example of its inadequate reflection on this entire issue. The Court simply went through the Constitution with a concordance, and concluded that most uses of the term "person" therein (with regard to voting, eligibility for presidential office, etc.) have only "post-natal application."[25] Almost all of the examples noted by the Court, in fact, apply only to adults. Yet the 14th Amendment proclaims that all persons who are either born or naturalized in the U.S. are citizens of the U.S. No court has used this wording to argue that new immigrants who are not yet naturalized are "non-persons" who can be killed with impunity—rather, it is assumed that immigrants are "persons" with an inherent right to life long before assuming the special rights and responsibilities, of American citizens. The Supreme Court interpreted this clause in the opposite sense in the case of those not yet born, as though the absence of full-fledged citizenship automatically meant the absence of any unalienable human rights.

This interpretation is imposed upon the 14th amendment from without, ignoring evidence that the amendment was intended to prevent any class of human beings from being denied the rights of persons. It is clear from the legislative history of the 14th amendment that the word "person" was not intended to distinguish between members of the human race who had rights and those who did not—on the contrary, words such as "man," "human being" and "member of the human race" were all used in Congressional debate by the framers of this amendment as common-sense synonyms for the term "person." [26] The status of the unborn child in relation to laws on abortion was not explicitly discussed during this debate; but when the AMA urged new abortion laws in 1859 and 1871 to protect the unborn child, from conception on, in all but the most extreme cases, the same state and federal legislators who ratified the 14th amendment responded promptly in recognition of their solemn responsibility to protect human life.[27] The protection of unborn life was seen as being in harmony with the basic purpose of the 14th amendment, which was, in the words of one of its Senate supporters, to "establish. . .equality before the law, and . . . give to the humblest, the poorest, the most despised of the race the same rights and the same protection before the law as it gives to the most powerful, the most wealthy, or the most haughty." [28] It is this principle of the innate equality of all members of the human race which the Supreme Court denied in the case of the unborn child, reversing the obvious trend toward protection of all human life found in American law prior to the "liberalization" of some state abortion laws in the late 1960s.

The implications of Roe v. Wade's principles for the legal status of human beings who are handicapped or dependent on others, or those who in any way fall below the standard of what some court or legislature may consider "meaningful life," reach far beyond the abortion issue itself. To appreciate these implications is to realize that the abortion debate is not between science and religion, or between moralism and pluralism, or between two different interpretations of scientific data. The debate is between the conviction that all human beings are inherently equal in rights and dignity, and the idea that the inherent dignity of membership in the human race should be considered irrelevant to the law. Some who agree with the Supreme Court's abortion decisions argue that legal protection should be accorded only to those who can articulate and justify their needs in the public forum; others propose a sliding-scale of rights corresponding to the possession of certain mental or physical abilities; still others eschew such considerations, arguing simply that legal abortion is necessary for the efficient pursuit of social goods and liberties and that this is sufficient reason for its acceptance. But these positions all have two things in common: They require us to reject the idea that all human beings have inherent value and inherent rights by reason of a commonly shared humanity, and they can easily be applied to the killing of other classes of human beings in addition to the unborn.

We have recognized for years that the arguments by which the Supreme Court devalued unborn life have the potential for undermining the idea of inherent human rights with regard to those already born. In its 1974 Declaration on Abortion, the Roman Catholic Church's Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith stated that an unequivocal defense of the right to life of human beings must be grounded in the conviction that this right exists prior to any state's recognition of it, indeed that it must exist as soon as life itself comes into existence. To argue that the right to life rests instead on official legal recognition by the state, or that it exists only upon arrival at some particular stage or condition of life which the state is willing to regard as socially valuable or "meaningful," is to deny that there is such a thing as an inherent right to life at all.[29] The logical conclusion of the principles used by the Supreme Court to legalize abortion is that our own fundamental rights are held only as privileges bestowed upon us by the state. Thus when Pope John Paul II said last year that there is a "patent contradiction" in the attempt to reconcile abortion with the furthering of human dignity, his words held special significance for the situation in the United States, in which the very principles used to justify abortion involve a denial of our traditional commitment to the natural rights of mankind. With Pope John Paul we hold that "the right to life is the most fundamental right of the human being, a personal right that obliges from the very beginning," and that the attempt to deny this right with respect to the unborn child is an attack upon the fundamental rights of all of us.[30]

THE LEGAL AND SOCIAL EFFECTS OF ROE V. WADE

When Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton were handed down by the Supreme Court in 1973, the public policy they created with regard to abortion was hailed by some Americans as an example of progressive social policy. Abortion advocated predicted that a variety of social benefits would soon follow. Safe and legal abortion would make unsafe "back alley" abortions a thing of the past; infant and maternal mortality rates would plummet; every child who was allowed to be born would be a "wanted child, and so the abuse and neglect of children would become less of a problem; teenage child-bearing and illegitimate children would become less of a burden upon society; etc.

Eight years later, we see no sign that the brave new world predicted in 1973 has materialized. Nor is there any reason to expect that a few more years of the same policy will eventually bear the promised fruit. Some of the more obvious failures of the current policy are as follows:

1. Initial predictions that the annual number of abortions would level out within a few years have proved overly optimistic. The estimated number of abortions performed last year is 1.5 million, and groups such as Planned Parenthood still point to a great unmet abortion "need" in many parts of the country.[31] At this point it seems clear that the "need" or "demand" for abortion is very flexible, growing every year as the current legal situation allows the "supply" to be openly and aggressively marketed to American women. As permissive attitudes toward abortion take hold, increasingly frivolous reasons are considered sufficient justification for abortion. Some genetic counselors who perform amniocentesis for the purpose of detecting genetic defects prenatally have complained about the growing number of women who wish to use amniocentesis simply to determine the sex of an unborn child, so that an abortion can be obtained if the child is not of the "right" sex.[32]

2. Despite the annual increase in the number of legal abortions, women continue to die every year from illegal abortions—that is, from abortions performed by nonphysicians. In addition, the huge number of legal abortions adds its own annual casualties to the maternal mortality statistics. It may be that the full story of this tragedy has not yet been told, since some findings suggest that the number of maternal deaths from legal abortion is under-reported.[33] Although the number of abortion-related maternal deaths has decreased since 1973, the rate of decrease is not significantly different from the annual rate at which it has dropped since 1942, due to general advances in obstetrical medicine.[34] In 1978, the noted obstetrician Denis Cavanaugh remarked that "there has been no major impact on the number of women dying in the United States since liberalized abortion was introduced," and indeed that "there has been less improvement in maternal mortality in the 1973-to-1975 period than in any other period since 1965. This suggests that approximately one million fetuses are being sacrificed each year with no evidence that it is contributing significantly to the reduction of maternal deaths in this country." [35] Since 1975, the annual number of abortion-related maternal deaths has levelled off, with the exception of 1977, when there was an increase in abortion-related maternal deaths; some legal abortions still result in the mother's death, and illegal abortions continue to be performed.[36] From the outset we have rejected the very premise on which this argument in favor of legalized abortion was based: Even if legalization did result indirectly in some preservation of life, it would be morally reprehensible to authorize the direct destruction of life in order to achieve this goal.[37] But it is now clear that this policy fails even when seen in its own callous and pragmatic terms. At this point the only way to reduce significantly the number of maternal deaths may be to restrict the actual number of abortions as much as possible, while offering comprehensive programs of care and support to women with problem pregnancies.

3. The claim that legalized abortion reduces the infant mortality rate rests on questionable reasoning. If one kills a child before birth, then obviously he or she will never appear in the official infant mortality statistics, but this can hardly be declared a social benefit. In any case, states which have shown remarkable reductions in infant mortality over the past few years have generally attributed their success to the development of better medical care for pregnant women and their children and not to abortion.[38] Some cities which have the highest abortion rates in the country, such as the District of Columbia, also have infant mortality rates which are a national scandal.[39] There may well be a cause-and-effect relationship at work here. The most reliable recent studies indicate that women who have had two or more abortions have a much higher chance that other women of having premature births in future pregnancies. In places like the District of Columbia, where a large percentage of the abortions are obtained by women who have already had at least one previous abortion, the premature birth rate which is a major cause of high infant mortality may be aggravated by the high abortion rate.[40]

4. The slogan of "every child a wanted child" seems empty in the face of a national epidemic of child abuse and neglect. Some psychologists have suggested that here, too, there may be a cause-and-effect relationship at work. Abortion may help to break down the protective instinct of mother for child which begins to form early in pregnancy. Once weakened, it tends to affect the behavior of the mother toward the other children.[41] Whatever the truth may be with respect to this particular claim, it is clear that the ideology represented by "every child a wanted child" is destructive rather than supportive of the family as a haven for the acceptance and nurturing of life.[42] When a child is seen primarily as the projection of parents' self-serving desires and needs rather than as a unique individual with intrinsic worth, the stage is set for parental disappointment and even uncontrollable anger whenever this child does not quite measure up to parents' plans or expectations. No clear link has been shown between an initially unplanned or "unwanted" pregnancy and the later "unwantedness" of the child after birth; in fact, almost every pregnant woman has ambivalent feelings about her pregnancy at one stage or another, and this is generally recognized as a perfectly normal event of pregnancy. Many of the children who end up being abused or neglected after birth are initially "wanted" and planned children who later have fallen short of their parents' standards of perfection.[43]

5. At one time it was thought by abortion advocates that legalized abortion would enable physicians to practice medicine with greater freedom from external legal restrictions, and that this would help the medical profession to devote itself more singlemindedly to the care of human beings already born. Instead, the erosion of respect for life which is promoted by a policy of abortion on demand has spread to areas of medical practice dealing with the handicapped and the terminally ill. The Hippocratic oath is as opposed to infanticide and euthanasia as it is to abortion; but this oath is now seen as "an inadequate guide" for physicians, according to a recent weekly magazine, because "modern doctors, many of whom swore to uphold its principles when they graduated from medical school, now violate it every day." [44] Physicians' professional and ethical opposition to practices such as infanticide for handicapped newborns and "assisted suicide" for the terminally ill thus becomes increasingly difficult to maintain.[45] A profound shift in the professional ethics of the physician can therefore be detected, in which the Hippocratic axiom "To help or at least to do no harm" is in danger of being replaced by the physician's role as technician, using his expertise either to kill or to cure as is demanded of him. As some physicians cease to consider themselves as involved in a sacred calling devoted to the nurturing of life, others have warned that such a trend may help to undermine public trust and respect for the medical profession as a whole. According to an editorial by Dr. Seymour Glick in a recent issue of The New England Journal of Medicine, the most fundamental reason for modern medicine's growing crisis of respectability is its failure to stand up "for the sanctity of life and for the dignity of human beings" in an increasingly secularized society. "Our societies must come to grips with this problem," Dr. Glick concludes, "because the problem transcends medicine; it threatens the very fabric of Western societal structure and its failure." [46]

6. Attempts to stem the tide of what is sometimes called the teenage pregnancy "epidemic" have been going on for many years. In 1963, Planned Parenthood pamphlets warned teenagers that abortion "kills the life of a baby after it has begun" and recommended contraception as a way of insuring that one need never face the prospect of abortion.[47]

When this approach did not have the desired effect, Planned Parenthood and other groups turned to abortion as a back-up to "contraceptive failure." The "epidemic" has continued, to the extent that Planned Parenthood, Inc. refers to it as "the problem that hasn't gone away." [48] Yet the response of Planned Parenthood and other groups has been to claim that more of the same approach will lower the teenage pregnancy rate, if only the government will help them to push contraception and abortion more aggressively and on a wider scale.[49] Some abortion advocates have called for mandatory abortion for teenage girls under a certain age as a way to solve this problem.[50] Yet this approach seems doomed to failure, even if it is allowed to become coercive, because it ignores the realities of teenage pregnancy and childbearing as human problems. Some teenage girls look to pregnancy, either consciously or unconsciously, as a welcome relief from a difficult or unloving home environment. Teenagers in general have little of the self-discipline required for consistent contraceptive practice, because of their romanticized attitudes toward the "spontaneity" of sex; and this lack of self-discipline is further encouraged by the offer of abortion as a quick and easy "back-up" solution.[51]

Researchers are beginning to notice that many of the problems once seen as results of teenage childbearing, such as low economic and educational achievement, may actually be factors in the social situation which contributed to the likelihood of pregnancy.[52] In short, the use of abortion as a solution to problems such as teenage pregnancy seems certain to fail even in its own pragmatic terms because it is based on a myopic view of the problem. Alternative solutions which are more complex but more respectful of human life and human dignity offer more promise in helping to solve this difficult problem.

While failing to solve the social problems once cited as justifications for the legalization of abortion, the Supreme Court's abortion decisions have created new problems in a number of legal areas. As the principles of these decisions have begun to work their way into American jurisprudence, they have provided ample evidence to support the claim that Roe v. Wade and its progency constitute a threat to the rights and dignity of all Americans. Again, only some of the most obvious examples of this can be listed here.

1. The Supreme Court's dichotomy between human beings and "persons in the whole sense," and its innovations in referring to independent or "meaningful" life as the only life deserving of legal protection, have begun to affect rulings dealing with the rights of those already born. In a 1979 abortion case, the Supreme Court ruled that a child born alive during an abortion who may be capable of surviving with medical help has no legal right to that help, because the recognition of such a right would have a "chilling effect" on the woman's right to have a late-term abortion.[53] In 1980, a New York state court cited Roe v. Wade to claim that terminally ill comatose patients have "in the true sense, no life" for the state to protect. This court argued that "the State's interest in preservation of the life of the fetus would appear greater than any possible interest the State may have in maintaining continued life of a terminally ill comatose patient . . . (whose) claim to personhood is certainly no greater than that of a fetus. [54] Recent court cases concerned with the right of handicapped children to medical treatment and with the new concept of "wrongful life" suggest that the 1973 abortion decisions pose a threat to all human beings who are especially helpless and dependent on others.[55]

2. As we noted above, the practice of abortion and its concomitant ideology of the "wanted child" constitute a threat to the family as a life-nurturing institution. The destructive effects of abortion on the family have been multiplied by the way in which the family is explicitly treated in recent court rulings on abortion. In Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, for instance, the Supreme Court ruled that a father's rights and responsibilities with respect to his unborn child are his only by delegation of the State, instead of being grounded in the natural relationships of parenthood and the family.[56] Even in rulings which have sustained relatively weak legislation dealing with parental consent for abortions performed on minors, the courts have insisted that a court, rather than parents, shall have the final say as to whether an abortion will be performed, and perhaps even the final say as to whether parents will be notified at all.[57] The federal courts have thereby attacked that institution which the United Nations has called "the natural and fundamental unit of society . . . entitled to protection by society and the state." [58] In which such as these the family is seen primarily as a grouping of separate individuals, or as the delegated agent of the State. In treating family structures merely as restrictions upon the rights of private individuals, the Supreme Court has ignored the family's vital role in promoting these rights. For most of us, the family is that training-ground where we are first educated to the very idea of inherent human dignity and rights, because it gives us our first experience of being accepted and loved simply because we are and not because we have earned acceptance through our own achievements. By intruding upon familial prerogatives and substituting their own values for the values of the family unit, courts weaken the ability of parents to provide this kind of community for their children; and when the values of the courts are themselves questionable with regard to the principle of inherent human rights, the result can only be a weakening of society's overall commitment to human dignity.

3. Some court cases dealing with abortion have provided an opportunity for attacks on the rights of individuals and groups who disagree with the current public policy on abortion. Although "conscience clauses" protecting health care personnel and privately owned hospitals have been enacted by state and federal legislatures, these clauses have been difficult to enforce.[59] Even rulings which uphold the principle of the conscience clause have noted that the consciences of employees need not be respected if this could cause "undue hardship" to the employer wishing to provide elective abortions.[60] There have also been attempts to force church-affiliated institutions to violate the moral convictions of their sponsors by making them provide abortion services.[61]

4. In some cases courts have played an intrusive role by actually making life-and-death decisions on behalf of private individuals. This has been made possible by Roe v. Wade's ruling that the constitutional "right to privacy" can over-rule any interest the state may have in preserving life that is not "meaningful." For instance, the right of a patient to refuse unwanted medical treatment has traditionally been seen as a common-law right to be exercised within the familial and doctor-patient relationship whenever possible. But some courts have begun to treat this area of law in terms of a constitutional right to privacy which is so personal and individual a right that it cannot be limited or exercised within those relationships, but must be adjudicated by the court itself. In cases where a patient is not competent to exercise this right on his or her own behalf, courts have attempted to make the decision by their own "substituted judgment." [62] These cases have provided an opportunity to treat all private decision-making processes in such situations as mere delegations of a power which properly belongs to the court itself.[63] This judicial trend has even been applied back to the abortion issue itself, allowing courts to order abortions for mentally retarded or incompetent women and to demand that state legislatures provide public funding for elective abortions.[64] The general idea at work in all these cases is that, since the right to privacy is a constitutional right to be defined by the state and federal courts, the courts have broad powers to facilitate the exercise of that right and even to exercise it on behalf of others. By a curious twist of reasoning, a "right to privacy" originally formulated as an alleged defense of individualism has become a very public entity indeed, and one which can be used to ignore the dignity of human individuals in the implementation of courts' value judgments on life and death. While pro-abortion groups continue to lobby against any constitutional amendment on abortion as a threat to individual freedom, we see a clear threat to freedom in this abuse of judicial power with regard to decisions concerning life and death.

When the decisions of the Supreme Court imposed an abortion policy on this country in 1973, many thought this marked the end of the public controversy over legalized abortion. The Court treated abortion simply as a medical procedure and as a matter of individual privacy, and by doing so seemed to have remove the issue from the public arena.

Eight years later, it is not possible realistically to hold such a view. While some maintain that abortion is now a private matter between a woman and her physician, the social and legal trends noted above indicate that the Supreme Court's decisions have had far-reaching effects on American society. This has happened, we believe, primarily because the court was tragically mistaken in thinking that abortion affects only a woman and her physician. Every abortion also involves the unborn child as an innocent third party. Every abortion involves the father of the child, and in many cases abortion has profound effects on friends, parents, and other members of the family. Every abortion also involves the future of the society in which it takes place, for it involves moral, psychological and emotional factors which play an important role in making up the character of that society. By ignoring the public dimension of the practice of abortion and failing to recognize it as the fundamental social problem that it is, we place ourselves among its passive victims. In the United States this public dimension has been magnified by the Supreme Court's classification of abortion as a virtually absolute constitutional right and by its direct attack on the most fundamental of all rights, the right to life itself. The potential for destructiveness inherent in such action is almost unimaginable, for it reaches to the very roots of our legal system and turns its most basic principles upside down. The right to life is replaced by the right to kill, and the very concept of inherent rights is replaced by the concept of privileges bestowed by the state upon those it considers worthy of recognition.

We do not pretend to have all the solutions to the problems which abortion has been purported to solve. Indeed, the idea that there was one quick and easy solution to these problems has been at the root of some very misguided support for our current public policy on abortion. But we do know that abortion, in addition to being a moral evil, has failed to solve society's problems, and has itself become a legal and social disaster, the consequences of which will be felt for many years to come. By reversing the current policy, we will clear the way to enable us to work together to promote the common good of all who live in our country. Without such a reversal, we fear that our society's commitment to that common good can only erode further.

THE ISSUE OF LAW AND MORALITY

The national debate on the relationship between law and morality has become closely associated with the debate on abortion in recent years. Some groups that support legalized abortion have claimed that any law protecting the unborn child would be an imposition of a particular morality on a pluralistic society; and some have even claimed that it would impose specifically Roman Catholic religious beliefs on this society, thereby violating the non-establishment clause of the First Amendment. We wish to conclude our testimony with some remarks on these charges.

Our response remains fundamentally the same as in 1974, when we gave the following testimony before the U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments.

"We wish to make it clear that we are not seeking to impose the Catholic moral teaching regarding abortion on the country. In our tradition, moral teaching bases its claim on faith in a transcendent God and the pursuit of virtue and moral perfection. In fact, moral teaching may frequently call for more than civil law can dictate, but a just civil law cannot be opposed to moral teaching based on God's law. We do not ask the law to take up our responsibility of teaching morality, i.e., that abortion is morally wrong. However, we do ask the Government and the law to be faithful to its own principle—that the right to life is an inalienable right given to everyone by the Creator. . . .

"We appear here today in fulfillment of our considered responsibility to speak in behalf of human rights. The right to life—which finds resonance in the moral and legal tradition—is a principle we share with the society and the one that impels us to take an active role in the democratic process directed toward its clear and unequivocal articulation."[65]

Since our testimony in 1976, several developments have helped to underscore the exact nature of the Catholic Church's moral concern in this area and the extent to which the abortion issue reaches beyond the bounds of any particular religion's moral teaching.

First of all, the increasingly visible involvement of other religious groups in the public debate on abortion has vividly demonstrated that this is not just a "Catholic issue." The news media have directed their attention primarily to new conservative political groups led by evangelical Protestants who were previously silent on most public policy issues. In addition, however, the governing bodies of denominations such as the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod and the Southern Baptist Convention have approved resolutions in support of a Human Life Amendment during the last two years, and other churches which had made statements in support of permissive abortion after 1973 have begun to qualify their stance.[66]

Second, the fact that a convincing case can be made against abortion on wholly secular grounds has become increasingly obvious. This case has been ably defended by many respected scholars in the realm of political philosophy and constitutional law.[67] The author of Aborting America, Dr. Bernard Nathanson, has articulated his opposition to abortion in terms consistent with his own non-religious humanistic convictions. All one needs in order to support laws against abortion, he notes, is a recognition of some simple biological facts and a commitment to the Golden Rule which has been taught in every civilized society.[68] Secular groups of every conceivable social and political background have enriched the public debate with the variety of their perspectives on this issue.[69]

Finally, the U.S. Supreme Court itself, in ruling upon the constitutionality of restrictions on the public funding of abortion, has reiterated the traditional judicial principle that a law with a "secular legislative purpose" does not violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendent simply because it "happens to coincide or harmonize with the tenets of some or all religions." Noting that "laws prohibiting larceny" are not unconstitutional establishments of religion despite the fact that "the Judaeo-Christian religions oppose stealing," the Court concluded that a funding restriction on abortion is "as much a reflection of 'traditionalist' values toward abortion, as it is an embodiment of the views of any particular religion."[70] The Supreme Court's argument clearly can be applied to legislation restricting abortion in general. To its own statement on the matter we wish only to add that the word "traditionalist" is no more appropriate as a description of the Catholic Church's position on abortion than it is as a description of our position on stealing. As we have emphasized throughout this testimony, our position on abortion is perfectly consistent with modern scientific knowledge and the most progressive features of American policy on human rights in general. We do not support legal protection for the unborn child because it is "traditional" to do so, but because we totally reject the idea that social "progress" lies in a retreat from the legal and ethical principles which have given the United States its reputation as a defender of the weak against the strong.

Pro-abortion groups have also claimed that opposition to abortion is a minority view and that we are seeking to "impose" this view on the majority of the citizens of the United States. This charge is false on two counts. First of all, every major public opinion poll taken in the last eight years has shown that most Americans are opposed to legalized abortion on demand. About half of those polled would like to see abortion made illegal except for certain rare circumstances; the other half is about equally divided between those who favor abortion on demand and those who either oppose all abortion or would make an exception only to prevent the death of the mother.[71] Two-thirds of the people of our country think that abortion is morally wrong, and almost three-fourths seem to realize that the victim of even a first-trimester abortion is a living human being. Contrary to a rather popular stereotype, women are more opposed to legalized abortion than men are, and Americans who are poor or who are members of racial minorities are more opposed to abortion than the white and affluent.[72] The most recent analysis of public opinion on abortion by Judith Blake, who has researched this question since before the Supreme Court's 1973 decisions, indicates that popular support for the full extent of the Supreme Court's actions in this area is even more precarious than the above figures would seem to suggest. Her findings show that Americans who have "moderate" or ambivalent attitudes toward legalized abortion actually lean more toward the consistent anti-abortion position than toward the consistent pro-abortion position.[73] These figures do not even begin to address the point that the group whose rights are in question, that of unborn children, is totally without a voice of its own, and therefore deserves the special concern of legislators who are sworn to defend the rights of minorities against the power of the majority.

Secondly, there is no effort afoot to "impose" a law on our country from the outside, but only a drive to return this issue to the American people's elected representatives. The legalization of abortion on demand was "imposed" on this country in 1973 by seven Justices of the U.S. Supreme Court. In attempting to correct this unfair decision by constitutional amendment as provided for by our Constitution, we display our commitment to American democratic principles.

There are also some who admit that the majority view is against abortion on demand, but who defend its legalization on the basis of American "pluralism." Because no one view of abortion will ever claim the minds and hearts of all Americans, they argue, we must continue to leave the abortion decision up to each individual woman. There are several important flaws in this argument as well.

1. This "pro-choice" argument would invalidate almost all civil rights legislation if it were applied consistently. In fact, the same argument was used to defend slavery in the 19th century. Slave-owners claimed that individuals or states that wished not to engage in the practice of slavery need not do so, but they should respect the conscientious decisions of others in this controversial matter. President Abraham Lincoln's response was to point out that the law of the U.S., if it accepted such a situation, would in fact be taking the pro-slavery side by acting as though there were nothing wrong with slavery. The same response must be made today to the "pro-choice" rationale for legalized abortion.[74] To withdraw all legal protection from the unborn child in the name of "pluralism" is to say, in practice, that this child is not deserving of any public attention and his or her life is to be left to the whim of the mother. It means forgetting that we are dealing not with a purely "private" decision but with one which determines the fate of a defenseless and innocent party. As we have argued elsewhere in this testimony, the current legal situation with regard to abortion also has a number of devastating effects on government and society which call for a public response.

2. The "pro-choice" argument, in one sense, does not go far enough in its defense of pluralism. If pluralism means anything in American society, it means that we must defend the rights and freedoms of every class of human beings, regardless of age, race, sex, or condition. A law which allows the killing of any class of human beings is therefore fundamentally anti-pluralistic and "anti-choice," for it allows those human beings to be deprived of any possibility of making their own choices and expressing their own opinions in the future. A pluralism which respects only those who are currently powerful and articulate enough to put their own beliefs into practice to the detriment of others is not, in our opinion, a genuine or complete pluralism.

3. The argument also ignores another important factor in what we have come to know as American pluralism. This factor was fully recongized by that great defender of religious freedom, John Courtney Murray, when he wrote his classic work entitled We Hold These Truths:

"One idea, rooted in the American tradition, has seemed to me to be central, and therefore it has been recurrent. Every proposition, if it is to be argued, supposes an epistemology of some sort. The epistemology of the American Proposition was, I think, made clear by the Declaration of Independence in the famous phrase: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident. . . .'

For the pragmatist there are, properly speaking, no truths; there are only results. But the American Proposition rests on the more traditional conviction that there are truths; that they can be known; that they must be held; for, if they are not held, assented to, consented to, worked into the texture of institutions, there can be no hope of founding a true City, in which men may dwell in dignity, peace, unity, justice, well-being, freedom." [75]

Without this commitment to the grounding of law in an objective order of inherent rights, there is no pluralistic America; instead, there is a plurality of Americas, each committed to its own peculiar view-point concerning human rights. We see this destructive form of pluralism at work in the arguments of those who consider the beginning of human life as merely a matter of private opinion. Once one rejects the idea that human rights should be based on simple existence as a member of the human race, one is faced with an irreducible and chaotic pluralism of arbitrary opinions as to the beginnings of "personhood," "meaningful life," or "fully human" life. In this climate, as we have seen, the "personhood" of human beings already born becomes a matter of debate as well, since their membership in the human race is not sufficient reason for being granted the rights or privileges or legal "person." [76] This will be a special threat to human beings, such as handicapped infants or terminally ill patients, whose right to life is already being compromised by our legal system. We cannot allow this trend toward the elimination of the weak and defenseless to be pushed forward under the banner of American "pluralism" of "freedom of choice," any more than we would allow a re-institution of slavery under this banner. Some human choices are fundamentally destructive of the rights and dignity of other human beings, and therefore should be forbidden by law.

In calling for legal protection for the unborn child, we have no intention of asking the government to take over our own task of teaching moral principles and forming consciences. But the law does have a teaching function, exercised through legislation which forbids or discourages specific actions deemed to be destructive of the common good. In deciding whether abortion should be considered as among such actions, legislators inevitably make judgments as to the moral principles which will be reflected in the law. To some extent, the question before our legislatures is not whether they will "legislate morality"—it is whether the morality reflected in the law will be one which respects all human life or one which legitimates the destruction of particularly inconvenient and dependent human lives. In this controversy, to refuse to legislate is to allow the Supreme Court by its decisions to legislate the latter form of morality.

Conclusion

During this testimony we have touched upon many elements in the complex issue of legalized abortion. We have reaffirmed the relevance of fundamental moral principles to the debate on this issue, while pointing out the undeniable basis which our moral position has in modern biological and medical fact. We have explained the way in which our position is in harmony with the most respected principles of international and American law, as well as the ways in which the Supreme Court's abortion decisions rest upon an unjust denial of those principles. We have delineated what we see as some of the most devastating social and legal consequences of these decisions, emphasizing the point that their reversal should be an important and immediate priority for all those who are committed to promoting the good of our society. Finally, we have discussed the controversial question of law and morality as it bears on this particular issue, and responded to charges that our commitment to legal protection for the unborn child is inconsistent with a commitment to American freedom and pluralism. Our final remarks will deal with the specific legislative response which we think should be made to the situation we have described.

Our own comprehensive response to the Supreme Court's abortion decisions can be found in the Pastoral Plan for Pro-Life Activities, approved by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops on November 20, 1975, which we presented as part of our testimony before the House Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights in 1976. This response is three-pronged, including efforts in the spheres of education and pastoral care as well as in that of public policy. Within the area of legislation and public policy, we proposed a pro-life legislative program with the following elements:

(a) Passage of a constitutional amendment providing protection for the unborn child to the maximum degree possible.

(b) Passage of federal and state laws and adoption of administrative policies that will restrict the practice of abortion as much as possible.

(c) Continual research into and refinement and precise interpretation of Roe and Doe and subsequent court decisions.

(d) Support for legislation that provides alternatives to abortion.

Although we have been active in all these areas, we have restated a number of times over the past eight years that our highest legislative priority is the passage of a constitutional amendment that will reverse the Supreme Court's abortion decisions and restore legal protection to the unborn. Today we again reaffirm our commitment to such an amendment.

We have generally refrained from endorsing a specific amendment before the Congress, however. Instead, we have suggested certain guidelines that we believe should be taken into account in formulating an amendment which gives a constitutional base for the protection of unborn human life. These guidelines state that a constitutional amendment should do four things:

(1) Establish that the unborn child is a person under the law in terms of the Constitution from conception on.

(2) The Constitution should express a commitment to the preservation of life to the maximum degree possible. The protection resulting therefrom should be universal.

(3) The proposed amendment should give the states the power to enact enabling legislation, and to provide for ancillary matters such as record-keeping, etc.

(4) The right to life is described in the Declaration of Independence as "unalienable" and as a right with which all men are endowed by the Creator. The amendment should restore the basic constitutional protection for this human right to the unborn child.

Now, as in 1976, considerable controversy has raged concerning the relative merits of various proposals for an amendment. In our 1976 testimony we recognized that not every proposal was equally consonant with all of our suggested guidelines; while arguing against a pure "states' rights" amendment as an ineffective measure for giving uniform protection to the unborn in the various states, we also recognized that some proposals granting legislative authority to Congress and the states to protect unborn human life were a significant improvement on the "states' rights" approach. Similarly, on September 22 of this year we expressed great interest in the new "human life federalism amendment" recently proposed by Senator Hatch of Utah, which expressly overturns the right to abortion created by the Supreme Court in 1973 and gives concurrent power to Congress and the states to restrict and prohibit abortion.

As moral leaders we can claim no special competence at legislative draftsmanship, and so we do not claim the expertise to comment at length on the advisability and effectiveness of specific formulations. Our own guidelines have always been offered as contributions to a dialogue, in which the members of Congress were considered as the appropriate agents for the actual drafting of an amendment to be presented to the state legislatures. We take note of the fact that some recent testimony before this subcommittee indicates a possibility that the establishment of constitutional "personhood" may not be necessary at the present time for restoring effective legal protection to unborn children, and indeed that it could fail through judicial interpretation to provide effective protection. We expect that the members of the subcommittee will take expert testimony of this sort into account, and also that they will consider the political possibilities for ratification of the various proposals which confront them. Our own fundamental commitment, as stated in our 1975 Pastoral Plan, is to an amendment which will actually provide the maximum degree of protection for unborn human life that is possible.

Our appearance here today is an expression of our commitment to the American democratic process. We believe that this process was short-circuited in 1973, when the decisions of the Supreme Court overturned the abortion laws of every state in the Union in its single-minded drive to promote its own policy on abortion. We urge our elected representatives in Congress to redress this injustice as soon as possible by restoring to our legal system the power to protect human life at every stage of its existence.

[17] In our 1976 testimony we cited criticisms of the abortion decisions by John Hart Ely, Alexander Bickel, Robert Byrn, and Archibald Cox. In his new book, Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review (Harvard University Press 1981), Professor Ely has restated his judgment that even a fairly "activist" viewpoint on judicial review fails to provide any warrant in the Constitution for Roe v. Wade. Liberal columnist Michael Kinsley recently voiced a growing consensus when he referred to the abortion decisions as "the one really indefensible case of judicial overreaching" in recent years (The New Republic, October 18, 1980, p. 15). On the Supreme Court's historical arguments, see: Joseph P. Witherspoon, "Impact of the Abortion Decisions Upon the Father's Role", The Jurist 1975, pp. 41-47; idem., Testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, June 10, 1981; Victor G. Rosenblum, Testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, June 1, 1981. Recognition of the fact that the abortion decisions had no firm grounding in legal history began with the dissenting opinions of Justices on the court itself. Referring to the majority opinion as "an exercise of raw judicial power", Justice White declared that "I find nothing in the language or history of the Constitution to support the Court's judgment." Justice Rehnquist joined in this dissent and added his own, in which he noted that the Court's imposing of specific limits on the states for each trimester of pregnancy "partakes more of judicial legislation than it does of a determination of the intent of the drafters of the Fourteenth Amendment." [23] The "treatment" in question, it should be noted, concerns only ecclesiastical penalties in canon law. The moral teaching of the Church, as we have already noted above, has condemned abortion at every stage as a form of grave wrongdoing from the earliest years of the Christian era. The fiction that the Church has changed its moral judgment of early abortions arises, in part, from a failure to understand the distinction between moral doctrine and canon law.

But early this year, the same researchers reported that "although 1.5 million women obtained abortions in 1979, an estimated 641,000 in need were unable to do so, largely because of problems of geographical and financial inaccessibility" ("Abortion in the United States, 1978-1979," Family Planning Perspectives, January/February 1981, p. 6). According to The Washington Post for October 21, 1981, the current issue of Family Planning Perspectives reports that the women in "need" of an abortion would number about 450,000 even if every woman in the U.S. used the most effective but most dangerous contraceptive devices.

Those deaths, which were uncovered in only four clinics, amounted to nearly half of the deaths that were reported officially for abortion in the nation as a whole. And if, as we suspect, the experience in Chicago can find a modest replication in New York, Detroit, Los Angeles, and other cities, the total deaths due to legal abortion may now exceed the number of deaths that were thought to occur each year as a result of illegal abortions."

[50] At the fourth annual meeting of the National Abortion Federation, held May 28-30, 1980 at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Washington, D.C., a talk given by Jane Hodgson included the rhetorical question: "Does freedom of choice really apply to the very young? Should we sit quietly by and allow our 12-year-olds, and our 11-year-olds, possibly 10-year-olds, to make a choice which is far more harmful to her, to society, and to the ensuing generation? Shouldn't we . . . mandate against continuing pregnancy in the very young, say, those less than 14 years?". Her proposal was later endorsed by another speaker, Lonnie Meyers, who claimed that "it's time we had the guts to say that 14 is too young to have a baby." See Andrew Scholberg, Wade* had placed severe restrictions on abortions performed after the point of "viability"; but even in 1973, the court had ruled that a post-viability abortion could be performed for "health" reasons, and had interpreted "health" so broadly that temporary financial or emotional distress were sufficiently serious justifications for an abortion in the final stages of pregnancy. In their Philadelphia Inquirer article "Abortion: The Dreaded Complication" (August 2, 1981), Liz Jeffries and Rick Edmonds report that the problem of dealing with a child born alive during an abortion now arises hundreds of times a year in the U.S.

[55] "Wrongful life" suits are predicated on the idea that a handicapped child's very existence is a "wrong" for which monetary damages can be assessed. In its 1980 ruling in Curlender v. Bio-Science Laboratories the California Supreme Court suggested that a handicapped child should be able to sue her own parents for not having aborted her. In the same state, however, the courts denied the right of Phillip Becker, a child with Down's syndrome, to have surgery which could save his life but which is opposed by his parents. The parents had argued that they do not wish Phillip to outlive them because they are afraid of the quality of life of which he would be capable. The Supreme Court has refused to hear an appeal from this decision (Bothman v. Warren B., No. 79-698; denial of cert. March 31, 1980). Another family has tried to gain temporary custody of Phillip in order to allow him the medical care he needs, but his condition may already have advanced too far for the surgery to be of help. [59] See the analysis by Noonan, A Private Choice, pp. 83-86. This problem was mentioned by the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in 1974, when it declared inadmissible a situation in which doctors or nurses should have to choose between the law of God and their professional situation: Declaration on Abortion, n. 22 (p. 9).

[60] This principle has recently been affirmed in KENNY v. Ambulatory Centre of Miami, 400 So. 2d 1262 (Fla. Ct. App. 1981). Here it was implied that the need to re-arrange schedules substantially in order to respect a nurse's refusal to cooperate in abortions might have been considered as "undue hardship". The lower court had ruled against the nurse without seeing evidence of any hardships of this kind.

[61] The National Conference of Catholic Bishops has filed suit against federal guidelines which could force certain employers, including the U. S. Catholic Conference, to provide abortion benefits through employees' health insurance plans and fringe benefit programs: NCCB v. Bell, U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia (Filed 1980). For comments on the threat to First Amendment rights involved in such guidelines, see George F. Will, "'Trivializing' Abortion", The Washington Post, August 19, 1979.

[62] Paul Ramsey has discussed this aspect of the Eichner case in his article "Two-Step Fantastic: The Continuing Case of Brother Fox", Theological Studies, March 1981, pp. 122-34. Other cases of this sort include: Superintendent of Belchertown State School v. Saikewicz, 373 Mass. 728 (1977); In re Earl Spring, No. F-2030, Mass., May 13, 1980. In its ruling in In re Grady (February 18, 1981), the New Jersey Supreme Court cited the famed Karen Quinlan case to uphold a right to sterilization as an exercise of the constitutional right to privacy. the court suggested that this right can override the State's interest in preserving a patient's life, and that only the courts can exercise such a right on behalf of a mentally incompetent patient.

[63] In the Spring case, the lower courts (probate and appeals) had ordered that Spring's attending physician, along with his wife and son, should make the decision as to whether life-prolonging treatment would be continued. The state supreme court overruled these decisions, claiming that "we disapprove shifting of the ultimate decision-making responsibility away from the duly established courts of proper jurisdiction." The court argued that it would be forsaking its own responsibilities if it tried "to delegate its resolution to some private person or group."

[64] Both Saikewicz and Spring were cited as precedents by the Massachusetts Supreme Court on February 17, 1981, when it ruled that the state of Massachusetts is required to subsidize elective abortions with public funds (Moe v. Secretary of Administration and Finance). Interpreted through these cases, the state constitution was said to provide more stringent requirements for actively supporting the pregnant woman's right to an abortion than are found in the U.S. Constitution. Similar chains of reasoning have been used by courts in California and Pennsylvania to mandate public funding of abortion in those states.

Court involvement in ordering abortions for mentally incompetent patients seems to be increasing. Justice Warren Burger recently refused to block an abortion ordered by the court-appointed guardian of a woman in a semi-catatonic state, despite the fact that no evidence had been presented on a medical need for the abortion. The woman in question has been fully competent earlier in her pregnancy, and had not sought an abortion (see "Justice Refuses to Bar Abortion for Sick Woman", NC News Service, March 19, 1981). In California, a court-appointed conservator almost succeeded in ordering an abortion for an unwilling 38-year-old mental patient, although all three of her sisters were adamantly opposed to the abortion and were all willing to adopt the child even if born with congenital defects. Superior Court Judge Bob Krug denied the petition for an abortion on the basis of medical risks involved in performing a second-trimester abortion, without denying that the conservator had the right to petition the court for an abortion against the wishes of the patient and her family (see Mary Sanchez, "Petition to do Abortion on Mental Patient Denied", NC News Service, March 26, 1981).

[66] At its 1979 national convention, the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod approved a resolution which condemns abortion, urges its members to help secure legal protection for the defenseless unborn child, and supports efforts to enact a Human Life Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The American Lutheran Church, which issued a statement in support of legalized abortion in 1974, approved a Statement of Judgment and Conviction at its 1980 national convention which rejects "the practice in which abortion is used for personally convenient or selfish reasons", recognizes that "an induced abortion ends a unique human life", and "deplores the alarming increase of induced abortions since the 1973 Supreme Court decisions." See the newsletter of Lutherans for Life, issues for December 1980 and February 1981. The Southern Baptist Convention, the nation's largest Protestant body with 13.4 million members, approved a condemnation of abortion at its 1980 annual meeting which includes a call for a Human Life Amendment banning abortion "execpt to save the life of the mother" (NC News Service, June 13, 1980).

[72] The most recent ABC News/Washington Post poll on abortion (Survey #34, aired June 8, 1981) shows 50% of men and only 42% of women favoring the goals of the "pro-choice" movement; 36% of women favored unrestricted abortion, compared with 45% of men. Nearly a third of the people strongly opposing legalized abortion make under $12,000 a year, with only 10% making $30,000 or more, and nearly one-quarter are black, whereas more than a quarter of those favoring legalized abortion make $30,000 a year or more. Similar results were obtained by the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company when it conducted a survey on American Values in the '80's: 65% of all Americans considered abortion as morally wrong, but opposition was stronger among women, racial minorities and the poor. The ABC News/Washington Post poll showed 71% support for the idea that "a fetus becomes a human being" either at conception or at some point in the first trimester; only 11% of those polled thought that one "becomes a human being" at birth.

[76] This has already been suggested by the testimony given by Dr. Leon Rosenberg before the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers earlier this year (see note 5). "Some say that life begins at conception", noted Dr. Rosenberg, "but others say that life begins when brain function appears, or when the heart beats, or when a recognizable human form exists in miniature, or when the fetus can survive outside the uterus, or when brain development is completed at two years of age." Any of these would be equally valid points for beginning to protect life, he claimed. Presumably, under the last-mentioned of these standards, some mentally retarded human beings would never become "persons" at all.

ABORTION AND THE HATCH AMENDMENT

(By Edward Bryce)

(After years of trying to defend the rights of the unborn by defining personhood, the American bishops have switched their strategy. The new proposal has sparked criticism from both prolife and prochoice groups.)

Last Sept. 21, when Senator Orrin Hatch (R., Utah) introduced a new proposal for a constitutional amendment to reverse the Supreme Court's abortion decisions, he touched off a spirited debate within the prolife movement.

The U.S. Catholic bishops, along with a number of Protestant and nondenominational groups dedicated to legal protection for unborn children, have hailed this "Human Life Federalism" amendment, which would empower Congress and the state legislatures to enact laws restriction abortion. But the proposal has come under fire from groups claiming it is a compromise of prolife principles and should be rejected in favor of allegedly more effective means of protecting the unborn. These groups, in turn, disagree among themselves concerning which alternative proposal should be supported.

To confuse matters further, abortion rights advocates have not treated the Hatch amendment as a compromise of any kind. Instead they view it, in the words of the executive director of the National Abortion Rights Action League, as "the gravest threat to abortion rights since the 1973 Supreme Court decisions."

An understanding of this debate requires yet another look at the Supreme Court's abortion decisions. On Jan. 22, 1973, the court handed down its decisions in the abortion cases Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton. The rulings instituted a national policy of legalized abortion on demand which neither proabortion legislative efforts nor referenda has been able to achieve.

Media accounts have often failed to note the radical character of these decisions. Abortion was elevated to the status of a constitutional right throughout the nine months of pregnancy. Even in the final three months—a time when the unborn child is capable of surviving indefinitely outside the womb and the interruption of pregnancy has always been considered a premature delivery rather than an abortion—no state could prohibit an abortion which an individual physician judged would promote the pregnant woman's emotional, social or financial health.

The seven justices subscribing to the majority opinion in these cases disagreed as to the exact section of the Constitution in which the new right of abortion was to be found. But they agreed that it was fundamental enough to override the state's interest in what they called the "potential life" of the unborn child and to invalidate any state action which might directly infringe upon the practice of abortion. Almost as an afterthought, they also rejected the claim that the unborn child should be treated as a "person" protected under the 5th and 14th amendments to the Constitution.

Later rulings of Federal courts have extended the abortion liberty. Laws designed to protect pregnant women's health during first-trimester abortions have been invalidated, to the chagrin of legislators trying to regulate legal but unsafe abortion mills. Third-trimester abortions were given further protection in 1979, when the Supreme Court invalidated state laws requiring medical treatment for infants born alive during abortions.

In a series of Supreme Court decisions, state laws requiring parental consent or notification for abortions performed on minors have been either overturned or substantially weakened, so that courts themselves can override parents in a variety of situations. The courts have even claimed the right to facilitate individual abortion decisions when dealing with women deemed too immature or mentally incompetent to exercise their own right of abortion.

Only in the area of abortion funding have the courts allowed legislatures to make policy decisions without judicial interference. But even here, at least one state law providing funding for "alternatives to abortion" has been ruled unconstitutional because it failed to provide funds to organizations which promote abortion.

In short, under the Supreme Court's decisions and succeeding rulings, state laws can be declared unconstitutional not only because they restrict abortion, but also because they fail to defend it against the objections of families, taxpayers and the public at large. The United States thus now has the most extreme proabortion public policy in the world. Given the important educative role that law has in a pluralistic society, this policy is a powerful force in promoting the acceptance of abortion.

After nine years, the number of abortions has reached over 1.5 million annually. Abortions outnumber live births in some American cities. Although opposition to abortion has grown, many believe abortion on demand will become a permanent fixture of American society if effective action is not taken soon. It is in this context that the Hatch amendment has been suggested, not as a perfect or cure-all solution, but as an effective means for beginning to reverse the current trend.

Most amendments proposed up to now have attempted to recognize the unborn as constitutional "persons" whose lives call for protection under the 5th and 14th amendments. But several factors cast some doubt on the wisdom of simply continuing this approach. Even the most popular of the personhood amendments has only about 30 supporters in the Senate after seven years of lobbying on its behalf by the National Right to Life Committee and other groups. That is far short of the 67 needed for a constitutional amendment.

Legal scholars have also begun to ask whether legal personhood would really provide effective protection for the unborn, especially if the Federal Courts should then seek to balance the unborn person's rights against privacy and other rights claimed for the pregnant woman. The unborn might be persons under the Constitution yet still highly vulnerable.

The Human Life Federalism amendment embodies a different approach. It reads as follows: "A right to abortion is not secured by this Constitution. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to restrict and prohibit abortion: Provided, That a provision of a law of a State which is more restrictive than a conflicting provision of a law of Congress shall govern."

The chief benefits claimed for this proposal are these:

It overturns the Supreme Court abortion decisions. The chief holding of the court—that abortion has the protection of a fundamental right under the Constitution—is reversed by the first sentence of the amendment.

It provides for effective laws. The amendment gives "concurrent power" to Congress and the states to make laws against abortion. The Congress can enact a national abortion law which would prohibit abortion on demand in states which do not wish to enact their own restrictions. In states which do enact laws, both the state and Federal statutes would be valid and enforceable—except that, where the two laws were in conflict, the more restrictive would govern. Thus the amendment avoids the most serious problem with a simple states rights approach to abortion—the prospect that some states might become abortion mills—and provides the first explicit declaration of national policy against permissive abortion in American constitutional history.

It has potential for broad appeal. All major public opinion polls on abortion show the same basic phenomenon. Less than one-quarter of the American people want abortion to be illegal under all circumstances, about the same number want legalized abortion on demand, and the majority are caught in the middle, wanting abortion to be illegal except in certain conflict situations. This is not an ideal situation by any means, but it is where Americans are on the issue. The Hatch amendment therefore can appeal to all but the hardcore minority in favor of abortion on demand.

It avoids exceptions clauses in the Constitution. If this amendment, by itself, sets no minimum standard of protection for the unborn, it also sets no upper limit. No exceptions clauses are written into the Constitution which might be morally unacceptable to prolife Americans and which stand in danger of being further weakened by court interpretation.

Thus society can gradually be educated to the complete rejection of abortion as a solution to personal or social problems, and under the Hatch amendment, the new societal consensus can be enacted into law at each stage to provide increasingly effective protection to the unborn. Without providing a constitutional basis for approval of abortion under any circumstance, the amendment expresses a basic trust in the ability of the democratic process to develop laws protecting the rights of all concerned.

While sometimes conceding the potential political advantages of the Hatch amendment, some members of the prolife movement have raised serious moral and philosophical objections against it. They cite three in particular:

First, that the amendment violates Catholic morality on abortion because, in the words of a 1974 Vatican statement, it "admits in principle the liceity of abortion"; second, that it treats the unborn unfairly by failing to recognize them as persons; third, that by treating the protection of the unborn as a matter for legislative discretion instead of as a matter of mandatory directive, it denies that the unborn have an genuine right to life. The first objection is of concern mainly to Catholics, while the other two deal more generally with the moral values reflected in American constitutional law.

Plainly the U.S. Catholic bishops do not believe the amendment is contrary to Catholic moral doctrine. They would certainly not have voted overwhelmingly in favor of it at their annual meeting last November if they believed the objection had cogency.

This also is the view of theologians whose commitment to the Catholic moral position on abortion is unquestionable. They note that the 1974 Vatican Declaration on Abortion was condemning laws which promote abortion or might force people opposed to abortion to cooperate in its practice against their consciences—in other words, the kind of laws which the Supreme Court's 1973 proabortion rulings have made possible. The same Vatican declaration says it could be morally acceptable to support a law which fails to set penalties for abortions performed under some circumstances, with the understanding that the Christian's responsibility is to advocate the improvement of such laws at every stage of the legislative process.

The Hatch amendment itself makes no provision for abortions and grants the power to restrict and prohibit abortion rather than promote it. If this power is not exercised to its fullest extent at first by state and Federal legislatures, the amendment provides a means for improving this situation through the democratic process.

The second objection—that the amendment does not declare the unborn persons—rests on an interpretation of legal personhood which has been called into question by many of the prolife movements' legal scholars. For instance, Dennis Horan of the Americans United for Life Legal Defense Fund says a declaration of personhood provides useful legal symbolism but might actually get in the way of effective protection for the unborn under present circumstances, because it gives proabortion Federal courts considerable latitude in setting the standard of protection.

A case in point might be the proposed Human Life Statute, which declares the unborn child a person on the basis of a factual finding that human life begins at conception. According to a Senate subcommittee which approved the proposal in September, this would not require states to adopt laws against abortions performed by private individuals, because the Constitution directly forbids only government actions contrary to due process of law. Also, courts might write exceptions into state abortion laws by balancing the due process rights of the pregnant woman against those of the unborn.

As a legal term, person is not synonymous with the philosophical concept of person, which means a human being with inherent dignity and inviolable rights. Those who insist on a law or constitutional amendment declaring the unborn to be persons mistakenly assume that the Federal courts would understand person to mean what they mean by it.

The third objective, that the Hatch amendment fails to mandate protection for the unborn, overlooks the fact that the Constitution mandates no particular standards of protecting against the private killing of any human beings. For instance, it does not spell out the exact circumstances under which a state may consider certain acts of homicide justifiable.

To be effective, even proposed constitutional amendments directly prohibiting abortion would require implementing legislation. But the only branch of government which would force recalcitrant legislatures to enact abortion laws would be the Federal courts—and they have generally shown themselves to favor abortion on demand.

Furthermore, in order to pass, such amendments also generally have to make provisions for some abortions, and these so-called exceptions might be interpreted loosely by the same Federal courts.

The only alternative to such problems seems to be a proposal like the Hatch amendment which empowers the people's elected representatives to set the standards of legal protection. If the question ultimately comes down to relying on legislatures or relying on Federal courts to provide protection for the unborn, most people who have followed the controversy in recent years would rely without hesitation on the legislatures.

Finally, there is the political dimension of the debate over the Hatch amendment. In the estimate of persons who have studied the mood of Congress carefully, it has real potential for enactment—much greater potential than any other amendment which has yet come to light. It has been introduced in the House by Rep. John Ashbrook (R., Ohio) and others. And, last Dec. 16, the Senate subcommittee on the Constitution voted 4 to 0 in its favor. This was a historic first—the first time a Congressional Committee had approved a constitutional amendment intended to undo the effects of the Supreme Court decisions.

On the other hand, prolife critics are right in pointing out that neither this proposal nor any other will be easy to pass. The difficulty is that, to some extent at least, the critics' posture can become a self-fulfilling prophecy. With the support of a united prolife movement, the Hatch amendment has solid prospects; without such support, its chances are doubtful.

Since the Supreme Court decisions of 1973, the U.S. bishops and most of the prolife movement have consistently advocated a constitutional amendment to protect unborn children. Now the question is which amendment will most effectively achieve that end. It is a question to be answered not just in light of what particular proposals say on paper or how committed prolife people might like to understand them, but in light of the complexities of legal language and likely interpretations by Federal courts with a proabortion bias.

Weighing these considerations, the bishops and many other prolife people have concluded that the Hatch amendment offers the most realistic prospect at present for giving the needed protection. It remains to be seen whether the entire prolife movement will unite behind it. Plainly 1982 will be a turning point of some kind in the continuing struggle for protection of the unborn.

ABORTING AMERICA

(Bernard N. Nathanson, M.D. with Richard N. Ostling)

THE SPECIOUS ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF ABORTION

I have held the opinions expressed in the previous chapter for many years; recent findings only reinforce them. However, the pro-abortionists have their own list of inadequate arguments, and examination of these is more painful, since I once mouthed so many of them myself. Still, intellectual honesty compels me to reassess them so that the abortion issue can get down to the essentials.

1. The Teeming Masses. We are sometimes told that abortion is necessary because of world overpopulation. The present work deals with the United States, not the developing nations, which face different cultural, economic, and medical situations from our own. Overpopulation is simply no reason to advocate widespread abortion in a nation like the U.S., and we are not going to end starvation in Ethiopia by aborting in Manhattan.

An aside on this matter of population control: It is intriguing to me that even extreme sectors of the American abortion movement do not advocate it as a primary contraceptive technique but rather as a "fallback" (a precious little euphemism) if birth control fails or is not used. There is a medical paradox here. The Pill produces a death rate far in excess of that in first-trimester abortions, yet few pro-abortionists have had the integrity or the courage to advocate abortion as "just another" birth-control method. Does not some recondite human repugnance for abortion lurk here? Even in liberated 1978, a vague stigma is attached; most women are still unable to look their gynecologists straight in the eye as they report on past abortions.

2. Mere Tissue. Pro-abortion spokesmen too often treat alpha as merely a chunk of tissue or an ordinary organ of the mother's body, rather like an appendix that is snipped off. One writer of this persuasion even likened alpha to the cells that flake off every morning when we brush our teeth. The biological facts of the matter will be described subsequently, but let me simply state here that this whole line of argumentation is biological nonsense, unworthy of the people who have advocated it. Alpha is an entity like no other within the woman's body.

3. You've Seen One, You've Seen Them All. This point is so eccentric that I would not mention it except that it appears in a book, Unwanted Pregnancy, written by a fellow obstetrician-gynecologist named Robert Petres, along with a Southern Presbyterian university chaplain. They dismiss the "personhood" argument on alpha, in part, because this implies that the entity in question is "unique, that he is one of a kind" and they flatly deny that this is true of alphas. "They are not unique. Laid side by side at four or five months' gestation, they are virtually indistinguishable. They are not unique in any way, shape or form." This is a simplistic argument reminiscent of the anti-abortionists' pheno-type gambit. In fact, individuality is structured into each and every alpha that is ever conceived. Its genetic code will never be repeated. Quite early in pregnancy, as we will see shortly, the bodily features and functions of alpha also become individualized. Sad but true, as you read these words some bored gynecologist may be aborting the next James Joyce.

4. The Woman-and-Her-Doctor. How many times have we heard this one? The "woman and her doctor" alone ought to decide on abortion. Even the Supreme Court swallowed this. This is a clever way of subtly implying professional scrutiny and endorsement for an abortion, but the phrase is wholly spurious. All one needs to do is look at the New York newspapers, where this allegedly "medical" service is advertised alongside "Madame Marie, Indian Reader," "Weight Loss—Amazing Breakthrough!" and "SINGLE? Looking for someone special?" One author has stated that abortion is no more a medical issue because doctors do it than is capital punishment a matter of electrical engineering because an electric chair is used.

Quite obviously, the mother and the mother alone makes the decision, except in the small percentage of abortions that involve true medical indications. Physicians have no special moral wisdom to impart on such non-medical decisions.

I must agree with Daniel Callahan's remarks against abortion as "medical": It may be very beneficial for a woman, but unless her life is threatened "an abortion cures no known disease and relieves no medically classifiable illness." "It may be merciful and it may be wise," but medicine does not classify a procedure as "therapeutic" when "it is not notably therapeutic for the fetus" and has a "100 percent mortality rate."

5. Men Don't Get Pregnant. We are told that laws against abortion were a plot by male chauvinists to oppress woman, or in the less hysterical version, that men can never understand what the pregnant woman suffers. But one day as a mother who had just given birth signed the routine consent form for a circumcision that would inflict considerable pain on her newborn boy, I asked myself: On this account, ought we not require that the father sign consent? How could a woman know what it is to have part of your penis cut off?

James Mohr's historical book points out that the original nineteenth-century feminists were universally opposed to abortion, even after antiseptics had made it a safer procedure. They considered it yet another outrage that had been inflicted upon women by men who forced them to have abortions.

Daniel Callahan objects to the argument about "men legislating for women" because abortion, child-bearing, and child-rearing have consequences for everyone in our society, of both sexes. For that matter, as a "women's issue," abortion works against the pro-choicers in that virtually every U.S. poll over the past decade has shown that women are significantly more anti-abortion than men are.

6. Cost Benefit. There is a current tendency, particularly in documents that ooze forth from the federal bureaucracy, to treat abortion and many other medical issues as a "cost benefit" problem. It is cheaper for our society to destroy alphas at $100 apiece than to take responsibility for aiding poor women and children. This may be good politics, perhaps, but it is hardly exemplary social morality. It reeks of the Pentagon's "body count" thinking of the Viet Nam era. Are we supposed to consider such pragmatism of alpha-elimination to be "liberal" and humanitarian? As one who sits in on hospital committee meetings, I must sadly report that this cost-benefit lingo has a lot of cachet among medical administrators who cope daily with the federal, state, and city agencies, and imbibe and recycle their repugnant jargon and accountant-like mentality. This trend is infuriating and dehumanizing.

Certain human issues are too grave to be handled in this way and must be shielded from a cost-effectiveness theory. Abortion is one of them.

7. Social Panacea. If the anti-abortionists would blame every social malady on abortion, the pro-abortionists propose it as the solution to all manner of social ills. But now that we have had several years of open abortion, what maladies have been alleviated? Liberalization has certainly brought benefits to individuals, but where is the society-wide evidence that it has reduced the welfare rolls, the curse of poverty, or illegitimacy and child abuse? (Actually, as mentioned already, reported child abuse has risen noticeably since abortion was legalized, and so have illegitimate births, despite the availability of abortion as an alternative.)

8. The "Unwanted Child." The Specter of child abuse is used as part of a broader pro-abortion argument, that every child born into this world must be "wanted," and that social evils will result if they are not. I have some important philosophical objections to the "unwantedness" line, but will limit myself here to matters of simple logic.

Would that all children were wanted. But projections of future harm from present emotions are totally unreliable. At some point in pregnancy, many children are temporarily "unwanted." For that matter, offspring are often "unwanted" at certain moments after they are born. An unwanted alpha does not always end up as a resented baby. As for battered children, there is no solid evidence that unwantedness during pregnancy produces battering. Rather, battered children appear to be the result of mistreatment of the parents when they themselves were children. Contrary to the stereotype, battering is not a problem limited to the poorer families that are of particular concern to the (usually more affluent) abortion avocates. As noted above, if anything, the statistical reports would lead one to conclude that liberal abortion laws, not strict ones, foster child abuse.

The "unwanted child" is also a myth. If alpha is carried to term, it will never be "unwanted" because of the hopeless shortage of babies available for the long list of childless couples who earnestly want to adopt them. So alpha need be "unwanted" only for the nine months between conception and birth. Adoption is difficult for the unwed mother, and more so for the widow, divorcee, or wife who becomes pregnant out of wedlock. The point is that an option does exist if we do judge alpha's survival to be even more important than the difficulties of the unwillingly pregnant woman.

9. Psychiatric Scare Tactics. No less than their opponents, the pro-abortionists indulge in pot psychology. The adoption solution, just mentioned, is portrayed as an unutterable trauma for the natural mother, or the psychological harm to a woman refused abortion is painted in lurid terms. Clinical proof of this is, on the whole, lacking. (For ample detail on psychological studies on both sides, see Callahan's Abortion: Law, Choice and Morality.) Just as I granted to the anti-abortionists, it is inarguably true that refusal of abortion or giving up of babies for adoption placement may occasion regret or remorse, mixed perhaps with more optimistic thoughts about the life that the mother has authored and preserved. But sadness is not sickness, nor a psychosis. There may indeed be emotional turmoil. This is true of all major life decisions and events, normal pregnancy and childbirth among them. The difficulties of life, however, are not psychiatric pathology and do not provide justification for a procedure if, on other grounds, it is judged to be unethical.

10. Women's Control Over Their Own Bodies. Leaving aside for the moment the question of whether alpha is merely "part" of the mother's body like an appendix, this principle is wrongheaded in any event. Civilized societies do not permit women absolute control over their bodies; they do not sanction such things as multilation of one's own body, drug abuse, prostitution, or suicide. Even if alpha is to be considered merely a woman's "property" and not the "person" that the anti-abortionists claim, control over property is not absolute—statutes against cruelty to animals are legitimate, including the animals that the violator owns. We cannot grant women absolute control over alpha without consideration of abortion on its own terms.

The broader claim is the the "right to privacy," which N.A.R.A.L. figured correctly was the only one that would work for us in the courts. We cited in particular the Griswold v. Connecticut ruling striking down anti-birth-control laws on privacy grounds. Justice Blackmun also cited that case in guaranteeing a "right to privacy" on abortion in 1973, but John Hart Ely of the Harvard Law School has pointed out that in Griswold the court reasoned that enforcement of the birth-control ban would have been impossible without outrageous government prying into the privacy of the home. With abortion, the conception may occur in private, but the abortion itself is "in public"—in a clinic or hospital—with various outsiders in attendance. Each act of abortion (but never each use of contraception) must be registered with the government.

There are, after all, good invasions of privacy. Society requires the white majority to respect the rights of the black minority. It does not grant parents total physical control over their offspring after birth, legislating against child abuse. Government intervenes in bodily privacy in the control of communicable diseases, and is even willing to violate parents' control and their explicit First Amendment right to religious liberty in medical-legal disputes where life is at stake (e.g., forced blood transfusions for underage Jehovah's Witnesses, or various medical procedures for children of Christian Scientists).

In the contemporary situation, the woman's "control over her body" offers her a number of options other than abortion. She can choose sexual continence, or if not continence, then contraception, or if not contraception, then sterilization, or if none of these, she can take control in making sure that the man in her life makes such a choice.

11. The Coathanger. The favorite button of the pro-abortionists is the one showing the coathanger, symbol of the self-induced abortion and the carnage that results from it, or the similar problem of botched illegal abortions done by "back-alley butchers." This is a fundamental argument; one that moved us deeply in the late 1960s, and one that could justify non-medical abortion even if no other argument stood up.

How many deaths were we talking about when the abortion was illegal? In N.A.R.A.L. we generally emphasized the drama of the individual case, not the mass statistics, but when we spoke of the latter it was always "5,000 to 10,000 deaths a year." I confess that I knew the figures were totally false, and I suppose the others did too if they stopped to think of it. But in the "morality" of our revolution, it was a useful figure, widely accepted, so why go out of our way to correct it with honest statistics? The overriding concern was to get the laws eliminated, and anything within reason that had to be done was permissible. Statistics on abortion deaths were fairly reliable, since bodies are difficult to hide, but not all these deaths were reported as such if the attending doctor wanted to protect a family by listing another cause of death. In 1967, with moderate A.L.I.-type laws in three states, the federal government listed only 160 deaths from illegal abortion. In the last year before the Blackmun era began, 1972, the total was only 39 deaths. Christopher Tietze estimated 1,000 maternal deaths as the outside possibility in an average year before legalization; the actual total was probably closer to 500.

The death of 500 women, or even 39, is a matter of the most serious concern, but this is hardly an overwhelming death rate among the millions of women of childbearing age. Depending upon the value that is placed upon alpha, it might be lopsided for a society to consider only the 500 women and ignore the 1,000,000 alphas that are legally extinguished each year.

Apart from deaths, there were the walking wounded of the abortion unjustice. Their sufferings were very real to me and to other physicians in the reform movement. In the old days there would be two or three critically ill patients in our ward from infected botched abortions at any one time, and the same in the ward of every other hospital. For this reason obstetrics-gynecology used to be a sobering specialty, and this was a major reason why its practitioners gradually accepted the change. In the middle of too many nights we had gotten a call that a woman was "miscarrying" in early pregnancy. When we would appear bleary-eyed to examine the seriously ill women it would turn out that, one way or another, she had been "started." Those were bleak nights indeed.

Why, then, do I now dismiss the whole carnage argument? Simply because technology has eliminated it.

The practice of abortion was revolutionized at virtually the same moment that the laws were revolutionized, through the widespread introduction of suction curettage in 1970. (Even before this, antibiotics and other advances had already dramatically lowered the abortion death rate.) Instead of scraping the soft wall of the pregnant uterus with a sharp instrument, the operator vacuums it out with a plastic suction curette. Though it is preferable that this be done by a licensed physician, one can expect that if abortion is ever driven underground again, even non-physicians will be able to perform this procedure with remarkable safety. No woman need die if she chooses to abort during the first twelve weeks of pregnancy. Largely due to suction curettage, the total of deaths from all abortions (legal and spontaneous "miscarriage" as well as the illegal abortions, which decreased markedly after legalization) was only 25 by 1976. Even without a suction machine, a simple combination of catheter and syringe can produce enough suction to carry out a safe early abortion.

As for the self-induced abortion, by thrusting a coathanger or other dangerous object into the womb, this will also be a thing of the past. Compounds known as prostaglandins can now be used to bring on contractions and expel alpha, and would readily be available for do-it-yourself abortions in vaginal suppository form. Prostaglandim suppositories would not provide a full abortion in most cases, but they would "start" the woman, and she could then go to her doctor to have her uterus cleaned out. Prostaglandins in general are safe for the mother's system, and besides that, there is no evidence that anything other than a spontaneous miscarriage has occurred. There are no signs of instruments in use, and the woman can command medical attention on a legitimate and legally safe basis. This may sound rather cynical, but this is what would now happen in practice if abortion were illegal.

There may be many other reasons or cases under which abortion is desirable, but this most emotional of the arguments, the one which swayed me more than any other, is now wholly invalid and obsolete.

RACHEL WEEPING AND OTHER ESSAYS ON ABORTION

(By James Tunstead Burtchaell, C.S.C.)

POLITICAL ARGUMENT: ABORTION ON DEMAND IS APPROVED BY MOST AMERICANS

A second reason for permitting abortion legally, quite apart from whether it be right or wrong morally, would be that it enjoys majority support among the public. Abortion advocates have insisted, with but few exceptions, that public opinion surveys show consistent approval of the prochoice position. How the polls have been used, and what they report regarding citizen opinion, affords another issue that will permit insight into the integrity of the proabortion argument.

Abortion advocates sometimes assert, without supportive reference, that there is majority support for legal abortion. Karen Mulhauser, for example, writing in the Newsletter of the National Abortion Rights Action League, of which she is executive director, states: "We are undisputed winners in the public opinion polls—we are the majority." Those who oppose are "the vociferous and fanatic few." Planned Parenthood speaks of a "well-organized, well-financed minority [trying] to impose their narrow moral standards on an unwilling society." Arlie Schardt, erstwhile executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, has stated for the public record: "Despite the fact that polls show most citizens—including Catholics—favor the right to abortion, and despite the Supreme Court's finding that women have the constitutional right to abortion, the issue frightens Congress." Beverly Harrison, an abortion advocate who teaches social ethics at New York's Union Thelogical Seminary, refers in argument to "the large number of polls which show that slightly over half of the public support the Supreme Court decision." This sort of general, unreferenced claim to majority support is not in itself objectionable . . . unless it happens to be trumped up. In this instance, as one finds, the evidence not only fails to sustain the claim; it consistently suggests the contrary.

A second misuse of opinion surveys is to falsify their findings by distorted restatement. Ellie Smeal, president of the National Organization for Women, gives a typical example of this. Describing "the overwhelming feeling of the majority," she asserts that "81 percent of all Americans and 76 percent of all Catholics support the right of women to choose a safe and legal abortion." This, as we shall see below, takes considerable liberties with the reported data.

A third snag is in the polls themselves. The correct calculation of public sentiment on abortion has repeatedly been stymied by poll questions that are poorly framed. A large measure of distortion is caused, for instance, when a question is couched in terms that warm the respondent toward a particular answer. The Harris Surveys are sometimes spoilt by this sort of editorializing. When Congress was first moving to deny Medicaid funding for abortions, Harris announced that public support for the Hyde Amendment was weak. When asked, "Do you favor or oppose a ban on the use of federal Medicaid funds for poor women who couldn't otherwise pay for them?" 47 percent favored the ban, 44 percent were opposed, and 9 percent had no opinion. But when Harris reshaped the question in biased form its survey produced a different result:

[In percent]

	Yes	No	?
"The U.S. Supreme Court in its original decision was right to say whether a woman has an abortion is a decision she and her doctor should make, and the new ban interferes with the right of a pregnant woman to make that decision."	55	34	11
"The ban is wrong because poor women who cannot afford legal abortions will be forced to have unwanted children or to have dangerous illegal abortions."	51	37	12
"Such a ban is unfair, because it means that rich women, who can afford abortions, will have them while poor women, who can't afford them, will not."	51	40	9

The NARAL, which gave prominence to the more agreeable but less reliable results, described the reshaped questions as having "personalized the funding issue."

Poll results are even more obviously coached when solicited by nonprofessionals. Congressman James W. Symington of Missouri canvassed his constituency to ascertain their views on a prolife amendment. His question was as follows: "The Constitution is the basic document of our American political system. From this fundamental document our laws are derived. In our nation's history it has been altered only 26 times, and only after long debate and serious thought. Recently, several new amendments have been proposed; which, if any, would you support? An amendment to prohibit abortion under any circumstances except to save the life of the mother?"

Here, besides a strongly cautionary preamble which communicates to the voters more of the congressman's attitude than their responses are likely to convey to him of theirs, Symington skews the inquiry further by specifying only one of the amendment formulae under discussion, and that the most restrictive. Predictably, responses showed very little support: men, 18 percent; women, 21 percent.

In November 1978 the ballot in Oregon included an initiative measure to cut off state funding of abortions. Before the vote a NARAL poll sought public reaction to this statement: "The service should be available to poor women who depend on public welfare, rather than have taxes raised to pay the costs of those extra children if abortion were not permitted." Fifty-eight percent agreed. The statement, however, is obviously more appropriate as a public relations tactic than as a legitimate opinion survey instrument. It is distorted by three assumptions: (1) that abortions for which tax-supported subsidy is denied will not take place anyway; (2) that children born after such denial of funded abortion will draw state welfare payments; and (3) that tax increases will result.

A most egregious example of an opinion survey-cum-coaching was provided by the Planned Parenthood Federation of America. At the federation's annual meeting in Houston, November 1979, delegates learned from Dr. Michael Rappeport and Ms. Patricia Labaw of a survey designed to go beyond yes-or-no questions. Of the 1,500 adults interviewed nationwide by telephone, at first 34 percent thought a woman should have an abortion only if her life were in danger, and 45 percent said they disapproved of abortion. "But you ask them about the 45-year-old woman with three children whose contraception did not work or the sixteen-year-old rape victim and suddenly they favor abortion." By the end of his survey, which Planned Parenthood had commissioned, Dr. Rappeport said that 90 percent favored abortion under certain circumstances, which the story headline cited as: "Survey Shows Most Adults Favor Abortion."

Other opinion surveys yield contrived results by asking questions that are more overtly misleading. Some, for instance, have asked whether respondents support the Supreme Court decisions of 1973, but then include some misstatement of what the Court actually decreed. Most frequently a poll will describe the Court as having legalized abortion during the first three months of pregnancy. There are many examples of this, but the Harris surveys provide the most widely known example. For years Harris has asked respondents whether they favored "the U.S. Supreme Court decision in making abortions up to three months of pregnancy legal." The results, which are discolored by the question, have been widely cited on behalf of abortion freedom.

When Harris's findings are reported by the NARAL they lose their original, disqualifying detail. They become simply: "Favorable Harris Polls Demonstrating 60 percent Support for Legal Abortions." "According to Mrs. Mulhauser, the latest figures from a Harris Poll in March show that 60 percent of Americans now support the Supreme Court decision on abortion." Lawrence Lader used the Harris Survey to show "that 52 percent of Catholics approved the Supreme Court's legalization of abortion."

The United States Commission on Civil Rights, in its 1975 proabortion report, cites a 1974 Gallup Poll (identical with the erroneous Harris Survey) wherein 52 percent agreed and 48 percent disagreed that "abortions through the third month of pregnancy should continue to be legal," and concludes that "the Court is supported by a majority of the population."

Congressman Thomas M. Rees of California, an advocate of abortion choice, polled his district, "a district of good, God-fearing middle-class people," whom he described as intelligent and highly educated. His question was: "A recent United States Supreme Court decision legalizes abortions which are performed by qualified physicians during the early stages of pregnancy. This allows an abortion to be a decision made by a woman and her doctor, rather than regulated by the government. Do you favor the Court ruling?" Besides coaching his respondents towards a particular answer and misrepresenting the Court, Mr. Rees crippled his survey by a third kind of blunder that has become an unfortunate commonplace in proabortion opinion reporting: the woman-and-her-physician formula.

What Wade and Bolton handed down was exactly what the abortion movement had asked for: total freedom for abortion on demand through pregnancy. Since that state of affairs has never since 1973 enjoyed broad public approval as either morally justifiable or legally desirable, those disposed to preserve and defend it have been at pains to identify some finding in the opinion surveys which might be construed as a blanket endorsement of what the Court had decreed, without putting too fine a point on it. One such finding lay in the consistently positive response to this (or a similar) question: "If a woman wants to have an abortion, that is a matter for her and her doctor to decide, and the government should have nothing to do with it." This question, in a preelection survey conducted by the Knight-Ridder newspapers, elicited an 81 percent agreement. At first sight, a positive response would seem to endorse a complete absense of legal restrictions on abortion. Ellie Smeal, of the National Organization for Women, has presented it as such: "81 percent of all Americans and 76 percent of all Catholics support the right of women to choose a safe and legal abortion." Likewise, in November 1979, when the New York Times/CBS News Poll posed the thesis, "The right of a woman to have an abortion should be left entirly to the woman and her doctor," it drew Catholic approval of 64 percent and Protestant approval of 69 percent (down from 69 percent and 76 percent, however, in 1977). The Times headline summed up: "Catholics in Survey Endorse Abortion." Louis Harris, who has asked this question repeatedly, sees the positive response as reflective of "the majority view favoring abortion."

As Peter Skerry has pointed out, however, the woman-and-her-physician question and its interpretation in proabortion literature are both misleading: "these high rates of approval do not stand up to scrutiny." In other, very reliable, polls there have been contradictory responses. In Gallup polls of 1972 and 1974 respondents said that the law should specify when abortion is justified, rather than leave women under no constraints (54 percent vs. 39 percent in 1972; 53 percent vs. 40 percent in 1974). Numerous Gallup polls have shown strong public demand for some form of local regulation (76 percent in 1975; 74 percent in 1977; 73 percent in 1979; 71 percent in 1980). Furthermore, in several surveys from 1970 through 1975 about one-third of the public said it should be lawful for a woman to obtain an abortion without her husband's consent. In these two respects the Court and its law are at variance with the public opinion thus expressed. The public appears to wish two exceptions to the woman-and-her-physician sovereignty: it wants abortion allowed under certain conditions (thus with some purview by the government through law) and it wants a decision shared by the husband. It is difficult therefore to accept that the woman-and-her-physician responses are quite that reliable in their own right. It is still more difficult to conjure them into serving as blanket endorsements for the present law of unrestrained abortion. Possibly they are taken by respondents to disapprove of some imaginable involvement in abortion by government officials.

There is yet another presentation of poll results which would strike an observer as directly dishonest if the data were not openly displayed by the very advocates who do them violence. In May 1979 Redbook published an analysis of its own abortion poll, conducted through the Gallup Organization. Its principal conclusion was that "the law of the land still accords with the will of the majority," since "80 percent of Americans say abortion should be legal under any or certain circumstances."

The chief Redbook question was: "Do you think abortion should be legal under any circumstance, legal only under certain circumstances, or illegal in all circumstances?" The responses were as follows (to which I add other responses received by Gallup to the same questions):

[In percent]

	1975	1977	1978	1979	1980
Legal under any circumstance	21	22	22	26	25
Legal under certain circumstances	54	55	54	54	53
Illegal under any circumstances	22	19	19	17	18
No opinion	3	4	5	3	4

These responses show a stable and consistent pattern, and agree largely with other comparable surveys. Invariably they have been construed as support for Wade and Bolton, whereas they most clearly are the opposite. Citing a similar but older poll, Joseph O'Rourke, a dismissed priest who heads Catholics for a Free Choice, declared that a majority of the country, Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Democrats, and Republicans, were in favor of abortion under certain circumstances. Betty Benjamin, president of the Abortion Rights Council of Minnesota, argues: "Public opinion polls reveal that 60-88 percent of people in this country think abortion should be legal either in all or some circumstances." Those who oppose abortion freedom oppose "the rights of the majority of Americans." What O'Rourke, Redbook, and Benjamin, with many others, have done is to coalesce the two groups ("always" and "sometimes" legal) into what they see as a majority in support of the present law and the prochoice position. But what the polls relentlessly reveal is that neither the prochoice position nor the prolife position (in its strong form) enjoys more than minority support.

There are presently two polar positions on abortion being actively advocated in this country. One position asserts that abortion is immoral and ought to be illegal, except possibly to save the mother's life. This position is satisfied by only one response: "illegal under all circumstances" (though if danger to the mother's life were specified as one appropriate legalizing circumstance this response would be significantly enlarged). This position consistently enjoys the adherence of about one respondent in every five. The other polar position asserts that abortion is an entirely individual moral issue for the pregnant woman and that she ought to be legally unrestricted in obtaining it (except as her own health and safety require). This position is satisfied by only one response: "legal under any circumstances." It enjoys the adherence of about one respondent in every four. This is presently the law of the land.

The majority of Americans surveyed do not subscribe to either polar position—prolife or prochoice—as presently preached. The majority will countenance abortion in certain circumstances. And the polls are clear and consistent in disclosing what those circumstances are. Basically, the "middle group" considers what are commonly called the "hard reasons" as justifying abortion and it rejects the "soft reasons." To get some sense of this we may put the Redbook findings alongside the two most recent comparable Gallup polls.

Question (asked of those who replied they would make abortions legal under certain circumstances): "Now, thinking about the first three months of pregnancy, under which of the circumstances do you think abortions should be legal?"

[In precent]

	Redbook 1979	Gallup 1979	Gallup 1977
Woman's life is endangered	85	78	77
Woman's physical health is endangered	50	52	54
Woman's mental health is endangered	45	42	42
Chance baby will be deformed	52	44	45
Rape or incest	75	59	65
Family cannot afford to have the child	14	15	16
Don't want child	14
No opinion		9	2

Several things must be noted here. First, this is not the total national sample responding, but that portion of the sample, the "middle group," which would allow abortion "under certain circumstances." Second, these responses hold only for first-trimester abortions. Approval falls off sharply for later abortions, as these same polls show (1977 and 1979 responses beside each other; the Redbook survey did not include this information):

[In percent]

	Trimester
	1st	2d	3d
Woman's life is endangered	77/78	64/66	60/59
Woman's physical health is endangered	54/52	46/46	34/33
Woman's mental health is endangered	42/42	31/31	24/22
Chance baby will be deformed	44/45	39/37	28/28
Rape or incest	56/59	38/32	24/19
Family cannot afford to have the child	16/15	9/6	6/4
No opinion	2/9	9/9	20/21

What can we learn from these responses? There is clear allowance for abortion to save the mother's life. There is considerably less allowance for abortion on behalf of her physical health. For abortion after rape or incest there is fairly strong allowance, but only during the first trimester. There is increasing rejection of abortion to eliminate a deformed child (especially since most such abortions require amniocentesis and must await the second trimester, by which time few would allow it). For reasons of mental health or economics there is little feeling that abortion is ever justifiable.

Obviously the largest segment of the public, the dominating swing group that wants to discriminate among reasons justifying abortion, is sympathetic towards endangerment of a mother's life and (much less emphatically) physical health, and towards pregnancy from rape or incest. Other reasons lack the approval of a majority of even this middle group. The only position, then, which this configuration of judgments comes near to approving (though it is less permissive) is that of the American Law Institute's Model Penal Code, which in its abortion provisions had been adopted by a growing number of states before 1973. This middle group does not agree with the present law of the land, enunciated in Wade and Bolton, which forbids state and federal legislatures to restrict abortion at any time during pregnancy, even the last three months if the woman claims it is for her health (understood in the widest sense). And since well over 95 percent of abortions currently performed are truly elective—that is, they occur because a child is unwanted, rather than for one of the "hard reasons" accepted by the group—this group of respondents stands at odds with current abortion law and practice.

Although the advocates of abortion on demand correctly identify their active opponents, the prolife group, as a minority no larger than themselves and perhaps a little smaller, they have failed to acknowledge another group, twice as large as either polar faction, which does not accept present abortion law. It is this group, not just the prolife faction, whose political weight can explain the various legislative frustrations the proabortion group has endured of late, and whose stable convictions regarding abortion explain its unreadiness to acquiesce in what the Supreme Court has done.

Judith Blake, the UCLA professor who has most persistently examined survey results on abortion, has long noted this. While tracing the differentiated opinions of this middle group through Gallup, NORC, and National Fertility surveys back into the 1960s, she has noted various majority opinions that go contrary to the teaching of the present Court: that human life begins at conception or at quickening, and that the unborn are persons before birth; that abortion should be unlawful without the husband's consent; that it should be lawful only in hospitals; and that it should almost never be permitted after the third month.

The fact that a national majority does not believe in unrestricted abortion has not been admitted by its advocates throughout the years of dispute over abortion funding. Indeed, the doctrine of the abortion advocates was that the legislative branch of the government was being manipulated by a vociferous minority. That the Congress should deny funding for abortion (except in the "hard" cases) simply because it was reflecting the national sentiment was something they have not been able to accept. Only lately have abortion advocates begun to admit that they represent a minority view.

In his indignant dissent from the Court's vindication of Congress's right to withhold Medicaid funds for abortions, Justice Brennan called the Hyde Amendment "a transparent attempt by the Legislative Branch to impose the political majority's judgment of the morally acceptable and socially desirable preference." Many political observers reflected that this was precisely what they thought Congress was authorized to do. Justice Blackmun, author of the Wade and Bolton opinions, took the same occasion to regret what was happening: "the Government 'punitively impresses upon a needy minority its own concepts of the socially desirable, the publicly acceptable, and the morally sound.'" Karen Mulhauser of the National Abortion Rights Action League, looking back to Wade and Bolton in 1973, has quietly acknowledged that "the country wasn't with us at that point." Patricia Roberts Harris, at the end of 1980, when her tenure as Secretary of Health and Human Services (formerly HEW) was drawing to a close, spoke out against telling young people, "in really medieval terms, you must control your sexuality," and advocated abortion freedom. She acknowledged, however, "that the cutting edge of public opinion is probably contrary to what I am saying." Linda Greenhouse, commenting on McRae in 1980, noted that Wade and Bolton "was as far in the van of a national consensus on abortion as the Court should prudently get." It seems, on the contrary, that the real national consensus does not think of the Court as its vanguard, and is securing for itself a belated recognition.

Before leaving this subject of public opinion on abortion, there is one constituency about whose opinion something needs to be said: women who have aborted. The female personnel of abortion facilities and of advocacy groups tend to include significant numbers of women who are veterans of abortion and whose comradeship in this experience binds them together. It may be their presumption—at least, this seems to recur in the literature of abortion advocacy—that women who have undergone elective abortion will uphold the right of other women to do the same. There is some evidence that this is not so.

Perez-Reyes and Falk report on a group of unmarried adolescent abortors who harbored opinons about the justifiability of abortion that were not entirely permissive. One third of the girls (34 percent) disapproved of abortion except for "hard" reasons—e.g., to save the mother's life or health, to avoid a handicapped child—or for serious medical need. "Apparently in a number of cases, the experience of having a[n abortion] did not result in a generalized more liberal attitude but forced the girls to rationalize their guilt by considering themselves 'exceptions' to the rule." Zimmerman's later study of a group of abortors noticed a similar phenomenon. "Abortion . . . is legal but, from the standpoint of public acceptance, it is not moral. . . . The women we studied tended to approve only under very restrictive circumstances. . . . Thus, the women appeared to retain the idea that they had committed an immoral act. In order to rescue the inconsistency between this and their moral character, they talked in terms of being forced to have an abortion, of not having had a choice. . . . They cut themselves off from future negative implications by viewing themselves as having changed. They took the position of being a different person now from when they had the abortion."

A third item for reflection comes from Japan, where, since American occupation days, abortion has been the most widely used form of birth control. One could expect that the women of a nation which may have between two and three million induced abortions annually, most of them performed for married women, would have made their accommodations of conscience on that subject long ago. Some public opinion surveys taken during the 1960s suggest it may not be so. Various polls, for example, yielded these responses:

AICHI. 59 percent felt that abortion is something "very bad", 16 percent felt that it is considerably bad, 17 percent felt that it is somewhat bad, and 8 percent thought that it could not be called something bad.

NAGOYA. 67 percent—"I think it [the fetus] is a human life from the moment it is conceived in the womb," 42 percent—[The abortion situation in Japan] is not good, 52 percent—[The abortion situation in Japan] is bad, but it cannot be helped, and 1 percent—"I don't know whether it is good or bad."

NATIONAL. 11 percent—[Abortion] should be prohibited completely, 29 percent—"I think it is something bad," and 48 percent—"I think it is not good, but it cannot be helped."

These few slips of evidence are only suggestive, not conclusive. The question they arouse is: does the massive incidence of elective abortion produce mostly partisan, sympathetic female (and feminist) veterans of the experience, or does it also produce, by abreaction, women who would not willingly send others into the experience? It is a question too difficult to answer at this time, but one cannot simply presume that abortors are, as a public opinon cohort, notably more liberal or permissive towards abortion than others.

After one has set aside the opinion polls that are valueless because the questions they ask are too vague, or invite certain responses, or misstate the issues, or draw on an unrepresentative sample; and after one has disregarded presentations of these survey results that are skewed or selective or blundering or dishonest, one confronts two facts. First, the only situation at law which would do political justice to polled majority opinion in this country over the last fifteen years would be one in which state laws permitted abortion in some circumstances and forbade it in others. The second fact is that, whether through guile or bias or self-deception, the advocates of abortion on demand have not acknowledged the first fact. It does not follow that they need agree with this majority view, but it does follow that in propounding their own more permissive views and in lobbying for them politically, they may not claim with any honesty to be representing a view that prevails in the minds of their fellow citizens.

SEQUELAE

In greatest part, this book is both an inquiry into abortion and an examination of a campaign of persuasion on its behalf, a campaign that would have us believe abortion is a necessary and therefore appropriate remedy for certain urgent problems, personal and social. The more I studied that campaign, its premises and arguments and backwash, the more I saw it as a work of dishonesty and death. Just as wife-killing would surely curb the incidence of wife-battering in America, abortion would surely curb some almost unbearable human miseries. Yet somehow each remedy, though it works, is wrong.

Nowhere in these many pages do I set forth an argument against abortion. Before embarking on this study it would not have occurred to me as necessary: why would one need to argue that mothers and fathers and healers should not destroy their unborn young? At the end of this study I doubt that an argument against abortion is decisive, for one sets one's direction in this great matter more by the will than by the mind. In this life we acknowledge and respect those whom we are willing to accommodate. Our basic attitude towards abortion matches our readiness either to address ourselves to others' needs or to eliminate others when their needs burden us too heavily. I sense an obligation to make some simple exposition of my own understanding about abortion, but it will be more an appeal than an argument. Those who do not wish to rearrange their lives to accommodate a child will not readily be brought to see their unborn as endued with rights or as an envoy of joy—at least not by any argument. Those who know that they have nothing more satisfying to do with their lives than to give others life and its hospitality hardly need to have it explained to them that the stranger appearing unbidden at life's entryway must, before all, be bidden welcome.

I hold that the life of every fellow human must be respected, preserved, and even protected. We must defer to others' lives, not simply to gain and repay a like protection from others, nor just to avoid the penalties of the law, nor merely because every human being has a right to his or her life, a right which deserves priority over every other human right, need, or desire. We must defer for still another reason: if we deal unjust injury or violent death to others, we shall bring upon ourselves a death of the spirit—a violent death. Those who kill, die. And they die when they slay, not later.

I hold that, so far as we best can tell, a human person's life begins at conception. Neither birth nor any transition leading up to it serves as a true beginning, unless we talk biological nonsense. Of course an unborn child does not speak or work or give her or his love to others (nor does a newborn child; nor, for that matter, some people long since born). But it is terribly important that we give the basic protection of life-loyalty to all fellow humans, not only to those who suit us as valuable contributors to society. My position is that no one should have the right or power to decide what qualities or what usefulness others must have to avoid being killed. It is enough to be any human being, no matter how burdensome or troublesome, to merit the right to life.

Abortion, then—the willful and violent killing of an unborn human being—is homicide. By this neutral term I mean simply the killing of a human. We talk of accidental and deliberate and justifiable homicides. Is there such a thing as a justifiable abortion? Here I would argue that if we claim any honesty we must hew to the same principles in evaluating abortion as govern our judgments on any other form of homicide.

Some maintain that all deliberate killing is wrong. Better, they argue, to accept violence at the hands of others than to take up weapons and end ourselves as death-dealers. Others, likewise committed to life, would say that homicide could be justified under certain conditions, e.g., to protect oneself or some innocent third party from mortal, undeserved attack. On the latter view it might be justifiable to destroy a child were that clearly the only way to save his or her mother's life. But there is no consistent, responsible moral way, from either point of view, to justify the killing of innocent offspring to relieve his or her elders of any inconvenience, no matter how severe the distress.

It is no less savage to abort a deformed child than to exterminate a retarded adult. It is no more justifiable to abort a child in order to conceal adultery than to murder a witness about to give evidence in a trial. One cannot fairly allow a child to be destroyed because he or she was conceived by rape or incest, without also allowing the elimination of illegitimate children.

My argument is straightforward. Abortion is homicide: the destruction of a child. Save for the rare, rare instance when it is a mortal threat to a mother's life to carry her child to birth, there is no abortion that is not the unjust taking of another's life because it is a burden to one's own.

Someone has reckoned that a high percentage of the murders in this country find close family or business associates as victims. We have in us this strange and desperate ability, this selfish madness, to blind our mind's eye towards those nearest us, to see them as insignificant, as nothing really human. We depersonalize our victims before killing them. So with abortion.

In opposing it I am in no way insensitive to the plight of mothers who are frightened thirteen-year-olds, or are supporting six children on welfare, or are having to drop out of college because of one night's foolishness. I simply say that these are not misfortunes that justify anyone in raising his or her hand to kill. They are not trivial miseries. But to allege them as cause for abortion reminds me too much of the excuses for the massacre at My Lai, and for the bondage of the slave trade, and for the industrial poisoning at Minamata.

I do not wish to donate on Tuesday to the March of Dimes for medical research on the health of the unborn, and on Thursday to Planned Parenthood to keep crippled children from ever surviving still birth. I want no part of the insanity that sends police into the privacy of homes to stop parents from battering and scalding their four-month-old babies to death, and then uses the same force of law to guarantee the "privacy" of parents to dismember their babies four months before birth. I have no stomach for a society which sees that in many of its homes children are unwanted, and would rather exterminate the children than heal the parents. And though I try to be patient, I do become exasperated when told that since I am a Catholic I have somehow lost my civil right to make public and legal appeal for the lives of the young marked down for death, or that I am imposing my private religious notions on the majority of my fellow citizens, when it is clear to anyone willing to inquire that it is the minority of citizens that presently uses the law to kill.

Women have a right to reproductive freedom I hear it argued, and I agree: all women, even little girls yet unborn who have the right to be free to grow to the age when they in their turn can make love and have babies. Women should have control over their own bodies, it is said, and I agree; but not life-and-death control over the bodies of their children (and in the case of male children, who ever heard of a male part of a female body?). Make abortions illegal, we hear it said, and they will still go on, but in the back streets, and I agree. Yet rape goes on despite our laws; should it no longer be a crime? And if the day came when the nation was no longer willing to go on record that rape was criminal, would there not be more of it? Can anyone who knows that we record 1,500,000 abortions a year in America imagine that most of these would have occurred without the legal protections of 1973? Drive abortion underground, it is said, and young women will die by the septic coathanger. Yes, just as the young women of the Weather Underground who blew themselves up making bombs. I mourn them all, but I mourn more their innocent victims—and differently. Make abortion a criminal act, we hear it said, and only the rich will be able to afford it. Yes, but then the rich have always been better able to afford their vices. I would as soon buy abortions for the poor as buy them heroin. Abortions will go on! Why not at least see that they be done cleanly and safely? Yes, say I, and so shall hatred and murder go on, but I shall not use the tax moneys to give sniper-scopes to the Klan or dumdum bullets to the Mafia.

But back to the point, the chief point, the much-avoided point, the only point at issue: to abort is to destroy one's son or daughter.

WATCHING AN ABORTION

(By Magda Denes)

(Magda Denes is a clinical psychologist who had an abortion several years ago, after which she decided to revisit the hospital to observe other abortions, as well as interview members of the medical staff, patients, family members, etc. Her new book, "In Necessity and Sorrow: Life and Death in an Abortion Hospital," is based on that research. This excerpt is taken directly from the book (beginning on page 53 and continuing through page 61) without alteration or ommission, and is reprinted with permission by the publisher, Basic Books, Inc. (Copyright 1976 by Magda Denes, all rights reserved).)

(The author is invited by "Dr Szenes" (all names except the author's are fictitious) to watch a saline abortion; she describes here what she saw, and her reactions to it and to other things she sees in the hospital.—Ed.)

"I have to get back to work, do you want to watch?"

"Very much, thank you."

"Stand here, then," he says, opening the swinging door and pointing me to a strategic corner where I can see but will not be in his way. To the girl he says, "Come in, young lady, I am Dr. Szenes. This is Dr. Denes, she'll be with us for the duration. Okay?" The girl nods, yes. He guides her to the treatment table and hands her over to the nurse who has been silently waiting. The nurse helps the girl onto the table and makes her lie down. She lifts the girl's white hospital gown to her waist and covers her thighs and genitals with a sterile disposable towelette, leaving her round protruding belly exposed. With a small gauze pad she washes the area with alcohol. Meanwhile, Dr. Szenes scrubs his hands at a tiny sink in the corner opposite to mine. "what is your name, young lady?" he asks. "Flo. Florence Sullivan." "Sullivan. Irish, eh? And how old are you?" "Well, my father was Irish. Sixteen and a half." "That's pretty young, to be going through this. When was your last period?" "June or July." "Which?" "June, I guess." "That makes you twenty-two weeks pregnant. Right?" "That's what I was told." The conversation goes on, partly to gather information, partly I suppose to reassure the girl, who looks terrified.

When he is through scrubbing, Szenes stands in front of the nurse, who holds open first a left, then a right sterile rubber glove so that the doctor can slip his hands into them. "Now this whole thing should not hurt you," he says, again addressing the girl. "It will be uncomfortable, but it should not hurt." The nurse hands Dr. Szenes a syringe. He expels a little liquid into the air, then injects Flo, near her belly button, just under the skin, holding the syringe parallel to the girl's abdomen. About two seconds later without removing the needle he jerks the syringe upward to make the needle plunge straight down into the abdominal cavity. At this point the needle is invisible and the syringe is completely vertical in the doctor's hands. The injected liquid is 5 cc's of Novocain. Flo winces and her eyes well up, but she remains silent. Szenes smiles at her. "That was the worst part, the rest is apple pie."

The nurse sprays the area with iodine solution, tinting Flo's skin the color of brown mustard. She takes the syringe from the doctor and hands him a needle. It looks enormous. He holds it up to show me. "It is an eighteen-gauge, three-and-a-half-inch long spinal needle. We use this to tap the fetal sac. It works very well." Turning back to the patient he places the needle on the exact spot of the injection and pushes it in to the hilt in one firm fluid motion resembling the choreographed movement of a dancer. Now that the horsing around is over, Szene's first-rate professional competence is unmistakable. There is no reaction from Florence. The needle ends in a pink hub about half an inch long. Holding on to it, Szenes removes the stylet to permit the free flow of amniotic fluid. As he lifts the stylet, I see a little squirt of yellowish liquid shoot up through the pink hub. Szenes says: "That's good. We're doing very well." The nurse hands him a short, thin rubber tube, one end of which he attaches to the needle hub. To the other end of the tube he connects a large syringe. Holding it steady, he slowly pulls the plunger outward, filling the syringe with a thin liquid the color and consistency of urine. He is suctioning out the amniotic fluid. When the syringe is filled he disconnects it from the rubber tube and squirts the liquid into the corner sink. The process is repeated three times—amounting altogether to one hundred and fifty cc's of amniotic fluid removed from Flo's belly.

"How do you feel, young lady? "Fine." Flo's voice is barely audible. Her hands are clutched on her chest, and she is very pale. "Excellent, because we are almost finished. I am going to hook you up now to the saline to replace the fluid we took out. While that's going on, you'll have to tell me whether you feel anything unusual. Like if your face gets flushed or if you suddenly feel numb or very thirsty. Things like that, okay?" Flo nods. "Talking doesn't interfere with this process, you know." The intent is to console, the result is disaster. Flo breaks into racking, body-shaking sobs. Her belly heaves up and down causing the rubber tube to flop about. "Stop it," says Szenes, his voice rising. "Stop it at once, you will dislodge the needle." The nurse, who until now has not uttered a sound, puts her hand on Flo's forehead and says, "Come on, dear, it is almost over." Flo grabs a corner of her folded-up white gown, stuffs it into her mouth and bits down on it. She looks like a broken-hearted three-year-old. For the first time since I have entered the room the context of the scene reasserts itself in my mind. Riveted, I have been watching on the level of pure performance something I have not seen before. Szenes, the nurse, even Flo, have been actors in a dramatic medical procedure, for me to observe and learn first hand. But the sobbing? The hand on the forehead? The rising inflection laden with concern of potential danger? This is no instructional demonstration, and the withdrawn liquid is no urine. It is fluid essential to the life of the child whose heart is beating in the belly of this other child. This other child who lies here, terrified, heartbroken, tormented, sucking on her shirt.

Next to the treatment table there is an intravenous stand about ten feet tall with an inverted bottle hanging from each side of its crossbar. One of the bottles has a long rubber tube attached to it. Szenes removes the short tubing from the hub of the needle in Flo's belly and connects it to the long tube leading from the bottle. The bottle contains hypertonic saline solution. He checks that the flow is steady by lowering and raising the bottle a couple of times, before replacing it on the crossbar of the stand. "I want about two thousand," he says to the nurse. It is evidently her duty now to keep an eye on the amount and the evenness of the flow.

Szenes sits down at a small desk in my corner to make notes in the charts. "Look here," he says to me, pointing to a number that exceeds nine thousand. "What is it?" "The patient's number." "You mean you have done this many?" "Well, not I, the five of us. Four, really, because Dr. Marcus joined us only a couple of hundred ago. I'd say about two thousand apiece, give or take a few."

The words of a pamphlet I had picked up weeks ago come back: "As a result of the concentrated solution of saline in the uterus the fetus will not survive more than a few hours after the injection." There is no way then to assert, except by pretense, that what is being salinated in its mother's womb is not alive or not human. There is no way to say that this is not a type of murder. And yet, there is no way to say that it would not be just as surely murder more cold and vengeful, to force little Flo to give birth to her bastard.

This is no floor for self-assurance. No floor to feel good about anything.

"Okay," says Dr. Szenes, getting up and checking the bottle. "I think we can remove this now." He disconnects the bottle, retracts the needle, and the nurse puts an adhesive stip on the tiny puncture site. "Do you feel all right?" Flo nods. "You can go back to your room now. Lie down for a half-hour. Then drink two glasses of water. After that, you can walk around. Watch TV. Make phone calls, whatever you want to do. When dinner comes you must eat it all whether you like it or not. All of it. After dinner you are to stay in bed. The house doctor will come to your room and put an intravenous needle in your arm. Once that's done you may not move at all, nor eat or drink anything. The IV contains glucose to nourish you and a medicine called Pitocin to stimulate labor. If the cramps get bad you can ask the nurse for some Demerol, a pain killer. You must ask for it if you want it, because the nurses can't tell when your pains get really bad. Don't believe anyone who says it retards labor. It does nothing of the sort. With any luck, you should be all done twenty-four hours after the IV is inserted. Any questions?" Flo has climbed off the table and is adjusting her gown in the back, where it is open, in preparation for leaving. She says, "No." "Fine. Good day, young lady." Flo leaves, and Szenes sticks his head out the door: "Next please."

I look at my watch. Fifteen minutes have passed since I entered the room. I am drenched in sweat. I have a bellyache. I gather my stuff together. "Oh, you are leaving?" "Yes. I think so. Thank you very much. And I'd like to come back later if I may." "Any time, a pleasure." I walk out as I hear him begin to explain the procedure to the new girl in the room, who is black, whose name is Joan, and whose age is thirteen.

I do not get to see Flo deliver. In fact, I do not see anyone deliver for a very long time.

Once the IV is inserted the patients are confined to bed, and they deliver there, anywhere from twenty-four to thirty-six hours later. The precise moment is unpredictable. The process is exactly like giving birth to a child: cramps, water-break, fetus, placenta, end. Although I frequently hear screams from this room and that, I am somehow never in the right room at the right time. "Did your water break?" "Yes." "Then you'll deliver very soon." "Within the hour, I was told." "Oh my God, it's ten to four, I have to be in my office at four o'clock. Goodbye. Good luck." I never invent my excuses, they just come up. Repeatedly.

I decide to put an end to my stalling and spend an uninterrupted afternoon on the floor. Nothing happens, not even screaming. Toward evening I turn in desperation to one of the nurses. "Isn't anybody going to give birth today?" Before she can open her mouth, her face tells me that I have spat in the soup. "Doctor, that is not what happens here." "I am sorry, I mean deliver a baby, I mean fetus. To hell with it, nurse, I am going home. Good night."

The next afternoon I return determined, regardless of where I am at the time of delivery, to look inside the buckets.

Two doors down from the nurses' station there is a little room with several large garbage cans, each nealty marked for different types of garbage, and a medium-sized table on top of which stand paper buckets—the type in which one buys fried chicken from take-home stores. The buckets are covered with their paper lids. Attached to each lid there is a white cardboard label bearing—printed in ink—the mother's name, the doctor's name, the time of delivery, the sex of the item, the time of gestation. Inside each bucket, I have been told, there is a fetus and its placenta stored in formaldehyde. At the end of the day the buckets are transferred to the laboratory where the contents are examined for abnormalities. That done, they are collected in a large plastic bag, and a special messenger takes them to a sister hospital in possession of an incinerator. There they are burned.

I ask the nurse on duty for some rubber gloves. "What size?" she asks. I am unaware that they come in sizes. Somehow I always thought that they were one-size-fits-all stretch. I hold up my left hand to show her its size. She misunderstands the gesture and says astonished: "You want size five gloves?" No, I mean six," I answer, faking it. "I have only six and a halves." "That's fine, thank you." I have learned that with nurses I must disguise my ignorance of medical matters, otherwise they become suspicious of my right to do whatever I am doing and they put obstacles in my way.

I go into the little room, place my stuff on the floor next to the garbage cans, and pull on the gloves. Their fit is remarkable. My hands feel completely protected without any noticeable loss of agility. I enjoy very much having them on. I touch several objects at random—my pencil, the curving outside of a bucket, the edge of the table, the handle of my briefcase, my nose—and I am delighted with the experience of false contact. My hands can gather accurate information without being in the slightest way exposed. I can touch anything, I think, and feel what it is, and yet it can not touch me. A paradise of one sidedness. I have a vague sense that there is some kind of parable hidden in the experience, but I cannot arrive at it in words. Besides, I am also a little ashamed that I can stand in this garbage-can-filled graveyard, playing with gloves.

Planting myself in front of the table, balanced, legs slightly apart, I remove with one hand the lid of a bucket. The sharp fumes of formaldehyde instantly hurt the insides of my nose and throat. The smell also brings with it the long-forgotten memory of fetal pigs. The association strikes me as unseemly; nevertheless I remember, with unwanted total recall, the misery of my sophomore year in college, when in Bio. I., every Wednesday from three to five, for six months, we dissected the fetal pig. On the first day of class the instructor brought in a huge container filled with formaldehyde and floating pigs. He fished out one pig for each student, tagged with the student's last name, giving the impression that the pig was a lost, finally returned relative, in regrettable shape. My English at the time was very poor so that it took me weeks to catch on why the pigs were so small. I thought "fetal" was a brand name like "Jersey" for cows. When I did catch on, I cut classes for a month. That entire semester I would at odd and inconvenient moments think that I could smell the burning odor of mildly decomposed flesh stored in acid.

I look inside the bucket in front of me. There is a small naked person in there floating in a bloody liquid—plainly the tragic victim of a drowning accident. But then perhaps this was no accident, because the body is purple with bruises and the face has the agonized tautness of one forced to die too soon. Death overtakes me in a rush of madness. Oh yes, I have seen this before. The face of a Russian soldier lying on a frozen snow-covered hill, stiff with death and cold—on one hand an erect, bloody stump, where someone has cut off his ring finger to get at his wedding band. Oh yes, I have seen this face before, on humans and on a castrated horse, left lying in its blood across some unrooted streetcar tracks by someone demented with hunger who thought he had found food. Oh yes, I am no stranger here—I have brains spilled on sidewalks and hearts crushed forever with one blow. Who says you can't go home again? A death factory is the same anywhere, and the agony of early death is the same anywhere.

I take the lid off all the buckets. All of them. I reach up to the shelf above this bucket graveyard tabletop and take down a pair of forceps. With them I pull aside in each bucket the placenta, which looks like a concerous mushroom shrouding the fetus. With the forceps I lift the fetuses, one by one. I lift them by an arm or a leg, leaving, as I return them again, an additional bruise on their purple, wrinkled, acid-soaked flesh. I have evidently gone mad. I carry on the examination, whose sole purpose by now is to increase the unbearable anguish in my heart. Finally, I lift a very large fetus whose position is such that, rather than its face, I first see its swollen testicles and abnormally large stiff penis. I look at the label. Mother's name: Catherine Atkins; doctor's name: Saul Marcus; sex of item: male; time of gestation: twenty-four weeks. I remember Catherine. She is seventeen, a very pretty blond girl. Not very bright. This is Master Atkins—to be burned tomorrow—who died like a hero to save his mother's life. Might he have become someday the only one to truly love her? The only one to mourn her death?

"Nurse, nurse," I shout, taking off my fancy gloves. "Cover them up."

NEW PERSPECTIVES ON HUMAN ABORTION

(Edited by Thomas W. Hilgers, M.D., Dennis J. Horan, and David Mall)

THE EXPERIENCE OF PAIN BY THE UNBORN

One aspect of the abortion question which has not been adequately investigated is the pain experienced by the object of an abortion. The subject has clearly little attraction for the pro-abortion party, whose interest lies in persuading the public that the unborn are not human and even in propagating the view that they are not alive. Indeed, in a remarkable judicial opinion Judge Clement Haynsworth has written, "The Supreme Court declared the fetus in the womb is not alive. . . ." [1] Judge Haynsworth's statement is merely a resolution of the oxymoron "potential life," which is the term chosen by the Supreme Court of the United States to characterize the unborn in the last two months of pregnancy.[2] Before that point, the unborn are referred to by the Court as alive only according to one "theory of life";[3] and as the phrase "potential life" appears to deny the actuality of life, Judge Haynsworth does not exaggerate in finding that, by definition of our highest court, the unborn are not alive. From this perspective, it is folly to explore the pain experienced. Does a stone feel pain? If you know as a matter of definition that the being who is aborted is not alive, you have in effect successfuly bypassed any question of its suffering.

It is more difficult to say why the investigation has not been pursued in depth by those opposed to abortion. The basic reason, I believe, is the sense that the pain inflicted by abortion is of secondary importance to the intolerable taking of life. The right to life which is fundamental to the enjoyment of every other human right has been the focus. That suffering may be experienced by those who are losing their lives has been taken for granted, but it has not been the subject of special inquiry or outrage. The assumption has been that if the killing is stopped, the pain attendant on it will stop too, and it has not seemed necessary to consider the question of pain by itself. In this respect those opposed to abortion have been, like most medical researchers, concentrating on a cure not for the pain but the the disease.

There are good reasons, however, for looking at the question of pain by itself. We live in a society of highly developed humanitarian feeling, a society likely to respond to an appeal to empathy. To those concerned with the defense of life, it makes no difference whether the life taken is that of a person who is unconscious or drugged or drunk or in full possession of his senses; A life has been destroyed. But there are those who either will not respond to argument about killing because they regard the unborn as a kind of abstraction, or who will not look at actual photographs of the aborted because they find the fact of death too strong to contemplate, but who nonetheless might respond to evidence of pain suffered in the process of abortion. In medical research it has proved useful to isolate pain as a phenomenon distinct from disease, so it may be useful here.[4]

The analogy of animals

The best indication that attention to the pain of the unborn may have social consequences is afforded by the example of humanitarian activity on behalf of animals. Let me offer three cases where substantial reform was effected by concentrating on the pain the animals experienced. In each case it was accepted that animals would die, whatever reform was enacted; an appeal on their behalf could not be based on an aversion to putting animals to death. The only forceful argument was that the way in which the animals were killed was cruel because it was painful to the animals.

The first case is that of trapping animals by gins—traps that spring shut upon the animal, wound it, and hold it to die over a probably protracted period. A campaign was launched in England against this method of trapping in 1928, and after thirty years Parliament responded by banning such trapping.[5] A second case is the butchering of cattle for meat. The way in which this was for centuries carried out was painful to the animal being slaughtered. A typical modern statute is the law in California which became effective only in 1968—all cattle are to be rendered insensible by any means that is "rapid and effective" before being "cut, shackled, hoisted, thrown or cast." Or, if the animals are being slaughtered for kosher use, their consciousness must be destroyed by "the simultaneous and instantaneous severance of the carotid arteries with a sharp instrument."[6] A third case: a 1972 California statute regulates in detail the methods by which impounded dogs or cats may be killed. If carbon monoxide is used, the gas chamber must be lighted so that the animal's collapse can be monitored. A newborn dog or cat may not be killed other than by drugs, chloroform, or a decompression chamber. The use of nitrogen gas to kill an older dog or cat is regulated in terms of an oxygen reduction to be reached within sixty seconds.[7] Each of these laws has a single goal: to assure that the animal not suffer as it dies.

It may seem paradoxical, if not perverse, to defend the unborn by considering what has been done for animals. But the animal analogies are instructive on three counts: they show what can be done if empathy with suffering is awakened. They make possible an a fortiori case—if you will do this for an animal, why not for a child? And they exhibit a successful response to the most difficult question when the pain of a being without language is addressed—how do we know what is being experienced?

The inference of pain

Our normal way of knowing whether someone is in pain is for the person to use language affirming that he or she is suffering.[8] This behavior is taken as a sign, not necessarily infallible but usually accurate, that the person is in pain. By it we can not only detect the presence of pain but begin to measure its threshold, its intensity, and its tolerability. Infants, the unborn, and animals have no conceptual language in which to express their suffering and its degree.

Human infants and all animals brought up by parents will cry and scream.[9] Every human parent becomes adept at discriminating between a baby's cry of pain and a baby's cry of fatigue or of anxiety. How do we distinguish? By knowing that babies are human, by empathizing, by interpreting the context of the cry. We also proceed by trial and error: this cry will end if a pain is removed, this cry will end if the baby falls asleep. But animals, we know, are not human and are, in many significant ways, not like us. How do we interpret their cries or their wriggling as pain reactions if they are silent?

What we do with animals to be able to say that they are in pain is precisely what we do with the newborn and the infant: we empathize. We suppose for this purpose that animals are, in fact, "like us," and we interpret the context of the cry. We also proceed by trial and error, determining what stimuli need to be removed to end the animal's reaction.[10] We are not concerned with whether the animal's higher consciousness, its memory and its ability to understand cause and to forecast results, are different from our own, even though we know that for us the development of our consciousness, our memory, our understanding, and our sense of anticipation all may affect our experience of pain. With animals, we respond when we hear or see the physical sign we interpret as a symptom of distress.

Once we have made the leap that permits us to identify with animals, we do not need to dwell on the overt signs of physical distress. All we need is knowledge that an injury has been inflicted to understand that the animal will be in pain. Consider, by way of illustration, this passage on the cruelties of whaling: "A lacerated wound is inflicted with an explosive charge, and the whale, a highly sensitive mammal, then tows a 300-ton boat for a long time, a substantial fraction of an hour, by means of a harpoon pulling in the wound."[11] The author does not particularize any behavior of the wounded whale beyond its labor tugging the whaleboat, nor does he need to. We perceive the situation and the whale's agony. In a similar way the cruelty involved in hunting seals is shown by pointing to their being shot and left to die on the ice.[12] The pain of the dying seal is left to imaginative empathy.

We are, in our arguments about animal suffering and in our social response to them, willing to generalize from our own experience of pain and our knowledge of what causes pain to us. We know that pain requires a force inflicting bodily injury and that, for the ordinary sentient being who is not drugged or hypnotized, the presence of such a force will occasion pain. When we see such a force wounding any animal we are willing to say that the animal feels pain.

The nature of pain

If we pursue the question more deeply, however, we meet a question of mixed philosophical-psychological character. What is pain? Pain has in the past been identified with "an unpleasant quality in the sense of touch." Pain has also been identified with "unpleasantness," understood as "the awareness of harm."[13] In the analysis of Thomas Aquinas, dolor requires the deprivation of a good together with perception of the deprivation. Dolor is categorized as interior dolor, which is consequent on something being apprehended by the imagination or by reason, and exterior dolor, which is consequent on something being apprehended by the senses and especially by the sense of touch.[14] The Thomistic definition of exterior dolor, while general, is not incongruent with a modern understanding of pain, which requires both harmful action on the body and perception of the action. It has been observed that pain also has a motivational component: part of the pain response is avoidance of the cause of the pain.[15] In the words of Ronald Melzack, a modern pioneer in work on pain, "The complex sequences of behavior that characterize pain are determined by sensory, motivational, and cognitive processes that act on motor mechanisms."[16]

Pain, then, while it may be given a general definition, turns out upon investigation to consist of a series of specific responses involving different levels and kinds of activity in the human organism. Melzack has put forward a "gating theory" of pain, in which the key to these responses is the interaction between stimuli and inhibitory controls in the spinal column and in the brain which modulate the intensity and reception of the stimuli.[17] Melzack's theory requires the postulation of control centers, and it is not free from controversy.[18] Yet in main outline it persuasively explains a large number of pain phenomena in terms of stimuli and inhibitors.

To take one illustration at the level of common experience, if someone picks up a cup of hot liquid, his or her response may vary depending on whether the cup is paper or porcelain. The paper cup may be dropped to the ground; an equally hot porcelain cup may be jerkily set back on the table. What is often looked at as a simple reflex response to heat is modified by cognition.[19] To take a more gruesome experience, a number of soldiers severely wounded on the beach at Anzio told physicians in the field hospital that they felt no pain; they were overwhelmingly glad to be alive and off the beach. The same wounds inflicted on civilians would have been experienced as agonizing.[20] For a third example, childbirth without anesthesia is experienced as more or less painful depending on the cultural conditioning which surrounds it.[21]

As all of these examples suggest, both the culture and specific experiences play a part in the perception of pain. Memory, anticipation, and understanding of the cause all affect the perception. It is inferable that that brain is able to control and inhibit the pain response. In Melzack's hypothesis, the gating mechanism controlling the sensory inputs which are perceived as painful operates "at successive synapses at any level of the central nervous system in the course of filtering of the sensory input."[22] In this fundamental account, "the presence or absence of pain is determined by the balance between the sensory and the central inputs to the gate control system."[23]

What is the nature of the sensory inputs? There are a large number of sensory fibers which are receptors and transmitters, receiving and transmitting information about pressure, temperature, and chemical changes at the skin. These transmissions have both temporal and spatial patterns. It is these patterns which will be received as painful at certain levels of intensity and duration when the impulses are uninhibited by any modulation from the spiral column or brain.[24]

The experience of the unborn

For the unborn to experience pain there must be sense receptors capable of receiving information about pressure, temperature, and cutaneous chemical change; the sense receptors must also be capable of transmitting that information to cells able to apprehend it and respond to it.

By what point do such receptors exist? To answer this question, the observation of physical development must be combined with the observation of physical behavior. As early as the 56th day of gestation the child has been observed to move in the womb.[25] In Liley's hypothesis, "the development of structure and the development of function go hand in hand. Fetal comfort determines fetal position, and fetal movement is necessary for a proper development of fetal bones and joints."[26] If fetal bones and joints are beginning to develop this early, movement is necessary to the structural growth; and if Liley is correct, the occasion of movement is discomfort or pain. Hence, there would be some pain receptors present before the end of the second month. A physiologist places about the same point—day 59 or 60—the observation of "spinal reflexes" in the child. Tactile stimulation of the mouth produces a reflex action, and sensory receptors are present in the simple nerve endings of the mouth.[27] Somewhere between day 60 and day 77 sensitivity to touch develops in the genital and anal areas.[28] In the same period, the child begins to swallow. The rate of swallowing will vary with the sweetness of the injection.[29] By day 77 both the palms of the hands and the soles of the feet will also respond to touch; by the same day, eyelids have been observed to squint to close out light.[30]

A standard treatise on human physiological development puts between day 90 and day 120 the beginning of differentiation of "the general sense organs," described as "free nerve terminations (responding to pain, temperature, and common chemicals), lamellated corpuscles (responding to deep pressure), tactile corpuscles, neuromuscular spindles, and neurotendinous end organs (responding to light and deep pressure)."[31] But as responses to touch, pressure, and light precede this period, visible differentiation must be preceded by a period in which these "general sense organs" are functioning.

The cerebral cortex is not developed at this early stage; even at 12 to 16 weeks it is only 30 percent to 40 percent developed.[32] It is consequently a fair conclusion that the cognitive input into any pain reaction will be low in these early months. Neither memory nor anticipation of results can be expected to affect what is experienced. The unborn at this stage will be like certain Scotch terriers, raised in isolation for experimental purposes, who had no motivational pain responses when their noses encountered lighted matches; they were unaware of noxious signals in their environment.[33] But if both sensory receptors and spinal column are involved, may one say with assurance that the reception of strong sense impressions causes no pain? It would seem clear that the reactions of the unborn to stimuli like light and pressure are the motivational responses we associate with pain. We say that a sense receptor is there because there is a response to touch and a taste receptor because there is a response to taste. By the same token we are able to say that pain receptors are present when evasive action follows the intrusion of pressure or light, or when injection of a disagreeable fluid lowers the rate of swallowing. Liley is categorical in affirming that the unborn feel pain.[34] His conclusion has recently been confirmed by an American researcher, Mortimer Rosen, who believes the unborn respond to touch, taste, and pain.[35]

While the likelihood of weak participation by the cerebral cortex will work against the magnification of the pain, there will also be an absence of the inhibitory input from the brain which modulates and balances the sensory input in more developed beings. Consequently, the possibility exists of smaller and weaker sensory inputs having the same effect which later in achieved only by larger and stronger sensations.

As the sensory apparatus continues to grow, so does the cerebral cortex: light stimuli can evoke electrical response in the cerebral cortex between the sixth and seventh months.[36] By this time there will be a substantial cerebral participation in pain perception together with the likelihood of greater brain control of the sensory input. If a child is delivered from the womb at this date, he or she may shed tears. He or she will cry.[37] As we do with other newborns, we interpret these signs in terms of their context and may find them to be signs of pain. What we conclude about the delivered child can with equal force be concluded about the child still in the womb in months six through nine: that unborn child has developed capacity for pain.

In summary, beginning with the presence of sense receptors and spinal responses, there is as much reason to believe that the unborn are capable of pain as that they are capable of sensation. The ability to feel pain grows together with the development of inhibitors capable of modulating the pain. By the sixth month, the child in the womb has a capacity for feeling and expressing pain comparable to the capacity of the same child delivered from the womb. The observation sometimes made that we don't remember prenatal pains applies with equal force to the pains of being born or the pain of early infancy. Memory, it must be supposed, suppresses much more than it recalls. If we remember nothing about life before birth or life before three or four, it may even be that some recollections are painful enough to invoke the suppressive function of our memory; life in the womb is not entirely comfortable.

The experience of pain in an abortion

The principal modern means of abortion are these. In early pregnancy sharp curettage is practiced: a knife is used to kill the unborn child.[38] Alternatively, suction curettage is employed: a vacuum pump sucks up the unborn child by bits and pieces, and a knife detaches the remaining parts.[39] In the second trimester of pregnancy and later a hypertonic saline solution is injected into the amniotic fluid surrounding the fetus. The salt appears to act as a poison;[40] the skin of the affected child appears, on delivery, to have been soaked in acid.[41] Alternatively, prostaglandins are given to the mother; in sufficient dosage they will constrict the circulation and impair the cardiac functioning of the fetus.[42] The child may be delivered dead or die after delivery.[43]

Are these experiences painful? The application of a sharp knife to the skin and the destruction of vital tissue cannot but be a painful experience for any sentient creature. It lasts for about ten minutes.[44] Being subjected to a vacuum is painful, as is dismemberment by suction. The time from the creation of the vacuum to the chief destruction of the child again is about ten minutes.[45] Hypertonic saline solution causes what is described as "exquisite and severe pain" if, by accident during an abortion, it enters subcutaneously the body of the woman having the abortion.[46] It is inferable that the unborn would have an analogous experience lasting some two hours, as the saline solution takes about this long to work before the fetal heart stops.[47] The impact of prostaglandins constricting the circulation of the blood or impairing the heart must be analogous to that when these phenomena occur in born children: they are not pleasant. If, as has been known to happen, a child survives saline of prostaglandin poisoning and is born alive, the child will be functioning with diminished capacity in such vital functions as breathing and cardiac action.[48] Such impaired functioning is ordinarily experienced as painful.

Do the anesthetics the mother has received lessen the pain of the child? It is entirely possible that some drugs will cross the placenta and enter the child's system, causing drowsiness. Anesthesia, however, is not administered to the gravida with the welfare of her child in mind, nor do the anesthetics ordinarily used prevent the mother from serious pain if she is accidentally affected by the saline solution. It may be inferred the child is not protected either. Is it possible that the abortifacient agent destroys the pain receptors and the capability of a pain response earlier than it ends the life of the unborn, so that there is a period of unconsciousness in which pain is not experienced? This is possible in curettage by knife or suction, but it would seem to occur haphazardly, since stunning the child is not the conscious aim of the physician performing the abortion. In saline or prostaglandin poisoning it seems unlikely that the pain apparatus is quickly destroyed. An observation of Melzack is of particular pertinence: the local injection of hypertonic saline opens the spinal gate, he has remarked, and evokes severe pain. At the same time, it raises the level of the inhibitors and closes the gate to subsequent injections.[49] From this it may be inferred that an unborn child subjected to repeated attempts at abortion by saline solution—the baby in the Edelin case was such a child [50]—suffers a good deal the first time and much less on the second and third efforts. The general observation of Melzack on the mechanism of pain is also worth recalling: any lesion which impairs the tonic inhibitory influence from the brain opens the gate, with a consequent increase of pain.[51] Any method of abortion which results first in damage to the cortex may have the initial effect of increasing the pain sensations.

From the review of the methods used, we may conclude that as soon as a pain mechanism is present in the fetus—possibly as early as day 56—the methods used will cause pain. The pain is more substantial and lasts longer the later the abortion is. It is most severe and lasts the longest when the method is saline poisoning.

Whatever the method used, the unborn are experiencing the greatest of bodily evils, the ending of their lives.[52] They are undergoing the death agony. However inarticulate, however slight their cognitive powers, however rudimentary their sensations, they are sentient creatures undergoing the disintegration of their being and the termination of their vital capabilities. That experience is painful in itself. That is why an observer like Magda Denes, looking at the body of an aborted child, can remark that the face of the child has "the agonized tautness of one forced to die too soon." [53] The agony is universal.

CONCLUSION

There are no laws which regulate the suffering of the aborted like those sparing pain to dying animals. There is nothing like the requirement that consciousness must be destroyed by "rapid and effective" methods as it is for cattle; nothing regulating the use of the vacuum pump the way the decompression chamber for dogs is regulated; nothing like the safeguard extended even to newborn kittens that only a humane mode of death may be employed. So absolute has been the liberty given the gravida by the Supreme Court that even the prohibition of the saline method by a state has been held to violate the Constitution.[54] The Supreme Court has acted as though it is believed that its own fiat could alter reality and as if the human fetus is not alive.

Can human beings who understand what may be done for animals and what cannot be done for unborn humans want this inequality of treatment to continue? We are not bound to animals to the same degree as we are bound to human beings because we lack a common destiny, but we are bound to animals as fellow creatures, and as God loves them out of charity, so must we who are called to imitate God.[55] It is a sign not of error or weakness but of Christlike compassion to love animals. Can those who feel for the harpooned whale not be touched by the situation of the salt-soaked baby? We should not despair of urging further the consciences of those who have curtailed their convenience to spare suffering to other sentient creatures.

With keener sensibilities and more developed inhibitors than animals, we are able to empathize with their pain. By the same token, we are able to empathize with the aborted. We can comprehend what they must undergo. All of our knowledge of pain is by empathy: we do not feel another's pain directly. That is why the pain of others is so tolerable for us. But if we begin to empathize, we may begin to feel what is intolerable.

We are bound to the beings in the human womb by the common experience of pain we have also known in the womb. We are bound to them as well by a common destiny, to share eternal life. As fellow wayfarers, we are bound to try to save them from a premature departure. We can begin to save them by communicating our knowledge of the suffering they must experience.

ABORTION: THE DREADED COMPLICATION

(By Liz Jeffries and Rick Edmonds)

Although abortions remain one of the major ethical controversies of our time, the fact is that an abortion has become the most common medical procedure performed on adults in the United States. More than a million and a half fetuses are aborted annually, and the number has increased about 50 percent from five years ago. At present, approximately one out of every four pregnancies is terminated by an abortion. American doctors remove more fetuses than tonsils.

But despite the intense attention the subject has received and the frequency with which the procedure is performed, something happens in a very small number of abortions, performed relatively late in the pregnancy, that no one wants to talk about. It horrifies many of the medical personnel who have encountered it.

What happens is that about once a day, somewhere in the U.S., something goes wrong and an abortion results in a live baby.

A woman's scream broke the late-night quiet and brought two young obstetrical nurses rushing to Room 4456 of the University of Nebraska Medical Center. The patient, admitted for an abortion, had been injected 30 hours earlier with a salt solution, which normally kills the fetus and causes the patient to deliver a mass of lifeless tissue, in a process similar to a miscarriage.

This time, though, something had gone wrong. When nurse Marilyn Wilson flicked on the lights and pulled back the covers, she found, instead of the stillborn fetus she'd expected, a live 2½-pound baby boy, crying and moving his arms and legs there on the bed.

Dismayed, the second nurse, Joanie Fuchs, gathered the squirming infant in loose bedcovers, dashed down the corridor and called to the other nurses for help. She did not take the baby to an intensive care nursery, but deposited it instead on the stainless steel drainboard of a sink in the maternity unit's Dirty Utility Room—a large closet where bedpans are emptied and dirty linens stored. Other nurses and a resident doctor gathered and gaped.

Finally, a head nurse telephoned the patient's physician, Dr. C. J. LaBenz, at home, apparently waking him.

"He told me to leave it where it was," the head nurse testified later, "just to watch it for a few minutes, that it would probably die in a few minutes."

This was in Omaha, in September 1979. It was nothing new. Hundreds of times a year in the United States, an aborted fetus emerges from the womb kicking and alive. Some survive. A baby girl in Florida, rescued by nurses who found her lying in a bedpan, is 5 years old now and doing well. Most die. The Omaha baby lasted barely 2½ hours after he was put in the closet with the dirty linen.

Always, their arrival is met with shock, dismay and confusion.

When such a baby is allowed to die and the incident becomes known, the authorities often try to prosecute the doctor. This has happened several dozen times in the past eight years, most recently in the case of Dr. LaBenz, who is to go on trial in Omaha this fall on two counts of criminal abortion. But interviews with nurses, some of them visibly anguished, uncovered dozens of similar cases that never reached public attention.

In fact, for every case that does become known, a hundred probably go unreported. Dr. Willard Cates, an expert on medical statistics who is chief of abortion surveillance for the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta, estimates that 400 to 500 abortion live births occur every year in the United States. That is only a tiny fraction of the nation's 1.5 million annual abortions. Still, it means that these unintended live births are literally an everyday occurence.

They are little known because organized medicine, from fear of public clamor and legal action, treats them more as an embarrassment to be hushed up than a problem to be solved. "It's like turning yourself in to the IRS for an audit," Cates said. "What is there to gain? The tendency is not to report because there are only negative incentives."

One result of the medical community's failure to openly acknowledge the problem is that many hospitals and clinics give their staffs no guidelines for dealing with abortion live births. Even where guidelines exist, they may not be followed. The doctor is seldom present when a live birth occurs, because most late abortions—those done later than the midpoint of pregnancy—are performed by the injection of a solution (the method used in the Omaha case) that slowly induces delivery of the fetus many hours later. Crucial decisions therefore fall to nurses and physician residents with secondary authority over the case.

Signs of life in the baby may or may not be recognized. At some hospitals a liveborn abortion baby is presumed dead unless it conspicuously demonstrates otherwise, by crying or waving its arms and legs. Even then, the medical personnel on the scene may let the bably die rather than try to save it.

Because they are premature, these infants need immediate care, including machine support, in order to live. Given such care, many can survive in good health, as did a pair of abortion babies born in separate incidents in Wilmington, Del., in the spring of 1979 and since adopted. Others are too premature to be saved even with the best care.

Whether they live or die, these abortion live births—and even successful, routine abortions of late-term, highly developed fetuses—are taking a heavy emotional toll on medical staffs across the country. Some physicians say they have "burned out" and have stopped doing abortions altogether. Nursing staffs at hospitals in Cleveland, Grand Rapids, Fort Lauderdale and elsewhere have rebelled at late abortions and have stopped their hospitals from performing any abortions later than the midpoint of pregnancy. Some staff members who regularly perform later abortions report having nightmares about fetuses including recurring dreams in which they frantically seek to hide fetuses from others.

In legalizing abortions in 1973, the Supreme Court said it was reserving the right to protect the life of a viable fetus—that is, one with the potential to survive outside the womb. But the court never directly acknowledged the chance of an aborted fetus being born alive. And it therefore neven gave a clear guideline for dealing with what Dr. Thomas Kerenyi, a leading New York expert on abortions, has called "the dreaded complication."

Twenty states (including Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware) have no laws limiting late abortions or mandating care for live-born abortion babies. Even where such state laws exist, they have usually been found unenforceable in practice or unconstitutional.

"Everyone—doctors, attorney, state legislators—is looking for some clear guidelines concerning disposition of these infants," said Newman Flanagan, district attorney for the City of Boston. "If a baby has rejected an abortion and lives, then it is a person under the Constitution. As such, it has a basic right to life. Unfortunately, it is difficult to protect that right, because there are no guidelines addressed to this specific issue."

Medical trends indicate that abortion live births will continue. They may even become more frequent. For one thing, demand for later-term abortions is undiminished, and with the growing popularity of genetic testing to screen for fetal defects midway through pregnancy, educated and affluent women are now joining the young, the poor and the uninformed who have been, until now, the main groups seeking late abortions.

Furthermore, estimating the gestational age of a fetus in the womb—a crucial aspect of a successful abortion—remains an inexact art. In March, doctors at the Valley Abortion Clinic in Phoenix estimated that one woman was 19 to 20 weeks pregnant; days later she delivered not an aborted fetus but a 2½-pound, 32-week baby. It survived after two months of intensive care at a Phoenix hospital.

Finally, medical science in the past 10 years has greatly improved its ability to care for premature babies. Infants are becoming viable earlier and earlier. Those with a gestational age of 24 weeks and weighing as little as 1½ pounds can now survive if given the best of care.

So long as doctors perform abortions up to the 24th week of pregnancy (as is legal everywhere in the United States under the 1973 Supreme Court ruling), it is statistically certain that some of these borderline cases will turn out to be viable babies, born alive. It happened again last May in Chicago—a 19-to-20-week estimate, a live-born, 2-pound baby boy.

By ignoring the problem of abortion live births, the courts and the medical establishment are chosing to overlook a long, well-documented history of cases: January 1969, Stobhill Hospital, Glasgow, Scotland: A custodian heard a cry from a paper bag in the snow beside an incinerator. He found a live baby. It was taken inside and cared for in the hospital's operating theater but died nine hours later. The infant's gestational age had been estimated at 26 weeks by the physician performing the abortion. It was actually closer to 32 weeks. No efforts were made to check for signs of life before the aborted baby was discarded. No charges were filed. Because the case had been written about in British medical journals, it was a matter of record—before abortion was legalized in this country—that such things could happen.

April 1973, Greater Bakersfield Hospital, Bakersfield, Calif.: A 4½-pound infant was born live following a saline abortion (induced by an injection of salt solution) performed by Dr. Xavier Hall Ramirez. Informed by phone, Dr. Ramirez ordered two nurses to discontinue administering oxygen to the baby. His instructions were countermanded by another doctor; the baby survived and later was placed for adoption. Ramirez was indicted for solicitation to commit murder. His attorney argued that a medical order based on medical opinion, no matter how mistaken, is privileged. Dr. Irvin M. Cushner of the University of California at Los Angeles, later to become a top health policy official in the Carter administration, testified that it was normal for Ramirez to expect the delivery of a dead or certain-to-die infant as the result of a saline abortion.

July 1974, West Penn Hospital, Pittsburgh: Dr. Leonard Laufe performed an abortion on a woman who contended she had been raped—though that and her account of when she became pregnant were later disputed. She had been turned down for an abortion at another hospital, where the term of her pregnancy was estimated at 26 to 31 weeks. Laufe put it as 20 to 22. The abortion, induced by an injection of prostaglandin, a substance that stimulates muscle contraction and delivery of the fetus, was filmed for use as an instructional film. The film showed the three-pound infant moving and gasping. Also, a nurse and a medical student testified that they had noticed signs of life. No charges were filed, however, after a coroner's inquest at which Laufe testified that the infant sustained fatal damage during delivery.

February 1975, Boston: Dr. Kenneth Edelin was convicted of manslaughter for neglecting to give care to a 24-week infant after a 1973 abortion at Boston City Hospital. Witnesses said Edelin held the infant down, constricting the flow of oxygen through the umbilical cord and smothering it. He was the first and only American doctor ever convicted on charges of failing to care for an infant born during an abortion. The conviction was overturned by the Massachusetts Supreme Court on the ground that improper instructions had been given to the jury. Edelin and his lawyer argued that he had taken no steps to care for the infant because it was never alive outside the womb.

March 1977, Westminster Community Hospital, Westminster, Calif.: A seven-month baby girl was born live after a saline abortion performed by Dr. William Waddill. A nurse testified that Waddill, when he got to the hospital, interrupted her efforts to help the baby's breathing. A fellow physician testified that he had seen Waddill choke the infant. "I saw him put his hand on this baby's neck and push down," said Dr. Ronald Cornelson. "He said, 'I can't find the goddamn trachea,' and 'This baby won't stop breathing.'" Two juries, finding Cornelson an emotional and unconvincing witness, deadlocked in two separate trials. Charges against Waddill were then dismissed. He had contended the infant was dying of natural causes by the time he got to the hospital.

July 1979, Cedars-Sinai Medical Center, Los Angeles: Dr. Boyd Cooper delivered an apparently stillborn infant, after having ended a problem pregnancy of 23 weeks. Half an hour later the baby made gasping attempts to breathe, but no efforts were made to resuscitate it because of its size (1 pound 3 ounces) and the wishes of the parents. The baby was taken to a small utility room that was used, among other things, as an infant morgue. Told of the continued gasping, Cooper instructed a nurse, "Leave the baby there—it will die." Twelve hours later, according to testimony of the nurse, Laura VanArsdale, she returned to work and found the infant still in the closet, still gasping.

Cooper then agreed to have the baby boy transferred to an intensive care unit, where he died four days later. A coroner's jury ruled the death "accidental" rather than natural but found nothing in Cooper's conduct to warrant criminal action.

A common thread in all these incidents is that life was recognized and the episode brought to light by someone other than the doctor. Indeed, there is evidence that doctors tend to ignore all but the most obvious signs of life in an abortion baby.

In the November 1974 newsletter of the International Correspondence Society of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, several doctors addressed a question from a practitioner who had written in an earlier issue that he was troubled by what to do when an aborted infant showed signs of life.

One was Dr. Ronald Bolognese, an obstetrician at Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia, who replied:

"At the time of delivery, it has been our policy to wrap the fetus in a towel. The fetus is then moved to another room while our attention is turned to the care of [the woman]. She is examined to determine whether complete placental expulsion has occurred and the extent of vaginal bleeding. Once we are sure that her condition is stable, the fetus is evaluated. Almost invariably all signs of life have ceased."

(Bolognese recanted that statement in a 1979 interview. "That's not what we do now," he said. "We would transport it to the intensive care nursery.")

In addition, Dr. William Brenner of the University of North Carolina Medical School suggested that if breathing and movement persist for several minutes, "the patient's physician, if he is not in attendance, should probably be contacted and informed of the situation. The pediatrician on call should probably be appraised of the situation if signs of life continue."

Dr. Warren Pearse, executive director of the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology, was asked in a 1979 interview what doctors do, as standard practice, to check whether an aborted fetus is alive.

"What you would do next [after expulsion] is nothing," Pearse said. "you assume the infant is dead unless it shows signs of life. You're dealing with a dead fetus unless there is sustained cardiac action or sustained respiration—it's not enough if there's single heartbeat or an occasional gasp."

These seemingly callous policies are based on the assmuption that abortion babies are too small or too damaged by the abortion process to survive and live meaningful lives. That is not necessarily the case, though, even for babies set aside and neglected in the minutes after delivery.

A nursing supervisor who asked not to be identified told of a abortion live birth in the mid-'70s in a Florida hospital. The infant was dumped in a bedpan without examination, as was standard practice. "It did not die," the nurse said. "It was left in the bedpan for an hour before signs of life were noticed. It weighed slightly over a pound."

The baby remained in critical condition for several months, but excellent care in a unit for premature infants enabled it to survive. The child, now 5 years old, was put up for adoption. The nursing supervisor, who has followed its progress, said she has pictures of the youngster "riding a bicycle and playing a little piano."

In the spring of 1979 two babies were born live, five weeks apart, after saline abortions at the Wilmington Medical Center. They were given vigorous care, survived and were later adopted. One had been discovered by a nurse, struggling for breath and with a faint heartbeat, after having been placed in a plastic specimen jar. The second was judged to be a live delivery and was given immediate help breathing.

A baby girl, weighing 1 pound 11 ounces, was born in February 1979 after a saline abortion at Inglewood (Calif.) Hospital. Harbor General Hospital, which is associated with UCLA and is fully equipped to care for premature babies, was called for help, but the neonatal rescue team did not respond. The infant died after three hours.

The Los Angeles Department of Health Services investigated and was told that there had been confusion over the baby's weight and that it reportedly showed poor vital signs. It was "very unusual for them not to pick up [an infant] of this size," Dr. Rosemary Leake of Harbor General told investigators.

The administrator of a New York abortion unit, asked what would be done for a live-born abortion baby, said, "The nurses have been trained in how to handle this. I'd like to think we would do everything to save it. But honestly I'm not sure."

These incidents together suggest that life in an aborted infant may or may not be recognized. If it is, supportive treatment may or may not be ordered.

Such incidents, when discovered, often provoke prosecutions. A few may seem something like murder at first blush. But on closer inspection the doctors' actions have been judged, time and again, not quite to fit the definition of a crime.

Nowhere was this more vividly shown than in the case of Dr. Jesse J. Floyd, who was indicted on charges of murder and criminal abortion by a grand jury in Columbia, S.C., in August 1975. The charges were the result of an abortion a year earlier of a baby that appeared to have a gestational age of 27 to 28 weeks. It weighed 2 pounds 5 ounces and lived for 20 days.

In October 1979 the state dropped its case against Floyd. County prosecutor James C. Anders later conceded in an interview that South Carolina's abortion law was of dubious constitutionality. "In the second place," he said, "I had a reluctant witness [the infant's mother]. That and the passage of time worked against me."

A detailed record was developed in the case, as part of a federal suit that Floyd brought against Anders in which he sought to block the state prosecution. The 20-year-old mother, Louise A., lived in the small town of Hopkins, worked at a military-base commissary and had plans to enroll in a technical college. Those plans made her unwilling to have the baby she was carrying, so she presented herself for an abortion at Floyd's office in July 1974. Court records indicate that she had been told erroneously by her hometown doctor's nurse that she was not pregnant, and that she only slowly realized that she was.

Floyd found her to be past the first trimester of pregnancy, and under South Carolina law that meant an in-hospital abortion would be required. There were delays in her raising $450 for the abortion and more delays in admitting her to Richland Memorial Hospital. She was injected with prostaglandin on Sept. 4 and expelled the live baby early on the morning of Sept. 6.

"I started having real bad labor pains again," Louise recalled in her deposition, "and finally my baby was born. I called the nurse. Then about four or five of them came in the room at the time. The head nurse came in the same time the other nurses came in and she told me did I know that the baby was a seven-month baby. I told her no.

"One of the nurses said that the baby was alive. They took the baby out of the room. He never did cry, he just made some kind of a noise."

The first doctor on the scene, paged from the cafeteria, was a young resident. She did not hesitate. On detecting a heartbeat of 100, she clamped and servered the umbilical cord and had the baby sent to the hospital's intensive care unit.

"It was a shock, a totally unique emergency situation, very upsetting to all of us," the doctor, who now practices in California, said in an interview. "Some people have disagreed with me [about ordering intensive care for an abortion live birth] but that seems to me the only way you can go.

"It's like watching a drowning. You act. You don't have the luxury of calling around and consulting. You institute life preserving measures first and decide about viability later on."

Ten days after birth, the baby had improved markedly and was given a 50-50 chance of survival. Then he developed a tear in the small intestine and died of that and other complications on Sept. 26.

Louise A. never saw the child. She checked out of the hospital two days after the abortion and did not return. But she did show a passing interest in the baby's progress.

"I kept calling this nurse," Louise said in her deposition. "I would call . . . and get information from them about the baby, and they told me he was doing fine. They told me he had picked up two or three pounds. I started going to school, and one afternoon I called home and they told me the baby had died, but no one told me the cause of his death."

Floyd never saw the infant either. On the day of the abortion, his hospital privileges at Richland were withdrawn, and they have never been restored.

These circumstances presented prosecutor Anders with a difficult care. Floyd had had no physical contact with the live-born infant, nor was he issuing orders concerning its care. Nonetheless, Anders thought the doctor could be held responsible for the infant's death.

Anders pressed his murder charge using an old English common-law theory. Under this theory, willfully doing damage to a "vital" infant in the womb could be considered a crime against the fetus as a person. The abortion itself, Anders alleged, was an assault.

This line of argument is not entirely farfetched. For instance, a Camden, N.J., man was convicted of murder in 1975 after he shot a woman in the abdomen late in her pregnancy, causing the death of the twins she was carrying. But application of the theory to abortion had never been tested—in South Carolina or anywhere else.

South Carolina law in the mid-1970s prohibited third-trimester abortion unless two other doctors certified that the abortion was essential to protect the life or health of the mother. No such certifications were made for Louise. However, various Supreme Court rulings suggested that both the requirement of consultation with other doctors and the explicit definition of viability (as beginning in the third trimester) would make that law unconstitutional.

Floyd's lawyers, George Kosko of Columbia, S.C., and Roy Lucas of Washington, also filed voluminous expert affidavits on the difficulty of estimating gestational age accurately. At worst, they argued, Floyd had made a mistaken diagnosis. What proof was there that he had intentionally aborted a viable baby?

District Court Judge Robert Chapman and the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals agreed that the prosecution was based on flimsy evidence and should be blocked. However, the Supreme Court disagreed, in a ruling in March 1979, and suggested that judgment should be withheld on constitutional matters until the state prosecution had run its course. The way was thus cleared for Anders to proceed, but with witnesses dispersed, memories fading and the legal basis for prosecution still doubtful, Anders chose to drop the case.

Floyd, 49, continues performing first-trimester abortions at his Ladies Clinic, but the loss of hospital privileges and the damage to his reputation caused his surgical practice to collapse, he said.

The long legal proceeding also seems to have had a chilling effect on abortion practice throughout South Carolina, which Anders concedes was one of his intentions.

"The main thing is the dilemma it puts the other physicians in," Floyd said in an interview. "It's just about dried up second-trimester abortions in this state. I have to send mine to Atlanta, Washington or New York."

Asked about late abortions and the risk of live births, Floyd said he thought abortions performed through the sixth month of pregnancy create "a problem to which there isn't an answer. We probably need to move back to 20 weeks. I would be reluctant to do one now after 20 weeks."

A similar case occurred about the same time in South Carolina, when Anders obtained a criminal indictment charging Dr. Herbert Schreiber of Camden, S.C., with first-degree murder and illegal abortion.

On July 18, 1976, a month after the charges had been filed, the 60-year-old doctor was found dead in a motel room in Asheville, N.C. A motel maid discovered the body slumped in a chair. Several bottles of prescription drugs were recovered from the room. Two days later the Buncombe County medical examiner ruled the death a suicide from a drug overdose.

Schreiber, who left no note, had pleaded not guilty to the charge of having killed a live baby girl after an abortion by choking or smothering her to death.

Comparing the Floyd and Schreiber cases, Anders found an irony: Schreiber "just reached in and strangled the baby," the prosecutor said his evidence showed. "I charged him with murder, and he committed suicide. If he had been willing to wait, he probably would have been OK too."

Not every doctor who performs a late abortion has to confront an aggressive prosecutor like Anders. But even those abortion live births that escape public notice raise deeply troubling emotions for the medical personnel involved. "Our training disciplines you to follow the doctor's orders," explained a California maternity nurse. "If you do something on your own for the baby that the doctor has not ordered and that may not meet with his commitment to his patient, the mother can sue you. A nurse runs a grave risk if she acts on her own. Not only her immediate job but her license may be threatened."

Nonetheless, nursing staffs have led a number of quiet revolts against late abortions. Two major hospitals in the Fort Lauderdale area, for instance, stopped offering abortions in the late 1970s after protests from nurses who felt uncomfortable handling the lifelike fetuses.

A Grand Rapids, Mich., hospital stopped late-term abortions in 1977 after nurses made good on their threat not to handle the fetuses. One night they left a stillborn fetus lying in its mother's bed for an hour and a half, despite angry calls from the attending physician, who finally went in and removed it himself.

In addition, a number of hospital administrators have reported problems in mixing maternity and abortion patients—the latter must listen to the cries of newborn infants while waiting for the abortion to work. And it has proved difficult in general hospitals to provide round-the-clock staffing of obstetrical nurses willing to assist with the procedure.

One young nurse in the Midwest, who quit to go into teaching, remembers "a happy group of nurses" turning nasty to each other and the physicians because of conflicts over abortion. One day, she recalled, a woman physician "walked out of the operating room after doing six abortions. She smeared her hand (which was covered with blood) on mine and said, 'Go wash it off. That's the hand that did it.' "

Several studies have documented the distress that late abortion causes many nurses. Dr. Warren M. Hern, chief physician, and Billie Corrigan, head nurse of the Boulder (Colo.) Abortion Clinic, presented a paper to a 1978 Planned Parenthood convention entitled "What About Us? Staff Reactions. . . ."

The clinic, one of the largest in the Rocky Mountain states, specializes in the D&E (dilatation and evacuation) method of second-trimester abortion, a procedure in which the fetus is cut from the womb in pieces. Hern and Corrigan reported that eight of the 15 staff members surveyed reported emotional problems. Two said they worried about the physician's psychological well-being. Two reported horrifying dreams about fetuses, one of which involved the hiding of fetal parts so that other people would not see them.

"We have produced an unusual dilemma," Hern and Corrigan concluded. "A procedure is rapidly becoming recognized as the procedure of choice in late abortion, but those capable of performing or assisting with the procedure are having strong personal reservations about participating in an operation which they view as destructive and violent."

Dr. Julius Butler, a professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Minnesota Medical School, is concerned about studies suggesting that D&E is the safest method and should be used more widely. "Remember," he said, "there is a human being at the other end of the table taking that kid apart.

"We've had guys drinking too much, taking drugs, even a suicide or two. There have been no studies I know of of the problem, but the unwritten kind of statistics we see are alarming."

"You are doing a destructive process," said Dr. William Benbow Thompson of the University of California at Irvine. "Arms, legs, chests come out in the forceps. It's not a sight for everybody."

Not all doctors think the stressfulness is overwhelming. The procedure "is a little bit unpleasant for the physician," concedes Dr. Mildred Hanson, a petite woman in her early 50s who does eight to 10 abortions a day in a clinic in Minneapolis, just a few miles across town from where Butler works. "It's easier to . . . leave someone else—namely a nurse—to be with the patient and do the dirty work.

"There is a lot in medicine that is unpleasant" but necessary—like amputating a leg—she argues, and doctors shouldn't let their own squeamishness deprive patients of a procedure that's cheaper and less traumatic.

However, Dr. Nancy Kaltreider, an academic psychiatrist at the University of San Francisco, has found in several studies "an unexpectedly strong reaction" by the assisting staff to late-abortion procedures. For nurses, she hypothesizes, handling tissues that resemble a fully formed baby "runs directly against the medical emphasis on preserving life."

The psychological wear and tear from doing late abortions is obvious. Philadelphia's Dr. Bolognese, who seven years ago was recommending wrapping abortion live-borns in a towel, has stopped doing late abortions.

"You get burned out," he said. Noting that his main research interest is in the management of complicated obstetrical cases, he observed: "It seemed kind of schizophrenic, to be doing that on the one hand [helping women with problem pregnancies to have babies] and do abortions."

Dr. John Franklin, medical director of Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania, was the plaintiff in a 1979 Supreme Court case liberalizing the limits on late abortions. He does not do such procedures himself. "I find them pretty heavy weather both for myself and for my patients," he said in an interview.

Dr. Kerenyi, the New York abortion expert, who is at Mt. Sinai Hospital, has similar feelings but reaches a different conclusion. "I first of all take pride in my deliveries. But I've seen a lot of bad outcomes in women who did not want their babies—so I think we should help women who want to get rid of them. I find I can live with this dual role."

The legal jeopardy, the emotional strain, the winking neglect with which "signs of life" must be met—all these things nurture secrecy. Late abortions take place "behind a white curtain," as one prosecutor put it, well sheltered from public view.

Only one large-scale study has been done of live births after abortions—by George Stroh and Dr. Alan Hinman in upstate New York from July 1970 through December 1972 (a period during which abortion was legal in New York alone.) It turned up 38 cases of live births in a sample of 150,000 abortions.

Other studies, including one that found signs of life in about 10 percent of the prostaglandin abortions at a Hartford, Conn., hospital, date from the mid-1970s. No one is so naive as to think there is reliable voluntary reporting of live births in the present climate, according to Dr. Cates of the Center for Disease Control.

Evidence gathered during research for this story suggests, without proving definitively, that much of the traffic in late abortions now flows to the New York and Los Angeles metropolitan areas, where loose practice more easily escapes notice.

"The word has spread," the Daily Breeze, a small Los Angeles suburban paper, said in July 1980, "that facilities in greater Los Angeles will do late abortions. How late only the woman and the doctor who performs them know."

This kind of thing is disturbing even to some people with a strong orientation in favor of legal abortion. For instance, the Philadelphia office of CHOICE, which describes itself as "a reproductive health advocacy agency," will recommend only Dr. Kerenyi's service at Mt. Sinai among the half-dozen in New York offering abortion up to 24 weeks. The others have shortcomings in safety, sanitation or professional standards, in the agency's view.

An internal investigation of the abortion unit at Jewish Memorial Hospital in Manhattan showed that six fetuses aborted there in the summer of 1979 weighed more than 1½ pounds. The babies were not alive, but were large enough to be potentially viable. A state health inspector found in June 1979 that the unit had successfully aborted a fetus that was well over a foot long and appeared to be of 32 weeks gestation. Hospital officials confirmed in an interview that later in 1979 a fetus weighing more than four pounds had been aborted.

"It's disconcerting," Iona Siegel, administrator of the Women's Health Center at Kingsbrook Jewish Medical Center in Brooklyn, said of abortions performed so late that the infant is viable. When Ms. Siegel hears, as she says she often does, that a patient turned away by Kingsbrook because she was past 24 weeks of pregnancy had an abortion somewhere else, "that makes me angry. Number one, it's against the law. Number two, it's dangerous to the health of the mother."

Though one might expect organized medicine to take a hand in bringing some order to the practice of late abortions, that is not happening.

"We're not really very pro-abortion," said Dr. Ervin Nichols, director of practice activities for the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology. "As a matter of fact, anything beyond 20 weeks, we're kind of upset about it."

If abortions after 20 weeks are a dubious practice, how does that square with abortion up to 24 weeks being offered openly in Los Angeles and New York and advertised in newspapers and the Yellow Pages there and elsewhere?

"That's not medicine," Nichols replied. "That's hucksterism."

Cates, of the Center for Disease Control, concedes that he has ambivalent feelings about those who do the very late procedures. There is obviously some profiteering and some bending of state laws forbidding abortions in the third trimester. But since late abortions are hard to get legally in many places, Cates puts a low priority on trying to police such practices. Medical authorities leave the late-abortion practitioners to do what they will. And so, too, by necessity, do the legal authorities.

The Supreme Court framed its January 1973 opinion legalizing abortion around the slippery concept of viability. As defined by Justice Harry Blackmun in the landmark Roe vs. Wade case, viability occurs when the fetus is "potentially able to live outside the mother's womb albeit with artificial aid."

The court granted women an unrestricted right to abortions, as an extension to their right of privacy, in the first trimester of pregnancy. From that point to viability, the state can regualte abortions only to make sure they are safe. And only after a fetus reaches viability can state law limit abortion and protect the "rights" of the fetus.

"Viability," Blackmun wrote, after a summer spent researching the matter in the library of the Mayo Clinic, "is usually placed at about seven months (28 weeks) but may occur earlier, even at 24 weeks."

The standard was meant to be elastic, changing in time with medical advances. Blackmun took no particular account, though, of the possibility of abortion live births, or of errors in estimating gestational age.

In subsequent cases, the high court ruled that:

A Missouri law was too specific in forbidding abortion after 24 weeks. "It is not the proper function of the legislature or the court," Blackmun wrote, "to place viability, which essentially is a medical concept, at a specific point in the gestational period."

A Pennsylvania law was too vague. The law banned abortions "if there is sufficient reason to believe that the fetus may be viable." The court said it was wrong to put doctors in jeopardy without giving them clearer notice of what they must do.

State laws could not interfere with a doctor' s professional judgment by dictating the choice of procedure for later abortions or by requiring aggressive care of abortion live births.

According to a 1979 survey by Jeanie Rosoff of Planned Parenthood's Alan Guttmacher Institute, 30 states have laws regulating third-trimester abortions. Some of these laws prohibit or strictly limit abortions after the fetus has reached viability. Some require doctors to try to save abortion live-born babies. Only a few states have both types of laws.

In addition, a number of these laws have been found unconstitutional. Others obviously would be, in light of Supreme Court rulings. Virtually all the state laws would be subject to constitutional challenge if used as the basis of prosecution against an individual doctor.

New York and California, ironically, have among the strongest, most detailed laws mandating care for survivors of abortions. But these laws have proved only a negligible check on the abortion of viable babies.

"We've had a number of claims come up that a baby was born live and full effort was not given to saving it," said Dr. Michael Baden, former chief medical examiner of New York City. "We've not had cases of alleged strangulation [as with Dr. Waddill in California] and that surely must be rare. All [the doctor] has to do is nothing and the result is the same."

Alan Marrus, a Bronx County assistant district attorney, has investigated several live-birth cases and the applicable New York law. He has yet to find "a case that presented us with facts that warranted prosecution. You need an expert opinion that in fact there was life and that the fetus would have survived. Often the fetus has been destroyed—so there is nothing for your expert witness to examine."

The incidents only come to light at all, Baden and Marrus noted, if some whistleblower inside the hospital or clinic brings them to the attention of the legal authorities. The credibility of that sort of witness may be subject to attack. And even if the facts do weigh against a doctor, he has some resources left. Almost always he can claim to have made no more than a good-faith error in medical judgment.

"This is happening all over the place," said a California prosecutor. "Babies that should live are dying because callous physicians let them die." But he despairs of winning any convictions. "Nobody's as dumb as Waddill. They're smarter today. They know how to cover themselves."

Unfortunately, advances in medical technique may only aggravate the overall problem. Fetuses are becoming viable earlier and earlier, while the demand for later abortions shows no sign of abating. Some argue that Justice Blackmun's definition of viability as "usually seven months" was obsolete the day it was published. It clearly is now.

A decade ago, survival of an infant less than 3 pounds or 30 weeks gestation was indeed rare, principally because the lungs of smaller infants unaided, are too undeveloped and fragile to sustain life. Now, infants with birth weights of about 1⅔ pounds routinely survive with the best of care, according to Dr. Richard Behrman, chief of neonatology at Rainbow Babies and Childrens Hospital in Cleveland and chairman of a national commission that studied viability in the mid-1970s.

Sometimes even smaller babies make it, and the idea that most of them will be retarded or disabled is out-of-date, Behrman said. "Most . . . survive intact."

Even with the medical advances, though, some live-born infants are simply too small and undeveloped to have a realistic chance to survive. A survey last year of specialists in neonatal care found that 90 percent would not order life-support by machine for babies smaller than 1 pound 2 ounces or less than 24 weeks gestation. And on occasion, a newborn may manifest muscular twitches or gasping movements without ever "being alive" according to the usual legal test of drawing a breath that fills the lungs.

Still, it is no longer a miracle for an infant of 24 weeks development (which can be legally aborted) to be saved if born prematurely.

"It is frightening," said Dr. Roger K. Freeman, medical director of Women's Hospital at the Long Beach Memorial Medical Center in Long Beach, Calif. "Medical advances in the treatment of premature babies enable us to save younger fetuses than ever before. When a fetus survives an abortion, however, there may be a collision of tragic proportions between medicine and maternity. Medicine is now able to give the premature a chance that may be rejected by the mother."

In 1970, Freeman developed the fetal stress test, a widley used technique for monitoring the heart rate of unborn fetuses. Also, he and a colleague at Long Beach, Dr. Houchang D. Mondalou, have developed a drug, betamethzene, that matures premature lungs within days instead of weeks. The hospital claims a 90 percent success rate with infants weighing as little as 1 pound 11 ounces.

At the University of California at Irvine, work is under way on an "artificial placenta" that doctors there say could within five years, push the threshold of viability back even further.

The life-saving techniques are not exclusive to top academic hospitals, either. Good neonatal care is now broadly available across the United States. In fact, the lively issue in medical circles these days is not whether tiny premature babies can be saved, but whether it is affordable. Bills for the full course of treatment of a two-pound infant typically run between $25,000 and $100,000. To some, that seems a lot to pay, especially in the case of an abortion baby that was not wanted in the first place.

The only way out of the dilemma, it would seem, would be for fewer women to seek late abortions. Though some optimists argue that this is happening, there is evidence that it is not.

Studies show that women seeking abortions late in the second trimester are often young, poor and sexually ignorant. Many either fail to realize they are pregnant or delay telling their families out of fear at the reaction. The patients also include those who have had a change of circumstance or a change of heart after deciding initially to carry through a pregnancy; some of these women are distrurbed.

As first-trimester abortion and sex education become more widely available, the optimists' argument goes, nearly all women who choose abortion will get an early abortion. But in fact a new class of older, well-educated, affluent women has now joined the hardship cases in seeking late abortions.

This is because a recently developed technique, amniocentesis, allows genetic screening of the unborn fetus for various hereditary diseases. Through this screening, a woman can learn whether the child she is carrying is free of such dreaded conditions as Downs syndrome (mongolism) or Tay-Sachs disease, a genetic disorder that is always fatal, early in childhood.

The test involves drawing off a sample of amniotic fluid, in which the fetus is immersed in the womb. This cannot be done until the 15th or 16th week. Test cultures for the various potential problems take several weeks to grow. Sometimes the result is inconclusive and the test must be repeated. The testing also reveals the unborn child's sex and can be used to detect minor genetic imperfections.

To many women, particularly those over 35, amniocentesis seems a rational approach to minimizing the chances of bearing a defective child. A few, according to published reports, go a step further and make sure the baby is the sex they want before deciding to bear the child.

In any case, it is late in the second trimester—within weeks of the current threshold of viability—before the information becomes available on which a decision is made to abort. The squeeze will intensify as amniocentesis becomes more widely available and as smaller and smaller infants are able to survive.

The abortion live-birth dilemma has caught the attention of several experts on medical ethics, and they have proposed two possible solutions.

The simplest, advocated by Dr. Sissela Bok of the Harvard Medical School among others, is just to prohibit late abortions. Taking into account the possible errors in estimating gestational age, she argues, the cutoff should be set well before the earliest gestational age at which infants are surviving.

Using exactly this reasoning, several European countries—France and Sweden, for example—have made abortions readily available in the first three months of pregnancy but very difficult to get thereafter. The British, at the urging of Sir John Peel, an influential physician-statesman, have considered in each of the last three years moving the cutoff date from 28 weeks to 20 weeks, but so far have not done so.

But in this country, the Supreme Court has applied a different logic in defining the abortion right, and the groups that won that right would not cheerfully accept a retreat now.

A second approach, advocated by Mrs. Bok and others, is to define the woman's abortion right as being only a right to terminate the pregnancy, not to have the fetus dead. Then if the fetus is born live, it is viewed as a person in its own right, entitled to care appropriate to its condition.

This "progressive" principle is encoded in the policies of many hospitals and the laws of some states, including New York and California. As the record shows, though, in the alarming event of an actual live birth, doctors on the scene may either observe the principle or ignore it.

And the concept even strikes some who do abortions as misguided idealism.

"You have to have a feticidal dose" of saline solution, said Dr. Kerenyi of Mt. Sinai in New York. "It's almost a breach of contract not to. Otherwise, what are you going to do—hand her back a baby having done it questionable damage? I say, if you can't do it, don't do it."

The scenario Kerenyi describes did in fact happen, in March 1978 in Cleveland. A young woman entered Mt. Sinai Hospital there for an abortion. The baby was born live and, after several weeks of intensive care at Rainbow Babies and Childrens Hospital, the child went home—with its mother.

The circumstances were so extraordinary that medical personnel broke the code of confidentiality and discussed the case with friends. Spokeswomen for the two hospitals confirmed the sequence of events. Mother and child returned to Rainbow for checkup when the child was 14 months old, the spokeswoman there said, and both were doing fine.

The mother could not be reached for comment. But a source familiar with the case remembered one detail. "The doctors had a very hard time making her realize she had a child. She kept saying, "But I had an abortion.'"

How Things Sometimes Go Wrong

Of the various ways to perform an abortion after the midpoint of pregnancy, there is only one that never, ever results in live births.

It is D&E (dilatation and evacuation), and not only is it foolproof, but many researchers consider if safer, cheaper and less unpleasant for the patient. However, it is particularly stressful to medical personnel. That is because D&E requires literally cutting the fetus from the womb and, then, reassembling the parts, or at least keeping them all in view, to assure that the abortion is complete.

Ten years ago it was considered reckless to do an abortion with cutting instruments after the first trimester of pregnancy. Now, improved instruments, more skilled practitioners and laminaria—bands of seaweed that expand when moist and are used to gently dilate the cervix, creating an opening through which to extract fetal parts—allow the technique to be used much later.

D&E is being hailed as extending the safe and easy techniques used for first-trimester abortions (cutting or vacuuming out the contents of the womb) well into the second three months of pregnancy. But there are dissenters. Dr. Bernard Nathanson, formerly a top New York City abortionist, now an anti-abortion author and lecturer, says that D&E "is a very dangerous technique in the hands of anyone less than highly skilled."

Besides, D&E puts all the emotional burden on the physician. And there are other techniques that allow the doctor, as one physician put it, to "stick a needle in the [patient's] tummy," then leave the patient to deliver the fetus vaginally as in normal childbirth and nurses to assist and clean up.

These more common methods for abortions after the midpoint of pregnancy use the instillation of either saline solution or prostaglandin. In these procedures, some of the woman's nurturing amniotic fluid is drawn out of the womb by an injection through her belly and is replaced with the abortion-inducing drug. (The amount of fluid in the womb is kept relatively constant to make sure the womb does not rupture.)

The two instillation substances work in different ways. Saline solution poisons the fetus, probably through ingestion, though the process is not completely understood. Usually within six hours, the fetal heartbeat stops. At the same time, the saline induces labor, though supplemental doses of other labor-inducing drugs often are given to speed this effect.

Prostaglandin, on the other hand, is a distillate of the chemical substance that causes muscles to move. It is thought not to affect the fetus directly but instead is potent at inducing labor. Fetal death, if it does occur, is from prematurity and the trauma of passage through the birth canal.

Each substance also has an undesired side effect. Saline, an anti-coagulant that increases bleeding, can make minor bleeding problems more serious and in rare cases even cause death. Prostaglandin, because it causes muscles to contract indiscriminately, was found to cause vomiting and diarrhea in more than half the patients in early tests. Claims that it causes fewer major complications, which made it preferred to saline by many in the mid-1970s, have now been questioned. And the high incidence of live births (40 times more frequent than with saline, according to one study) also has lessened its popularity.

But saline is not foolproof either in preventing live births. Dr. Thomas F. Kerenyi of Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York, the best-known researcher on saline abortions, said most live births result from "errors in technique"—either administering too small a dosage or getting some of it into the wrong part of the womb.

A wrong estimation of gestational age can cause either a saline or prostaglandin abortion to fail. A larger-than-expected fetus might survive the trauma of labor or might reject a dose of saline (or urea, a third instillation substance sometimes used).

And on the basis of physical examination alone, studies show, doctors miss the correct gestational age by two weeks in one case out of five, by four weeks in one case out of 100, and sometimes by more than that. Pregnancies can be dated more exactly by a sonogram, a test that produces an outline image of the fetus in the womb, but because of its cost (about $100) many doctors continue to rely on physical exams.

There is one other abortion technique, hysterotomy, but it is the least desirable of all from several points of view. Because it is invasive surgery (identical to a Caesarean section), it has a much higher rate of complication than do the instillation techniques. Usually done only after attempts to abort with saline have failed, it has the highest incidence of all of live births.

As the infant is lifted from the womb, said one obstetrician, "he is only sleeping, like his mother. She is under anesthesia, and so is he. You want to know how they kill him? They put a towel over his face so he can't breathe. And by the time they get him to the lab he is dead."

Over the years, the chief criterion in choosing between abortion of methods has been safety for the patient. Advocates of D&E contend that bleeding, perforation of the uterus and infection all occur less frequently with D&E than with other methods, Dr. Willard Cates of the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta prefers D&E. Because it can be done—unlike instillation—in the early part of the second trimester, he has said, the need for as many as 80 percent of the very late abortions could be eliminated.

How very late are abortions performed?

His own clinic at Mt. Sinai, Dr. Kerenyi said, screens patients closely to make sure they are not past the legal 24-week limit. But in theory, he said, there is nothing to prevent successful saline abortions from being performed "virtually all the way to birth. At 30 weeks, say, you would just have to draw off and inject that much more of the solution."

Most practitioners who were interviewed say they stop doing D&E at 18 to 22 weeks. But again, there appears to be nothing to prevent the technique from being used much later.

"You can do it, you can do it," an abortionist, who would talk only if not quoted by name, said of D&Es late in pregnancy. "Some son-of-a-bitch misreads a sonogram and sends me a woman 26 weeks. I've done it. You've just got to take your time and be careful. And you're not going to end up with a live birth."

"I Stood By And Watched That Baby Die"

Nurses are the ones who bear the burden of handling the human-looking products of late abortions. And when an unintentional live birth occurs, they are the first to confront the waving of limbs and the gasping.

Reluctant to talk about their experiences, most of those interviewed for this article did not want their names to be published, and out of professional loyalty, they did not even want their hospitals to be named.

They spoke of being deeply troubled by what they have seen of late abortions in American hospitals.

Linda is a nurse in her late 50s in Southern California. Hurrying out of a patient's room one day to dispose of the aborted "tissue" as nurses were taught to think of it, she felt movement. Startled, she looked down, straight into the staring eyes of a live baby.

"It looked right at me," she recalled. "This baby had real big eyes. It looked at you like it was saying. 'Do something—do something.' Those haunting eyes. Oh God, I still remember them."

She rushed the 1½-pound infant to the nursing station. She took the heart rate—80 to 100 beats a minute. She timed the respirations—three to four breaths a minute. She called the doctor.

"I called him because the baby was breathing," Linda said. "It was pink. It had a heartbeat. The doctor told me the baby was not viable and to send it to the lab. I said, 'But it's breathing' and he said, 'It's non-viable, it won't be breathing long—send it to the lab.'"

She did not follow the order. Nor did she have resources at her command to provide any live-saving care. Two hours later the infant died, still at the nursing station, still without medical treatment. It died in a makeshift crib with one hot-water bottle for warmth and an open tube of oxygen blowing near its head.

The nursing supervisor, Linda said had refused to let her put the baby in the nursery, where there was equipment to assist premature babies in distress. "She said to follow the doctor's orders and take it to the lab. I kept it with me at the station. We couldn't do an awful lot for it."

This happened eight years ago, in 1973, but Linda is still upset. "I stood by and watched that baby die without doing a thing," she said. "I have guilt feelings to this day. I feel the baby might have lived had it been properly cared for."

Jane, about 50, is the head floor nurse in an Ohio hospital. She and her fellow nurses successfully petitioned their hospital in 1978 to stop doing late abortions. Twice before that, she witnessed live births after abortions.

She recalls vividly the 16-year-old patient who phoned her mother after her abortion and said in an agonized voice, "Ma, it's out—but Ma, it's alive."

That happened in 1975. Jane still speaks of it bitterly, her eyes flashing anger.

A year earlier Jane saw the second abortion live birth in her experience. "I was called by the patient's roommate," she recalled. "When I got there the baby's head was sticking out and its little tongue was wiggling. Everybody felt they couldn't do anything until they called the doctor. It was a little thing—it only lasted about 15 minutes. But it was alive, and we did nothing. And that was wrong.

It rankles, too, that she was routinely forced to handle dead fetuses, the size and shape of well-formed premature babies.

"Because of my position," she said, "I had to pick them up off the bed and put them in a bottle of formalin [a preservative fluid]. Sometimes you had to have a very large container. Our gynecologists seemed to have a very poor ability to estimate gestational age. Time and again they would say with a straight face, 'This woman is 20 weeks pregnant' when she was actually 26 weeks."

Norma Rojo, about 35, is an obstetrical nurse at Indio Community Hospital in Indio, Calif. She was present the night of May 3, 1980, when a 15-year-old patient delivered a live baby girl after a saline abortion.

"Get rid of it," the patient cried hysterically. "I'm sorry, Mama—get rid of it," she said, the baby alive, kicking and crying, between her legs.

Two weeks earlier the girl had been in a traffic accident that killed four others and had sought the abortion out of fear that her baby might be damaged.

The fetus, which in tests had shown a normal heartbeat of 132 to 136 in the womb, appeared healthy at birth. "She was beautiful," said Mrs. Rojo. "She was pink. There were no physical deformities. She let out a little lusty cry. She lay in a basin put there to catch the stuff. She was waving her arms and legs. You could tell she was making a big effort to live."

The nurses cut the umbilical cord, wrapped the infant in a blanket and took her to the intensive care nursery. She was put in an isolette (a life-support system) within minutes and was given oxygen.

Acting on their own, the nurses had the 1 pound 14 ounce baby transferred six hours later to Loma Linda University Medical Center, one of several hospitals in the Los Angeles area specializing in the care of very small premature infants. Four days later the baby was reported stable but had developed a complication causing hemorrhaging of the brain. Dr. David Deming of Loma Linda said then that its chances were only 50-50. He added, though, that the abortion had done little damage. "I would say there is probably no effect on her from the saline."

Eleven days after birth, the baby died. Family members indicated they were upset by the nurses' effort to save it.

"After this experience," Rojo said, "my friend [another nurse] and I are changed. We realize doctors aren't perfect. . . . I hope this is the last [abortion live birth] I ever see, but if there are any more, we will do the same thing."

A DAY IN THE LIFE OF THE FETUS

(By Sir A. William Liley, M.D., Research professor in perinatal physiology at the Postgraduate School of Obstetrics and Gynaecology, National Women's Hospital, Auckland, New Zealand.)

To anyone who thinks in purely quantitative terms, life before birth occupies a small fragment, a mere 1 percent of our earthly existence. We spend nine months—three-quarters of a year—in the uterus, and our three score years and ten—roughly three-quarters of a century—out of it. However, from a developmental point of view the picture is very different. As everyone knows, we each started life as a single cell. This single cell divided into two, the first generation of cell division; the two cells divided into four, the second generation of cell division; the four cells divided into eight, the third generation of cell division; and so on. And how many such generations of cell division are required to produce the 30 million cells which make up our adult bodies? The answer is about 45. Of these 45 generations of cell multiplication or replication, 8 have occurred by the time we implanted in the wall of our mother's uterus, 30 or nearly two-thirds have occurred by 8 weeks' gestation, 38 have occurred by 28 weeks' gestation, 41 by the time we are born, and the remaining tedious 4 occupy the whole of childhood and adolescence.

In these terms, when we allow that 41 of these 45 generations of cell division have occurred by birth, it is obvious that in developmental terms we spend 90 percent of our lives in utero, and for some sensory and neural structures the percentage is even higher. This factor is of supreme importance in modern obstetrics and perinatology. It emphasizes the critical importance of our health and welfare during the phase which determines so much of our future physical, psychological, and intellectual makeup, when rapidly multiplying cells are so vulnerable to noxious influences.

Even if the drama of the fetus's physical development is accepted, it would still be wrong to accept the classical view that the fetus blindly develops structures in anticipation of life and function to begin at birth. All of the evidence shows that, for whatever structure or system we care to nominate, development of structure and development of function go hand in hand. As the fetus develops structures he uses them, but most important, as a principle of growth such use is necessary for the development of the structure. In technical terms, if a function cannot be served without differentiation of the structure, equally without the stimulus of function, this structure does not differentiate properly anyway.

The most obvious demonstration of these principles is presented by fetal movement and musculoskeletal development. The classical view is well known—at about 16 to 20 weeks of pregnancy the fetus begins some random, aimless kicking movements. In point of fact, the fetus has been moving ever since he had limbs to move, from about the time of mother's second missed period (approximately the eighth gestational week). Since movements are felt not in the insensitive uterus but in the mother's abdominal wall, some 9 to 11 weeks must elapse before the woman is conscious of this movement.

Formerly, direct observation of the fetus was limited to the period beyond some 16 to 20 weeks when the baby's skeleton was opaque enough to be shown on x-rays and image intensifiers. However, we could indirectly recognize fetal activity by dramatic and rapid changes in the axis of the fetal heart on electrocardiographic recordings. Now we can observe such movement directly by ultrasound: making sonographic images by recording the echoes of sound waves.

In early pregnancy, indeed for the first two-thirds of pregnancy, the fetus is under no constraint and has plenty of room to move frequently and freely. In a relatively globular cavity he or she has no axis of stability and can lie in any position. It is only in the last 10 weeks of pregnancy, with rapid fetal growth and a steep decline in amniotic fluid volume, that the fetus is compelled to endure reduced living space. Moreover, by this stage the uterine cavity has a very definite, normally longitudinal, axis and a very definite shape—it is ovoid with the lower pole narrower than the upper pole. Faced with these physical facts the great majority of babies adopt the obvious solution of lying with their long axis in the long axis of the cavity. Furthermore, the baby is now much longer than the uterine cavity and must fold to fit in. As the usual fetal attitude is one of flexion, the majority of babies present head down: the compact head forms a smaller pole than the back, thighs, calves, and feet, and this position corresponds to the shape of the uterine cavity. If, however, the fetus elects to extend his or her legs as some 4 percent of babies do, he or she will present by the breech, since the tapering lower trunk and thighs form a smaller pole than do the head, arms, calves, and feet.

Minor variations of uterine contour, unusual locations of the placenta, and the presence of another baby may all present challenges to fetal comfort and ingenuity. Sometimes in selecting a position of comfort the baby may have chosen one which is difficult or impossible for vaginal delivery. However, babies do not lie in odd positions in late pregnancy to make life difficult for the obstetrician and dangerous for themselves and their mothers, but rather because they are trying to be as comfortable as possible.

If newborn babies are nursed naked in a warm environment, they tend to adopt—especially when asleep—the position of comfort they assumed in utero in late pregnancy. Thus, some babies sleep with their hands cupped under their ears, and the baby whose legs were extended in utero tends to sleep like a safety pin, with a foot over each shoulder.

Maternal movement and change of position, uterine contractions, and external palpation all disturb a baby and provoke fetal movement. How babies change ends in the uterus while they still have room is obvious. They propel themselves around with their legs and feet—usually walking backward—with their heads leading the movement, but occasionally walk around forward with their heads trailing. How they change sides is more subtle: first, they extend and then rotate their heads, then their shoulders, and at last their hips and legs in an elegant longitudinal spiral roll. At the mid-point of their turn they have a 180 degree spiral twist in their spine. Insofar as this is the obvious way to turn over (indeed it is the way you and I would turn over in bed or in a swimming pool), there would be nothing remarkable about it. However, according to textbooks of the development of locomotor function in the newborn or infant, this maneuver is not seen in the neonate but first appears at some 14 to 20 weeks of extrauterine life. Nevertheless, we have seen by x-rays babies moving in this way 16 weeks before birth, and I am sure it will be observed earlier by ultrasound. Hence, the real reason we do not see this behavior in the newborn is not that the baby lacks the neural coordination, the reflex pathways for this feat, but simply that a maneuver which is simple in the prenatal state of neutral buoyancy is initially impossible against the new experience of gravity.

Fetal movement is necessary for the proper development of bones, joints, and muscles. The baby wrapped up compactly with a pathologically low volume of amniotic fluid is born with a wide range of compression deformities and a severe restriction of the range of joint movement. Similar effects occur in the baby with a congenital absence of muscle or degeneration of spinal motor neurons, in which case the long bones are extremely slender, and appearance formerly common in victims of paralytic poliomyelitis.

Clinically, fetal responsiveness to touch and pressure was a nuisance with some earlier models of heart-rate monitors and pressure recorders which required bulky instruments to be strapped firmly to the mother's abdomen. The fetus would purposefully and repeatedly move to avoid the sustained pressure or a recording instrument. Equally, fetal responsiveness is an advantage when for some diagnostic or therapeutic procedures we want a fetus to change its position a little. Continuous gentle pressure with fingertips or a knuckle provides the necessary persuasion.

The fetus responds violently to needle puncture or the injection of cold or concentrated solutions, stimuli which you and I agree are painful, children will describe as painful, and the newborn, to judge by his or her responses, finds painful. However, I have been told by advocates of abortion that we have no proof that the fetus actually feels pain. Strictly speaking, of course, they are quite correct: these is no biochemical or physiological test to tell if anyone is in pain. Pain is a peculiarly subjective and personal phenomenon, a feature which makes it very easy to bear other people's pain stoically—an important point for doctors in general and obstetricians in particular to remember. By the same reasoning we have no proof that animals feel pain, through it would seem reasonable to assume from their responses that they do. Indeed, without this assumption there would be no point in having organizations for the prevention of cruelty to animals, and I for one would be concerned that a charitable consideration we were prepared to extend to animals should be withheld from our own unborn.

It seems probable that labor and delivery are painful experiences for some babies. X-ray films taken during labor contractions show fetal limbs flailing, although this activity is not apparent to the mother or observers through a firmly contracted uterus. However, the tail end of this fetal protest is often apparent as a contraction wanes and the uterus relaxes. Similarly, of one attempts to reproduce by gentle manual compression a mere fraction of the overlap of fetal skull bones which can occur in the course of a single contraction, the newborn child protests violently. And yet it is an interesting measure of the manner in which we adults can selfishly view the world when we consider the general disregard of an infant's cries as signals of real distress.

Contrary to traditional view, the inside of a uterus in not entirely dark and certainly not silent. Light and sound reach the fetus, and his or her responses to external light and sound stimuli may be recorded as increased movement, heart rate changes, or as electroencephalographic waves. Both habituation, the fetus's eventual nonresponsiveness to repeated signals, and conditioning, the phenomenon whereby the fetus can be alerted by a first signal to anticipate a second different one, have been demonstrated.

Apart from special circumstances like close-up flash photography of the pregnant abdomen or a naked abdomen in sunshine, normal in utero light levels are very low and shifted far to the red end of the spectrum. In this situation, the fetus is using only his or her crude low-light intensity or rod vision; both light intensity and images are needed to practice macular or cone vision. By contrast, the fetus has been exposed to sound stimuli much richer in pattern and meaning and it is therefore not surprising that the newborn can discriminate among quite a range of phonetic values. External sound reaches the fetus, provided it is of sufficient intensity to survive the attenuation through maternal tissues. In practice, this means it must be higher than 75 to 80 decibels. Audiometric curves may be obtained from the fetus to reassure mothers, in particular deaf-mute mothers, that their babies can hear, although the variableness of fetal wakefulness and attention span naturally make such recording sessions rather protracted.

But it is not only external sound which bombards the fetus, since the uterus is a very noisy place. The loudest sounds to reach the fetus are the erratic gurgles of gas in maternal intestines. These peak at 85 to 90 decibels—about the intensity of traffic noises in a busy street. At and below 60 decibels two other and more interesting sounds occur—the maternal voice and the all-pervading blood pulses which are in synchrony with the maternal heartbeat through the great vessels supplying the uterus and placental bed.

The baby is accomplished at swallowing by birth; this is hardly surprising when we know that it has been drinking its amniotic fluid in phasic pattern from at least as early as eight weeks' gestation. Fetal swallowing contributes to fetal nutrition, and the fetus who for anatomical reasons cannot swallow in utero is born with a reduced birth weight. In late pregnancy, the fetal swallowing rate shows a fascinating variation from as low as 5 ml per hour to as high as 70 and occasionally 100 ml per hour.

Generally speaking, large, well-nourished babies swallow at a high rate and small, undernourished babies at a low rate although there are interesting exceptions to this rule. More consistent and interesting is the good correlation between fetal swallowing rates and independently assessed feeding performance in the newborn. The fast drinkers in utero are the same in the nursery; the slow drinkers in utero are dainty, tedious feeders in the nursery.

Some babies are also veteran thumb suckers by birth. As part of the neurological examination of the newborn, if the area around the mouth is stroked the baby turns its head to the side of the stimulus and opens its mouth. This reflex, which is known in American as the "rooting" reflex and in English as the "seeking" reflex, is clearly the mechanism by which the baby homes in on the nipple. As it is very common in utero for babies to lie with hands and sometimes feet close to their faces, it is not surprising that the fetus should elicit this reflex itself. Hence, it is not uncommon on prenatal x-rays to spot babies sucking thumbs, fingers (often two fingers), and occasionally toes. We have observed thumb-sucking as early as 24 weeks on x-rays and it has been photographed in the 9-week abortus. It is not surprising that parents may find this a difficult habit to break when the baby has had so much start and practice.

Fetal hiccups are a common and interesting phenomenon. They occur at a rate of some 14 to 20 per minute, in episodes which may last from half a minute to over half an hour. Many women have noticed these series of small, regular, jerky movements. Some have wondered what they were, a few have correctly guessed what they were, while others have been rather uneasy especially if there is an epileptic in the family tree. Worriers should be reassured because although fetal convulsions can occur, they appear to be exceptionally rare. On the other hand, fetal hiccups are very common. We suspect they are related to episodes of fetal swallowing, because the baby who hiccups in utero hiccups as a neonate usually and sometimes only after feedings. Fetal hiccupping episodes are few in the morning and show an interesting peak in the late afternoon and early evening.

A similar daily pattern is shown by episodes of so-called fetal breathing—the exercise that the baby performs with its main respiratory muscle, the diaphragm, before birth. These movements have a higher frequency than hiccups, usually some 40 to 70 per minute. Like any respiratory movements, they are affected by a number of influences, especially carbon dioxide concentration.

Variation of fetal movement is shown throughout the day, but the occurrence of hiccups is about 30 percent more frequent at night. The number of episodes per day of fetal hiccups, "breathing," and movement are similar, however, in showing a decline in the last few weeks of pregnancy. The reduced number of movements is balanced by each movement's taking longer to complete, so that in late pregnancy the baby actually spends about the same proportion of time moving as earlier.

That fetal hiccups, "breathing," and movement episodes are not uniformly distributed around the clock is an important observation: it shows that the fetus has already acquired some diurnal or circadian rhythms. That circadian rhythms are acquired and related to activity cycles is indicated by inhabitants of fishing villages whose lives revolve around the tides: their rhythms are lunar not solar, in periodicity. The fetus demonstrates several such rhythms, which shows that he or she is not indifferent to the world outside the uterus, and that his or her cycles are probably determined by the mother's activity and metabolic cycles.

This, then, is the fetus we know and care for in modern medicine. It is also the fetus we each once were ourselves. The picture has been built up of small pieces; even if we still could fit in many more pieces, the overall image is clear enough. We were not placid, dependent, fragile, nerveless vegetables who lied in a metabolic nirvana and a state of sensory deprivation.

We did not blindly develop structures in anticipation of a life and function to begin at birth, either: development of structure and development of function went hand in hand. We were active and reactive. The uterus filtered, buffered, and somewhat distorted the outside world but did not completely block it off. It is a truism to say that we are all the products of nature and nurture, but this is a truth not restricted to extrauterine life. At birth, we are the products of our nature, our genetic endowment, our nurture—our intrauterine environment.

L.A. CORONER, D.A. OFFICE BROUGHT IN—INVESTIGATION UNDERWAY INTO STORAGE OF 1,000 ABORTED FETUSES

(By Nick Thimmesch)

When I became acquainted with the pro-life movement in 1973, I was struck with how diverse its people were, and how they showed single-minded determination in fighting the consequences of the infamous Roe v. Wade decision. There were Protestants, Catholics, Jews, and non-believers in the movement. There were whites, blacks, browns, Indians, and Asian-Americans.

There were rich, poor and earnest Middle Class, Democrats, Republicans, Independents, Libertarians, young and old. In those days there were no computerized high-speed mailing lists, or fussy debates over the relative virtues of, say, a Helms bill or a Hatch amendment.

After I published "The Abortion Culture" in Newsweek, I was startled with the enthusiastic response from prolifers. They were desperate for any sign that anybody in the media cared, and they were hoping for any move to undo the Supreme Court's wrongdoing.

In the nine years since, the relatively small numbers of prolife activists achieved some remarkable successes, given the widespread, mainstream indifference toward abortion on demand. The establishment of the Hyde Amendment, the election of state legislators, U.S. Congressmen, and two presidents who expressed agreement with prolife goals, and an increasing public awareness of issues focusing on the value of human life—well, that's quite a record.

But people are people. Through history, those in serious, spirited movements inevitably quarrel over tactics and approaches.

It is no different in the prolife movement than it was, say, in the American revolution, or during the antislavery crusade. In recent months, in debating merits of legislation to stop abortion, prolifers have called each other names they usually reserve for the ardent pro-abortionists.

Distressed over the wrangling, I knew it was clear that we all need to be reminded of what this movement was all about.

On Feb. 4, a ghastly discovery in a backyard in Woodland Hills, California, provided the sorbering reminder. It was there that workmen, routinely dispatched to repossess a large, steel storage container, became upset and even ill from what they found.

Empty, the container weighs 4,000 pounds, but this one came in at 11,000. The workmen struggled to get it onto the back of their truck, even breaking a winch in the process.

What were its heavy contents?

They opened the container, found boxes which they also opened, and suddenly, small parts of a tiny human body fell out. It was one of 1,000 fetuses in the custody of Melvin R. Weisberg, 33, who had leased the container from the Martin Container Company.

The men went back to their boss, Nick Martin, and told him they couldn't clean out the container. One man said it smelled like a cesspool.

The forklift operator admitted that he was frightened. "It was nothing that anybody's ever seen before," he said. "It was sick, whoever did it."

Martin went to see for himself. He became disgusted. "They say they're just fetuses," he said, "but they sure looked like humans to me."

Now 1,000 unborn don't weigh 7,000 pounds, even when they are suspended in formaldehyde in plastic containers. No, the unborn were in the company of specimens of medical "waste"—cancerous growths from operations, "pap smears," other pathology lab specimens, and hundreds of printed medical records.

Some of the unborn were egg size, some were as large as four to five pounds, meaning they could have been the results of prohibited late abortions. The larger ones were in one-gallon containers; the smaller ones in jars marked "dentures."

This grisly collection of snuffed out human lives and medical "waste" was supposed to be analysed and identified by Weisberg, who had operated a pathology lab in Santa Monica. But Weisberg had gone broke, closed the business, and stored his inventory in Nick Martin's big, black container.

Weisberg had received the specimens from doctors, clinics and hospitals in half a dozen states. The labels indicated that some had been in storage since 1979.

The first reporter on the scene noted that some containers came from Planned Parenthood organizations in Missouri and California. When I called the national offices of Planned Parenthood about this, I was told that affiliates in several states had shipped Weisberg pap smears for analysis, but never fetal material. According to the Planned Parenthood's New York headquarters, one of its Minnesota facilities sued Weisberg because he never performed the promised services on the smears.

As far as Planned Parenthood is concerned, the unborn and stillborn are all medical waste, and should be dispatched with the aid of a pathology lab of the kind Weisberg ran. This clinical mentality was also expressed by the assistant coroner commenting on the "find" in Woodland Hills.

"There is no evidence of foul play," proclaimed Richard Wilson, "but there could be violations of the health code covering the disposal of medical waste."

In a way, this response is not surprising. All across America, the unborn killed in abortions are pretty much regarded as medical "waste." A spokesman for D.C. General Hospital, for example, told me that aborted babies are regarded as surgical specimens, and are incinerated with the garbage within three weeks after the abortion.

This is the same D.C. General where employees once actually sold the organs of dead babies. In 1976, it was revealed that staffers in the hospital's pathology department collected more than $68,000 from commercial firms for organs of stillborn and dead premature babies, including some from "late-term elective abortions."

A hospital official later admitted that the money earned from this commerce was used to buy a TV set for the lounge, to cover expenses for physicians attending conventions, and for soft drinks and cookies for visiting professors. It was all very tidy.

At George Washington University hospital, where President Reagan's life was saved last year, no reports of such sales, but a slightly different policy on disposal of aborted babies. At G.W.U., the aborted unborn under 20 weeks are cremated, in the words of a spokesman, "like an amputated part."

Aborted babies over 20 weeks, I was told, "are regarded as adults, and a death certificate is issued. The mother can then elect cremation or burial for the fetus."

In California, where the Los Angeles District Attorney is pondering aspects of the "find" in Weisberg's backyard, bodies and body parts must be buried in a cemetery or cremated. Moreover, California law prohibits abortion after 20 weeks, though this law hasn't been tested. The coroner impounded all of the Weisberg material, and is conducting special tests on 31 of the fetuses which are described as weighing four pounds or more, therefore 20–27 weeks, and viable.

The District Attorney is also wrestling with the question of ownership of the fetuses. Do they belong to the mothers, to the abortion clinics or hospitals from where they were shipped, or to Weisberg, their custodian?

Weisberg met with an assistant to the Los Angeles District Attorney's office last week, an event which the Los Angeles Times had breathlessly described as "Secret Meeting Set in Fetus Discovery Case." Little of the mess was untangled, and more meetings will be held. My, oh my.

Meanwhile, a group of Right to Life organizations in California have announced that it would like to claim the 1,000 unborn babies' bodies in order to bury the dead babies in an ecumenical burial service. The Los Angeles Diocese of the Catholic Church is willing to furnish a plot large enough to bury the bodies in Holy Cross cemetery. Several mortuaries have volunteered to assist the coalition in preparing the bodies.

The Rev. Donald P. Shoemaker, a Protestant minister who is on the faculty at Viola University, says he is organizing a group of clergymen including a priest, a rabbi and ministers, to conduct a non-sectarian burial service. This group has been promised by Los Angeles County Assemblyman Mike Antonivitch that he will make sure the bodies are not incinerated and are kept for burial.

Such is life and death in California, and for that matter, everywhere in the Western world which seems to be on an anti-life binge. There is so much for prolifers to do besides debate politics or the Hatch amendment.

For example, with at least 1.3 million abortions performed annually in the U.S. and millions more in the rest of the world, there is no shortage of unborn (fetal material?) for experimentation and commercial use. The Paris law journal, "Gazette du Palais," recently reported that guards at the Swiss-French border intercepted a truckload of frozen human fetuses destined for cosmetic laboratories in France.

Indeed, there is all manner of advertising these days for the magic of collagen, a gelatinous substance found in connective tissue, bone, and cartilage of fetuses and nonhuman animals. There is no suspicion that human fetal material may be used for this purpose.

Moreover, prolifers should know there is a good deal of experimentation by doctors and drug companies with unborn children destined to be aborted. The Arizona Republic in Phoenix reported last March that E.R. Squibb and Sons Laboratories was involved in an experiment utilizing unborn fetuses which would be aborted. There are countless cases where the National Institute of Health sponsored non-therapeutic experimentation on previable infants—unborn children. At one point, the government even approved such experimentation on an ethical basis.

And there is more.

What to say of the burgeoning genetic engineering business, corporations producing "life" organisms, experimenting with them, and then killing them? In vitro fertilization, use of frozen embryos, the widespread practice of amniocentesis—all raise questions right up the alley of prolifers.

How appalling to learn about the "find" in Woodward Hills, California, but it's just as appalling to read how doctors walk away from freshborn but deformed babies, so they can die. And how about the young father who wanted to decide whether to have his wife abort their child so he could use the unborn's kidneys for a transplant he desperately needed?

There is no end to it in our time. It clears the head to encounter such grisly, subhuman experience in a world which calls itself enlightened, sophisticated and industrially advanced.

With or without laws and amendments—and I agree with Cong. Henry Hyde who cosponsors all of them—people concerned with the value of human life in all of its stages will have plenty to do. Cain left his mark for all of us to deal with.

LATE ABORTION STATISTICS

It comes as no surprise that more people oppose late abortions than early ones. Indeed, many people believe that late abortions are still illegal, or, where they are permitted, it is due to indifference on the part of the state legislature. Even when they are informed that late abortions are legal everywhere in the U.S. and are beyond the reach of any legislature, skeptics will still reply that abortions are rarely, if ever, performed after viability. While it is certainly true that a very small proportion of all abortions occur after 20 weeks gestation, it is also true that a very small proportion of the postnatal deaths in the U.S. are homicides, yet we properly give these considerable attention.

The word "late" needs a precise definition, but there is no common agreement on its meaning in this context. Since babies have been born at 20 weeks and have subsequently developed normally, it is not unreasonable to begin a table at 21 weeks and to let the reader decide from there.

The following table was constructed using data supplied by the U.S. Dept. of Health, Center for Disease Control, in Atlanta. However, only eight states (Illinois, Kansas, Nebraska, New York, (excluding New York City), Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Vermont) report abortions by single week of gestation. Since Chicago is the only large city included in this group of states, the simple extrapolation methods which I used to estimate the totals for the entire U.S. probably underestimate the actual figures. After all, a late abortion is a dangerous operation which is not socially acceptable in most circles. Big cities offer better facilities and greater anonymity. Further, the reported figures show unmistakable signs of underreporting of the gestational age. For example, the eight states reported hundreds of abortions after one week, i.e., prior to conception itself. (Gestation is measured from the last day of the last menstrual period.) The figures are for 1978, the latest available.

THE NOBEL LECTURE

(By Mother Teresa)

It is not enough for us to say: I love God, but I do not love my neighbor. St. John says you are a liar if you say you love God and you don't love your neighbor. How can you love God whom you do not see, if you do not love your neighbor whom you see, whom you touch, with whom you live? And so this is very important for us to realize that love, to be true, has to hurt.

It hurt Jesus to love us. It hurt him. And to make sure we remember his great love, he made himself bread of life to satisfy our hunger for his love. Our hunger for God, because we have been created for that love. We have been created in his image. We have been created to love and be loved, and then he has become man to make it possible for us to love as he loved us. He makes himself the hungry one, the naked one, the homeless one, the sick one, the one in prison, the lonely one, the unwanted one, and he says: You did it to me. Hungry for our love, and this is the hunger of our poor people. This is the hunger that you and I must find. It may be in your own home.

I never forget an opportunity I had in visiting a home where they had all these old parents of sons and daughters who had just put them in an institution and forgotten, maybe. And I went there, and I saw in that home they had everything, beautiful things, but everybody was looking towards the door. And I did not see a single one with their smile on their face. And I turned to the sister and I asked: How is that? How is it that the people they have everything here, why are they all looking toward the door? Why are they not smiling?

I am so used to see the smile on our people, even the dying one smile. And she said: This is nearly every day. They are expecting, they are hoping that a son or daughter will come to visit them. They are hurt because they are forgotten. And see—this is where love comes. That poverty comes right there in our own home, even neglect to love. Maybe in our own family we have somebody who is feeling lonely, who is feeling sick, who is feeling worried, and these are difficult days for everybody. Are we there? Are we there to receive them? Is the mother there to receive the child?

I was surprised in the waste to see so many young boys and girls given into drugs. And I tried to find out why. Why is it like that? And the answer was: Because there is none in the family to receive them. Father and mother are so busy they have no time. Young parents are in some institution and the child takes back to the street and gets involved in something. We are talking of peace. These are things that break peace.

But I feel the greatest destroyer of peace today is abortion, because it is a direct war, a direct killing, direct murder by the mother herself. And we read in the scripture, for God says very clearly. Even if a mother could forget her child, I will not forget you. I have curved you in the palm of my hand. We are curved in the palm of his hand: so close to him, that unborn child has been curved in the hand of God. And that is what strikes me most, the beginning of that sentence, that even if a mother could forget something impossible—but even if she would forget—I will not forget you.

And today the greatest means, the greatest destroyer of peace is abortion. And we who are standing here—our parents wanted us. We would not be here if our parents would do that to us.

Or children, we want them, we love them. But what of the millions? Many people are very, very concerned with the children of India, with the children of Africa where quite a number die, maybe of malnutrition, of hunger and so on, but millions are dying deliberately by the will of the mother. And this is what is the greatest destroyer of peace today. Because if a mother can kill her own child, what is left for me to kill you and you to kill me? There is nothing between.

And this I appeal in India, I appeal everywhere: Let us bring the child back, and this year being the child's year: What have we done for the child? At the beginning of the year I told, I spoke everywhere and I said: Let us make this year that we make every single child born, and unborn, wanted. And today is the end of the year. Have we really made the children wanted?

I will give you something terrifying. We are fighting abortion by adoption. We have saved thousands of lives. We have sent words to all the clinics, to the hospitals, police stations: please don't destroy the child; we will take the child. So every hour of the day and night it is always somebody—we have quite a number of unwedded mothers—tell them come, we will take care of you, we will take the child from you, and we will get a home for the child. And we have a tremendous demand for families who have no children, that is the blessing of God for us. And also, we are doing another thing which is very beautiful. We are teaching our beggars, our leprosy patients, our slum dwellers, our people of the street, natural family planning.

And in Calcutta alone in six years—it is all in Calcutta—we have had 61,273 babies less from the families who would have had, but because they practice this natural way of abstaining, of self-control, out of love for each other. We teach them the temperature meter, which is very beautiful, very simple. And our poor people understand. And you know what they have told me? Our family is healthy, our family is united, and we can have a baby when ever we want. So clear—those people in the street, those beggars—and I think that if our people can do like that how much more you and all the others who can know the ways and means without destroying the life that God has created in us.

The poor people are very great people. They can teach us so many beautiful things. The other day one of them came to thank, and said: You people who have evolved chastity, you are the best people to teach us family planning. Because it is nothing more than self-control out of love for each other. And I think they said a beautiful sentence. And these are people who maybe have nothing to eat, maybe they have not a home where to live, but they are great people.

The poor are very wonderful people. One evening we went out and we picked up four people from the street. And one of them was in a most terrible condition. And I told the sisters: You take care of the other there; I take care of this one that looked worse. So I did for her all that my love can do. I put her in a bed and there was such a beautiful smile on her face. She took hold of my hand, as she said one word only: thank you—and she died.

I could not help but examine my conscience before her. And I asked: What would I say if I was in her place? And my answer was very simple. I would have tried to draw a little attention to myself. I would have said I am hungry, that I am dying, I am cold, I am in pain or something. But she gave me much more—she gave me her grateful love. And she died with a smile on her face—as that man whom we picked from the drain, half eaten with worms, and we brought him to the home. I have lived like an animal in the street, but I am going to die like an angel, loved and cared for. And it was so wonderful to see the greatness of that man who could speak like that, who could die like that without blaming anybody, without cursing anybody, without comparing anything. Like an angel—this is the greatness of our people.

And that is why we believe what Jesus has said: I was hungry, I was naked, I was homeless; I was unwanted, unloved, uncared for—and you did it to me.

ABORTION AND PUBLIC OPINION

Public opinion polls have often been cited to support stances both for and against legalized abortion. These polls have not always given reliable or consistent information because of differences in sampling, in the phraseology of questions, and in the respondents' level of knowledge on the issues. Such problems, of course, are common in public opinion polls taken on any complex issue.

The abortion issue, however, also carries with it special complications: both sides in the dispute claim that the issue is a matter of fundamental right and therefore that the vagaries of public opinion are inadequate to express the full significance of the issue. Opponents of abortion further point out that one of the two entities most intimately involved in every abortion procedure—the unborn child—is unable to express his or her viewpoint on public policy regarding abortion. Advocates of the abortion right point out in response that the Supreme Court has treated the issue in terms of a woman's constitutional "right of privacy" and claim that the views of women should be accorded special weight regarding an issue which men do not confront in the same manner.

But even here, some knowledge of public opinion may be of help, not in assessing the objective validity of either claim, but in assessing whether most Americans would consider either as valid. Some polls, for example, suggest that, to the extent differences exist on matters of abortion policy between the sexes, women may be even more protective of the rights of the unborn than men. Women consistently place the point at which "human life begins" at an earlier stage than do men and may be even more opposed to legalized abortion than are men.[1] In fact, the very groups that are often viewed as "under-represented" within our political system, i.e., women, racial minorities, the poor, are more opposed to abortion than the rest of the population, according to many public opinion polls.[2] Concomitantly, those groups best represented within this system may be disproportionately supportive of the Roe-spawned abortion right. According to a recent poll conducted by the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, only 29 percent of the "political leaders" within the United States considered abortion as "morally wrong" as opposed to 65 percent of the general population.[3]

Within the limits of these polls, several general observations can be made about public opinion and abortion. Professor Adamek testified on a number of these before the Subcommittee.[4] Despite differences in the wording of questions and the span of time over which the various polls were taken, Professor Adamek has identified certain patterns of response which are relatively consistent.

1. Neither the opponents of all abortion nor the advocates of unrestricted abortion can claim agreement with the majority of the American people. The population can be divided roughly into three groups: those who oppose legalized abortion in virtually all circumstances (perhaps 22%); the "middle majority" which opposes legalized abortion except for certain "hard cases" such as serious endangerment to the mother's health, rape or incest, and likelihood of serious defect in the baby (about 55%); and those who want abortion to remain legal in all circumstances (about 23%).[5]

2. Support for legalized abortion deteriorates significantly as soon as one speaks of abortion after the first trimester. There is no majority support for abortion under any circumstances after this point, except in the case of danger to the mother's life.[6]

3. Support also deteriorates as soon as one speaks in terms of specifics instead of vague generalities. For instances, one Gallup poll showed 64% support for the proposition that "the decision to have an abortion should be made solely by a woman and her physician", but another Gallup poll taken in the same year showed only 24% support for the proposition that a woman should be "able to get an abortion without her husband's consent."[7] (This kind of discrepancy occurs even within the membership of the major "abortion rights" groups: for instance, a poll of members of the National Abortion Rights Action League, not cited by Adamek, show 85% support for legalized abortion in all circumstances, but only 58% support for legalized abortion when the child is not of the preferred sex. Some legal abortions are already being performed for this reason, according to the news media.)[8]

4. Polls seeming to indicate majority approval of the Supreme Court's abortion decisions have been flawed in several respects. By keeping to vague generalities, by wording the question in a misleading or euphemistic way, and by misrepresenting the Court's decision as legalizing abortion only during the first trimester, these polls obscure the fact that the majority of Americans approve of legalization only in cases which constitute less than 5% of the abortions now performed legally in the United States.[9]

5. There is serious disagreement between the Supreme Court and the American people on the question of "when life begins" as well as on the question of when the unborn may be considered as a "human person." As mentioned above, disagreement with the effect of the Court's decision is significantly stronger among women than among men. Three polls taken in 1981, for example, indicate that a majority of the public believes that human life begins within the first trimester of pregnancy, while only 5 to 17% believes it begins at birth. A poll reported by Judith Blake in 1977 shows only 18% of men and 8% of women adopting the stance that human personhood begins at birth, while 33% of the men and 51% of the women believe that it is present at conception.[10]

A recent study by Judith Blake and Jorge Del Pinal of the University of California, based on the findings of 18 public opinion polls taken from 1965 to 1980, lends support to Adamek's most important conclusions.[11] This study also found that most Americans fall into the "middle" category, disapproving of unrestricted abortion but approving of legalization in certain rare circumstances. This study reached two additional conclusions which are of special significance for the debate over attempts to reverse the Supreme Court abortion decisions:

1. Even among the minority which supports abortion on demand, there is little support for the full extent of the Supreme Court's decisions or for the full agenda of the "prochoice" movement. This group shows no strong support for the Federal funding of abortion, for abortion without the husband's consent, or for abortion after the first trimester.[12]

2. People in the large "middle" group are "markedly more similar to respondents who are negative toward abortion than to those who are positive" when one analyzes their background characteristics and attitudes toward related issues. Abortion thus appears to take its place "at the end of a long line of issues on which 'policy' has run far ahead of the nation's will to execute."[13]

Further support for these conclusions has recently come from a somewhat unexpected source. Jeannie Rosoff, president of the Alan Guttmacher Institute which conducts research for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, recently announced at a Planned Parenthood public impact seminar that the American people support legalized abortion only in the rare "hard cases" and that it is becoming difficult to ignore "people's genuine discomfort at the number of abortions" currently performed in the United States.[14] Most of these abortions, Rosoff noted, are performed for social, economic, age, or lifestyle reasons, and "support dwindles very, very rapidly" as soon as these are presented as justifications for a legal abortion.

Feelings on public policy regarding abortion do seem to translate into support for specific proposals designed to reverse the Supreme Court's abortion decisions. In a poll conducted by DeVries & Associates in November and December of 1974, only 25.1 percent elected to let the decisions stand; 32.8 percent thought that Congress should reverse the decision and make abortions illegal either in all circumstances or except to save the life of the mother; and 39.5 percent favored a somewhat lower level of constitutional protection for the unborn, either by having Congress make abortions illegal except in specific cases determined by law or by restoring the authority to make abortion laws to the States. Opposition to the Supreme Court's decisions is slightly higher now than in 1974, so support for these proposals would now presumably be somewhat stronger than it was in 1974.[15] If the analyses of Blake and Adamek are correct, even many of the people who claimed to support the 1973 Supreme Court decision in this 1974 poll would favor more restrictions on abortion than are currently provided for under these decisions and their progeny.

More recently, three polling organizations asked Americans whether they would support legislation that would or might make all abortions "murder." Support for such a measure ranged from 29 percent to 42 percent—apparently indicating that some in the "middle majority" will side with the anti-abortion stance even when presented in its most extreme form, if they are asked to choose between this and the present state of affairs.[16]

In order to appreciate the full significance of these findings for the proposed amendment it is necessary to understand how flexible the provisions of this amendment are. It would be difficult to see how public opinion could be cited as evidence against the proposed amendment, when its precise objective is to allow public policy to keep pace with public opinion through the democratic process. One study conducted by Market Opinion Research and the National Abortion Rights Action League, however, claims that "over half the voters interviewed believe that abortion is not an issue in which government at any level should be involved", with the implied claim that government is not presently involved in the abortion issue and that passage of a constitutional amendment would initiate this unwanted involvement.[17] But the legal reality, and the reason why opposition to the Supreme Court's abortion decisions has been so strong and persistent, is that these decisions press government at its most fundamental constitutional level into the service of abortion. Abortion has been singled out for special treatment by the Federal courts, to the extent that health regulations and consent requirements deemed appropriate for medical procedures of similar hazards and complexity are ruled unconstitutional in the case of a first-trimester abortion.[18] If complete absence of government involvement in this issue were really desired, this could be achieved by ratifying S.J. Res. 110 and then failing to enact any penal legislation on the matter; for under such circumstances, abortion would be neither a crime nor a constitutional right. Groups advocating legalized abortion seem to consider this as an unlikely scenario, apparently indicating a perception that the majority of Americans actually do want substantial restrictions placed on access to abortion.

If it is true, as some have claimed, that a constitutional amendment should memorialize a consensus instead of trying to create one,[19] S.J. Res. 110 has the potential for reflecting the American consensus on abortion much more accurately than the Constitution as currently interpreted by the Supreme Court does. It is true that some supporters of this measure see it as an opportunity to work toward a more complete national consensus against legalized abortion; but the amendment itself does not require such a result, and allows groups favoring abortion to conduct the same kind of lobbying efforts toward their own goal of unrestricted abortion. Indeed, the obvious fact that it is easier to block controversial legislation than to enact such would seem to give the advantage to the latter groups, if they do in fact represent the majority of the American public. Whatever the final consensus on the substantive issues involved, it would be more likely to garner public respect if it were reached through the democratic process instead of being imposed upon the public by a small number of appointed judges on the basis of highly controversial constitutional arguments. I have heard no testimony showing that respect for the Supreme Court or for Congress is likely to be boosted by Congressional refusal to report out a proposal allowing the American public to express its opinion on the matter.

FOOTNOTES

[2] This is the consistent finding of all polls which distinguish among these groups. For example, the ABC News/Washington Post poll taken in 1981 showed that almost one-third of those strongly opposing legalized abortion earn under $12,000 a year, with only 10 percent earning 30,000 or more, and that nearly one-quarter are black. More than one-quarter of those supporting legalized abortion earn $30,000 or more. Annual abortion polls taken by the National Opinion Research Center have consistently shown that black Americans are strongly opposed to abortion on demand and some have even suggested that they are more opposed to legalized abortion than Catholics are. See Andrew M. Greeley, "Black Stand on Abortion," in the New York Daily News, March 12, 1978. It seems clear that the issue of religion has often been overemphasized in the debate on abortion policy. Although some differences in survey responses seem traceable to denominational differences, intensity of church involvement and commitment to a traditional personal morality seem to be much more strongly associated with opposition to abortion than is any particular denominational affiliation. See: ABC News/Washington Post poll of 1981; Gallup polls at 1975 and 1977. This result is quite understandable in light of the fact that major Western religious denominations condemned abortion almost unanimously until recent years. See on this issue generally Grisez, Abortion: The Myths, the Realities, and the Agruments (1970), Chapter IV; J. Noonan. A Private Choice, 53-63; New Perspectives, Chapters 25-27. The U.S. Supreme Court, despite its strong commitment to the "right" of abortion, has never accepted the view that abortion restrictions violate the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment. See Harris v. McRae, 100 S. Ct. 2671 at 2689 (1980).

[3] This finding was reported in the Wall Street Journal, May 15, 1981. The same poll found the socio-demographic correlations that other polls have reported: Moral opposition to abortion is strongest among women, the poor, and racial minorities.

[4] The data analyzed include results from the National Opinion Research Center for 1972 to 1980, the Gallup Opinion Index for 1972 to 1981, and individual polls conducted by Judith Blake, ABC News/Washington Post, and CBS News/New York Times, as well as prior analyses of poll data by Blake, Donald Granberg and other sociologists. A useful summary of the issue of public opinion on abortion is contained in Duggan, "Abortion and the Opinion Polls", Supplement to Catholic League Newsletter, Vol. 8, #6.

[5] The major source for this finding is a series of five Gallup polls taken from 1975 to 1981. Similar results have been obtained by the National Opinion Research Center in eight polls taken from 1972 to 1980. See Adamek, tables 2 through 4. An ABC News/Washington Post poll taken in 1981 showed 40 percent who "generally speaking" agreed that a woman should be able to get an abortion if she wants one, but these respondents were not asked whether they supported legalized abortion in all circumstances. The 60 percent who disagreed with the statement were generally found to favor legalization only in certain rare circumstances, and this only in the first trimester. Earlier in the same poll the public's feelings about "right to life group", and "pro-choice" groups was elicited: 71 percent had heard about "the right to life" and a majority of these claimed to agree with this group's position on abortion, while only 24 percent had heard of "the pro-choice group", and 46 percent of these claimed to agree with its position on abortion. These findings do not seem to contradict those of NORC and Gallup; they are consistent with the claim that support for abortion "generally speaking" deteriorates rapidly as soon as particular circumstances are mentioned.

[7] See Adamek, table 1. In any event, the idea that abortion decisions are currently made by "a woman and her physician" has been called a "myth" by many physicians. As Bernard Nathanson, an obstetrician and gynecologist who helped found the National Abortion Rights Action League, testified, "In virtually every instance when a woman presents herself to the doctor her mind is already made up, and the doctor is nothing more than the instrument of her will. In that there are only very few medical reasons for abortion, the vast majority of abortions are decided upon for financial, emotional or situational reasons. There is no physician input into the decision-making process in permissive abortion." Senate Hearings, October 14, 1981, Dr. Bernard Nathanson, Obstetrician and Gynecologist, St. Luke's-Roosevelt Hospital; Assistant Clinical Professor, Cornell University the author of an important work tracing his evolution on this issue, B. Nathanson with R. Ostling, Aborting America (1979).

[8] For the opinion survey of National Abortion Rights Action League members, see Granberg, "The Abortion Activists," in Family Planning Perspectives, July/August 1981, at 163. Under current constitutional law, a third-trimester abortion performed for purposes of sex selection is legal, and requires only that the physician performing the abortion believe that the birth of a child of the "wrong" sex might adversely affect the mother's "well-being." This issue was recently debated on the PBS television program "Boy or Girl: Should the Choice be Ours?, which was first aired in January of 1981 as part of a six-part series on bioethics titled "Hard Choices." Also see McTaggart, "The Break-through that Backfired," New York Sunday News Magazine, Feb. 8, 1981.

[9] See Adamek, at 4. Dr. Irvin Cushner of the University of California has testified that "something on the order of 2 percent of all of the abortions in this country are done for some clinically identifiable entity," including abortions to prevent the birth of a handicapped child; Dr. Cushner estimated that about 1 percent are performed for "physical health" reasons. Senate hearings, October 14, 1981. According to Dr. Richard Schmidt of the University of Cincinnati School of Medicine, only "a minute fraction" of the total number of abortions are currently performed for "life-saving indications," and the number of indications continues to decrease every year. Senate Hearings, October 19, 1981. As U.S. Representative Vin Weber of Minnesota testified, "Abortion has become a technique used for family planning. Millions of people find it inconvenient to have a child, or they wish to better plan their families, a sort of social engineering." Senate Hearings, December 16, 1981. Another witness, Bella Abzug of Women U.S.A., testified to the fact that some groups supporting legalized abortion now see it primarily as a "method of birth control." Senate hearings, December 16, 1981. None of the major public opinion polls show majority support for this state of affairs.

[15] Increased opposition to the Supreme Court's abortion decisions is indicated by Gallup polls of 1974 and 1981; 46% opposition to these decisions' legalization of first-trimester abortion was recorded in the more recent poll. These questions did not deal with other aspects of the decisions, such as late-term abortion, spousal and parental consent, or medical regulations.

[17] Senate hearings, December 7, 1981. Barbara Bryant, Vice President, Market Opinion Research. As noted by the Chairman of the Subcommittee on the Constitution, this study was flawed in several respects: its sampling included only three American communities which do not seem representative of American opinions on abortion; questions were worded in vague, misleading or euphemistic ways; respondents were not allowed to express their views on legalization under different circumstances and for different stages of pregnancy; and some of the responses indicate internal inconsistency (for instance, 93 percent of those polled in Springfield, Massachusetts agreed that the abortion decision should be made entirely by the "consenting patient", but 26 percent expressed support for a constitutional amendment that would prohibit abortions). This poll also asked voters about three different proposals for reversing the Supreme Court's abortion decisions, including a proposal like S.J. Res. 110; but since it asked for a choice among these alternatives, rather than for a choice between each of them and the current situation of abortion on demand, it is unfortunately not very useful in gauging the political acceptability of this proposal among the American people. As noted above, only 25 percent of those polled by DeVries & Associates in 1974 elected to let the Supreme Court's decision stand, and this seems consistent with NORC and Gallup findings on support for abortion on demand.

Dr. Bryant also presented testimony on an analysis of abortion surveys which was commissioned by the National Abortion Rights Action League. This study takes at face value some of the poll results which Dr. Adamek and Judith Blake have analyzed and found wanting, but it ultimately comes to the same conclusions: most Americans want abortion to be legal only under certain extraordinary circumstances.

[18] Medical regulations designed to protect the pregnant woman in a first-trimester abortion, aside from the requirement that the abortion be performed by a licensed physician, are of doubtful constitutionality under current law. A wide range of regulations and "informed consent" requirements have been invalidated by the progeny of Roe and Doe. In November and December of 1978, investigative reporters from the Chicago Sun-Times published accounts of abuses at legal abortion clinics in the city of Chicago which suggest that such clinics are seriously under-regulated.

[19] This argument has been put forward by Senator Patrick Leahy in his opening statement before the Subcommittee on October 15, 1981. Cf., however, the testimony of Dr. Adrian Rogers, former President of the Southern Baptist Convention, who observed that greater public discussion on this issue was likely to clarify the existence or nonexistence of any "consensus". ABORTION AND THE OPINION POLLS

(By Dexter Duggan)

(A sense of humor will be useful when Roper, Harris, Gallup and Yankelovich all agree that the public is overwhelmingly in favor of some notion that makes no sense at all.—Wall Street Journal, Dec. 26, 1980, with advice for President-elect Reagan.)

Bernard N. Nathanson, M.D., once a leading national champion of legally unrestricted abortion, contends in "Aborting America" that, "The American public has not yet given 'informed consent' to laissez-faire abortion."

His claim seems strongly at odds with numerous public opinion polls which convey the impression that the majority of Americans has willingly endorsed the sweeping permissive abortion decissions of the U.S. Supreme Court.

Some polls leave the impression of majority endorsement of the Court's reasoning, without explicity claiming such endorsement. Upon perusing their statistics, one learns there is no such approval.

Other polls do claim majority agreement with the Court. But these polls' questions, when examined, are revealed to have blurred, or even misrepresented, the scope and range of the Court's action.

In citing various pollsters' figures, I do not intend to imply that I agree with the accuracy of any. But I do contend that even the pollsters' own statistics do not add up to the substantial national majority approval for the Supreme Court action that is supposed to exist.

Even The New York Times, a leading editorial champion of permissive abortion, admitted in an August 18, 1980 "news analysis", "What do the American people think about abortion? It depends on how you ask them the question." When the Times/CBS News Poll questioned in a way conventionally favored by many pollsters, using language about "an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting abortions," the paper said there was only 29 percent approval for such a proposal. But when the object of the abortion was factored into the question—did people "believe there should be an amendment to the Constitution protecting the life of the unborn child"—the approval rate jumped to 50 percent.

The pollsters' "experiment suggested that not all polling questions are created equal," the Times reported. "Fully one-third of those who opposed the amendment when it was presented as 'prohibiting abortions' supported it when it was presented as 'protecting the life of the unborn child.' "

WHAT ABOUT THE CHILD?

Students of abortion polls have noticed that references to the unborn child are generally absent from their wording. The Times analysis said inclusion of the unborn "is the preferred question of the anti-abortion movement, and the results indicate why this group likes it so much." The Times refrained from pointing out that the type of wording which casts abortion as a private concern of the individual woman, with no reference to the unborn, is the preferred wording of the pro-abortion movement—and also of many professional pollsters.

A year earlier, Time Magazine had been even more straightforward about what polls were actually finding. Down in the body of a religion-department story, the January 29, 1979 issue of the news-weekly said, "... poll data indicate that about half the population agrees with the Catholic belief that human life begins at conception, and that only a minority of Americans are as liberal as the Supreme Court regarding abortion on request." Indicating that abortion opposition was not uniquely confined to Catholics, the article added, "Religious opposition to abortion, or at least to aborton on request, is more widespread than is sometimes apparent."

Perhaps the full extent of the opposition was not more "apparent" because—despite such occasional, slight acknowledgements of the true shape of things in the major media—the conventional wisdom continued to prevail. Dissenters from the Supreme Court action, it was assumed, constitute a small, even very small, minority—a minority, however, which often managed to prevail on the floor of Congress and in elections around the nation, with well-established pro-abortion incumbents being turned out by the voters in favor of anti-abortion challengers. Although the "pro-choice majority" dear to the hearts of abortion advocates was bound to reverse all this some day, that day seemed extremely slow to arrive.

Even a journal as committed to permissive abortion as Family Planning Perspectives, produced by Planned Parenthood's Alan Guttmacher Institute, published a few articles recognizing that data analysis does not support the popular media conclusions.

In FPP's Sept./Oct., 1980 issue, the article "Abortion Attitudes, 1965-1980: Trends and Determinants" acknowledged there was still a lack of majority opinion favoring abortion "for any reason." Drawing on what it regarded as reliable National Opinion Research Center (NORC) polling, the article said that as of 1980 there was still only 41 percent approval for abortion "for any reason"—the Supreme Court's position enunciated seven years earlier, perhaps, among other reasons, to respond to the demands of public opinion that were believed to exist.

Another article in the same issue of Family Planning Perspectives, "Abortion and the 1978 Congressional Elections," cited a different survey, according to which only "24-28 percent said that they believed abortion should never be forbidden." This article added that other surveys, like NORC's "show higher proportions supporting legal abortion for any reason." Although both articles agreed that polls find majority backing for abortion in certain cases, both also agreed there is no majority backing for abortion for any reason—the Supreme Court's position imposed on the nation.

The "Abortion Attitudes" article also noted that while there was clear public backing in NORC's findings for abortion for three "hard" reasons, "It is equally clear that there is no consensus as to the soft reasons; approval averages only about 50 percent in 1980. In addition, approval for the soft reasons is a more sensitive indicator of changes in public attitudes toward abortion than is approval for the hard reasons." The article explained that NORC had polled about six reasons for abortion. Three were "hard": "If the woman's health is seriously endangered by the pregnancy"; "If she became pregnant as a result of rape"; and "If there is a strong chance of a serious defect in the baby." The others were "soft": "If the family has a very low income and cannot afford any more children"; "If she is not married and does not want to marry the man"; and "If she is married and does not want any more children."

NARROW APPROVAL RANGE

Thus, the findings indicate that abortion was approved by many people only for very definite hardship reasons, not for reasons of what might be called personal preference or socioeconomic illness.

For some reason, NORC did not begin to poll about the substance of the Supreme Court decisions—abortion "for any reason"—until 1977, four years after they had been handed down. When respondents finally were questioned about abortion "for any reason" in 1977, only 38 percent were found to approve. In 1978, the figure dropped to 33 percent, then in 1980 it rose to 41 percent.

The "Abortion Attitudes" article ran counter to many assumptions made by the popular press. Despite a strong expectation in the media that support for permissive abortion is allied with political liberalism, the article said NORC data showed only "a very slight correlation between political liberalism and approval of abortion. . . . We conclude that although abortion attitudes are not completely independent of political ideology, the two are not closely related."

Now let us consider the work of the organization whose name has become virtually synonymous with the polling profession, Gallup.

The June 1980 Gallup Opinion Index reported, "Despite the emotional and political turmoil surrounding the issue of abortion, public opinion on the controversial topic has changed remarkably little since the Supreme Court ruled in 1973 that women have the right to have abortions performed." Gallup said its "question asked since 1973 was: 'Do you think abortions should be legal under any circumstances, legal under only certain circumstances, or illegal in all circumstances?' " Approval for legal abortion "under any circumstances" (in other words, the effect of the Supreme Court's action) grew from 21 percent in 1975 to 25 percent in 1980. Approval "only under certain circumstances" remained almost steady, dropping from 54 percent in 1975 to 53 percent in 1980. Those believing abortion should be "illegal under all circumstances" declined from 22 percent in 1975 to 18 percent in 1980. During the same period, "no opinion" went from 3 percent to 4 percent.

UNPOPULAR DECISIONS

In other words, according to Gallup's statistics, in 1975, two whole years after the Supreme Court decisions, there were more people (22 percent) against any abortion whatever (even to save the mother's life) than in favor of the Court's action (21 percent)! Yet, did you see any story reporting these poll results in those terms? Gallup itself certainly refrained from doing so.

Even by the year of the latest figures, 1980, those approving abortion for any reason were far fewer than those against abortion in some or all circumstances. Gallup has never found anything near to majority approval for what the Court wrought. Yet, remarkably, Gallup has refrained from commenting on the obvious import here. Instead, in its interpretive commentary, Gallup highlights a different subject: Catholicism. According to the most recent findings, 22 percent of Catholics approve abortion "under all circumstances," and 55 percent "only under certain circumstances." Gallup's June 1980 Index explicitly calls attention to this pattern: "Although the Roman Catholic Church officially opposes abortion under all circumstances, many Catholics disagree with the Church's position on this issue. In fact, Catholic views are generally in line with those of Protestants." But Gallup fails even to raise the obvious next point: both Catholic and Protestant views are definitely out of harmony with the scope and range of the High Court's action.

The Gallup commentary seems consciously suited to conform to general media expectations: Catholics in rebellion against the institutional Church, and nothing worth noting in the fact that the majority of Americans disagree with the Supreme Court.

On occassion, Gallup has polled about one important matter other pollsters seem to have omitted, whether respondents approve abortion at the different stages of pregnancy. Many polls seem to assume that if a respondent feels few qualms about early abortion, approval can be assumed for an abortion nearer the time of birth. It must have occurred to Gallup that this assumption is incorrect.

The May, 1979 Gallup Opinion Index indicates that poll respondents were asked whether they approved of abortion for certain specific reasons, and whether they approved it for these reasons at the three different trimesters of pregnancy. The listed circumstances were threat to mother's life; threat to her mental health; possibility of fetal deformity; severe threat to mother's physical health; rape or incest; and financial hardship.

When Gallup says that a consistent majority of Americans approve of legal abortion "only under certain circumstances," we are apparently to believe that these six specified situations are the ones being talked about. Each of them could be considered to represent a hardship in some measure. That is, none appears to deal with abortion as a method of birth control, which is the reason the great majority of abortions are performed today.

Yet the results show that among the 54 percent approving abortion "only under certain circumstances," there was majority approval for first trimester abortions for only three of the six reasons, and for second and third trimester abortions only for the "life of the mother."

[In percent]

	1st trimester	2d trimester	3d trimester
Life of mother	78	66	59
Mental health	42	31	28
Fetal deformity	44	37	28
Physical health	52	46	33
Rape/incest	59	32	19
Financial	15	6	4

A comparison with results of a similar poll in 1977 shows these approval rates virtually unchanged, except that about 6 percent fewer respondents approved abortion for rape or incest. One cannot fail to notice the pronounced reluctance of respondents to approve even hardship abortions six years after the Supreme Court went far beyond such hardship situations and legalized abortion for personal preference.

In looking over all these detailed figures, it is impossible to ignore a highly significant omission in the accompanying remarks: not a single word suggested that the results amounted to a major rejection of what the Supreme Court had already legalized. Indeed, when the Index comments, "in the second and third trimesters a majority would make abortions legal only to save the life of the mother," it seems to imply that the legality of late-term abortions is still an open question. This is an impression which, intentionally or not, has been assiduously cultivated by media reports about the Supreme Court's legalization of abortion "in the first three months of pregnancy." Gallup did nothing to correct this misinformation and, in fact, seemed to promote it with such statements as, "In 1973, the Supreme Court overruled all state laws that prohibit or restrict a woman's right to obtain an abortion during her first three months of pregnancy." Not a word was added to indicate that the Supreme Court had legalized abortion beyond that period, right up until the moment of birth.

THE CATHOLIC ISSUE

Despite its failure to note this rather important point, the May, 1979 Gallup Opinion Index did manage to call attention to the attitudes of Catholics. "Although the Roman Catholic Church officially opposes abortion under all circumstances," the Index reported, "many Roman Catholics oppose the church line on this issue. In fact, Catholic views are generally in line with those of Protestants."

Left unsaid is the resulting fact that Protestants and Catholics stand jointly opposed to the scope of the Supreme Court's action. Given the misleading formulation of that statement, it is not at all hypersensitive to note the pejorative use of the term "church line," as if Catholics were discouraged from thinking for themselves.

One type of question successful in producing large majorities apparently in favor of permissive abortion is the familiar ploy of asking respondents whether abortion should be a matter decided by "a woman and her doctor." On one level, this question is so obvious (would anyone think abortion should be decided between a woman and a kindergarten child? a woman and a parking meter?) that many respondents were probably giving their assent merely to the woman-doctor conjunction. On another level, abortion advocates were fond of this type of phrasing because it subtly implies a disinterested physician's endorsement of abortion after scrutiny for a true medical justification. The obvious implication is that the physician is being seriously consulted; the woman has not decided on her own to go to a high-volume abortion clinic. Moreover, this type of question generally specifies not simply "a" doctor, but "her" doctor. The plain implication is that the doctor involved in the consultation is the patient's regular physician who has a complete knowledge of her medical history. That implication is, of course, usually wholly erroneous in the contemporary context.

The pollster using such wording is actually testing her majority endorsement for the proposition that an inconveniently pregnant customer should be able to obtain casual service from a licensed abortionist. To refer to an abortionist who the woman has probably never met before as "her doctor" is as tendentious as referring to the Racing Form as one's "financial advisor." When pollsters so carefully decline to say what they actually mean in phrasing a question, one must wonder why they avoid a straightforward phrasing—unless they fear it would produce an adverse result.

Even the woman-and-doctor concept failed to produce consistent majorities for abortion. In June, 1972, Gallup found 64 percent agreement that "the decision to have an abortion should be made solely by a woman and her physician." Yet only six months later, another Gallup inquiry found only 46 percent favoring "a law which would permit a woman to go to a doctor to end pregnancy at any time during the first three months."

Dr. Bernard Nathanson has denounced the "woman and her doctor" phrasing as "wholly spurious" but a "clever way" to imply professional medical scrutiny before the abortion decision is reached. In reality, Nathanson observed, "this allegedly 'medical' service" is touted in the abortion clinic advertisements in the classified pages, alongside the fortune tellers and dating bureaus.

ANOTHER MISCONCEPTION

Peter Skerry, writing in "The Public Interest," cautioned that among the "persistent misconceptions about the continuing controversy over abortion in the United States" was the belief that antiabortion sentiment could be dismissed "as nothing but the view of a few well-financed zealots." One might think that a careful study even of findings like those above, by pollsters not known for antiabortion presumptions, would cast strong doubt on this small-zealot-group hypothesis. But not for the first time, having decided in advance how a situation ought to be, the news media have declined to cope with evidence that might disprove the favored image.

When Pope John Paul II visited the United States in October, 1979, many media leaders who editorially supported the Pope's "liberal" political views but abhorred his "conservative" moral views apparently decided that all Americans thought like the journalists. There was scant suggestion in the media that many people had been offended or thought the Pope had taken an unpopular or divisive course when he appealed for world disarmament before the United Nations or when he pointed to capitalist inequities. The Pope began to disturb the nation, it seemed, only when he opposed some of the causes close to media hearts.

The October 15, 1979 Newsweek candidly described the onset of the chill: "As the week wore on, and the Pope spoke out on the controversial sex issues facing the Catholic Church, the coverage on all three networks became more critical."

A major theme in the media was that American Catholics sharply disagreed with the head of their Church on moral issues. What better way to provide evidence than by the fruit of modern objectivity, the scientific opinion poll? But the evidence quickly turned chaotic.

The October 15, 1979 Time reported an Associated Press-NBC News Poll as finding among American Catholics that "50 percent even tolerate abortion on demand." Citing the very same poll, the October 6, 1979 Los Angeles Times said it revealed that "half of the Catholics polled were in favor of abortion on demand."

SYNONYMS

One might question whether "tolerate" and "in favor of" were acceptable synonyms in this case. As a Pole, the Pope might appreciate the distinction between Eastern European citizens tolerating Russian occupation troops and actually being in favor of their presence. Yet, apart from this, it is curious that any poll respondents should be listed as approving "abortion on demand," because that term is virtually anathema to pollsters when probing public attitudes. If, indeed, the AP-NBC pollsters actually had asked people's views about "abortion on demand," they not only practiced an unusual bluntness, but also discovered a greater proportion of Catholics than of the general population approving such abortion, as measured by other opinion polls.

Indeed, AP-NBC's findings were immediately undercut by the findings of a Gallup poll. The October 8, 1979 New York Times said a "recent Gallup poll" revealed, "On abortion, 44 percent (of American Catholics) were recorded as feeling that there should be a relaxation of the church's prohibition of abortion under any circumstances." This is a proposition rather removed from either 50 percent tolerance or 50 percent support for unrestricted abortion.

The October 22, 1979 Time religion section, while carrying forward the customary received wisdom ("The Pope and his church are out of step with contemporary Americans, including many Roman Catholics, in dealing with sexuality."), did manage to cast serious doubt on the impression, put forward only a week before in the same magazine, that Catholics are receptive to "abortion on demand." "Even among relatively liberal Catholics," Time reported, "there is negligible backing for abortion on demand. In fact, no front-rank Protestant, Eastern Orthodox, Jewish or Muslim theologian has yet developed a serious argument for totally open abortion. . . ." Such a sober admission was generally lacking in media coverage.

In August, 1977, a Harris survey was released to the media, with a repetitious question that hammered home the point to respondents: abortion is legal for only the first three months of pregnancy. The wording precluded the very possibility of any additional abortion legality. The question was asked a full four years after the Supreme Court made public its abortion decisions, which have been available since then for any pollster to study and learn their full extent. The question, which Harris said drew the approval of 53 percent and the oppostion of 40 percent, was:

"In 1973, the U.S. Supreme Court decided that state laws which made it illegal for a woman to have an abortion up to three months of pregnancy were unconstitutional, and that the decision on whether a woman should have an abortion up to three months of pregnancy should be left to the woman and her doctor to decide. In general, do you favor or oppose the U.S. Supreme Court decisions making abortions up to three months of pregnancy legal?"

MISLEADING QUESTION

Aside from the question's repetitious disregard for the legal facts, it also uses the "woman and her doctor" ploy to create the assumption of medical justification. The question is no more objective than one formulated by anti-abortionists that might ask: "Do you actually favor a law that lets evil abortionists murder helpless babies?"

In the accompanying commentary under his byline, Lou Harris concluded that the 53 to 40 percent margin of approval meant, "Basically, then, public opinion appears to be entirely in line with the reasoning of the Supreme Court on the abortion issue." Ironically, in an article acknowledging that changes in wording can affect abortion poll results, the Christian Science Monitor referred to this Harris survey without mentioning that its wording seriously misrepresented the legal facts. On January 16, 1979, the Monitor stated that that Harris survey "showed 53 percent of adult Americans favoring the 1973 Supreme Court decision. That slight majority has held steady in annual Harris polls on abortion since 1973."

In his book, "A Private Choice," Berkeley's Prof. John Noonan condemned Harris for "this clear misstating" of the law, an error Harris declined to correct after it had been called to his attention. Prof. Noonan also suggested that when respondents are presented with a poll question that doesn't specify a reason for the abortion, they implicitly equate "legal abortion" with abortion performed for a genuinely therapeutic reason. Noonan's reasoning seems quite valid, given that when respondents were presented with specific reasons for abortion by pollsters such as Gallup, majority abortion approval was confined to a very few serious "hard case" reasons.

POLLING TREND

During the past decade a persistent direction has emerged in the formulation of poll questions. That direction was already well established in 1976 when the National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL) released a compilation of poll questions asked by 10 different organizations. Although NARAL refrained from pointing it out, none of the poll questions presented an accurate description of the Supreme Court's unprecedented action. Indeed, most of the questions offered no description at all, but instead polled in some other manner, such as using the spurious medical-endorsement approach of asking whether abortion should be a matter for a woman and her doctor.

None of the questions asked whether a woman should be able to seek the services of "an abortionist" or "a professional abortionist." With only one exception, none of the questions mentioned the unborn child or fetus to be destroyed by the abortion. The exception was a National Opinion Research Center survey mentioning the child in hardship contexts including an unspecified "defective" condition and poverty. None of the questions in the compilation asked whether abortion was approved for, say a "healthy, normal unborn baby." And there was certainly no question that asked, for instance, whether respondents approved of "destroying the healthy unborn baby without a serious reason, as is usually the case with abortion today," or "poisoning the unborn child with deadly saline abortion solution," or "cutting up the large healthy fetus with sharp instruments because the Supreme Court allows that upon the pregnant woman's request."

To the obvious objection that such questions would be loaded in the antiabortion direction, the appropriate response is that the professional pollsters seem to have had no objection to loading questions in the opposite direction. A 1974 Gallup question so outraged the Ad Hoc Committee in Defense of Life that the anti-abortion committee bought some newspaper advertisements to remark upon it. Although Gallup repeatedly referred in its findings to abortion, that word appeared nowhere in the question presented to respondents. They were asked instead about going to a doctor to "end pregnancy."

"How can you take a poll on abortion without using the word?" asked the Ad Hoc Committee. "And how accurate would it be?"

The majority of respondents no doubt knew what type of "end [to] pregnancy" they were being asked about. Still, one must wonder why the professional polling organization didn't eliminate the ambiguity when it originally formulated its wording. The article announcing the results plainly preferred the word "abortion" over the ambiguous term.

Just as the pollsters' choice of words influences poll results, so do the predispositions of journalists influence the interpretation of those results. For example, in 1979 the well-known California pollster Mervin Field released a survey announcing that a majority of California respondents, 57 percent, opposed "abortion for any reason." In his release to the media, Field said he had polled on abortion in California since 1969. The cumulative surveys, he said, "show that there was a substantial liberalization of attitudes toward abortion between 1969 and 1975. Since then, however, the trend toward liberalization has slowed markedly."

CONFLICTING RESULTS

At the same time, Lou Harris announced that 60 percent of his respondents nationwide favored the Supreme Court's abortion decisions. Since California is far from a socially conservative state, journalists there might have been expected to find the discrepancy between the two polls to be somewhat disquieting, but instead they focused on the fact that liberalization of attitudes toward legalized abortion was continuing, albeit quite slowly.

Totally sidestepping the major implications of Field's survey, the Associated Press wrote up his findings to emphasize "growing" abortion support, thus unfluencing the Los Angeles Herald Examiner to headline the AP dispatch, "State Poll Shows Tolerance Grows on All Abortions," while the Orange County Register headlined the AP story, "Poll Says Fewer Oppose Abortions."

With characteristic agility, the media had once again managed to transform a poll commentary that explicity noted a slackening of abortion approval and demonstrated a minority approving abortion on demand into yet another abortion endorsement.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am saddened that the events of today have dictated that the Senate will not be considering a constitutional amendment on the subject of abortion this year. But I rise today not to bemoan that fact, but rather to call attention to those who follow the events relative to the right to life, that this Congress has been able to go further in its efforts to protect that right than any other Congress since the Roe against Wade decision.

Senator HATCH has done an exemplary job in guiding a constitutional amendment on this subject through subcommittee and full committee levels. That has not happened before in history.

For that exemplary achievement, the Senator from Utah has not only my thanks and admiration, but my pledge of support in the next Congress to see to it that the best constitutional amendment possible on the subject of abortion passes the Senate.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum roll be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, after listening to the debate in the Senate over the past several days, I am struck by a profound irony. Over the past year and a half, I have heard a number of my colleagues—on the Senate floor, in committee meetings, and in the media—denounce excessive intrusion by Government into the lives of citizens. These colleagues have urged us to get Government off people's backs and extolled the virtues of less Government and greater individual liberty.

But as the months have passed, we have come to understand the true import of these slogans. To the reactionaries, less Government intrusion means more liberty for polluters to despoil the air and water and desecrate the wilderness. Getting Government off people's backs means tax exemptions for segregated schools, and discrimination against the minority whose skins are not white. Greater freedom means denial of a constitutional guarantee of equal rights for the majority who are women. To the reactionaries, less Government means fewer programs to help the most vulnerable in society—the elderly, the poor, the disabled, and the workers who have lost their jobs in this recession.

To paraphrase, a famous aphorism, the proponents of these narrow views believe that the rich as well as the poor should be free to sleep under bridges, to beg in the streets, and to stand in unemployment lines.

These advocates of reaction are the illegitimate descendants of one of the greatest and most progressive principles, not only in American history but in the long history of human freedom—the individual's right to privacy. As Justice Louis Brandeis wrote half a century ago:

> The makers of our constitution undertook to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness * * * they sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions and their sensations.
> They conferred, as against the Government, the right to be let alone the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men. To protect that right, every unjustifiable intrusion by the Government upon the privacy of the individual, whatever the means employed, must be deemed a violation of the (constitution).

The self-proclaimed opponents of less Government interference now stand before the Senate with proposals that would increase the involvement of Government in the most private of all decisions. With breathtaking hypocrisy, they talk of taking Government off people's backs—and then fight to put Government into people's bedrooms.

Where our Constitution affirms diversity of thought and freedom of belief, they seek conformity to their own vision of America. Since the earliest colonial days, America has stood in the world for tolerance and liberty. But the false prophets of less government now demand a Government-imposed regimen of intolerance, of repression against those whose religious creed differs from theirs, and whose gender happens not to be male.

Their methods demonstrate their disdain for liberty. Time after time, they promote proposals to strip the judiciary of jurisdiction. They would subvert the very institution designed by the Founders as the central safeguard of our rights and freedom. How can they stand before us now and pledge to protect citizens from Government, when they seek to take away the most important protection of all against oppressive government?

The issue before us touches some of the most deeply personal questions in individual life. I do not believe that any woman makes the decision lightly whether to have an abortion. I have my own view, but this is an issue on which sincere and decent people hold widely differing beliefs and values. Men and women, lay persons and clerics, have conscientiously reached their own conclusions as to when, if ever, abortion is permissible.

For nearly two decades, I have served in the Senate and heard my colleagues debate whether Congess can or should decide this intensely private decision for others. I have listened carefully and thought long. And I am convinced that the issue of abortion cannot appropriately or effectively be resolved by statute or by constitutional amendment. It is, and it must remain, a matter of individual conscience.

Finally, it disturbs me very deeply that many of the proponents of these amendments have voted consistently against the help and support that can mean fewer abortions. They have cut funds for maternal and child health programs that prevent fetal disease and help a mother carry a child to term. They have cut immunization programs that protect children from crippling birth defects. They have opposed education and job training programs that give the poor and disadvantaged an alternative to despair and dependency. They have sought to cripple programs of contraceptive services for those who wish them. In the name of less Government, they turn their back on proven alternatives to abortion, and then seek to resolve the problem by the most intrusive kind of Government of all.

I am proud to have stood for Government when it has brought better health care to parents and children, better education, better jobs, and a better future. I have sought less Government and more free enterprise when that means greater efficiency and the end of outworn programs. And I am proud to have stood for less Government when it means the defense of our priceless freedoms—of thought and religion, of speech and press and assembly. Congress will never resolve the issue of abortion by Government fiat. But by defeating these amendments, Congress can begin to move beyond this issue and work for a better and more decent life for all citizens in our society.

Mr. BUMPERS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, almost weekly, and certainly monthly, the Supreme Court renders a controversial decision which is, in many instances, highly unpopular. There are hundreds of examples: Miranda against Arizona; Roe against Wade, dealing with abortion; Furman against Georgia, dealing with the death penalty; Mapp against Ohio, the exclusionary evidence rule; Baker against Carr and Reynolds against Simms which was the one-man-one-vote decision. And there was Rostkor against Goldberg, which dealt with the all-male draft.

Congressional response to these unpopular decisions has varied. Each Member of Congress can cite several opinions of the Supreme Court in which he or she violently disagrees, and we frequently get on the stump to denounce these decisions because it brings us easy applause.

There is an old expression that it is a lot easier to bring people to their feet than to their senses. The recent common responses have been to introduce bills in Congress which would limit the jurisdiction of the lower Federal courts, the Supreme Court, or both. There are currently over 30 such bills pending in Congress which would restrict Federal court jurisdiction over the issues of abortion, prayer in schools, and busing, and the pending issue deals with two of them.

These bills call into question the basic constitutional concepts of separation of powers and independence of the Federal judiciary. They also call into question the basic precept established by Marbury against Madison that the U.S. Supreme Court—not the President, not the Congress—has the final say on constitutional issues.

Alex de Touqueville came to this country and examined our system. He said of our provision for judicial review of constitutional questions:

I am inclined to believe this practice of the American courts to be at once the most favorable to public order . . . the power vested in the American courts of justice of pronouncing a statute to be unconstitutional forms one of the most powerful barriers that have ever been devised against the tyranny of political assemblies.

In the Federalist Papers, No. 47, James Madison underscored the importance of the separation-of-powers concept imbedded in our Constitution when he wrote that:

The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of a one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elected may just be pronounced the very definition of tyranny.

Separation of powers does not mean that each branch is completely independent of the other, but judicial constitutional review by an independent judiciary not beholden to the people, the legislature or the President for tenure in office or continued compensation was intended as a basic check on the power of the executive and legislative branches to invade fundamental individual rights and liberties. The importance of the protections granted article III judges by the Constitution was underscored recently by Justice Brennan's plurality opinion in Northern Pipeline Co. against Marathon Pipe Line, handed down on June 28. The central point in Justice Brennan's reasoning was the constitutional requirement that judges to whom the power to exercise broad article III jurisdiction is granted must enjoy article III protections as well. Reminding us that among the injuries and usurpations recited against the King of Great Britain in the Declaration of Independence was that the King had "made judges dependent on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries," Justice Brennan remarked that the Constitution "commands that the independence of the judiciary be jealously guarded."

In my own State, in Cooper against Aaron, the Little Rock school desegregation case that arose in the late 1950's and which presented a classic clash between Federal and State authorities, repeated the basic Marbury against Madison precept that it is the province and duty of the Judicial Department to say what the law is. In Cooper the Court said:

This decision (Marbury v. Madison) declared the basic principle that the Federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution, and that principle has ever since been respected by this Court and the country as a permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system.

These basic principles are so sensible and salutary that they hardly need justification, Yet, our history reflects that these jurisdiction-limiting efforts are not new. Court-stripping bills flourished in the late 1860's after the Civil War and in the 1930's as this Nation was fighting its way out of the Great Depression. Again, in the 1950's several bills were introduced and were given serious consideration by congressional committees. Some of them were even passed by one House of Congress.

I cannot say it loud enough or often enough: These efforts to amend the Constitution by simple majority vote were wrong in the 1860's, wrong in the 1930's, wrong in the 1950's, and wrong today.

Over the years, these efforts have been directed at reapportionment of State legislative bodies, regulation of obscenity, prayer in public schools, abortion, gender discrimination in military conscription, due process, and contempt of Congress. The first measure of recent vintage to receive serious consideration by Congress was introduced by Senator Jenner of Indiana in 1957. Jenner's bill proposed to remove from the Supreme Court's jurisdiction cases involving five different types of issues:

First, contempt of Congress. Second, programs to insure the loyalty of Government employees. Third, State subversive activities controls. Fourth, regulations promulgated by local boards of education to control the subversive activities of teachers. Fifth, the Jenner bill would have removed jurisdiction to review bar admissions practices and policies. Anyone with a sense of history recognizes immediately that all five of these provisions were intended to reverse controversial 1956 and 1957 Supreme Court opinions about cold-war loyalty and security programs.

The bill was a political response to a perceived crisis of its time. The Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings on the bill and reported a much more limited version which died on the Senate Calendar at adjournment.

Then in the early 1960's there was the effort to remove a particular subject matter from the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction in response to the controversial reapportionment decisions of the Baker against Carr and Reynolds against Simms cases. In 1964 Congressman Tuck of Virginia introduced a bill to remove the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction and the inferior Federal Court's trial jurisdiction in all cases relating to the apportionment of representation in State legislative bodies. The House Judiciary Committee refused to act on the bill and was subsequently discharged. Although the House of Representatives passed the bill, it died in the Senate without further action being taken.

In 1979, during debate on the Establishment of the Department of Education, Senator HELMS, proposed an amendment to exclude from Federal Court jurisdiction any cases drawing into question the validity of ordinances or statutes permitting voluntary prayer in public schools or other public buildings. Subsequently, the same Helms amendment was added to a separate bill which dealt with the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Although the Helms amendment to the Department of Education bill was reconsidered and finally tabled by the Senate, the Supreme Court jurisdiction bill with the Helms amendment attached was passed and sent to the House. The House Judiciary Committee held hearings on the school prayer amendment, but the measure never came to the House floor and it died at adjournment.

Well, this is just a very brief overview of some of the bills Congress has considered. The question is, How broad is Congress authority to eliminate or limit the jurisdiction of either the Supreme Court or the lower Federal courts?

Article 3 of the Constitution provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." In cases affecting ambassadors, public ministers, and cases in which a State is a party, the Constitution provides that the Supreme Court is to have what is known as original jurisdiction. It is absolutely clear that Congress may not expand or curtail the Court's original jurisdiction. That was established by Marbury against Madison.

In other cases, however, the Constitution provides that the Supreme Court is to have "appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." Although this statement seems fairly straightforward and fairly broad, the basic question is, What limits are there on the power of Congress to make exceptions and regulations to the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction?

The seminal case is ex parte McCardle decided by the Supreme Court in 1869. I will not go through a lengthy explanation of the facts, but while McCardle's case was on appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, and even after it had been argued, Congress passed a bill taking away the Court's jurisdiction over McCardle's case. Interestingly, the bill was passed because liberal Members were afraid that the Supreme Court, if given the opportunity, would strike down the reconstruction statutes. The Court held unanimously that Congress had effectively eliminated its jurisdiction over the McCardle case. The Court said:

> We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution; and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this Court is given by express words.

No one is quite sure how broadly McCardle should be read. For one thing, as the above quote indicates, the Court did not believe that it was at liberty to inquire into the motives of Congress in taking away its jurisdiction. That is hardly the rule today. The Court regularly inquires into congressional motives. Another important point about the McCardle case should be emphasized. Congress had not taken away all avenues for appealing habeus corpus cases such as McCardle's to the Supreme Court. In other words, the Court had jurisdiction under other statutes to hear McCardle's case if he had alleged jurisdiction under those statutes. And there is even language in the Court's opinion welcoming McCardle to use those other jurisdictional statutes, but there is no evidence that he ever did.

It seems to me that all we can take from the McCardle opinion is that Congress has some authority to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the U.S. Supreme Court. The case does not stand for the proposition that Congress can completely divest the court of appellate jurisdiction over certain cases. The argument that McCardle should be given a rather narrow reading has been underscored by the Supreme Court since then. Only 3 years after McCardle, the Court decided United States against Klein. Klein makes clear that Congress may not enact legislation to eliminate an area of jurisdiction for the sole purpose of controlling the results of a particular case. In other words, Congress may not decide the merits of a particular case under the subterfuge of limiting the court's jurisdiction.

There are other fairly obvious limits on Congress authority. Congress may not act in a way that violates another provision of the Constitution. The obligatory example is that Congress may not prohibit blacks from bringing cases in Federal court. To do so would violate a separate provision of the Constitution, the fifth amendment.

What about Congress authority over lower Federal courts? Lower Federal courts were not created by the Constitution. They are creatures of Congress, and several cases seem to grant Congress fairly broad authority to limit the jurisdiction of lower Federal courts. Until 1875 Congress refrained from providing the lower Federal courts with general Federal question jurisdiction. Until that time, the State courts provided the only forum for vindicating many important Federal claims.

So, there are real limits on Congress authority in this area: Defining the precise limits is another matter entirely. Every law student knows that for years Congress had by statute required a minimum dollar amount in controversy for Federal question cases. Although Congress eliminated that $10,000 requirement in 1980, I do not think that Congress power to set a minimum was ever seriously questioned by a court.

In passing the Norris-La Guardia Act many years ago, Congress successfully took away the power of Federal courts to enjoin strikes. And, it is clear that Congress has the power to condition the exercise of jurisdiction by Federal courts on the plaintiff's first presenting his claim to the State courts: The Tax Injunction Act is a good example of this. There are a host of instances in which Congress has successfully limited the power of Federal courts, but still, the precise scope of constitutional limits on Congress authority in this area are unknown.

Three Supreme Court Cases this session provide us with more guidance on these complicated issues. Over the years, the Court has made clear that when Government acts in a manner that disadvantages protected groups, especially racial minorities, it violates the due process and equal protection clauses of the Constitution. A finding of an intent to discriminate is a prerequisite to an equal protection violation but Rogers against Lodge, decided by the Court on July 1, tells us that we can infer intent from a totality of circumstances that shows clearly the effect of Government actions on minorities.

The Seattle school case, Washington against Seattle School District No. 1, decided June 30, 1982 made clear that antibusing limitations that focus solely on remedies designed to end segregation fall squarely within this principle. The voters of the State of Washington had barred local school boards from busing in order to remedy racial imbalance. School boards were left free to bus for any other reason. The Court held that this "singling out" of a racial issue for special treatment, this burdening of racial minorities through the political process, violated the equal protection clause. The limitation on busing was not based on a neutral principle of general application, which would have passed muster, but was based on race.

Finally, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, writing for the Court in Mississippi University for Women against Hogan, underscored the principle that "Congress' power under section 5 (of the 14th amendment) * * * 'Is limited to adopting measures to enforce the guarantees of the amendment; section 5 grants Congress no power to restrict, abrogate, or dilute these guarantees.' (quoting footnote 10 of Katzenbach against Morgan) although we give deference to congressional decisions and classifications, neither Congress nor a State can validate a law that denies the rights guaranteed by the 14th amendment."

Mr. President, even aside from the constitutional limits, I am convinced that withdrawing Federal court jurisdiction over controversial issues is bad policy. I have made two statements on the Senate floor about this in just the last few months because I want the record to be absolutely clear: I strenuously object to these court-stripping bills, and I do not want either my children or my constituents to ever believe that I acquiesced in or only mildly objected to them.

What is the purpose of these bills? There might be many legitimate reasons for alleviating some of the workload of our Federal judges who all say they are overworked. It is true that, over the years, the case filings in Federal courts have steadily increased and most Federal judges have more than they can say grace over. But if this is the problem, surely there are much more efficient ways of dealing with it than by stripping the courts of jurisdiction to hear controversial constitutional issues.

I also do not hear anyone seriously suggesting as a rationale that the State courts are institutionally better equipped to deal with these controversial constitutional issues. Although the State courts are filled with hundreds of distinguished jurists who understand that they are bound to abide by the Constitution, it could not seriously be argued that these judges are institutionally better equipped than Federal judges to resolve questions of Federal constitutional law. It is clear that these court-stripping bills do not rest on this as a rationale. So, there must be some other rationale.

What other legitimate reasons might there be for these bills? Most assuredly, the Senators and Representatives who introduced these measures did not do so out of a deep and abiding concern that our most basic constitutional guarantees should be even more vigorously enforced than they are now. All of us took an oath to uphold the Constitution, and it would be consistent with that oath to introduce measures in an effort to shore up constitutional guarantees. But clearly, this is not the motivation behind these 30 bills.

The impetus for these measures is transparent. These measures are intended to weaken our basic constitutional rights and liberties. I can discern no other motivation for them, and none exists. The Members of the Senate and House who support these bills do so in the belief that the State courts will be less friendly to our constitutional guarantees. I think they may be surprised. One could cite hundreds of State court decisions across the land that vigorously enforce the Constitution. As Prof. Laurence H. Tribe of Harvard University pointed out last year in testifying before a congressional committee, State courts may choose to—

Replicate the very rulings that had inspired jurisdictional restructuring, thereby freezing the law unwisely but otherwise rendering the shift from Federal to State courts too inconsequential to have been worth the effort * * *.

On the other hand, there is the danger that the State courts would move in 50 different directions and there would be no uniformity in interpreting the Constitution. We might end up with 50 separate interpretations, and such a result would be completely at odds with the intent of the Founding Fathers. It would completely destroy the constitutional fabric that has kept our Nation free, our homes secure, our rights protected, and our institutions sound for almost 200 years.

Imagine, if you will, 50 separate interpretations of the freedom of speech clause, the freedom of press clause, or the freedom of religion clause of the first amendment. Imagine the chaos if due process meant one thing in Iowa, another in California, and still another in Florida. Imagine if cruel and unusual punishment under the eighth amendment meant one thing in Arkansas and just the opposite in Tennessee. What if the right to vote under the 15th amendment was vigorously guarded by the courts in Arizona but not by the courts in New York? These are just examples, and some Members of Congress will argue that I am overstating my case.

It will never come to this, they will say. But it is my firm belief that once we erode one constitutional guarantee, the next erosion is not nearly as painful, and the next one becomes even less painful.

The lawyer Members of the Senate who have practiced in Federal courts know that most Federal courts guard the exercise of their jurisdiction jealously. Once a case is filed, the first thing any court does is try to figure out why it should be dismissed and not heard at all. The court always looks to see if the plaintiff has standing to sue. And if he does not, the case is dismissed.

The Supreme Court is careful to make sure that the plaintiff's case is not moot. A classic example of the dismissal of a case for mootness occurred earlier this year when the Supreme Court reversed and dismissed the opinion in the case of Murphy against Hunt. In that case, the plaintiff was charged with rape and detained in jail until trial under the terms of a Nebraska statute authorizing his dentention. He filed suit in Federal court claiming a violation of his eighth amendment right not to be subjected to "excessive bail." This court struck down the Nebraska statute.

When the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case, many of us who are interested in the constitutionality of preventive detention anxiously awaited a final decision on the merits. But none was forthcoming. the Supreme Court dismissed the case because the plaintiff had been convicted by the Nebraska Supreme Court and the question of pretrial detention was therefore moot. The Court could have seized upon the opportunity to decide an important question of constitutional law, but it did not do so. Again, my point is that the Federal courts jealously guard the exercise of their power.

I have never felt the courts were involved in a power grab. They decide cases when they have to, and they dismiss them when they do not.

Who are these Federal judges that the authors of these court stripping bills are so afraid of? Are they radicals? Well, as you are aware, Mr. President, most Federal court judges come from fairly conservative backgrounds. Many come from established law firms where they represented corporate and business clients. I am sure that there are exceptions, but it is clear that the great majority of them are no more liberal, nor conservative, than the American people as a whole or the Members of the U.S. Senate. They are a cross section of the lawyers that this Nation has produced over the years. They are nominated by the Members of this body and confirmed by those Members. They simply enforce our basic constitutional guarantees as they understand them.

Mr. President, all of us can point to Federal court and Supreme Court decisions with which we strongly disagree. But I ask you, should our most precious constitutional rights be subject to mere political whim, fancy, or caprice? Or should they be ultimately resolved by an independent Federal judiciary? Judicial constitutional review by an independent judiciary not beholden to the people or legislature for tenure in office of continued compensation was intended as a basic check on the power of the executive or legislative branches to invade fundamental individual rights and liberties. As Hamilton wrote in the Federalist Papers:

It could not be expected that men who had infringed the Constitution in the character of legislators would be disposed to repair the breach in the character of judges.

In the recent history of this country, Federal courts have stood as a bulwark for the protection of our basic constitutional guarantees. They have been willing to protect unpopular constitutional guarantees because the Members of this body and the Members of the House of Representatives did not have the political courage to do so. So we should support that role rather than detract from it if we are serious about keeping our oath to uphold the Constitution.

Those of us in Congress who understand the magnitude of the stakes must take a stand. The onslaught against the Constitution is one of the most, if not the most, dangerous threats to this Nation.

I ask my colleagues to take stands on all of these bills and remember Dante's great warning that:

The hottest places in hell are reserved for those who remain neutral in the face of moral questions.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. JEPSEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President before we vote today on this—the third cloture vote on this "pro-choice" filibuster—let it be clear that this body, this Congress, and the Nation must eventually resolve once and for all the issue of abortion. Like the great moral evil of slavery, it must be addressed and resolved, so let this body work its will and make a choice by voting up or down on the question of abortion on demand.

President Reagan recently said in a letter to some of my colleagues:

It is crucial that a filibuster not prevent the Representatives of our citizens from expressing their judgment on so vital a matter.

It is time to stand and be counted on this issue.

Mr. President, attention has been focused—and properly so—on the findings section of the measure now before us. Let me say at the outset that I am in full agreement with the provisions of that section. But let me also say that the remaining sections of this comprehensive prolife legislative package also merit the consideration and the support of this body.

For those of us who have participated in the perennial and often protracted Senate struggles over the issue of taxpayer funding of abortion, the most significant of these complementary provisions may well be the section that reads:

No funds appropriated by Congress shall be used directly or indirectly to perform abortions, to reimburse or pay for abortions, or to refer for abortions, except when the life of the mother would be endangered if the child were carried to term.

This and the other funding restrictions need to be enacted now.

Finally, let the record show that the prolife movement is united behind this amendment. Let the record show that the prolife movement, bonded by the blood of our brothers and sisters, will ever continue the struggle for recognition of these inalienable rights, which in the words of John F. Kennedy, "come not from the generosity of the state but from the hand of God."

Mr. President, I yield the floor, if so desired, to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DANFORTH). Without objection, it so ordered.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senator HELM's amendment, which would permanently remove the Federal Government from financing any abortion-related activity.

The Senate and House of Representatives, together, have had over 80 abortion-related votes since 1973. By far, the majority of these ballots centered around Government involvement in the funding of abortion or abortion-related activities. Beginning in 1976 and each year thereafter, Congress has passed language which would prohibit reimbursement for abortion under the medicaid program. Although challenged before the Supreme Court, this public policy on the funding of abortion was found to be fully within the framework and prerogative of Congress.

Clearly, this is an issue which has confronted Congress consistantly since the Supreme Court legalized abortion in 1973. After much debate, Congress appears to have reached a consensus about Government involvement in the financing of abortion. The consensus is that the Government should not be involved in the financing of abortion.

Today we have an opportunity to make this consensus a part of permanent law. As each Member is well aware, the usual manner taken in restricting abortion funding is through a rider or amendment to the relative appropriations bills. This has always resulted in bogging down the fiscal process of the U.S. Government. The answer to that constant thorn is to enact as a part of permanent law a restriction on the use of Federal funds for abortion or abortion-related activities. I would hope that the Senate will adopt this bill for that end.

The bill before us today would prohibit any agency of the U.S. Government from performing abortions. This would make the Hyde language regarding the medicaid program permanent law. The bill also prohibits Federal funds from being used for abortion referrals, training in the performance of abortions, insurance contracts which reimburse for abortion, or any experimentation which relates to abortion.

The bill prohibits any institution receiving Federal funds from discriminating against prospective or present employees, students, or prospective students on the basis of their opposition to abortion. A person who refuses to counsel or assist in the performance of abortions is also protected from discrimination.

There exists tremendous controversy over the issue of abortion today. Rather than subsiding in the 9 years following the Supreme Court's decision, the clamor has grown. I, personally, believe that abortion is the taking of human life. I hope that this body will take needed action to protect the millions of lives which are perishing each year. However, whatever the outcome on the main issue of abortion, I would hope that the Senate will affirm—through permanent statute—Congress longstanding policy of not using tax dollars to finance abortions or abortion-related activities.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I move to table the second-degree amendment of my friend and colleague from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), amendment No. 2038, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask to proceed for a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

NOT VOTING—6

Boren	Glenn	Johnston

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 2038 was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if I could have the attention of the Senate, what is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending business is amendment No. 2040, offered by the Senator from Montana to amendment No. 2039, offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, my hope is that we can conclude this matter today. If there are other amendments dealing with abortion, I hope we can find a way to entertain them today and dispose of them.

I am advised that the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) may have an amendment. Could I inquire of my friend from Oregon if that is the case?

Mr. HATFIELD. I may.

Mr. BAKER. I am told that the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) may have an amendment.

Mr. DENTON. I have an amendment but it is not on abortion.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator in more ways than I can say. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENTON. I will want to offer my amendment, however.

Mr. BAKER. I will cooperate with the Senator in every way to see that he has that right.

Mr. WEICKER addresed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WEICKER. In order that we might establish a sequence, I ask the Chair, as I understand the Chair's response to the distinguished majority leader is that the Baucus amendment is the pending amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WEICKER. Which amendment is a perfecting amendment to the Weicker amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WEICKER. The amendment just tabled was the Helms perfecting amendment to the Helms prayer amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WEICKER. What the Senator from Connecticut attempted to do here was offer a perfecting amendment to the Helms amendment. Is it the Chair's position that that is not in order at this time, that we now revert to the Baucus perfecting amendment to the Weicker amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WEICKER. In other words, that a perfecting amendment to the Helms amendment is not in order to be proposed at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not want to rush anybody, but if we are not going to have another abortion—no. [Laughter.]

The Senator from North Carolina claims my nose grew an inch when I made that statement.

Really, if there are not going to be further abortion amendments, we now have this bill to deal with and its other ramifications. I am prepared now to go off the bill, come in in the morning, proceed with the amendment tree as it exists, and dispose of this matter. I remind my colleagues we have to get this bill passed. It is the debt limit bill and it has to happen. We have disposed of a big issue here. I do not even remember now what the Baucus amendment is, but in any event, we need to work our way up that tree and dispose of these measures so we can get to passage or, if necessary, we can dispose of it by some other means.

If nobody cares to go forward with an amendment at this time or with further debate, I am going to ask the Senate to go into a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I understand the position the majority leader is in. It is the hope of this Senator that when we do proceed to the pending question tomorrow, this Senator will be allowed to have the privilege of the floor when this amendment comes up.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no difficulty with that. I put this request now so all Senators may hear it.

I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate resumes consideration of the pending business, the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS) be the first recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. I would not presume to suggest something the majority leader may have already tried, but we have been on this amendment now for 2 weeks. I am curious whether it is possible to get any kind of agreement, maybe for everybody to withdraw their amendments that are pending and not offer any amendments on the debt ceiling bill, which the House is probably not going to accept anyway, and just vote up or down on the debt ceiling and get it disposed of. Is that not in th realm of possibility?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I hope it is in the realm of possibility. It would gladden my heart if that were to occur. I make this statement, that I shall make every effort to advance that suggestion. At some point, we have to dispose of this bill.

I have said for some time now that this bill is available for amendment, but we have been on it for 3 weeks now. Clearly, Members cannot offer their amendments because there have been other things pending. Circumstances are such that at some point, we have to get on with the business of the Senate. That is going to be through the proposal as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, perhaps, or with amendments dealing with them at one time or a motion to recommit with instructions. Senators should be on notice that I hope to conclude this bill sometime late tomorrow.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I make a proposition to the distinguished majority leader: Why not go ahead and vote on the Helms first-degree amendment right now? Up or down or a motion to table, whatever.

Mr. Baker. Mr. President, I would do that, but I am afraid others may not.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, my response to the Senator from North Carolina is that for weeks all we have heard is the articulate, eloquent arguments on the matter of abortion by my good friend from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD). Now the matter referred to is the matter of school prayer. The distinguished Senator from North Carolina has yet to hear from the Senator from Connecticut on that subject. I think I am at least entitled to the same amount of time on school prayer as was given to the Senator from Oregon on abortion.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Connecticut that I have just about had a surfeit of the Senator's conversation about the prayer amendment. I do not think we are going to change one vote. I do not care if we talk for 3 weeks straight, day and night, 24 hours a day. I submit, let us move on with the business of the Senate and vote up or down right now.

Mr. BAKER. I have no right to interfere, Mr. President, but let me say I really hope we can get to a vote on the remaining amendments. I have no idea that we can get a unanimous-consent agreement, but I am willing to try. We shall work on that overnight, but I think we are not likely to get that on the floor at this time.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 6 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there will be no more votes tonight.

ORDER FOR RECESS TODAY UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, Senators should be on notice that tomorrow may be a very late evening.

Now I yield the floor.

THE DISINTEGRATING PANAMA CANAL: A THREAT TO HEMISPHERIC SECURITY

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, as chairman of the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee, I am deeply concerned by reports that I have been receiving from a number of sources on the serious deterioration of the Panama Canal in terms of its maintenance and its operational readiness. The Panama Canal is a central strategic factor within the context of the security of the Western Hemisphere. Since the ill-advised passage of the legislation relating to the Panama Canal Treaty during the Carter administration, the physical integrity of the canal has suffered greatly and our Nation's security, and the security of all the Republics of this hemisphere, has thereby been degraded.

Mr. President, I should not have to remind the Senate that the Carter administration presented these treaties for our consideration with the express commitment that these treaties would assure the operation and maintenance of the canal. Indeed, the treaties were justified by the Carter administration and its supporters who said that these treaties must be approved in order to guarantee the continued operation of the canal.

Just recently, the Washington Times newspaper has published a series of important articles analyzing conditions in the Canal Zone and the operational capabilities of the canal itself. The author, Mr. William F. Wright, a professional journalist who spent many years with UPI and who speaks the Spanish language, is an eminently qualified observer. Indeed, he made it a specialty over the years to cover events in Latin America and is thoroughly familiar with the people and cultures of Latin America.

The incisive reporting by Mr. Wright corroborates reports that I have received from a number of qualified sources on the Panama Canal concerning its deteriorating condition. The question is raised as to whether or not the Panama Canal Commission has isolated the ostensible spirit and intent of the implementing legislation relating to the Panama Canal Treaty. The Commission has imposed untrained and unqualified personnel of Panamanian nationality on an organization that was once the finest of its type in the world. Mr. Wright's reporting clearly outlines the dismal state of affairs in the canal zone and the seriously imperiled canal.

Mr. President, has the Panama Canal Commission been managing the canal's operation on a prudent basis? Or has the Commission tried to further the attempts of the U.S. State Department to placate leftist forces and opinion in Panama to the detriment of not only the long-term national security interests of the United States and Panama but also to the detriment of the long-term security interests of all the republics of the Western Hemisphere?

Our hemisphere is beset with major challenges. Soviet-Cuban expansion is proceeding apace and has not been checked by a firm U.S. policy. Relations within the hemisphere between the United States and our sister republics have been gravely damaged by the wholly inappropriate policy pursued by Washington during the crisis in the Malvinas Islands. Evidence is mounting about the disintegration of the Panama Canal which is jeopardizing the operational capabilities of the canal and hemispheric security.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that three articles by Mr. Wright which appeared in the Washington Times be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times, Aug. 30, 1982]

"BIG DITCH" REVISITED: SIGNS OF DETERIORATION RAMPANT

(EDITOR'S NOTE: Washington Times staff writer William F. Wright visited the Panama Canal in 1978 at the height of the Senate debate over the controversial new canal treaties. He returned there recently to find the canal hobbled by the agreements and faced with a potential exodus of American employees that could cripple the historic waterway. This is the first of a three-part report.)

(By William F. Wright)

ABOARD OVERSEAS NEW YORK, PANAMA CANAL—Capt. John Wallace steps nimbly from a motor launch and clambers up a precarious rope ladder to the deck of the Overseas New York, A red and white flag flutters up the ship's halyard signaling that a Panama Canal pilot is on board.

Wallace, 62, is making his 3,142nd transit of a waterway that to the casual eye appears little changed since the Carter administration initiated the canal's gradual turnover to Panama nearly three years ago. But Wallace urges the visitors to "take a closer look" as we begin our 50-mile passage from the Pacific to the Caribbean.

A "closer look" during the 12-hour voyage turns up unmistakeable signs that the "Big Ditch," the once-proud symbol of American ingenuity, dedication, efficency and old-fashioned patriotism, is increasingly plagued with serious and, in some cases, dangerous maintenance and operational problems, And the canal's ability to operate with reasonable efficiency in the years ahead, before Panama assumes outright ownership in the year 2000, seems to be in jeopardy with the prospect of a potentially crippling flight of much of its remaining U.S. work force.

4:30 A.M.

The first signs of change and decline greet us at the start of our trip at the Port of Balboa, formerly under U.S. jurisdiction and now controlled by Panama. A Panamanian National Guard sergeant at the gate holds our party up for several minutes while he slowly checks passports and other documents. Canal pilots say they are occasionally frisked by guards at the gate determined to show that "Panama is in charge now."

The once-spartan dockside is filthy. Stray dogs wander into the area. We find the motor launch dispatcher sound asleep atop a filing cabinet. Slumbering linesmen who will handle guide lines from our ship are sprawled everywhere. At one point after Panama assumed control of the port, wooden pilings that protect ships from the concrete pier wall had fallen into such disrepair that the Panama Canal Commission, a U.S. government agency that now operates the canal, was forced to replace them.

5:30 A.M.

Another somber sign of the times as our ship approaches Miraflores Locks, the first set of concrete-and-water stairways that will ultimately lift us 85 feet over the Continental Divide and down again—from sea level to sea level. Gone are the red, white and blue bicentennial colors that marked the canal as an American waterway before the treaties took effect. In deference to Panama, which now exercises sovereignty over the canal area, tugboats, dredges and electric locomotive "mules" that help guide ships through the locks have been scrubbed clean of the offending colors, and the tugs no longer fly the Stars and Stripes.

As we nudge into the first lock chamber, Wallace moves to the starboard wing of the bridge to better maneuver the big ship into the lock. Our beam is 105 feet. The locks are 110 feet wide, giving us a clearance of only 2½ feet on each side. Laden with 63,720 tons of Alaskan crude oil bound for a refinery on the East Coast of the United States, we sit so low in the water that at times we will have a clearance of less than a foot between our keel and the concrete floor of the lock chamber.

Mindful of some recent costly accidents in the canal, including one involving our own ship, Wallace says he now coaxes vessels through the waterway "with a great deal of circumspection, hoping for the best but prepared for the worst."

Wallace and other senior pilots deplore the lowering of qualifications for the pilot force, once considered the aristocracy of the American canal community. Pilots were previously recruited from the ranks of sea captains. Today, Panamanians need only possess a third mate's license to join the force and most of them are recruited from the canal's tugboat fleet.

Capt. Theodore Johnson, skipper of another transiting tanker, the Pennsylvania Sun, expresses concern at the pilot situation.

"When they start sending these Panamanians aboard that have only had tugboat experience, that's going to bother the hell out of me because they don't know what a big ship can do or what to do with a big ship," he says.

6:15 A.M.

We enter the first lock chamber at Miraflores. In the control house, Hubert Webster, 52, a veteran of 16 years with the canal organization, is having his own problems. A forest of cards with the word DANGER in big red letters on them covers much of his control board. Each card represents a piece of lock machinery that is out of commission. Webster says that one of the cards represents a set of backup "guard" gates that if working could prevent Miraflores Lake ahead of us from cascading over the entire locks in the kind of accident canal officials dread. He said such a catastrophe could happen if a ship struck the main gates holding the lake back with enough force to rip them from their concrete moorings.

"We could lose the whole damn lake," Webster says. "It would shut down the canal." He says the backup gates have been down for at least three weeks, a "hell of a long time" for such a critical piece of canal machinery to be out of commission.

Eight other cards represent faulty backup "rising stem" valves that control the flow of water to and from the lock chamber. Webster says that if enough main and backup valves fail to operate, the effect could be to suddenly "drydock" a ship in the lock chamber, sending it crashing to the concrete lock floor with enough force to crush her hull, rudder and propellers and damage the chamber floor.

"The reason why we have these problems is quite simple," Webster says. "We now have to give preference to hiring Panamanians who are not qualified. Maintenance suffers. How the hell can you take someone who has done little but wield a machete and train him to fix such complex machinery?"

Below on the lock wall, senior lockmaster William Melody, 41, is worrying about his blood pressure.

"Maintenance has just gone to s---," he says, using a well-worn expletive. "There is such a rush to push Panamanians in here they don't seem to care if they are qualified or not. I've become so exasperated that in the last two years my blood pressure has gone up 10 points."

Our ship begins to move out of the second lock chamber at Miraflores. Melody, Webster and another control house operator, William Benny, wave goodbye. It may be more than just a passing gesture. All three say they will probably take early retirement if the canal's American employees lose their commissary, postal and other privileges provided by the U.S. military, as they are scheduled to do in 1984.

Many other U.S. employees say they will leave also. Of the 1,711 Americans still with the canal organization (down from 3,591 when the treaties went into effect), about 550 are eligible for early retirement. Canal officials say the departure of such a large number would have a "severe" effect on the canal operation.

7:24 A.M.

We clear Miraflores Locks. Ahead lies Miraflores Lake, more maintenance-troubled locks, treacherous Gaillard Cut, concern among the canal area's American community over the sometimes harsh Panamanian National Guard now policing their neighborhoods, and dread that malaria and yellow fever could return to the region.

PANAMANIAN GUARD TAKEOVER DISMAYS U.S. CANAL WORKERS

(EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the second of three articles on the Panama Canal, three years after the new canal treaties were signed. The writer grew up in Panama and is a veteran canal watcher.)

(By William F. Wright)

ABOARD OVERSEAS NEW YORK, PANAMA CANAL.—Capt. John Wallace surveys the jungle-fringed expanse of blue-green water from our starboard bridge. Then he breaks for breakfast in the wheelhouse and some blunt observations on a topic he says is not so digestible: the new Panama Canal treaties.

Wallace, a veteran canal pilot, is guiding our tanker through Miraflores Lake, 54 feet above sea level, in the Panama Canal. Only the throb of our engines and the chirping of birds along the banks break the early morning stillness. All seems serene. But apprehension is in the air.

Inside the wheelhouse, the talk turns to one of the changes under the new agreements that has caused the most concern among the canal's American employees and their dependents: The Panamanian National Guard's takeover of law and order in the former U.S.-controlled Canal Zone, abolished under the treaties.

"Having the Guardia in our neighborhoods is something that does not go down easily with a lot of people here," he says. It is a sentiment often heard during our passage through the canal.

To outsiders, the Guardia's presence may not seem like much to swallow, but in an area accustomed since canal-construction days to its own highly regarded U.S. police force and courts, Panama's often heavy-handed soldier-police force is viewed with considerable circumspection.

"Our people are leery and afraid to get into any kind of trouble with the Guardia," says Frederick A. Cotton, head of the General Services Bureau of the Panama Canal Commission, a U.S. government agency that now operates the canal with increasing Panamanian participation.

Cotton says the former "Zonians" have reason to be concerned. He cites as an example a recent "frightening" encounter he says two teen-age daughters of U.S. canal employees had with Panamanian guardsmen. He gives this account of the incident.

The girls, Tara Brown and Maurya Ridge, were driving home at night through a forest preserve in the former Canal Zone when two off-duty guardsmen in an unmarked car and civilian clothes pulled alongside and shouted at them to stop. The girls, frightened that they would be assaulted if they stopped, speeded up. The other car, which had since picked up a uniformed guardsman, caught up with them and forced them to halt. The uniformed guardsman drew his revolver, pointed it at the girls and ordered them out of the car. The girls, by now "petrified," were detained and taken to the former Canal Zone police station in Balboa, now under National Guard control. There they were refused permission to phone their parents and to go to the bathroom. One of the girls was forced to polish a brass rail she leaned against at the station. The girls, by then in tears, were taken to night court where a Panamanian judge eventually released them—three hours after they had first been detained. No charges were filed against them.

"This is one of a number of instances where our people have been detained for hours by the Guardia and the Guardia has failed to notify the commission despite a clear treaty obligation to do so," Cotton says.

"The plain fact is our people's civil rights are being ignored," he says. "The problem is that the Guardia are not trained as police officers. They are, in effect, a Latin American army with all that that implies."

Cotton says such cases of alleged harassment of American residents of the old Canal Zone stem from the Guardia's determination to "show who's in charge now" following the end of U.S. juridiction over the area.

"It's their ball game now, and they're making sure we know it," he says.

Asked why he is speaking so openly, Cotton, born and raised in the zone and civil-affairs director in the old Canal Zone government, says he will probably take early retirement next year. Thus, he says, he does not feel as constrained to remain silent as might other U.S. canal employees with longer service to go. He notes that nearly half of the canal organization's 1,711 American employees will be eligible for early retirement within several years, "and I'm betting most of them will take it."

"They (the Panamanian government) are trying to get us to leave," Cotton says. He says a move to force such an exodus would be tantamount to Panama committing "suicide" because it would cripple the vital waterway that the little country will ultimately control (by the year 2000) under the treaties.

Another worry among the canal's American community is Panama's assumption of much of the responsibility for sanitation in the old zone, where stringent mosquito control had been a way of life since Col. William Gorgas conquered malaria and yellow fever during early construction days. In some areas of the former zone, where the grass was previously kept neatly cut, it now grows with abandon, providing breeding grounds for mosquitos that can spread disease.

8:10 A.M.

Our ship enters Pedro Miguel Locks, the second set of concrete and water stairways along our journey through the isthmus.

Ashore, senior lockmaster John Adams, 43, is seeing red over a green light. When it is working, the light signals that the gates ahead of us are clear of floating lake debris that might cause one of the gate strut arms to snap. With the light not working, Adams says he relies on "pure faith" that nothing is obstructing the gates before he orders them opened.

"I have been trying to get them to fix it for days," Adams says of Panamanian electricians hired by the canal organization since the treaties came into force, "In the old days, if you called an electrician they would come like that," he says, snapping his fingers. "We have electricians these days who I wouldn't let change a lightbulb in my home."

Adams, echoing the view of other Americans we encountered along the canal, says many Panamanians who went to work for the canal organization before the new agreements are valued, dedicated employees. But he says others hired under a treaty-mandated, pro-Panamanian employment policy, "just don't give a s——."

Capt. Wallace, our veteran pilot, says the attitude of some of the more recently hired Panamanian operators of the electric locomotives that help shepherd ships through the locks have become so lax that they are often seen "reading comics or even watching portable television sets" on the job.

9:30 A.M.

We clear Pedro Miguel Locks and enter Gaillard Cut, the nine-mile stretch through the Continental Divide that posed the greatest challenge in digging the canal more than a half a century ago. The cut still plagues the canal with landslides that disrupt traffic.

I go below to the officer's mess. Ahead lies more rumblings of discontent among the canal's U.S. work force, and a final set of locks that will take us to the Caribbean, including a lock chamber where our tanker sustained costly damage on an earlier transit.

TWO TREATIES POSE ROUGH SAILING FOR WATERWAY

(EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the last of three articles on the Panama Canal three years after the new canal treaties were signed. The writer grew up in Panama and is a veteran canal watcher.)

(By William F. Wright)

ABOARD OVERSEAS NEW YORK, PANAMA CANAL—Capt. John Wallace moves to the port wing of our bridge to keep a watchful eye on an encroaching lock wall. The future is also closing in on this historic waterway and he doesn't like what he sees.

The 62-year-old canal pilot is nearing the end of his 3,142nd transit of the Panama Canal. The Caribbean sparkles ahead of us in the distance under clear blue skies. But Wallace sees storm clouds: the consequences of the three-year-old Panama Canal treaties.

"Things have deteriorated in every way and it's going to get worse," he says.

Wallace echoes a sentiment we have heard frequently as our ship, laden with 63,720 tons of Alaskan crude oil, has wended its way through locks and lakes on its journey from the Pacific. It is a view held almost unanimously by the American canal employees we have met along the way.

The passage has pointed up a startling irony. The treaties that were supposed to ensure the canal's continued efficient operation seem to be having the opposite effect. Our transit has turned up clear signs that the "Big Ditch," the once-proud symbol of American ingenuity, dedication and efficiency, is suffering from increasing maintenance and operational problems under the treaties. An many of the canal's remaining U.S. employees may leave before they have had enough time to train their Panamanian replacements.

1:57 P.M.

Our tanker, one of the largest vessels able to transit the canal, squeezes into the first of three chambers at Gatun Locks, the final set of concrete-and-water stairways that will lower us 85 feet to the Caribbean.

Sometimes the descent can be shaky—and costly. No one knows this better than Capt. Joe Christian, 56, one of the canal's longest-serving pilots.

Christian says he was taking the Overseas New York through Gatun Locks last April 26 when the ship fell victim to an "incredible" accident, the likes of which he says he hasn't seen in his 30 years as a canal pilot. Shaking his head and saying he still can't believe it, he gives this account.

The tanker was entering the second lock chamber when the Panamanian control house operator, thinking the ship already was completely in the lock and clear of the previous lock's concrete step, began lowering the water in the chamber. As the water dropped, the ship's stern struck the step sill, bounced up and struck it again, damaging its rudder and hull and wrenching its boilers out of alignment. Agents for the ship placed the damage at about $2.5 million, considering the high cost of taking the ship out of service for repairs. They said a claim would be filed against the Panama Canal Commission, a U.S. government agency that operates the waterway under the treaties.

Christian says a report issued by a canal commission investigating team found the control house operator at fault for failing to ensure the vessel had cleared the sill before lowering the water.

"It was negligence, pure and simple," Christian says. He says the control house operator could have averted the accident by paying attention to large sign markers along the lock wall showing graduated distances between the lock gates. He says the accident also could have been avoided if a guard gate, which when closed keeps vessels away from the sill, had been operating. The gate had been out of commission for about six weeks, he says.

Christian says the accident is symptomatic of the "serious" deterioration in the canal's operation and maintenance since the treaties went into effect three years ago. The treaties initiated, initiating the waterway's gradual transfer to Panama, which will receive outright ownership of the canal on Dec. 31, 1999.

"I reckon that on about 75 percent of my trips through the canal, something goes wrong either with a piece of machinery or because someone is not doing his job," he says. "We are being forced to hire Panamanians who just are not qualified. You can't go out and shake a palm tree and when a fellow falls out with a screwdriver in his hand, say he's an electrician."

Christian says he's so exasperated with the situation he will "most likely" leave the canal organization in 1984, when U.S. employees are scheduled to lose their commissary, postal and other U.S. military-provided privileges. Capt. Wallace, our senior pilot on this transit, predicts that many other U.S. canal employees will also leave. "I think things are going to get so bad a lot of people won't want to stay," he says.

Dennis P. McAuliffe, head of the canal commission and former commanding general of the Panama-based U.S. Southern Command, acknowledges that such an exodus would be disastrous. "We couldn't operate the canal without them," he says.

But McAuliffe maintains that the three years the canal has been operating since the treaties came into force demonstrate that the new system of running the waterway "does work." He also contends that morale among the U.S. work force is "generally very good." Representatives of U.S. employees say otherwise.

"Morale is lower than whale s---," says James J. O'Donnell, president emeritus of the local chapter of the American Federation of Government Employees and the canal's chief power dispatcher. Joyce Payne, president of the Pacific Advisory Council representing the bulk of the American canal community, says one reason morale is low is that there is a feeling among the remaining U.S. work force that "all the commission wants to do is get rid of us" to make way for Panamanians. She says a lot of U.S. employees are afraid to speak out for fear of losing their jobs.

Fred Cotton, born and raised in the old Canal Zone and now director of the canal commission's bureau of general services, has no such qualms.

"Morale is terrible," he says. "The reason is the crappy way the commission has been treating its U.S. employees." The fact is, he says, the much-villified "Zonians" did a "fantastic job in running the canal before the treaties. Sure, we fought against the treaties but we've been trying to make them work and we've been stepped on for our trouble."

The waterway's maintenance and operational problems come at a time when the canal is struggling to cope with increasing traffic. According to the latest projections, a record 14,300 ships are expected to transit the canal this year.

Although a soon-to-be-completed interocean pipeline across the Panamanian isthmus is expected to deprive it of most of its lucrative oil traffic, canal economists say canal traffic will continue to grow in the long term.

Some senior canal officials, who asked not to be identified, already are beginning to question Panama's ability to operate a waterway vital to work shipping. An estimated 97 percent of the world's merchant fleet of some 60,000 vessels still can transit the canal.

The canal's value to the United States is even greater, especially when taken together with the Caribbean region as a whole. Nearly half of America's trade and more than half of its strategic materials pass through the canal or the Gulf of Mexico.

U.S. defense officials say the canal remains a "major asset" for the U.S. in its ability to facilitate the deployment of U.S. forces to various parts of the world. They point out that all U.S. warships except 13 of the largest aircraft carriers can transit the canal and most future U.S. warships will be specifically designed to transit the canal.

4:15 P.M.

We clear the last lock chamber at Gatun and head for the Caribbean. Capt. Wallace and three other assistant pilots who were needed to help take our big ship through the canal shake hands with the skipper on the bridge and board a launch for shore.

On shore, Wallace looks back on his long career of shepherding ships through the Panama Canal with mixed emotions.

"Every time I go through the canal, I feel proud to be part of something grand and wonderful that the U.S. accomplished against great odds," he says. "But when I think of the treaties, I think of how my country was sold out."

PANAMA TO ASSUME FULL CONTROL AT END OF THE CENTURY

The Panama Canal's gradual transfer to Panama involves two treaties. Here are their key provisions:

Panama will assume full control and ownership of the canal on Dec. 31, 1999. Until then, the canal will be operated by the Panama Canal Commission, a U.S. government agency, with increasing Panamanian participation.

The former U.S.-controlled Canal Zone has been abolished, with Panama now exercising full jurisdiction over the area.

An annual payment out of canal revenues of 30 cents per ton of cargo transiting the canal will be paid Panama until it assumes control of the canal. In fiscal 1981, this came to $56.8 million. Panama also is to receive an additional fixed annual annuity of $10 million.

The U.S. remains responsibile for the canal's defense until Panama assumes control of the waterway at the end of 1999, when U.S. forces are scheduled to withdraw from Panama.

Panama agrees to maintain the permanent neutrality of the canal after it assumes control, keeping the waterway open in war and peace to all ships.

SENATOR RANDOLPH HONORED BY AIR FORCE ASSOCIATION

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, earlier this week, the 180,000-member Air Force Association honored our colleague Senator RANDOLPH with its Presidential citation for a professional lifetime of support of commercial and military aviation.

As all of us know, this tribute is well deserved for an individual whose vision and insight has led to the development of the Nation's air transport system and strengthened our national defense.

From the start of his long and distinguished career in the Congress, Senator RANDOLPH has been a leader in legislative efforts on behalf of aviation.

As a Congressman in 1938, he sponsored the Civil Aeronautics Act on which today's air transportation system is based. In 1941, he was the first Member of Congress to introduce legislation to create a separate Air Force. Six years later, the Air Force was established as a separate entity under the National Defense Act which reorganized the Armed Forces.

While still in the House in 1945, he cosponsored the Federal Aid to Airports Act, one of the most significant aviation laws ever enacted. He was among the leaders in setting up the Civil Air Patrol, sponsored the bill to establish the National Air and Space Museum and led the fight for Federal funds for air marking and cross-wind landing gear, two safety developments of great importance to early pilots.

After his election to the Senate in 1958, Senator RANDOLPH continued to promote the cause of an air transportation system adequate to the Nation's needs. He was a major sponsor of legislation creating the airport and airway trust fund and he authored legislation establishing National Aviation Day.

Senator RANDOLPH is a member of the National Aeronautic Association and of the National Advisory Council of the Embry-Riddell Aeronautical Institute.

Congratulations are in order to the senior Senator from West Virginia on this most prestigious award and I ask unanimous consent that two articles detailing Senator RANDOLPH's accomplishments as aviation's legislative pioneer be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AVIATION'S LEGISLATIVE PIONEER

(By J. Ponte, Jr.)

Senator Jennings Randolph (D-W. Va.) began a distinguished congressional career over 45 years ago, taking office as a member of the House of Representatives on March 4, 1933, the same day Franklin D. Roosevelt became President. But the legislator who was to become one of Congress' staunchest aviation advocates had his interest in airplanes stirred long before coming to Washington.

In the Nation's Capital this month, as he prepares to begin his fourth full Senate term at age 76, Senator Randolph is being honored as one of aviation's true friends. The National Aeronautic Association, which presented its former member with the Elder Statesman of Aviation Award in 1972, will present the senator with one of aviation's highest honors, the Wright Brothers Memorial Trophy, citing his "distinguished support of aviation in the United States by successful initiation and advocacy of major aviation legislation over more than four decades of service in Congress and as an airline executive."

"Prior to coming to Washington, D.C., I had an intense interest in aviation in West Virginia," the senator recalls. "I felt as a young man that we had peculiar problems of transportation due to the rugged terrain of West Virginia, which could favor aviation rather than hamper it. We had difficulty in establishing road systems because of the high cost and we had a rail system that mostly ran east-west, very little north-south. And so as I came into my late teens, I began to think of the possibility of aviation for strengthening the transportation system of the state."

After graduating magna cum laude from Salem College in West Virginia in 1924, Randolph worked for several years as an editor before assuming a position at Davis and Elkins College in 1926. He served as a professor of journalism and public speaking, director of athletics and college trustee until 1932—the start of his political career. Before joining Congress, the aviation-minded Randolph had already helped in the development of the airport at Elkins, the small town that has been his West Virginia residence for over 50 years. On Nov. 17, 1973, the Elkins-Randolph County Airport was dedicated Jennings Randolph Field.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS ACT

As a member of the House, Randolph's interest and involvement with aviation heightened. The young congressman became exposed to aviation's growing pains and as his awareness of its many problems grew, so did his faith in the airplane's promise.

One of the first and certainly one of the most important pieces of legislation with which then-Representative Randolph became associated was the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, the law which he calls the "Magna Carta" of the airline industry. Randolph helped to write the law which chartered regulatory policy for the nation's air carriers and established what is now the Civil Aeronautics Board (CAB).

Recent legislation to deregulate the airlines, still governed by the 1938 Act, and to eventually phase out CAB has not been received enthusiastically by Randolph. "We don't want people to just jump in and take the cream of the crop. After all, [the airlines] have spent years and years developing their programs," the senator says in explaining his opposition.

Of great concern to Randolph is the possible deterioration of airline service to the country's small communities. He feels that deregulation will permit carriers to withdraw service just as freely as it would allow them to enter a profitable route. A partial solution, the senator feels, is an expanded short-haul commuter airline service. Randolph calls the present commuter network "a fine development" and predicts: "Commuters will provide a tremendously important service in the future. With our growth of population all over this country, there are areas that should be served."

AIRMAIL PICKUP PROPONENT

Senator Randolph's interest in providing air service to the nation's small communities stems from his long-standing philosophy that aviation should benefit all people. He displayed this feeling back in the airlines' early decades as an advocate of the airmail pickup system. Authored by Randolph, the Experimental Air Mail Service Act was passed in 1938 to develop a service by which mail could be picked up and delivered by air without the aircraft having to land. Dr. Lytle S. Adams had invented the pickup device, a forerunner to later sea rescue and spacecraft recovery methods, and the Randolph bill was designed to establish a test program for what would hopefully one day become a viable postal system. The pickup system would not only save time, but also enable areas without airports to enjoy airmail service.

The flights began in May 1939 and proved to be most successful, flourishing during the war years. After six years of operation, the pickup carrier, All American Aviation (which eventually became Allegheny Airlines), had logged over 5.1 million revenue miles and made nearly 296,000 pickups and deliveries. (See "Triple 'A' Airline," Air Line Pilot, March 1978.)

Naturally, the experiment's success thrilled the senator who had written an article for the January 1940 issue of Popular Aviation magazine entitled "Airmail for Punkin Center," describing the system and how it could benefit the country's small towns and rural areas. But after the war CAB felt that feederline routes, combining passengers with mail service, would better serve less populated portions of the nation. The final pickup and delivery was made in July 1949. Noting phlegmatic mail delivery as well as the country's clogged roads, Randolph feels that a similar system might improve postal service today.

SYNTHETIC FUELS

Some five years after the airmail pickup experiment began, the now-veteran congressman from West Virginia once again displayed an innovative spirit and, in this case particularly, perspicacious foresight. Randolph introduced legislation authorizing research and development of synthetic fuels derivation processes. He had been studying German methods of extracting gasoline and fuel oil from coal, oil shale and other materials and felt the United States should develop similar technology. To demonstrate the idea's feasibility. Randolph accompanied Civil Air Patrol Major Arthur C. Hyde, who flew a single-engine Stinson 175 miles from Morgantown, W. Va., to Washington, D.C., in November 1943 on fuel derived from coal.

The synthetic fuels bill passed in 1944 and some $83 million was appropriated to advance the technology. Advocating the importance of energy research for aviation as well as other requirements, Randolph prophesied when he wrote in January 1944: "We must not, for the sake of our national security, come to depend on foreign countries. We must plan for the conservation of our national oil resources and the immediate development of practical methods for the commercial production of synthetic fuels, so that it cannot be said in the future—'too little and too late.'" Nevertheless, with the end of World War II interest waned and the project was phased out in the early 1950's with funds still remaining from the original appropriation.

But Congressman Randolph still had other important aviation programs to pursue before his 12-year respite from Congress began, following a defeat in the 1946 election. These included authoring legislation to provide aeronautical training for pilots, mechanics and technicians as well as aviation courses in high schools. Randolph also spearheaded efforts to provide funds for airport improvements including the National Federal Aid to Airports Act in 1945 which he authored. As a senator in 1968, he introduced the Airport Development Act that led to the Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970, which presently funds the Airport Development Aid Program.

DEFENSE AND POSTERITY

World War II deomonstrated to the world the importance of air power, but Congressman Randolph had recognized that fact years before. "I felt that we had too much reliance in our military planning and programming on the Navy and so I introduced legislation [in April 1941] that would give greater emphasis to aircraft," he remembers, explaining his commitment to a separate Air Force even before the war began. Randolph's 1941 resolution was not adopted; however, when the National Defense Act of 1947 became law and established the Department of the Air Force, the senator's significant contribution was remembered.

Along with his many achievements in regulation, education and experimentation, Senator Randolph long sought recognition for aviation's vital role and particularly stressed the need for a place to preserve its history. In May 1939, his resolution calling for a National Aviation Day was adopted. Each year since, the President has proclaimed a date on which the nation officially salutes its aviation heritage.

In 1946, Congress approved another Jennings Randolph measure—this one to establish a National Air Museum. According to the one-time educator, the July 1976 opening of the National Air and Space Museum in Washington, D.C., was well worth the wait. He talks about the facility with understandable pride: "I walk through there sometimes and I stand and watch the people . . . and listen to the comments of fathers talking to their little children, explaining the museum's marvels. It's a great feeling."

CIVILIAN SERVICE

From 1947 until his election to the Senate in 1958, Randolph continued his involvement with aviation by serving as assistant to the president of Capital Airlines, a trunk carrier which merged with United in 1961. The former editor also served as Capital's director of public relations. During this period with the airline, he traveled Capital's route system addressing school audiences, rotary clubs, chambers of commerce and a host of other educational, civic and social organizations.

Senator Randolph, who never held a pilot's license but did solo under a student certificate, remembers having had a good rapport with Capital's pilots, some of whom accompanied him during speaking engagements. The organizer and first president (1944–1945) of the Congressional Flying Club, Randolph describes today's airline pilots as a "highly competent group of men and women dedicated not only to flying, but to serving people as well."

In the Senate, Randolph continued working in a number of important areas. Among his non-aviation legislative achievements was sponsorship of the 26th Amendment to the Constitution, ratified in 1971, which granted voting rights to 18-year-olds. Most recently, he cosponsored legislation entitling World War II WASP's (Woman Airforce Service Pilots) to veterans benefits.

Looking ahead, Senator Randolph sees many challenges for aviation, especially in improving safety to prevent catastrophes like the September San Diego crash. "I think we need to have a very careful planning program about the mix of large and small aircraft," he advises. Randolph also sees a need for an in-depth review of the entire aviation program, including the air traffic control system.

The Wright Trophy recipient for the year which marks the 75th anniversary of powered flight sees another important goal for aviation: "I think that the use of air power is not just to deter an enemy . . . I'd like to see aviation become the instrument for peace and understanding—not to separate people, but to bring them together. That has not yet been accomplished."

PIONEER EFFORTS ON CAPITOL HILL

(By W. Lawrence Graves)

Generally, candidates for Congress are ambitious, hard-driving people. Successful candidates are probably a little more ambitious and a little more hard-driving. And the competition in Congress creates a climate of intense combativeness.

One of the most successful people in congressional politics is Senator Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.). Senator Randolph has achieved a remarkable electoral record in being elected and reelected to represent West Virginia in Congress for almost 40 years. He is also known as one of the most capable and effective legislators in Congress.

What makes Senator Randolph so special, however, is that in the hard-bitten business of congressional politics, he has compiled his successful record while being almost universally admired and loved. All who know him recognize that he is the person to emulate, and they would be proud to be even 50 percent as successful.

He is a thoroughly constructive and committed individual whose ideas may have seemed too advanced when he dreamed them; but, once implemented, they are ideas everyone wonders why he did not think of first. His career is remarkable both in his foresight in aviation and in his ability to bring his ideas to reality.

Aviation is fortunate that Senator Randolph has an unceasing dedication to its development and improvement. He is a true aviation pioneer and is one of aviation's outstanding spokesmen and leaders.

Everything Jennings Randolph has done, he had done well. And he has done it with a conscientious concern for the way in which it is achieved. (Machiavelli would not be served well by Jennings Randolph, who believes the means is as important as the end.)

He graduated magna cum laude from college and never looked back. His early and consistent involvement in aviation was so notable, he was awarded an honorary degree in aeronautical science in 1943. Among his awards and citations are six major aviation-related honors, including the Wright Brothers Memorial Trophy.

In 1946, Senator Randolph authored the legislation that led to the construction of the National Air and Space Museum in Washington, D.C. It is the busiest museum in the entire world with more than 10 million visitors last year.

General aviation is looking for fuel alternatives in 1981. In 1943 Senator Randolph flew from Morgantown, West Virginia, to Washington, D.C., in a single-engine Stinson powered by fuel derived from coal to dramatize the need for alternative fuels.

"We must not come to depend on foreign countries. We must plan for the conservation of our national oil resources and the immediate development of practical methods for the commercial production of synthetic fuels," Senator Randolph wrote, not last week, but in 1944.

He also founded and was the first president of the Congressional Flying Club.

Senator Randolph represents West Virginia, a state whose topography looks like rumpled corduroy and which uses aviation as access to the national economy. He has combined his love for his home state with his love for aviation—staying an advocate of both. His string of remarkable legislative accomplishments has left an indelible mark on West Virginia as well as aviation.

Seniority plays a role in congressional politics and with the switch in Senate control last January, from the Democrats to the Republicans, some Democratic committee chairmen, whose influence was based upon chairing of a committee or subcommittee, have lost most of that senatorial influence.

Senator Randolph, on the other hand, has always relied on his special integrity and good will for his accomplishments. His tools of political power are not lost with a committee chairmanship. Senator Randolph will continue to exercise leadership and direction in the Senate, which is all for the good.

ACID RAIN

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, Kathleen Bennett, Assistant Administrator for Air, Noise, and Radiation of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, recently presented valuable testimony to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. At a hearing focusing on the phenomenon known as acid rain and on congressional attempts to control it, Mrs. Bennett listed the major scientific uncertainties surrounding acid deposition—the deposition of acidic materials, whether wet or dry, from the air onto the surface of the Earth or upon structures or objects—despite current knowledge of it:

Currently, there is no good measure of when acidity in rain should be considered detrimental. The conventional definition is based on pure water saturated with atmospheric carbon dioxide. It has a pH of 5.6, which is, therefore, the theoretical level of "normal" rainfall. Naturally occurring precipitation may be considerably more or less acidic. Hence, at this point, there is no clear reference for developing a remedial program.

Although oxides of sulfur and nitrogen are considered to be precursors of acid deposition, the transformation processes are not yet understood. There are significant differences in the composition and acidity of rain between seasons, geographical regions, and even during and between storms. However, no clear evidence is yet available which can explain or accurately predict how precursors are transformed or why the observed variations occur.

Another uncertainty exists with regard to the transport and distribution of precursor emissions. Remote regions of the globe have rains with a low pH, as do Hawaii and Alaska. to resolve such uncertainties, better data and more accurate modeling techniques are necessary.

Additional uncertainties include the relative impact of local sources as compared to more distant sources; the role of other photochemical pollutants and how they affect acidity levels; the relative importance of the potential effects from acid deposition on different receptors (i.e., aquatics, forests, materials, etc.); and others.

Mrs. Bennett goes on to mention recent studies on the question of the long-range transport of pollutants and concludes that:

These studies, in presenting opposing theories on the cause of the acid deposition problem, emphasize the degree of the current uncertainty on a question fundamental to a regulator and the consequent need for further research.

We do need to take steps to mitigate the effects of acid deposition in the Northeast. But any control strategy that we adopt must be guaranteed to accomplish its stated goal. How can the Congress responsibly impose a multibillion-dollar pollution control program on the American people—and that is what the front-running plan will cost the taxpayer—without the assurance that the expected environmental benefits will accrue?

Mr. President, we do not yet have the solid scientific data base on which to predicate such a program. I urge my colleagues to read in its entirety Kathleen Bennett's statement before the Senate Energy Committee. I ask unanimous consent that it be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF KATHLEEN M. BENNETT

Good morning, Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee. I am Kathleen M. Bennett, Assistant Administrator for Air, Noise, and Radiation of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. I am pleased to appear before you to discuss the Agency's views on acid deposition as it may affect the use of fossil fuels, as well as the recent Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works' action on acid deposition.

While acid deposition is certainly not a new issue, our understanding of it has increased greatly in recent years—and so has our concern. In 1980 Congress authorized a ten-year study of the problem. The Reagan Administration is committed to resolving the issues surrounding acid deposition. President Reagan, in expressing his determination to seek reauthorization and in outlining 11 principles for Clean Air Act review, called for the acceleration of research on acid deposition—research which this Committee authorized and directed just two years ago. The President has therefore increased comprehensive acid deposition research funding by more than 70 percent from fiscal year 1981 to fiscal year 1983.

There are those who believe that the acid deposition problem is caused, for the most part, by sulfur dioxide emissions from midwestern coal-burning power plants, which are transformed into acidic compounds in the upper atmosphere, transported over long distances toward the northeast, and deposited in poorly buffered, acid-sensitive lakes. Nitrogen oxide emissions are thought to contribute to acidity as well, and ozone also apparently plays a role in the atmospheric processes. Other effects attributed to acid deposition include materials effects on marble or painted surfaces, forestry effects, crop growth, soil acidity, and heavy metal migration in drinking water supplies.

In the face of this, there is tremendous pressure to "do something"—to control the precursor emissions now, while the study continues.

Why, then, does the Administration not favor the immediate imposition of an emission control program?

At the base of the Administration policy is the fact that the Clean Air Act of 1970, with its 1977 Amendments, is already addressing all three of the precursor pollutants of concern. For instance, since the mid-1970's, the sulfur dioxide emissions from coal-fired power plants have decreased even though coal-fired electric generating capacity has been increased during the same period by almost 60 percent. The implementation of the Act through Federal ambient standards, State plans for control of new and existing sources, and new source performance standards for new plants apply to these precursor pollutants.

An apparent difficulty is that the Act is aimed at protecting against ambient effects experienced locally, and does not directly deal with secondary products of pollution that may be experienced far from the source. Given the vigorous prevention and control program already in place in this country—probably the best in the world—the question before us is whether an additional program is necessary to protect against more distant effects.

This is why a study program is needed, and why the Clean Air Act gives us the confidence so that we need not move precipitously. The tremendous progress made in recent years in understanding the problem now enables us to ask the more practical questions that a regulatory agency must resolve in order to design an environmentally and economically effective program which can be defended before those suffering from the effects of acid deposition and those who will bear the cost of trying to remedying them.

I will first briefly describe the state of knowledge and the uncertainties requiring resolution and the need for responsible action, and then outline our analysis of the impacts that could be expected if the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee proposal were to become law.

ACID DEPOSITION—KNOWLEDGE AND UNCERTAINTIES

"Acid deposition" is a general term for the deposition of acidic materials, whether wet or dry, from the air onto the surface of the earth or upon structures or objects.

In several areas of North America, acid deposition occurs in varying degrees of severity. However, the circumstances of its formation, the nature of its effects under various conditions, and the feasibility of potential controls are the subject of widespread debate.

There is considerable information on some aspects of the emissions of oxides of sulfur and nitrogen which are considered to be the precursors of acid deposition. The majority of man-made emissions of sulfur oxides in the United States comes from utilities; the remainder comes from other combustion sources, non-ferrous smelters, and transportation sources. U.S. nitrogen oxide emissions come mainly from transportation and from utilities and industrial boilers.

Emissions tend to be highly interactive, and multiple emissions must be considered simultaneously. Both sulfur oxides and nitrogen oxides can be transformed respectively into sulfuric acid and nitric acids by reacting with moisture and other substances in the atmosphere. These transformations can take place in clouds, in rain droplets, or after deposition. Depending on a number of variables, emissions may be deposited relatively near their sources or transported over great distances.

Despite the current knowledge concerning acid deposition, a number of major scientific uncertainties remain unresolved. These include:

(1) Currently there is no good measure of when acidity in rain should be considered detrimental. The conventional definition is based on pure water saturated with atmospheric carbon dioxide. It has a pH of 5.6, which is, therefore, the theoretical level of "normal" rainfall. Naturally occurring precipitation may be considerably more or less acidic. Hence, at this point, there is no clear reference for developing a remedial program.

(2) Although oxides of sulfur and nitrogen are considered to be precursors of acid deposition, the transformation processes are not yet understood. There are significant differences in the composition and acidity of rain between seasons, geographical regions, and even during and between storms. However, no clear evidence is yet available which can explain or accurately predict how precursors are transformed or why the observed variations occur.

(3) Another uncertainty exists with regard to the transport and distribution of precursor emissions. Remote regions of the globe have rains with a low pH, as do Hawaii and Alaska. To resolve such uncertainties, better data and more accurate modeling techniques are necessary.

(4) Additional uncertainties include the relative impact of local sources as compared to more distant sources; the role of other photochemical pollutants and how they affect acidity levels; the relative importance of the potential effects from acid deposition on different receptors (i.e., aquatics, forests, materials, etc.); and others.

Presently we have an inability to monitor dry deposition, yet in many areas it clearly plays an important role in creating the adverse effects associated with so-called "acid rain." Nor can we disassociate the effects felt in overall acidity from sudden shocks or bursts of acidity that occur, for example, when accumulated acid-bearing snow melts in the spring and runs into lakes from those that occur from slow, steady, year-round dusting or rainfall. Yet understanding these proportions and relationships bears importantly on the control programs that would be appropriate.

The uncertainty surrounding acid deposition is demonstrated by the divergent conclusions reached in two recent studies. While the results of the studies are preliminary and have not yet been subject to peer review, the results are important to note. One study, conducted by the University of Rhode Island on the long-range transport of sulfate aerosols in the atmosphere, indicates that acid deposition in the Northeast may result from sulfur dioxide emissions of local origin rather than from midwestern sources. Preliminary data from receptor points in Massachusetts and Rhode Island suggest that sulfate aerosols in the atmosphere contain little trace of the "signature" of sources in the Midwest. Another recent study by the Mitre Corporation concludes that the current acid deposition problem is largely a long-range transport problem and cites recent decreases in sulfur oxide and nitrogen oxide emissions in the Northeast while acidity has increased. These studies, in presenting opposing theories on the cause of the acid deposition problem, emphasize the degree of the current uncertainty on a question fundamental to a regulator and the consequent need for further research.

NEED FOR RESPONSIBLE ACTION

Any additional remedial action must be based, at a minimum, on the reasonable certainty that it will, in fact, accomplish its intended purpose. The American people have the right to expect that their government will not impose an additional multi-billion dollar pollution control program, without first determining with some assurance that the intended environmental benefits will be achieved.

In this case, quick and simple solutions are extremely costly and unlikely to achieve the desired results. Given the length of time it has taken to recognize the magnitude and complexity of the problem and the many fundamental questions that remain to be answered, Congress wisely authorized a comprehensive research program.

Currently, in an effort to reduce uncertainties so that meaningful and effective program options can be considered, EPA is engated in a number of projects.

EPA alone has committed more than $9 million in fiscal year 1982 to its research efforts on acid deposition. The President's requested budget for fiscal year 1983 includes $11.4 million for EPA's contribution to the Interagency Task Force's acid deposition research efforts. When added to the acid deposition research budgets elsewhere in government, the total 1983 request is $22.4 million.

The three major areas of uncertainty toward which EPA's efforts are directed include:

(1) effects of acid deposition, to create a better assessment and inventory of the problem we are trying to solve . . . and the deposition level that triggers the effects;

(2) transport, transformation, and deposition processes, to understand how the problem occurs and develop the tools to relate the problem to its causes; and

(3) assessments and policy studies, to identify and specify what additional research may be warranted and to design appropriate responses to the acid deposition problem based on the state of knowledge.

SENATE COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS ACID DEPOSITION PROPOSAL

On July 22, 1982, the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works approved an amendment to the Clean Air Act designed to address the acid deposition problem. That proposal would require a massive emission reduction program exceeding 8 million tons over a 12-year period as well as an emission restriction program which would affect all major new and modified sources of sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide within a 31-state region. Additionally, the proposal would require some changes to the current acid deposition research program.

RESEARCH PROGRAM

Aside from the tens of billions of dollars in additional capital outlays and operating costs that may be required to reduce emissions so drastically, the proposal ignores the scientific uncertainties and general lack of consensus surrounding this issue. We do not, therefore, support the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works' acid deposition proposal, because our current research program is well planned, targeted and adequately financed.

The research program proposed by the Senate Committee would involve increased funding for the Federal Acid Precipitation Task Force and would require reports to Congress on research results in 1985 and 1987. The Task Force would conduct research on advanced electricity generation technologies. The National Academy of Science would be mandated to establish an independent scientific review board to consider research results and the Task Force's activities. The Board would be required to submit reports to Congress in 1986 and 1988 and recommend emission and effects reduction strategies.

EMISSION REDUCTION PROGRAM

The proposal would establish a 31-state region upon which an additional control program would be imposed. Within that region, by 1993 the proposal would require an 8 million ton sulfur dioxide reduction from 1980 actual annual levels. In addition, all existing sources or new sources since January 1, 1981, would be subject to an offset provision. Coupled with the 8 million ton reduction requirement, this offset requirement, due to a projected increase in new and existing source emissions, would result in an estimated 10-11 million ton reduction or more from otherwise projected 1995 base case sulfur dioxide emission levels

(that is, the levels that would be expected to occur if no change in the law is made). For new sources, after January 1, 1995, growth must be offset unless these sources adopt best available control technology and attain the most stringent emission limitation achieved in practice by a source in the region. These requirements would compel a number of states, such as Ohio, Missouri, Indiana, and Wisconsin, to cut their projected 1995 emissions by more than two-thirds.

The proposal includes two exceptions to its offset requirements. Increases from coal conversions with less than 1.5 pounds sulfur dioxide per million BTU's average emission rates need not be offset. New sources in states without a single source with a limit of greater than 1.2 pounds would not be required to be offset. However, it does not appear that any state could meet this qualification.

Furthermore, all of these requirements are cast in terms of reducing emissions at individual sources without regard to our real goal of minimizing adverse effects on receptor areas. If controls are determined to be needed, they should be based on the reduction needed at the receptor area to minimize the impacts rather than imposing an arbitrary constraint on individual sources.

The 8 million ton emission reductions are to be allocated among the 31 states in the region. Governors are allowed 18 months in which to negotiate a plan for allocating reductions. However the proposal fails to set forth the basis for these allocations and this deadline presumes detailed scientific and technical data which unfortunately has yet to be developed. If they do not develop such a plan, reductions would be required based upon excess emissions above the level which would result if all existing sources were emitting at 1.5 pounds SO_2 per million BTU's. The provision specifies a schedule for state plan revisions, approval, and enforceability.

The proposal includes a number of interim reductions and compliance requirements. First, existing sources, defined as of January 1, 1981, cannot increase actual sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide emission rates above January 1, 1981, levels unless a simultaneous offset occurs. Any switching to fuels with a higher sulfur content may trigger the need for immediate offsets. Second, all sources which were not in compliance with their state plans in effect on January 1, 1981, must be in compliance with those emission limits by December 31, 1985 or every facility owned by the operator of the non-complying source must comply with an average of 1.2 pounds. This provision effectively repeals 1981 and 1982 SIP revisions.

Finally, the proposal includes a default option. If a state does not meet its required reduction, each utility system in the state must meet a state-wide average of 1.2 pounds SO_2 per million BTU.

RAMIFICATIONS

There is no strong scientific justification for such a program—there is little conclusive evidence that it would produce dramatic reductions in acid deposition or any amelioration of its effects. It would definitely impose large costs—in terms of jobs, coal market impacts, and consumer utility rates—and unreasonable control requirements—in terms of new and existing source offset and emission reductions. Furthermore, the program as currently proposed would discourage coal conversions that would otherwise be cost effective and desirable. Although the National Academy of Sciences called for an immediate reduction in emissions from existing sources, this conclusion was reached without taking to account the considerable costs such a program would impose.

It is conceivable that policymakers in the Congress and in the Executive Branch would one day decide that these costs and impacts are justified because of the environmental results they would achieve and the consequent benefits that would flow from them. However, given the magnitude of the costs and the unlikelihood of any detectable effects, such a decision is premature.

If this proposal is enacted, most major coal-burning sources will be forced to install scrubbers or switch to lower sulfur coals. In reviewing the environmental impacts of this proposal, we noted that, as a result of it, profound shifts will occur in coal production and a number of coal-producing regions of the country would be particularly affected. Specifically, our projections show that Northern Appalachia, which in 1980 produced 185 million tons of coal, would produce 218 million tons in 1995 in our base case, that is, in the absence of any change in the law. The Senate proposal, however, would cause a greater than 50 million ton reduction in 1995 production levels or an estimated 25% decline from the levels which would occur without further controls. In the Midwest, the decline in coal production caused by the bill would be even greater. In 1980 that region produced 134 million tons of coal and is projected to produce over 200 million tons in 1995 in the absence of further control requirements. Under the Senate bill, the Midwest would suffer a decline of approximately 95 million tons or almost a 50% reduction in 1995 coal production levels. The amount of decline would be the equivalent of more than two-thirds of current production levels.

The declines in coal production which would occur in traditional coal producing areas would be even more pronounced when viewed on a state-by-state basis.

For example, in the Northern Appalachian region, Pennsylvania and Ohio are especially illustrative of the resulting declines. In 1980, 93 million tons of coal were produced in Pennsylvania and 122 million tons are projected to be produced in 1995 without additional controls. Under the Senate bill, 1995 coal production would decline by approximately 17% or 21 million tons. This decline is approximately equivalent to one-fifth of Pennsylvania's current coal production. In Ohio, 1980 production levels were 39 million tons and 1995 levels are projected to remain constant at roughly 42 million tons absent additional controls. Assuming the Senate bill requirements, production in 1995 would decline by about 60% to 16 million tons. This decline is roughly equivalent to 65% of Ohio's current coal production.

In the Midwest, Illinois produced 63 million tons of coal in 1980 and is projected, absent additional controls, to produce 97 million tons in 1995. With the Senate Committee proposal in place, production in Illinois in 1995 would decline by more than 70 percent or over 70 million tons. This reduction is larger than the State's total current level of production. The result would be a 1995 production level of about 26 million tons—well below 1980 production levels. In Indiana the situation would be similar; that State's 1980 production was 31 million tons. The State is projected to produce 46 million tons in 1995—absent additional controls. With the Senate bill in place, 1995 coal production would decline by almost 50 percent or 22 million tons. The result would be 1995 production of less than 25 million tons—also significantly below 1980 levels.

Although these shifts are offset by gains elsewhere, that provides little comfort for those regions which would be most adversely affected. These declines in coal production are more significant when related effects are considered—including miner unemployment, employment shifts, and associated declines and shifts in support employment.

Our preliminary projections indicate that the costs of such a control program would be massive—on the order of $5-6 billion per year based on 1982 dollars. The nitrogen oxide constraint alone which would preclude coal conversions is responsible for $1.6-$2.4 billion of this total. Even without the nitrogen oxide cap, cumulative costs by 2010 would total well over 30 billion dollars for utilities alone. If the nitrogen oxide constraint is retained, the cumulative cost will double to over 60 billion dollars. The cost per ton of sulfur dioxide removed would average around $500 per ton, but in some states the maximum marginal cost would be greater than $1,200 per ton removed. The average increase in annualized electricity rates in the 31 state region would be more than 4 percent with some states experiencing increases greater than 7 percent. States whose consumers would be particularly hard hit by increased electricity rates would be Florida, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Missouri. Utility scrubber capacity would have to increase by almost 10 percent (or more, if steps are taken to protect local coal production) to meet the requirements of the proposal.

Our review of the Senate Committee proposal indicates that it would undermine utility plans to convert to coal as an alternative to using higher cost imported oil. Although uncontrolled nitrogen oxide emission rates for most powerplants are not expected to increase, reconversions from oil to coal are a notable exception. Nitrogen oxide emission rates for these units would be expected to increase—so much that this provision will prevent most of these units from reconverting. Instead, utilities operating these units will be forced to bear the high costs of continuing to burn oil.

The proponents of this proposal, in an apparent attempt to show some consistency between their proposal and the Administration's position and research effort, point out that the reduction program would not commence for another five years, thereby allowing ample time for the key scientific issues relating to control to be resolved. We do not feel that this is an accurate portrayal of how the proposal would operate.

The provision as currently drafted would define an existing source based on its January 1, 1981, emission status. Any change involving emission increases after that date would have to be offset. Therefore, new and existing sources built or modified after January 1, 1981, would be subject to a possible requirement of emissions offset—if their construction or modification would result in an emissions increase, regardless of the results of the five years of additional research.

Additionally, any source not in compliance with the state plan as in effect on January 1, 1981, must be in compliance by December 31, 1985, or every facility owned by the operator of the non-complying source must comply with an average of 1.2 pounds by December, 1985. This provision, too, is mandated without regard to its relationship to future acid deposition research results.

Some sources have received relaxation of emission limits since January, 1981, which EPA has approved as meeting all statutory requirements. This provision will require such sources to reduce emissions to meet requirements in effect in January, 1981, even though such reductions are not necessary to protect ambient air quality standards.

These requirements would become law simultaneously with enactment of this proposal—not following the conclusion of a badly needed research effort and the making of decisions based on conclusive results. We view the resulting uncertainty and expense which would be faced by countless new and existing sources as well as the States, and the shadow that would be cast over the entire state plan revision process, as dangerously disruptive and lacking any basis in sound public policy. The proposal in this area fails to recognize the realities of source planning and unwisely prejudges the conclusions of scientific inquiry. This offset provision and similar reduction provisions are drawn in such a way that they would fail to accommodate results which may be realized from research efforts.

Our projections indicate that, while the proposal calls for an 8 million ton reduction in sulfur dioxide emissions, the result will be a 10-11 million ton reduction or more below 1995 base case utility and industrial sulfur dioxide emission levels. This amounts to nearly a 50 percent decrease from base case levels in 1995.

The question then arises: what is bought by this control program? The program involves high economic and social costs with no assurance that the intended results would be realized. During the twenty-five year period between 1985 and 2010 this proposal would cost rate payers in the 31-state Eastern region well over $60 billion. Yet after 1995 the fifty per cent decline in emissions will be rapidly eroded by new growth. By the year 2010 sulfur dioxide emissions from utilities would only be 3 million tons or 18 percent lower than if no additional controls had been imposed.

SUMMARY

The economic and social effects, as well as the questionable environmental results underscore the need to ensure that any proposed control program be designed so that environmental results will be achieved, at costs commensurate with the benefits derived. Considerable doubt exists concerning the degree to which acid deposition would be mitigated by the Senate Committee's proposal. These doubts are so fundamental, and the costs so high, that a strong case exists against its enactment.

In this country, which as one of the most vigorous control programs in the world, it is not enough to throw money and greater regulations at a problem without regard to consequences. While we have made great strides in this nation to control air pollution, the Federal government and the States should be concentrating on research so that the acid deposition problem may be addressed effectively. Legislating additional costly controls is premature.

This concludes my prepared statement. I would be happy to respond to your questions.

A DECADE OF RAIL TRANSIT FOR THE BAY AREA

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, 10 years ago this month the San Francisco Bay Area Rapid Transit District—known worldwide as BART—began train service on the first all-new rail transit system to be built in the United States in 60 years. It has been a model of foresight, planning, and service. It came about through the efforts of three bay area counties—Alameda, Contra Costa, and the city and county of San Francisco. The fully automated system was 80-percent locally financed, and its opening in 1972 evidenced the bay area's commitment to a strong public transit network.

Since BART began operating, it has carried 350 million passengers more than 4.5 billion passenger miles without a passenger fatality.

There is no question that BART has been a major factor in the economic growth of the bay area since.

Today BART is carrying over 190,000 passengers every working day, 30 percent of all transbay commuters, thus relieving congestion on the bay area's freeways, bridges, and downtown parking areas by some 60,000 cars daily.

Based on today's projections, more than 250,000 passengers a day could be using BART by 1985-86, and over 300,000 passengers a day by the end of the decade.

BART has embarked on an intensive $500 million capital program designed to increase the capacity of the system, expanding the capability of the system's automatic train control system to operate more trains and to improve the system's ability to reduce the time between trains.

As Senator from California, I take great pleasure in drawing BART's decade of service to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. Senate.

AL KELLER, JR., NATIONAL COMMANDER, THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, from August 20 through August 26, one of America's great veterans' service organization—the American Legion—met in their 64th annual national convention in Chicago, Ill. As chairman of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee and as a member of the American Legion, it was my privilege and honor to attend a portion of the convention and to address one of its sessions. I am always impressed with the dedication of both the leadership and membership of the Legion in preserving our American value system. There are few organizations as articulate in setting forth the viewpoint of this Nation's veterans, their dependents, and survivors.

At the convention Al Keller, Jr., of Kankakee, Ill., was elected the American Legion's new national commander for 1982-83, replacing outgoing National Commander Jack W. Flynt following his outstanding year of leadership for that fine organization.

Al Keller was a gunner on a B-24 in the European theater with the Army Air Force and flew 16 combat missions in World War II. He was a prisoner of war for a short time prior to the end of the war.

His professional career includes being a cost accountant for a major corporation and an office manager and accountant for a construction company.

He began a civil service career as administrative assistant for the Kankakee County Board. He served as an accountant for the American Red Cross and returned to local government as chief deputy county clerk. Presently, he is administrative assistant for Kankakee County.

Keller has been an active Legionnaire for 28 years beginning with Post No. 85, Kankakee, which he served as post commander, and adjutant. He has also served as post service officer.

He also served the Legion's Illinois Department as district commander, department vice commander and department commander. He also served on the department's veterans' affairs and rehabilitation commission for several years.

He was a member of the Legion's National Americanism Commission until his election to national commander.

I commend and congratulate Al Keller upon assuming this extremely important position as the leader of our Nation's largest veterans' organization. I am confident that under his leadership the Legion will continue to grow and to exert the very positive influence it has always been in our communities and for our veterans in the past. I look forward to working with the new national commander as we strive to meet the legislative needs of America's veterans.

THE VETO OVERRIDE ON THE SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the veto override was a close one. You can not shave them any closer than that. It takes two-thirds to override and it was exactly that. I voted to sustain the President and resist the override.

This bill has some real duds in it. I do not refer to the very fine things such as domestic assistance, senior citizen community service employment programs, and the educational benefits which were appropriated. These benefits were all heavily funded in the last appropriation, and I would have joined others in assuring that those programs were sustained, had the veto been upheld.

No, I refer to some marvelous public works projects buried deep in the suet of that urgent supplemental. There were projects there—ones thought to have died a grisly death, now risen from the dead like Lazarus—and they always keep creeping back into the funding picture. One of the more egregious ones is the Tug Fork project in West Virginia. It was not included in the Senate report of the bill, but it first shows up in the legislative notice as funds for "Pineville and Barbourville, Ky., and Williamson, W. Va., project components." It is unfortunate that a project of this magnitude was allowed to slip through in that fashion. It is a porkbarrel project of grotesque dimension whose funding could wind up costing the taxpayers of the United States up to $1 billion.

The Tug Fork River project has been around this place for several years now, as a project to authorize the Army Corps of Engineers to undertake flood control measures in the Tug and Levisa Forks of the Big Sandy River and Cumberland River, W. Va., Ky., and Virginia. Concern over the expenditures has been expressed, and opposition voiced over these many years, and the project has been stopped. Until now. It nearly matches the scope of the Tennessee Tombigbee Water project which is the very grandfather of bloated Federal animals that waddle around in the swamp under the cover of legislative maneuvering and gimmickery and then launch their avaricious assault on an inadequately protected Federal treasury where they graze to their fill on the green of Federal dollars. And once the gates to the Treasury are mashed down, other behomoths appear on the scene for their share and before long the special interest managerie have all been fed, and bed down for another year—fat and happy. Too bad that the rest of the Nation, those who must now do without so that others can indulge their gluttony, must now suffer the consequences—and go ploddingly back to work to generate more tax dollars before the next "feeding."

So now we go on to other things before us. I am certain that the President is greatly disappointed and yet there are many conscientious Republicans who have supported the President throughout this economic realinement, as he tries diligently to restore economic stablity to our Nation, and some of them jumped ship on this one. I do not think that will occur often in the future. Perhaps the original veto was a bit ill advised—but I did support the President because I still feel that these outlandish public works projects must be knocked off. And that is what I was up to. I will keep right on striving until this sort of waste and abuse in Government is halted. It is really a poor way to do business. I know there are many on both sides of the aisle who long to see sensible and thoughtful legislating become the order of the day.

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE PREVENTION AND SERVICES ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Members of this body have long recognized the tragic problem of family violence. In 1974 we enacted the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act in order to focus national attention on the increasing incidence of child abuse. Through this legislation we provided Federal assistance to States, localities, and private agencies to work with families in the prevention and treatment of abused and neglected children. The success of this program is well known. Thousands of parents and children have received counseling and other needed assistance in order to recognize and cope with the severe emotional stress that accompanies this problem.

In the last few years we have become increasingly aware of another form of family violence—spousal abuse. It is impossible to ascertain how widespread the problem has become. Shame, fear, and guilt of the victim and the abuser often results in these incidents going unreported. Agencies providing services to the victims, such as hospitals and social service agencies, lack trained personnel to recognize and report the existance of a violent home situation. While all 50 States now have mandatory reporting laws for suspected child abuse, only 12 States have similar law as concerning the abuse of adults. Despite these obstacles, it is estimated that 1.8 million women a year are victims of severe and repeated beatings in their own homes. Husbands are also the victims of abuse but the incidence is much lower.

All across the country, women's groups and community organizations have recognized the need for assisting the battered spouse. Relying heavily on volunteers and local support, they have opened thousands of shelters to give victims a place to go, with their children to escape further abuse. Once in the shelter, the abused spouse is offered counseling and other supportive services so that she can access her situation without fear. The spouse who committed the abuse is also offered counseling.

States have also recognized the need for this assistance. By mid-1980 44 States had enacted new legislation to provide some kind of help to battered spouses through direct grants or technical assistance.

The Federal role in this area has been fragmentary. In 1979 the Carter administration established the Office on Domestic Violence under the Department of Health and Human Services to coordinate Federal and State efforts and to disseminate information. Early last year the Reagan administration abolished this office turning its back on any Federal commitment to alleviating this tragic situation.

Although other Federal programs attempt to address the needs of victims they are narrowly focused. Support services for victims is often contingent on income eligibility resulting in complicated paperwork and long delays. Direct funds for the operation of shelters are almost nonexistant.

Today I am introducing the Domestic Violence Prevention and Services Act. The bill is similar to the one we passed in the last Congress in a bipartisan effort to recognize our commitment to these families. That legislation never reached a final vote. The bill is designed to provide the necessary Federal support and encouragement to State, local, and community activities and to coordinate those programs that will assist victims of domestic violence. Federal funds will be made available through the States contingent on matching local support. The legislation establishes the Federal Inter-Agency Council on Domestic Violence to facilitate the coordination of existing Federal programs that assist victims.

The cost of these programs will be $20 million in fiscal year 1983. This money will be used to aid existing shelters and prevention efforts and to attract more support from local and private sources.

There has never been a greater need or sense of urgency for this legislation. Eleven million Americans are now out of work. Recent studies have shown that families are facing increased emotional stress from loss of jobs. Loss of work, loss of income, and the loss of one's self-image have left family members in a state of overwhelming despair. As a result the incidence of domestic violence has increased drastically.

We can no longer afford to turn away from these individuals. They need our help now. The American family is our greatest resource. We must be willing to make them our highest priority.

By Mr. DODD (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. CANNON, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. BENTSEN, and Mr. RANDOLPH):

S. 2909. A bill to authorize financial assistance for a continuing education program to secondary school science and mathematics teachers designed to increase their competency and to assist them to qualify for certification, and for other purposes; to the Committeee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS TEACHERS DEVELOPMENT ACT

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation designed to help redress the serious shortage of qualified secondary school teachers in mathematics and science, a shortage that could have a grave impact on both our economy and our national defense.

In our contemporary world of video home recorders, personal computers, and telephoning by satellite, we tend to take technology for granted. But William Bradford did not reach Plymouth Rock in 1620 via an SST, and Priscilla Mullens did not bake the first Thanksgiving turkey in a microwave oven. But they and their successors had access to unlimited and unmatched resources. Instinct, insight, and innovation were the tools used by Americans over the centuries to harness these resources to build a modern society and way of life. Education, particularly in science and mathematics, became the vehicle for achieving our Nation's progress.

In our lifetime, advances in both basic science and applied technology have been phenomenal and the prospects for continued developments seem to be limitless.

The introduction of specialized technology has increased industrial productivity and profitability. Surgical techniques utilizing laser beams in some cases, have obviated the need for surgical incisions. Scientists are able to correct the behavior of a defective human gene, an important advance in the effort to combat genetic defects. Discoveries from space and ocean explorations may hold the key to our past and may unlock the door to our future.

Despite the obvious need for well-trained personnel to manage our increasingly sophisticated technological society, somehow we have allowed an erosion of our educational systems which produce these people. Today, we face a serious national shortage of science and mathematics teachers. According to a 1982 report of the National Science Teachers Association (NSTA), one-half of the Nation's newly hired secondary school science and mathematics teachers are unqualified to teach. They are currently employed only on an "emergency basis" because qualified teachers are not available.

Not surprisingly, the NSTA report also suggests that fewer students are entering the science and mathematics teaching areas. Moreover, one in four of the younger faculty members plans to leave teaching completely. The report projects that if the present rate of teachers leaving academe continues, the Nation will have a net loss in science and mathematics teachers of 35 percent between now and 1992.

By contrast, the Soviet Union places stronger emphasis on science and mathematics at all levels of education than does the United States, concludes the "Science and Engineering Education for the 1980's and Beyond," a report issued by the National Science Foundation and the Department of Education.

The results are predictable. First, secondary school graduates in the Soviet Union have greater preparation in science and mathematics than do high school students in the United States. Second, while the United States is graduating 27 percent more college students than the Soviet Union, only 18 percent receive degrees in science and engineering fields, compared to 53 percent in the Soviet Union. Finally, as a result of this emphasis, the Soviet Union has twice the number of scientists with advanced engineering degrees as the United States.

All of this is occurring at a time of growing need for knowledgeable and well-trained science and mathematics personnel to manage sophisticated new technology in business, industry, government, the professions, academia, and the Armed Forces.

Many high technology industries have expressed concern about the prospect of future vacancies. The American Electronics Association survey for 1981 through 1985, for example, projected that 200,000 new jobs will be available for people with bachelor of science degrees in electrical and computer software engineering during this time frame.

The New York Times featured an employment outlook in high technology in its March 28, 1982 edition. It projects 685,000 new jobs through 1990 for people trained in computers.

The introduction and increasing use of CAT scanners, ultrasound, nuclear scans, and fiberoptic instruments will mean more and more new technical jobs in medicine.

Yet, without a concentrated effort to improve science and mathematics education in our secondary schools, it is unlikely that we will be able to take advantage of the opportunities presented by these technological innovations and those to follow. Particularly at a time when we can no longer count confidently on unhampered exploitation of natural resources to meet our needs, it is essential that we move to protect our technological future.

President Harry Truman declared that no nation could maintain its leadership unless scientific and technological resources were developed to the fullest, and the work of science in universities, industries, and its own labs received generous and intelligent support.

Federal funding is the umbilical cord for the viability and promotion of research and education in science and science-based technology. Although allocations in the private sector have increased in the areas of education and research, these do not necessarily reflect areas of national interest.

A stable long-range support system for science and mathematics education and research is a national priority. Without insuring this support, we are undermining the availability of adequately trained manpower and jeopardizing our economy, national security, and future developments of sophisticated technology.

Today, many of the brightest high school students, largely by dint of their own ability, are still able to obtain the background necessary to prepare them to continue studies in institutions of higher education. These are usually the students who are already committed to a particular vocation.

The majority of students, however, are graduating from our secondary schools with only minimal knowledge in either science or mathematics. They are not prepared to enter vocational schools, colleges, or universities.

It has been said that this century's only constant is change. The United States needs knowledgeable citizens who can intelligently adapt and manage these changes.

The scientific achievements we are witnessing today are the outgrowth of years of research. We are harvesting the fruits from scientific seeds planted 20 and 30 years ago. These are rewards resulting from careful long-range planning, as well as support on the Federal, State, and local levels.

It is useful to remember the call of the 1960's after Sputnik to "return to excellence in education by providing students with good backgrounds in science and mathematics." A similar call is needed for the 1980's.

In a written statement for the National Convocation on Precollege Education in Mathematics and Science held May 12 and 13, President Reagan warned that the education of American schoolchildren in science and mathematics had reached such a deplorable state that it threatened the Nation's military and economic security.

Mr. President, the legislation I am introducing today provides a partial answer to the needs of secondary school science and mathematics teachers. The National Science and Mathematics Teachers Development Act will establish a new program within the Department of Education. This program will provide continuing education for those teachers currently employed on an "emergency basis" and for other teachers presently engaged in teaching science and mathematics in secondary schools. It thereby seeks to create a mechanism to improve teacher competency and enable teachers to develop new teaching strategies.

Surely, better motivated, prepared, and competent teachers will better attract and train talented students on whom our technological future will ultimately depend.

Mr. President, it would be a disaster for the Congress of the United States to ignore the crucial need to upgrade the Nation's secondary school science and mathematics education systems.

The National Science and Mathematics Teachers Development Act will help strengthen the quality of science amd mathematics education, insure our national research potential, provide for qualified industrial and Armed Forces personnel, protect United States competition position in the international marketplace, and provide for a stable and healthy national economy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the National Science and Mathmatics Teachers Development Act be printed in the RECORD.

I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2909

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Science and Mathematics Teachers Development Act".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) a program of science and mathematics education and research is essential in order to provide a strong economy, to contribute to ensuring national security, and to contribute to the future development of advanced technology;

(2) the strength and independence of the United States depends on the ability of the Nation to furnish adequately trained personnel in the field of advanced technology to implement the new systems of our increasingly sophisticated technological society;

(3) presently, large numbers of inadequately trained individuals are applying for advanced technological positions in private industry, including defense-related industries, and the Armed Forces, and there is an increasing difficulty in filling vacancies in such positions with qualified personnel;

(4) in order to remedy these problems, it is essential that secondary school students have better training in science and mathematics;

(5) yet, there is a serious shortage of qualified secondary school teachers in science and mathematics;

(6) one-half of the Nation's newly employed secondary school science and mathematics teachers are unqualified to teach these disciplines;

(7) moreover, fewer secondary school graduates are entering the field of teaching science and mathematics;

(8) one in four of the younger secondary school faculty in the science and mathematics fields is planning to leave teaching for a better paying position in private industry and defense-related industry; and

(9) by contrast, many industrialized countries place stronger emphasis on science and mathematics at all levels of education than does the United States and, as a result, compete more effectively in the fields of advanced technology, and international trade.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to authorize a program for full time and part time workshops for secondary school science teachers and secondary school mathematics teachers designed to increase their teaching skills and to assist such teachers to qualify for certification in the areas of science and mathematics, and thereby encourage better science and mathematics instruction for secondary school students, increase the research potential of the United States, and provide increased numbers of qualified personnel for private industry, defense-related industries, and the Armed Forces.

By Mr. TSONGAS (for himself and Mr. SASSER):

S. 2910. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to establish new educational assistance programs for veterans and for members of the Armed Forces; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS' EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1982

● Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce a comprehensive G.I. bill which would provide new educational assistance to individuals who serve in the military.

There is consensus among those most informed about the All-Volunteer Force that it has deteriorated over the last several years. This bill would upgrade recruits, retain outstanding military personnel, and ease the readjustment of servicemen to civilian life once they leave the military.

The Veterans Educational Assistance Act has already been introduced in the House, where extensive hearings have been held on the legislation. It is time that the Senate recognize the need for a new permanent GI bill by supporting this legislation.

Under the proposal, an individual who enlists in any branch of the military for at least 3 years would be entitled to an education stipend of $300 per month for up to 36 months.

Further, the Department of Defense would have the option of providing supplemental educational assistance for service personnel who work in hard-to-fill specialities. This provision would particularly be promising in retaining military personnel. Any branch of the military could grant a leave of absence to an individual who wants to avail himself of his benefits and return to the military with additional skills.

Another provision would have particular appeal to midcareer service personnel. After 10 years of service they could transfer educational benefits to a spouse or children. In effect, the provision would serve as investment in their children's education.

Finally, the bill includes benefits for part-time military personnel in the Reserves and the National Guard.

Mr. President, there are those who will argue that we do not need a GI bill at this time. Recruitment and retention have increased because of the current recession, and the quality of the recruits has improved. The President, who campaigned on a promise of restoring the GI bill, now states that restoration of the GI bill can wait. Others say the bill is too costly.

I submit, however, that now is indeed the time to restore the GI bill. We must not let our national security depend on the vicissitudes of the economy. If an economic crisis is the incentive provided to young and talented individuals to enlist, then we can assume that when and if the economy improves, we can expect the same problems of scarce and subquality recruits.

Nor is the President's concern about cost well founded. The Congressional Budget Office estimates the total expense of this bill to be $381 million a year from 1985 through 1989, $1.2 billion a year by 1990, and $1.4 billion a year by 1994.

Although these figures appear to be high, there are offsetting savings that the incentives for longer service would produce. In 1979, the Government Accounting Office reported that 444,000 first-team volunteers had left the service between 1974 and 1977 before completing their initial enlistments. The cost to the Federal Government was $5.2 billion.

Each case of attrition costs the Government $12,000. Dr. Charles Moskos of Northwestern University, a military sociologist, testified before the House Subcommittee on Education, Employment and Training that cutting the military attrition in half would result in manpower savings of more than $600 million a year. Further, by assisting young women and men to pursue their education, we are helping them to improve their lives and increase their productive contributions to the Nation.

An article in the Washington Post last week reported that veterans are losing Pell grants because of the way their GI benefits are computed in determining eligibility for additional Federal benefits. Several of these students will be unable to continue their education. Such a result creates the impression that those who have served their country cannot count on their country to serve them in return.

Mr. President, we cannot allow this kind of attitude to affect the ranks of our military. We need a GI bill, and we need it now.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 120—CONCURRENT RESOLUTION RELATING TO THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE WASHINGTON CATHEDRAL

Mr. Danforth submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. CON. RES. 120

Whereas the foundation stone for the Cathedral Church of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, known as the Washington Cathedral, was laid on September 29, 1907, with the President of the United States, Members of Congress, and Justices of the Supreme Court in attendance;

Whereas George Washington was the first to call for a "great church for national purposes in the capital city";

Whereas the Congress in 1893 granted a charter to the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Foundation for religious, charitable, and educational purposes, leading to the construction of this grand Gothic cathedral;

Whereas the Cathedral is administered by the Episcopal Church, it is truly a house of prayer for all people, with its pulpit open to all faiths, seeking to serve the whole Nation, offering its ministry on behalf of all churches;

Whereas in times of trial the leaders of our Nation often have gathered there to pray and seek God's guidance;

Whereas this majestic monument to our Nation's faith in a Divine Creator dominates the physical and spiritual horizons of the City of Washington;

Whereas the Cathedral is an architectural and artistic masterpiece that will lift up the human heart for centuries to come;

Whereas the nave of this magnificent Cathedral was dedicated in the year of America's two hundredth anniversary "for the reconciliation of the peoples of the earth";

Whereas the Cathedral inspires over 500,000 American visitors each year; and

Whereas September 29, 1982, marks the seventy-fifth anniversary of this great Cathedral: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States recognizes and pays tribute to the Washington Cathedral on its seventy-fifth anniversary and to all the men and women whose especial labors have contributed to the building of this great house of worship.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate is directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the Canon of the Cathedral Church of Saint Peter and Saint Paul.

SENATE RESOLUTION 463—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. THURMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 463

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to consideration of S. 2671. Such waiver is necessary because S. 2671, as reported, authorizes the enactment of new budget authority which would first become available in fiscal year 1983, and such bill was not reported on or before May 15, 1982, as required by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for such authorizations.

This budget waiver will allow Senate consideration of S. 2671 which creates a federal commission to commemorate the Bicentennial of the Constitution. After hearings in the Constitution Subcommittee, S. 2671 was introduced by all members of the Subcommittee and approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee on a voice vote on August 4, 1982.

S. 2671 authorizes the appropriation of $300,000 for fiscal year 1983 and such sums as necessary for the subsequent years until the termination of the Commission in 1989. The $300,000 figure is less than half of the President's budget request for such a commission. The Judiciary Committee Report on S. 2671 expresses that the funding amount was left "unspecified for the years after 1983 . . . to provide the Appropriations Committee the discretion to adjust the $300,000 amount downward based on the success of the Commission's fundraising efforts." Senate Report No. 97-535, page 35.

In order to begin planning for the education and celebrative activities of the bicentennial, the Commission must get underway immediately. Delaying the inauguration of the Commission could be fatal to adequate planning of this important event. Moreover, since the appropriations bill in which this would appear has not been addressed by the Senate, this should not disrupt that budgetary process.

SENATE RESOLUTION 464—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. THURMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 464

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 1701. Such waiver is necessary because S. 1701 authorizes the enactment of new budget authority which would first become available in fiscal year 1983, and such bill was not reported on or before May 15, 1982 as required by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for such authorizations.

The waiver of section 402(a) is necessary to permit congressional consideration of S. 1701, the Missing Children Act. This legislation would create a national clearinghouse of information on missing children and a clearinghouse of information on unidentified dead bodies.

S. 1701 was introduced on October 6, 1981. Hearings were held on the subject of missing children on October 5, 1981, by the Subcommittee on Investigations and General Oversight of the Labor and Human Resources Committee. The Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice of the Committee on the Judiciary held hearings on April 1, 1982, on the subject of missing and exploited children. The legislation was reported by the Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice on June 30, 1982. It was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on July 30, 1982.

If S. 1701 is not considered, it will mean a significant delay in establishing both clearinghouses of information on missing children and the unidentified dead.

The impact on the appropriations process will not be significant. The Committee anticipates that the Department of Justice will submit an amendment for additional budget authority for fiscal year 1983 in which the funding for this program can be accommodated.

SENATE RESOLUTION 465—RESOLUTION RELATING TO AGRICULTURAL TRADE

Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. LONG, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. GRASSLEY) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 465

Whereas net U.S. farm income in 1982 is estimated to have declined for a third consecutive year, and about 25 percent from 1981;

Whereas bumper harvests continue to place downward pressure on farm prices, despite U.S. efforts to restrain production;

Whereas increased U.S. farm exports will reduce the nation's balance of payments deficit, increase personal income and tax revenues, and provide additional employment;

Whereas America's full competitive advantage in agricultural exports is not being realized because of foreign export subsidies and other unfair trade practices, which are becoming increasingly injurious to U.S. exports, including value-added products;

Whereas the American farmer and agribusiness are finding it increasingly difficult to compete for export markets with the foreign governments which finance these unfair trade practices;

Whereas these unfair acts by foreign governments are resulting in the loss of additional jobs and tax receipts, and in increased outlays by the Treasury of the United States for farm supports: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That during the forthcoming Ministerial-level meeting of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), the United States Government should seek every means of restoring U.S. competitiveness in agricultural trade:

(1) With particular emphasis on correcting the disparate treatment of primary and nonprimary products provided in the Agreement on Implementation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXII of the GATT (the Subsidies Code); and

(2) Without reference to any existing political or economic problems or disagreements in nonagricultural areas; and be it further

Resolved, That pending restoration of fair and equitable trading conditions under the GATT, it is the sense of the Senate that the United States pursue every appropriate and legitimate means to prevent further erosion of our agricultural exports, including value-added products, and to regain a fair share of foreign markets commensurate with the competitive market advantage of the American farmer; and be it further

Resolved, That in restoring U.S. competitiveness in agricultural trade, it is the sense of the Senate that the United States make available the funds necessary to assist in the competitive exportation of primary and value-added products and to counteract the continued use of foreign export subsidies and other unfair trading practices; and be it further

Resolved, That restoration of full competitiveness for U.S. farm products in export markets will serve the twin objectives of creating additional jobs and raising net farm income.

AGRICULTURAL TRADE

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the United States is facing an extremely difficult period as it tries to get its economic house in order during a worldwide credit crisis, slow industrial activity and low prices for agricultural products. Additional pressures are being exerted by differences within the Atlantic alliance over construction of the natural gas pipeline between Western Europe and the Soviet Union. Finally, a number of vital issues in our international trade relations are due to be considered in coming months—issues that need to be addressed on their merits and not in relation to other problems.

THE DOLE RESOLUTION

Mr. President, in view of the seriousness of these developments, I am offering, together with Senators LONG, MOYNIHAN, DURENBERGER, and GRASSLEY, a resolution today which would encourage a clear and unambiguous approach to resolving our differences over agricultural trade. Rather than raising the already-high volume of criticism which is clouding our relations with various trading partners and competitiors, I would set out a three-point agenda to be followed in charting a long-term course for U.S. farm product exports.

Specifically, Mr. President, the resolution would:

First, urge the administration to restore U.S. competitiveness in agricultural trade by correcting the disparate treatment of primary and nonprimary products under the subsidies code of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). The United States will have an opportunity to raise this issue during the ministerial-level meeting of the GATT this November in Geneva. The resolution also specifies that our efforts during GATT considerations not be influenced by any existing political or economic problems or disagreements over nonagricultural issues.

Second, depending on the outcome of the GATT ministerial and the likelihood of reestablishing fair and equitable trading conditions, the resolution expresses the sense of the Senate that the United States should use every legitimate means, including neutralization of unfair competitive advantages by our international competitors, to prevent further erosion in our farm exports.

In this effort, the resolution would give the Senate's support for making available the funds needed to restore competitive conditions and counteract export subsidies and other unfair practices.

Third, the third point emphasizes the importance of agricultural exports, including value-added products, to increased net farm income and the creation of additional jobs in our economy. Agriculture is our most productive and efficient industry, and its freedom to expand without inhibition is key to the recovery or our economy at large, including many industrial sectors such as farm machinery, steel, and food processing.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, our differences with other major exporters of farm products over the conduct of trade under the GATT are well known and do not require further elaboration. I am sure that the administration will be making the U.S. argument as clearly and forcefully as possible in the next few months.

However, I believe it is time to indicate, as dispassionately as possible, that our domestic agricultural system has been stretched to the limit. We must either compete effectively for export markets or begin a long and painful withdrawal from our dominant position in world trade.

Mr. President, the latter course would be a serious mistake, both for the United States and its farmers and for the security of the world's future food supply. No one should forget the World Food Conference in Rome only 7 years ago when we spoke of crop shortages and famine. Everyone should know that it is the United States which is bearing this responsibility by carrying a disproportionate share of world grain reserves today.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues for their support for this resolution as an effective way to put the Senate on record for a straightforward approach to our international disagreements over farm trade.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 466—RESOLUTION RELATING TO THE MEXICAN CRISIS

Mr. HELMS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 466

Whereas, the United States Government through numerous federal agencies, the Federal Reserve System, and through multilateral organizations is committed to the stabilization of the international economy, and to international economic development, and

Whereas, the United States Government has long-standing, close ties with the Government and People of Mexico and has long provided various forms of assistance for the economic development of Mexico, and

Whereas, the present financial and economic crisis in Mexico requires the assistance of the United States government, and

Whereas, the key principle of any United States assistance must be the future prosperity of the Mexican People: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the Sense of the Senate of the United States that:

The United States Government, any agency thereof, any official thereof acting as representative to any international organization shall take no action which would provide substantial assistance to the government of Mexico or any agency thereof, unless assurances have been received that the Government of Mexico has taken or will soon take the following actions:

(a) The adoption of a monetary policy aimed at stabilizing the value of the Peso to that of the United States dollar.

(b) The suspension and elimination of all exchange rate controls and controls on the international flow of capital.

(c) The restoration of financial institutions to their owners prior to the nationalization on September 1st, or such a program that would provide for the restoration of a private banking system in Mexico.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the tragedy of the present monetary chaos in Mexico is the massive harm that it will cause to the people of Mexico. They do not deserve what their Government has done to them.

The United States has a responsibility in this situation, but my concern is that it will be little more than a temporary bailout—one that will appear to help Wall Street bankers more than Mexican citizens.

Mr. President, I have little sympathy for bankers who have made billions of dollars of loans to Mexico in spite of, and with full knowledge of, economic policies that inexorably led to this crisis. I think that they should bear the brunt of their losses—not the American taxpayer.

But what is the alternative? Is there a policy open to the United States that would help restore economic stability in Mexico—and, by doing so, help American consumers of Mexican goods, Mexican consumers of American goods, the economic prosperity of Mexico and general economic stability in our hemisphere?

As chairman of the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I have seen the effects of wrongheaded economic policies in many nations of North, South, and Central America and the Caribbean. I will add, parenthetically, that some of those policies are those advocated by Washington through the traditional liberal-left ideology of the U.S. State Department.

Mr. President, it is tragic that we have often encouraged policies of collectivism, of socialism, of inflation, of massive taxation to permeate this hemisphere and strangle economic growth. With the loss of economic growth, we have been partly responsible for the loss of economic well-being for hundreds of millions of people who deserve better.

Because the Mexican situation is so crucial and because some action is imperative, I today offer a sense-of-the-Senate resolution to encourage debate and action that may lead to a real solution to the problems we face—a real solution to the continuing stagnation of the Mexican economy.

In many respects, the Mexican economy's problems become our problems. Mexico is sending people north at unprecedented rates, by shrinking and stagnating their own economy and making the United States the only viable alternative for millions of impoverished Mexicans to whom socialism offers nothing but destitution. Are the Mexicans glad that so many millions of their people come to the United States and send dollars back home to their families who are trying to seek out a living under socialism? Is this their answer to dollar flight out of Mexico—to follow the dollars with people who will work for them, and send them back?

Mr. President, the United States cannot and should not dictate economic policy for our neighboring nations. We cannot and should not tell the Government of Mexico or any other state what they should or should not do. But, we do have an obligation, as stewards of our own scarce resources, to see that they are not wasted on foolish schemes. If we follow past practices of U.S. financial assistance, the latter is the most likely occurrence: Mexico will be provided with a temporary bailout in spite of the likelihood that a repeat of the current financial debacle is just around the next corner.

We have a clear obligation to the American taxpayer to ask if any U.S. investment in the Mexican situation at this time will be a proper one. We have a right to insist that certain conditions are met to assure that the people of Mexico will not be subject to more destructive policies that have led to the present situation.

MONETARY STABILITY

Mr. President, the first problem that must be addressed is the Mexican peso. The Government of Mexico pumps out too many pesos and has responded to expected market forces by slapping on controls and then continuing to inflate the peso. What must be done is not what we would expect the IMF to require—that Mexico agree to certain rates of money supply growth. That nostrum has not worked for the United States—the largest economy in the world.

What we must determine is whether the Mexican Government will agree to stabilize the peso to something of value—in this case, the U.S. dollar. It must administer its monetary policy so that if the peso is falling on international markets, it must restrict the supply. If the peso is gaining on international markets, it must allow the supply to increase. In other words, it must respond to the demand for the peso internationally and domestically.

EXCHANGE CONTROLS

Accompanying this "price rule" must, of course, be the complete relaxation of international capital flow controls and exchange rate controls—other than the official readiness to redeem the peso in a fixed number of dollars.

Exchange controls are particularly destructive to a nation such as Mexico. If controls are put on, that is a signal that the peso will be worth less in the future. It is a signal that it is unwise to have capital in Mexico—and soon there is little influx, little faith in the willingness of the Government to maintain the value of the currency and little investment.

Perhaps the irony of exchange controls is that some people are still so ignorant or so ideologically committed that they ignore the dismal record of such controls.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

One key to economic growth in Mexico must be a financial system that is dependable. Until the banks were nationalized, Mexico had at least a dependable, well-managed private banking system, but now politicians are appointed as heads of financial institutions and with public ownership of banks has come public ownership of companies partially owned or controlled by the bank. Unless assurances are received that the financial institutions will be returned to private hands, so that there is a chance of rational credit allocation in Mexico and thus real economic growth, the United States should not provide added assistance.

We have seen how nationalization of any institution is an invitation to increased corruption of government officials who are suddenly in charge of new-found power and wealth. What Mexico needs is not a new dimension of government power which sends the world the signal that corruption is on the rise in Mexico—rather, Mexico needs to send signals which assure the world that a bloated, mismanaged, and corrupt image is being restrained, and redirected, to more responsible and market-oriented mechanisms.

OTHER FACTORS

Mr. President, there is much wrong with the Mexican economy that could be cured by using some commonsense. The new President of Mexico takes office December 1, and he will face massive problems, not the least of which is alienation of certain constituencies in Mexico that favored the actions leading to the present crisis and which must be undone if Mexico is to regain economic stability and to prosper.

That is why the resolution I put forth today is important. It may provide a basis for taking actions that would otherwise be politically unpalatable. The President of Mexico can take these actions and truthfully say that he "had to" because the United States would not provide needed aid without them. He can blame his actions on the U.S. Senate if he wants to, or on the Senator from North Carolina. If these actions are necessary and good for the people of Mexico, it matters not to whom he gives the blame or credit.

What is clear, however, is that if these actions are not taken—or if actions similar to them are not taken—then any assistance provided directly or indirectly by the United States is a waste of taxpayers money, and we might as well just use it to build a 40-foot wall along our southern border. Why tighten our security? Because millions of Mexican's have already "voted with their feet" against the present economic policies of the Mexican Government, and if we support those policies with added money down that vortex, then more Mexicans will be driven to find a better life in the United States.

It is doubly ironic that the policies of this body and this Nation will affect the lives of many, many Mexicans whether we act favorably on my resolution or not. If we accept it, and if these changes are implemented in Mexico, then there is a better chance that economic growth can come again to Mexico and economic well-being to its people. If we reject this resolution and allow money to go to bail out the Mexican financial situation without a change in economic policy, then we condemn more Mexicans to poverty, and we encourage more Mexicans to seek refuge in this country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from the September 3 Wall Street Journal be printed at the conclusion of my remarks and that the text of my resolution be printed in the RECORD following the editorial.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REVIEW AND OUTLOOK—STORY OF THE WEEK

Despite President Reagan's Middle East initiative, discussed below, our vote for news development of the week goes to the bank nationalization in Mexico. Mexico is more important to our national interests than any of the quarrelsome Mideastern dominions. Many Americans fail to appreciate this, despite Mexico's proximity, population and even its oil resources. Let doubters ponder, say, the refugee problem that would be created in Texas by any insurrection south of the border.

Americans—that is, we norte-americanos—also need to understand that Mexico is a nation with a serious history and a serious heritage. Despite its current crisis and its endemic poverty, the Mexican economy had a quite credible long-term growth record even before important oil discoveries. Despite the curiosities of its political system, Mexico has managed the peaceful transfer of power at regular intervals ever since the 1920s. President Jose Lopez Portillo and Miguel de la Madrid, who will succeed him in December, are both cosmopolitan and impressive figures. For all the problems in their land, the Mexicans have much of which to be proud.

Partly because their accomplishments are not well enough understood north of the Rio Grande, though Mexicans occasionally carry their pride to self-destructive extremes. Their policies must be Mexican; whether they are sensible is less important. This is the case with the banks. Nationalization of the financial sector is firmly within the Mexican tradition of a state-directed economy. And let no outsider suggest that it is another stiff dose of the arsenic that caused the illness in the first place.

Mexico's basic economic problem is that it has outgrown its economic institutions. Now in the top 20 nations in the world in both population and gross national product, it can no longer be run as an isolated, centrally directed economy. But for political and historical reasons, it has great difficulty developing new institutions using price mechanisms and integrating itself with the world economy as befits a nation of its stature.

Two decisions during President Lopez Portillo's tenure are symptomatic. In March of 1980, Mexico decided not to go through with a tentative agreement to join GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. This would have introduced a measure of international competition, greatly spurring the efficiency of Mexican industry. Many of the largest enterprises favored joining, but the forces of isolation and inaction prevailed.

In June of 1981, Jorge Diaz Serrano, the head of the Mexican oil giant, Pemex, resigned in a dispute over his decision to cut oil prices. In retrospect (and for that matter at the time), Mr. Diaz Serrano's decision was clearly correct, needed to protect Mexico's markets in a time of falling energy prices. But the government was unwilling to accept the implications for its revenue and spending plans, so the Pemex head lost his job.

Mexico had an opportunity to start on basic economic reform in 1976, when it was forced to revalue the peso and go to the International Monetary Fund for a rescue. But a wave of new oil revenues swept aside reform and kept the old habits afloat. Oil income was used to subsidize consumer prices, to build steel mills in the jungle that didn't work, and to prop up the peso in the face of mounting inflation. Future revenues were pledged to back loans financing more of the same, and when the oil price broke the whole structure tottered down.

Mr. Lopez Portillo's assault on the banks is a classic case of killing the messenger. Under these conditions of course capital flees; if it can't flee through bank accounts if will flee in shoeboxes. Of course there was a run on the banks, in no small part caused by the government's decision to freeze the bank's dollar deposits and partially expropriate them with an artifically low rate for conversion into pesos. And the scapegoating of the banks, especially in conjunction with the replacement of the head of the Mexican central bank yesterday, may portend a flight into the kind of radical lefist myth-making President Lopez Portillo had previously avoided.

Mexico will no doubt be topic one this weekend at the joint annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in Toronto. The IMF has more or less agreed to come up with some $4 billion to bail out Mexico's current debt, and details are under negotiation. We wonder what conditions will be attached to the loan this time. For that matter we wonder whether the IMF was consulted or even notified in advance of the bank nationalization. Perhaps the initial rescheduling agreement came too easily.

These words will no doubt be resented in Mexico, but they are spoken with no animus. It is simply that, as Mexico's resort to the IMF shows, we now live in a world so economically and financially interdependent each nation has a vital interest in the progress of every other. We see the bank nationalization as story of the week precisely because high on our wishes for the world is a prosperous and vital Mexico.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1982

AMENDMENT NO. 3277

(Ordered to be printed and lie on the table.)

Mr. PRESSLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2574) to authorize appropriations for the construction of certain highways in accordance with title 23 of the United States Code, and for other purposes.

INTERSTATE HIGHWAYS ALLOCATION FORMULA

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am submitting an amendment to S. 2574, the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1982.

This amendment deals specifically with the Interstate System resurfacing apportionment contained in S. 2574. Under the provisions of S. 2574, the apportionment formula for dividing the fiscal year 1984 amount of $1.1 billion would be based on a formula with 60 percent weight assigned to the number of actual interstate lane miles and 40 percent to the number of vehicle miles (VMT) on the Interstate System within a given State.

My amendment changes the apportionment formula so that 65 percent of the emphasis is given to lane miles and 35 percent of the apportionment is based on vehicle miles traveled.

In the State of South Dakota, there are over 2,600 lane miles of interstate highway. The costs of resurfacing, restoring, and rehabilitating these roads are enormous and are increasing dramatically every year. However, the price must be paid because the Interstate System is vital to the economy of South Dakota and the Nation.

States with high lane mileage and low VMT are hard-pressed in the current economy to resurface and restore their portions of the Interstate System. Ever increasing costs for repairs—coupled with deterioration of the interstate highways brought about by heavy use, severe temperature changes, and compaction of the roadbed—have created a funding shortfall that rural States find it difficult to cover. The importance of good roads to a rural economy cannot be denied and is ample justification for changing the apportionment formula so that those States with many miles of interstate highway to restore and resurface are given a better deal.

I ask my colleagues to support this amendment, and I urge quick consideration of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1982. The contract authority that will be available after the passage of S. 2574 is needed to aid the depressed construction industry throughout the country.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Select Committee on Intelligence be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, September 16, at 10 a.m., to receive a briefing on intelligence matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

DEATH OF PRESIDENT-ELECT BASHIR GEMAYEL

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I was shocked and saddened by the brutal assassination of President-elect Bashir Gemayel in Lebanon. Combined with the PLO's withdrawal from Beirut, his election by the Lebanese Parliament had given cause for new hope that Lebanon's wounds could at last begin to heal and that country rediscover its tradition of democracy and prosperity. We took heart from Bashir Gemayel's pledge to dedicate himself to unity, liberty, security, and justice for all Lebanese under a democratic government. Instead, Lebanon's recent tragic history has been compounded by yet another senseless tragedy.

What is imperative now is for all parties in Lebanon to recognize in this latest outrage the absolute futility of further resort to violence. I reiterate my total condemnation of terrorism from any quarter, which offers no solutions to problems in the Middle East. As Bashir Gemayel himself emphasized on the day of his election, force should have no place in resolving disagreements in Lebanon or any other country.

I pray for calm and restraint on all sides, and I hope that, rather than inciting further tension and death, Bashir Gemayel's murder will strengthen the resolve of the people of Lebanon to join together in an historic display of unity, in the interest of peace, democracy, and reconstruction.●

P.P.I.'S, GOODBY!

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, earlier this month, the Food and Drug Administration quietly rescinded a Carter administration proposal that would have required pharmacists to distribute patient information leaflets for a number of prescription drugs.

While I believe that consumers need to be well-informed about the benefits and potential risks of drugs, this mandatory patient package insert (PPI) program would have borrowed heavily on the regulatory mechanisms commonly associated with the FDA, and would have placed a disproportionate legal and practical burden on our Nation's pharmacists and drug manufacturers.

Drug companies would have been required to not only design and prepare the leaflets, but to deliver them to all the drug distribution centers in the country. Pharmacists would then have been required to see that every consumer received the appropriate leaflet at the time the drug was dispensed. While pharmacists bear part of the responsibility for the education of the public about prescription drugs, the PPI program would have placed an unfair burden on their shoulders.

In fact, the main reason that this program was doomed to fail was that the dispensing of patient information was all to have taken place at the time of the drug purchase, not when the drug was prescribed. A better approach is one which supplies prescribing professionals, doctors, and nurse practitioners or physician assistants, with drug information that can be given to and discussed with patients at the time of prescribing. At this point, the patient is better able to have questions resolved and be informed of correct drug use and expected results. A patient who obtains a PPI at the time of dispensing has already purchased the drug, and will find it more difficult to discuss the information with the prescribing professional.

Now that the PPI program has been scuttled, there are many private sector initiatives underway that will provide more and better information to patients at a greatly reduced cost to the public. Among the new activities are the following:

A group of health professionals, trade groups, and consumer and scientific organizations have joined FDA in forming the National Council on Patient Information and Education. The council will serve to educate patients about their need to know more about the drugs they take, and to urge physicians to provide such advice. Paul Rogers, former chairman of the House of Representatives Subcommittee on Health and the Environment will chair the council.

The American Medical Association will soon begin distributing 20 patient information leaflets through physicians at the time the prescription is written.

The American Association of Retired Persons has begun to include drug information leaflets for its members with prescriptions filled through its mail order pharmacy services.

The U.S. Pharmacopeil Convention (USP) has developed two publications called "About Your Medicines" and "Advice for the Patient," books for consumers on prescription drugs.

Many other such private sector efforts are underway or planned. FDA has established a patient education resources center to collect information about these efforts and to facilitate the exchange of information between parties involved in patient education. In addition, FDA is assisting private efforts by developing a public and health professional campaign that will emphasize doctor-patient relations as well as drug reactions and the proper use of medicines.

These alternative voluntary efforts will result in an effective national patient drug information program. While the PPI program has quietly disappeared, this new voluntary effort should be given visibility, recognition, and praise.●

AMERICAN HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION COMMITTEE FINDS THAT BUDGET CUTS HARM AMERICANS' HEALTH

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, a special committee of the American Hospital Association on Federal funding of mental health and other health services has recently released its final report on the health impact of budget cuts. The conclusions reached by the special committee, chaired by David M. Kinzer, the president of the Massachusetts Hospital Association, are sobering and deeply disturbing. The committee concluded, "The cuts (in Federal programs) have triggered a much more rapid deterioration in health status than most officials responsible for the cuts are now willing to acknowledge. . . . The most vulnerable segments of our population are being hurt most by the cuts. . . . The country is moving further away from providing a common base of 'health security' for the poor and disadvantaged. . . . A two-tier system consisting of high quality care for private payers and lower quality care for the public payers is emerging."

The report does not limit its examination of the impact of recent budget cuts in Federal programs to health programs narrowly defined. Rather, it analyzes the health consequences of a broad range of Reagan administration policies. For example, the report notes, "Some hospitals have provided evidence that cuts in food stamps and school lunch programs are sending more persons with malnutrition to hospital outpatient departments. The tensions associated with an ailing economy have increased the reported incidence of attempted suicide, traumatic injury and battered children, which has worsened in some areas because of fewer social workers assigned to deal with this problem. In the northern States, cuts in fuel assistance for the elderly were blamed for increases in reported cases of hypothermia last winter."

The report details, program by program, the devastation wrought by the Reagan administration's budget cuts. Cutbacks in AFDC have meant that 200,000 working mothers and their children will lose medicaid eligibility by the end of 1983. One million Americans have been forced off food stamps and 250,000 women and children have had WIC program benefits curtailed.

The report notes that a spokesman for the American Academy of Pediatrics has reported that one-third fewer children are being immunized as a result of higher vaccine costs and Federal budget cutbacks, and that delivery of vaccine would be reduced by "intolerably low levels" if proposed funds for 1983 are not increased.

The report also chronicles the impact of the Reagan administration's economic policies and the resulting record unemployment of the health of Americans. To cite just a few examples:

State mental health centers in Alabama, where the unemployment rate is 16 percent, report an increase in cases of stress. In Selma, a welfare office reported a sharp rise in child neglect cases among out-of-work families. A mental health center worker from Mobile reported increases in patients, in cases of depression, and in domestic problems and commented that he had never seen so many economy-related cases in 30 years of experience.

In the Detroit suburb of Dearborn, the Midwest Health Center reports a 25-percent increase in prescriptions for antidepressant and antianxiety drugs over last year's level. During one recent six-month period, the number of patients requiring psychiatric counseling had risen by 15 to 20 percent.

One of the harshest program changes has been brought about by the administration's handling of the social security disability program. The report observes:

Not only are the reductions across all programs causing hardships, but narrowly interpreted administrative procedures are permitting unjustified benefit denials. A quadraplegic in Utah was denied social security benefits because a medical note indicated she had "increased mobility"—sufficient to roll over on a mat. Meanwhile, although still a quadraplegic, she was deprived of benefits for three months while an appeal was processed. Moreover, obstruction and delays in filing procedures and eligibility decisions aggravate the problem. For example, a man 77 years old with end-stage Alzheimer's Disease in need of nursing home placement was required to produce retroactive bank statements for two years.

In Massachusetts, a man who has spent most of his life in mental institutions recently returned to the community. He lives in a rooming house and is able to get along only with substantial assistance. He remains hostile and has great difficulty relating to people. Moreover, this individual has never learned to read. On October 13, 1981, he received a letter from social security officials stating, "Because of your education, work experience and our evaluation of you, we find you ready to return to work." This man's disability benefits were terminated on November 30, 1981. A legal services lawyer is helping this individual appeal this termination.

These are but a few examples of individuals who are left with no resources and eventually find their way to emergency rooms of general hospitals. The future costs to the health care system—or to the criminal justice system, into which many of these individuals are likely to be diverted—far exceed the costs associated with a more thorough, accurate review of a recipient's disability status.

The report also considers the impact of cutbacks in medicaid and medicare. The conclusion is chilling: A growing deterioration in the quality and availability of health care available to the less well-to-do in our society. The report sounds an ominous note:

Two levels of care based on ability to pay is not only repugnant in itself but is also a betrayal of the implicit promise of the Medicare and Medicaid programs. This is especially true when two levels of clinical care result and not just two levels of amenities. The lower tier in the system is characterized by the lack of a personal physician, patterns of crisis intervention rather than ongoing care, the absence of appointment systems, lower levels of staff and support services, poor physical facilities, and so forth. The upper and lower tiers are most often correlated with higher and lower socioeconomic groups, and their existence is more manifest in urban areas. Medicare recipients with recourse to private resources supplement the gap left by lower levels of reimbursement in public programs. Such supplements may be financed by out-of-pocket payments or purchase of coinsurance.

The reductions in federal funding in response to two consecutive Reagan Administration budgets may promote the emergence of a three-tier system: higher and lower quality of care and the absence of care. The chronic mentally ill and the disabled are most likely to fall into this third tier and to be affected by the absence of care.

The special committee finds that among the foreseeable results of recent funding reduction is a major impending crisis of access to health care. The current policies of the federal government threaten to erode what was at best a fragile balance in the health delivery system as a whole.

The report is not limited to documenting the suffering and harm that has come about as a result of the Reagan administration's policies. The report offers a series of recommendations designed to reverse this dangerous trend. The recommendation include:

No further cuts in Federal funding for health services.

Meaningful reimbursement reforms including prospective payment systems that include all populations.

Community-wide and institutional local planning to ensure that access to cost-effective care exists for all.

Funding for mental health services at parity with other health services.

The report of the AHA's special committee on Federal funding of mental health and other health services is a major contribution to our understanding of the impact of budget cutbacks adopted in the last 2 years. Mr. Kinzer and his colleagues have done the Nation a great service in bringing to the public's attention a careful and informed assessment of the broad-ranging impacts of the cuts. The report is essential reading for all those involved in the development of our national health policy and all those who are concerned with the health and well-being of our citizens.

We have heard reports that the administration is contemplating even further cuts in these vital programs next year. I urge all those in the administration responsible for our human services policy to consider this report carefully before embarking on another series of harmful and shortsighted budget proposals.●

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, yesterday a major debate sponsored by the Heritage Foundation was held in the Longworth Building on whether or not the Clinch River breeder reactor should be funded. Over 120 people attended and the debate was quite lively. Indeed, I only wish the debate could have been held here before the entire Senate.

Even though the Heritage Foundation has come out against Clinch River, the forum was balanced and fair. Making the case for Clinch River was Dr. David Rossin of the Electric Power Research Institute, a long-time proponent of Clinch River who previously worked at Commonwealth Edison of Illinois—the main contracting utility for the project. Joining him was Mr. Gordon Chipman, the breeder program's director at the Department of Energy and man with Hill experience as a technical adviser to Congresswoman MARILYN BOUQUARD on the House Science and Technology Committee.

On the side opposing Clinch River was Republican Congressman VIN WEBER of Minnesota and Dr. Brian G. Chow, a physist and doctor of finance, formerly with the American Enterprise Institute. Dr. Chow authored the American Enterprise Institute study the "Liquid Metal Fast Breeder Reactor: An Economic Analysis," and is now a senior research analyst with Pan Heuristics, a defense and energy research firm based in Los Angeles. Three important points emerged from the debate.

The first of these was that Clinch River will cost far more than DOE's latest estimate of $3.57 billion. Indeed, both sides made it clear that building the reactor is just the beginning. In specific, billions more must yet be spent on the infrastructure necessary to provide Clinch River with the plutonium fuel it needs. Back in 1971 keeping these fuel cycle costs out of the Clinch River estimate seemed sensible; everyone assumed that plutonium fuel and breeders would be so economical that private industry alone could provide these services and make a profit. Yet, both sides agreed that no one yet knew when breeder reactors would be more economical than existing light water reactors. They also agreed that Clinch River meant very little as a breeder demonstration project unless it was immediately followed by an even more expensive scaled-up version of the plant, which DOE in fact is now planning to fund for next year.

The second point that surfaced during the debate was that as a demonstration plant, Clinch River might give us hands-on engineering experience relating to its own construction and operation but that advanced breeder research and development—what is needed to devise a more economical breeder—is hardly Clinch River's objective. Indeed, as one exchange made clear, building Clinch River now has as much to do with advancing an economical breeder as building the French Concorde had with advancing an economical supersonic transport: The thing might fly—which no one ever doubted—but this knowledge will not make it any more economical nor provide us with the kind of research and development necessary to design one that is. DOE has a distinct breeder research and development program. It is funded separately from Clinch River at over $300 million a year. It features its own experimental breeder and a new breeder test facility and advanced design data comes from it, not Clinch River.

The last point that the debate raised and upon which both sides agreed, is that more advanced breeder designs than Clinch River are clearly available—one specific one by Westinghouse was discussed. Yet, the proponents of Clinch River argued that Clinch River should still be built to keep DOE's breeder efforts from loosing momentum and to provide insurance against the outside chance that we will need a commercial breeder (even this design) decades before others predict.

As many of you know from my fight last year against Clinch River I find these later arguments most unpersuasive. Of the people now working on Clinch River almost all have engineering and metallurgical skills that could be used more profitably elsewhere. More important, Clinch River and near-term commercial breeders in general are a losing proposition against light water reactors and will remain so for some time.

Dr. Chow did an excellent job in explicating this point in yesterday's debate, Mr. President. The paper he presented at yesterday's debate is both brief and clear in its explanation of the economic problems facing Clinch River. I ask that the complete text of this paper be printed in the RECORD.

The paper follows:

WHY WE SHOULD NOT FUND THE CLINCH RIVER BREEDER REACTOR

(By Brian G. Chow)

Ever since the discovery of nuclear fission in the late 30's, scientists have been fascinated by the idea of a nuclear breeder which offers the potential for an essentially inexhaustible supply of energy. This fascination is at the heart of breeder enthusiasm, although, in time, other arguments have been put forth to support the breeder. However, the timing of the introduction of a new technology is governed more by its economic competitiveness than its abundance. For the same reason, we have not yet massively deployed other inexhaustible or essentially inexhaustible energy resources such as solar energy and seawater uranium.

Until recently, energy planners in the United States and abroad consistently overestimated future nuclear plant capacity and underestimated uranium resources. These estimates, coupled with overoptimistic projection of breeder plant capital and fuel cycle costs, led to the false conclusion that the need for breeders is urgent. It was under such a sense of urgency that, in 1972, President Nixon committed the federal government to build the Clinch River Breeder Reactor (CRBR) as a joint demonstration project with the electric utilities. It was considered then that the breeder would be commercialized as early as the year 1985.[1]

What has happened since 1972? The projection of U.S. nuclear plant capacity installed in the year 2000 has dropped by a factor of seven and that in the year 2020 by a factor of twelve.[2] Nuclear projections in other countries have also declined drastically. Instead of a shortage in uranium supply we now have a glut. It will not disappear soon and the Congress is now deliberating a bill to limit the uranium imports. The glut is caused not only by a reduction in uranium demand resulting from the drastic cutback in nuclear plant construction, but also by an increase in uranium supply. During the last decade, a number of geological settings which contain large economic quantities of uranium have been discovered in various places over the globe. This has greatly expanded the uranium resource base. On the other hand, the estimated reprocessing cost in real terms for the breeder fuel has jumped by a factor of four.[3] The construction cost of a breeder was thought to be $250/kwe [4] more costly than a current reactor (a lightwater reactor (LWR)) and, by the year 2006, the cost will be the same "via the economies of scale associated with a size change, and also via the classical learning effect." [5] In the latest DOE projection, it is apparent that the CRBR design will not bring the breeder construction cost near that of a current reactor—a matured breeder is estimated at $1035/kwe more.[6] In fact, since the CRBR decision in 1972, it is hard to find any key cost component that has changed in the direction more favorable to the breeder.

How do we assess the breeder in light of these significant changes? A commercial breeder will not be economically competitive with the current type reactor even with only a modest improvement of 15 percent in uranium efficiency, until the price rises to $210/lb U_3O_8[7], which is eleven times the current uranium spot price of $18.5/lb U_3O_8[8], and more than twice the $95/lb U_3O_8 figure projected by the Department of Energy's own Energy Information Administration for the year 2020.[9] The breeder is not expected to be economical until after the year 2040 or about sixty years from now. It is far too early to build a breeder demonstrator now.

One very noticeable evidence of the deteriorated breeder economics is the absence of a cost-benefit analysis in the recently released environmental impact statement of the U.S. fast breeder reactor program.[10] In the earlier statements, a cost-benefit analysis was presented and a large breeder benefit was claimed in no uncertain terms. Now, the breeder proponents prefer to argue that the future is uncertain and the breeder option should be developed as soon as possible for insurance purposes. One should note that the fuel cost in an improved lightwater reactor is less than 10 percent of the electricity delivered price for a uranium price of up to $200/lb U_3O_8, and the key advantage of a breeder is savings in fuel cost.[11] Even if the future turns out unexpectedly and extremely favorable to the breeder, the worst that can happen to the consumers is to pay a higher price for the uranium which is only a small component of the electricity price. If we adopt a ten-year delayed breeder demonstration strategy, the consumers, at worst, are to pay an electricity price higher by no more than one percent during the 1982-2050 period.[12] This is hardly unbearable and its probability of occurrence is very low.

Let us evaluate the insurance argument from the perspective of uranium supply adequacy. In the latest EIA forecasts, four nuclear capacity projections are made. Since we are interested in the unlikely event which is most favorable to the breeder, we select the highest projection of the four.[13] By the same token, let us use the domestic reserves and only those resources with 95 percent high confidence; both estimated by the Department of Energy.[14] If the highest projected nuclear capacity is exclusively supported by the light-water reactors with improvements but without breeders, we still have enough uranium to supply the lifetime requirement of all these reactors built on or before the year 2030. Therefore, there is no urgency now to build the CRBR even for insurance purposes. Let me emphasize that we have not yet included those probable resources of lower confidence level nor those possible and speculative resources of any confidence level. In fact, if the DOE's estimated mean or expected amount of uranium, instead of the high confident amount, is assumed to be available, we have enough uranium to suport even DOE's highest projected nuclear capacity without breeder participation until the year 2055.

Moreover, the taxpayers would have to pay well beyond the additional $2.3 billion to complete the CRBR. First, pioneer energy projects are prone to cost overruns.[15] Second, we will not be asked to support the CRBR alone. Fund requests for a large breeder demonstrator as a CRBR follow-on have already appeared in the FY 1984 budget proposal. We will be told to support the reprocessing, fabrication and other breeder fuel cycle facilities. We will be told that we will need all these and more in order to have in place the infrastructure of engineering, industrial and licensing experience. Since the economic breeder will not appear until far into the future, to support the breeder program as proposed by the breeder proponents will cost us handsomely and indefinitely. The total cost will likely be closer to $10 billion than to $2.3 billion. There exist more cost-effective investments such as research, development and demonstrations of improvements in the present type reactors. Because some of these improvements are retrofittable and all are based on existing reactor technology, they will penetrate the market faster than the breeder, and produce larger and quicker electricity cost savings. It is important to note that opposition to the CRBR in no way implies opposition to nuclear energy in general. It seems that at present the nuclear market is so blight that the nuclear industry fears that saying anything against its long-endorsed reprocessing and breeder would put the nuclear market in further jeopardy. Quite the contrary, concentrating our resources on the improvements of current reactors which are in trouble and in need of reviving would help the nuclear industry much more than expanding our efforts on the uneconomical breeder.

Most of the breeder demonstrators and associated facilities in various countries were planned when breeder economics was anticipated to be favorable. Since substantial investments were made, an alliance was formed among groups with vested interests—some people from the nuclear industry, utilities, bureaucracy, and politics. They will continue to advocate the breeder program. But their momentum is being slowed by reality. In fact, even the French, who are the most ardent breeder supporters, no longer expect their breeder to be economical. Using France's own estimate of the plant capital cost of their "target" commercial breeder,[16] we found that it still will not be economically competitive with a 15 percent-improved light-water reactor[17] until the uranium price reaches about $300/lb U_3O_8, sixteen times the current uranium spot price and three times the EIA's projected price for the year 2020.

In sum, the CRBR was committed a decade ago under a false sense of urgency—that the uranium would soon be running out, and that the breeder construction cost would be brought down to close to that of the light-water reactor or that the uranium price would be so high that even a breeder with a substantial higher construction cost would still produce electricity at a cost no higher than that of a light-water reactor. None of these turns out to be the case. Breeder reactors based on the CRBR design will not be economical even after many units are built. Lately, Westinghouse and Burns and Roe, Inc. have proposed a new design which is drastically different from that of the CRBR, so as to have the potential of reducing significantly the breeder construction cost.[18] Whether such a design is workable remains to be seen. The message, however, is clear. We must seek alternative designs to produce an eventual economic breeder. The CRBR demonstrator cannot test these designs. For example, the Westinghouse/Burns new design calls for sodium pipe bellows, individual containment cells, primary piping nozzles in the deck instead of at the reactor vessel. Obviously, these design changes cannot be made or tested in CRBR. It is simply premature to build a demonstrator when the design remains to be determined. Other countries with breeder programs are facing the same problem. Factors affecting breeder economics have fundamentally changed over the last ten years. We have no choice but to alter our planned programs accordingly. If we proceed along the old path, the CRBR project and other breeder related projects will cost us dearly year after year for a long period of time. And, they will divert our resources from more worthy projects, such as the improvements of current nuclear reactors, and the testing of new designs and components that would have a chance leading to an economical and desirable breeder.●

THE SECRETARY OF ENERGY'S ANNUAL REPORT TO CONGRESS: AN ADMISSION OF FAILURE

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Department of Energy has just released the Secretary's annual report to Congress for 1982. The report contains a number of disturbing indications of the administration's dangerous and unwise approach to our vital national energy concerns. I want to bring to my colleagues' attention several of the most troublesome aspects of this report.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

The report demonstrates once again the administration's refusal to take even the most minimal steps to protect the Nation from sudden and unanticipated shortages or cutoffs of energy supplies. The veto of the Standby Petroleum Allocation Act and the failure to provide an adequate fill rate for the Strategic Petroleum Reserve leave America dangerously vulnerable to disruptions of imported energy supplies. In place of careful planning, the administration offers only a blind faith that the market will somehow respond to serious shortages. At the same time, the report belittles the national consensus in favor of energy independence that has characterized the policy of the preceding three administrations—two Republican and one Democratic.

CONSERVATION

The report reaffirms the administration's indifference to energy conservation. The report observes "there is little need for Federal participation beyond helping to insure that the marketplace provides realistic price signals to energy consumers." This unwise and shortsighted policy is embodied in the administration's budget request for conservation for 1983, which slashes conservation funding by 85 percent, in effect, dismantling support for conservation.

Federal conservation programs for the elderly, for low-income individuals, for business and industry have played a vital role in reducing our dependence on foreign oil. Conservation remains the most cost-effective source of energy. The administration's cavalier indifference to these vital activities will have serious consequences for all Americans.

RENEWABLE ENERGY

The report documents in glaring details the administration's abandonment of essential support for renewable energy research and development. In the past several years, the United States had begun to take the critical first steps toward exploiting the vast potential of safe, environmentally sound and cost-effective renewable energy—Sun, wind, ocean, and thermal energy and biomass. Now the administration proposes to turn back the clock with funding reductions of up to 97 percent.

Renewable energy is the hope of our future. America's economic competitors are already moving forward aggressively in this area. The question is not whether we will tap this promising source of energy but when. We can ill afford the administration's failure to pursue this critical area of research and development.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

Nowhere is the imbalance in our national energy program more apparent than a comparison of the administration's budgetary plans for nuclear energy as compared with conservation and renewable energy. At the same time the administration proposes slashing conservation and renewable energy by 80 to 97 percent, the administration continues to propose massive funding for nuclear energy—topping $1 billion next year—including such wasteful white elephants as the Clinch River breeder reactor.

There remain serious questions which must be answered concerning reactor safety, nuclear proliferation, and waste management and disposal. Heedless policies of "hurry up" will do little to solve our Nation's energy needs, and could imperil the health and safety of our citizens.

NATURAL GAS DECONTROL

Despite the clear concerns expressed by Members of Congress of both parties, the report renews the administration's call for accelerated decontrol of natural gas—including old gas. The report ignores the devastating impact of accelerated decontrol—on inflation, on unemployment, on economic growth, and on the well-being of American consumers, particularly the elderly and the poor—while blandly asserting that "the law needs to be changed" and "all gas should be decontrolled."

The National Gas Policy Act of 1978 reflects a careful compromise designed to permit gradual decontrol while protecting the American economy and consumers from unwarranted, disruptive price hikes that would bring windfalls to a privileged few and hardship to millions. The administration should put the interests of the American people first and abandon its harmful pursuit of accelerated natural gas decontrol.

These are only a few of the more troublesome aspects of the Secretary's report. Symptomatic of the administration's rigid, counterproductive energy policies is its continued support for dismantling DOE—which, as GAO and others have concluded, would not produce cost savings—and would further cripple our efforts to develop a coherent energy policy.

Members of Congress and the American people would do well to examine the Secretary's report closely. It demonstrates vividly the total failure of this administration to develop an energy policy that would assure the Nation safe, enviromentally sound energy at a reasonable price, that would protect the most vulnerable in our society and preserve the Nation's security.●

PHILADELPHIA CITY COUNCIL SUPPORTS EXPORT TRADING COMPANY LEGISLATION

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I was pleased to note recently that the Philadelphia City Council on July 29 adopted a resolution in support of the Export Trading Company legislation (S. 734) now in conference with the House, and commending the Philadelphia Industrial Development Corp. and the Philadelphia Port Corp. for their efforts to set up such a company for small- and medium-sized business in the area.

Such action is typical of the forwardlooking attitudes of the PIDC and the port and their awareness of the potential increased exports hold for the vitality of the Port of Philadelphia and the strength of the regional economy. As a result, the enactment of this legislation will have a near-term positive impact on a major trade and industrial center in the Northeast.

Mr. President, I commend the city council, the PIDC and the port for their foresight in this regard, and I ask that the text of the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

RESOLUTION No. 867

Memorializing President Ronald Reagan and the Congress of the United States to support pending legislation enabling the creation of export Trading Companies and commending the Philadelphia Industrial Development Corporation and Philadelphia Port Corporation for developing plans for implementing an Export Trading Company for small and medium businesses in the Greater Philadelphia area.

Whereas, Current federal policy developed in the 1930's is restrictive toward world trade and does not reflect the economic realities of international markets of today, resulting in hampering United States companies and businesses in competing in the expanding world-wide markets; and,

Whereas, Current legislation is pending before Congress which would remove the restrictive barriers, thereby assisting small and medium businesses in entering the international markets; and,

Whereas, Small businesses account for nearly nine out of ten employees in Philadelphia and, given the opportunity to participate in world markets, could spark the greatest economic growth for the area in the past several decades, and simultaneously aid our struggling port business; and,

Whereas, The Philadelphia Industrial Development Corporation and the Philadelphia Port Corporation has foreseen this tremendous economic potential, and has begun developing plans for implementing an Export Trading Company in anticipation of federal legislation which will enable the Philadelphia area to be one of the leaders in this area and enhance our competition in the world market; therefore,

Resolved, by the Council of the City of Philadelphia, That we hereby memorialize President Ronald Reagan and the Congress of the United States to promptly support legislation enabling the creation of Export Trading Companies; and further,

Resolved, That the Council of the City of Philadelphia commend and support the joint activities of the Philadelphia Industrial Development Corporation and Philadelphia Port Corporation toward developing plans for the implementation of an Export Trading Company for small and medium businesses.

Resolved, That certified copies of this Resolution be forwarded to President Ronald Reagan, the President pro tempore of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the United States Senators representing the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and the members of the Congressional Delegation from Pennsylvania, the Board Members and Directors of the Philadelphia Industrial Development Corporation and Philadelphia Port Corporation, as evidence of the sentiments of this legislative body.●

FIFRA REAUTHORIZATION BILL UNACCEPTABLE

● Mr CRANSTON. Mr. President, today the Senate Agriculture Committee ordered reported legislation (H.R. 5203) to reauthorize the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act with amendments to section 24(a) of the act. I am opposed to the changes approved by the committee.

Under current law, section 24(a) permits States to place more stringent regulations on the sale or use of federally registered pesticides and to have access to pesticide companies' data on how pesticides affect human health and the environment in making such determinations. California more than any other State has taken advantage of this provision in the law.

More importantly, California's requests for information beyond that reviewed by the Environmental Protection Agency have resulted in the State's identifying pesticide problems peculiar to local conditions and have enabled the State to develop additional pesticide use guidelines to protect the public or deny pesticide registration altogether when justified. The program has worked very well. In fact, there have been numerous instances in which California has taken action well ahead of the Federal Government to cancel registrations of chemicals subsequently found by EPA to pose unacceptable public health and safety risks. For example, California restricted, then phased out, most uses of DDD and DDT in the late 1960's because of residue problems and environmental persistence. EPA did not cancel these chemical until 1972. Again with DBCP the State of California acted first—suspending registration in 1977 when problems of infertility of manufacturing plant workers and California applicators were discovered. Subsequently the State discovered that DBCP presented a groundwater contamination problem as well.

EPA suspended DBCP 3 years later, with the action based almost entirely on California's findings.

The State's access to chemical companies data has been essential in making complete evaluations of pesticides. Under existing law, a chemical company can go to court if it feels that a State's request for data is arbitrary, capricious, or unfair. H.R. 5203 as approved by the Senate Agriculture Committee, however, shifts the burden to the State to demonstrate that it has a concern about a pesticide. I think that the burden should remain on the companies to show that a pesticide is safe. It is totally unreasonable to require a State seeking additional data on the health and safety of a pesticide to show that a special local concern about the chemical is based on signfiicant factual information when it is the factual information the State is requesting from the chemical company. The committee approved bill sets up a catch 22 situation by requiring the State to show that its concern is based on data in order to obtain chemical company data. Moreover, a State should not be required to register a pesticide for conditional use when it has reason to question the sufficiency of the data submitted and seeks additional information. Such a requirement erodes the States ability to regulate pesticide use to insure public health and safety and adequately protect fish and wildlife.

These are just a few of my objections to the committee approved amendments to section 24(a) of FIFRA. I urge my colleagues to take a close look at the bill with these concerns in mind.●

DISSOLUTION OF MOSCOW HELSINKI MONITORING GROUP

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, it was with great regret that I learned on September 8 that the Moscow Helsinki group—that small, brave group of human rights activists in the Soviet Union—has decided to cease its long, valiant struggle against official repression and has announced its dissolution. With most of its members jailed, exiled, or subjected to constant harassment, the remaining members have decided they cannot go on attempting to draw attention to Soviet Government abuses of its solemn commitments under the Helsinki Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. According to Elena Bonner, wife of Andrei Sakharov and one of only three Moscow Helsinki monitors still at liberty, the few remaining activists feared that their fellows in prison would have their sentences extended if the group continued its activities.

I would like at this time to describe the fate of one imprisoned member of the Moscow Helsinki group, Dr. Leonard Ternovsky, whose particular contribution to the human rights struggle was in exposing the use of psychiatry in the Soviet Union for political purposes. Dr. Ternovsky, a radiologist, had signed many documents in defense of political prisoners, particularly concerning Vladimir Bukovsky and others who had been confined to psychiatric hospitals for their political activities. As a result, Ternovsky soon found himself the target of KGB harassment and threats that he would be liable to legal prosecution if he did not cease his human rights activities.

After Aleksandr Podrabinek's arrest for his exposé of the Soviet abuse of psychiatry, "Punitive Medicine," Ternovosky joined the working commission to investigate the use of psychiatry for political purposes. Following a show trial in December 1980, Ternovsky was sentenced to 3 years in a general regime camp for "anti-Soviet slander." Dr. Ternovsky is married and has one daughter.

Mr. President, this tiny band of people has suffered enormously for daring to demand of their government that it accord to its citizens the most elemental human rights, and the names of some of them have become famous for unwavering courage and determination: Andrei Sakharov, in internal exile; Yuri Orlov and Anatoly Shcharansky, imprisoned in a labor camp reportedly under the most inhumane conditions; Pyotr Grigorenko and Vladimir Bukovsky, now in refuge in the West.

The dissolution of the Moscow Helsinki monitoring group follows soon after several other disturbing developments behind the iron curtain: the drastic limitation on telephone service between the Soviet Union and the free world, the suppression of the independent peace movement in Moscow, and a general upsurge in repression of religious and political dissenters.

The record of the Soviet Union regarding compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act is shameful and is an indictment of the Soviet legal system. The record of its eastern European satellites is little better. Having signed the Helsinki Final Act, Moscow cannot claim foreign protests are interference in the internal affairs of the Soviet Union. We must continue to speak out against Soviet treatment of its citizens with such brutality, contempt, and fear. That is the ultimate irony: The Soviet Government and Communist Party is afraid of this handful of people, of what they might inspire in the Soviet people, afraid that, like the Polish people, the Russian people also may one day refuse to accept the dictates of the Communist Party. As a Commissioner of the U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the government body charged by law with monitoring compliance with the Helsinki Final Act, I feel that the upcoming deliberations of the CSCE Review Conference in Madrid will be negatively affected by the deliberate Soviet flouting of its Helsinki pledges.

Mr. President, I ask the Members of the Senate to join me in paying tribute to the members of the Moscow Helsinki group—those in exile, those in prison or labor camp, those confined in psychiatric wards under an especially horrible kind of imprisonment, and those clinging to a precarious liberty which may be ended at any moment. These people have written a chapter of Soviet history Russians will some day look back upon with pride and wonderment.●

PROMPT PAYMENT REQUIREMENTS FOR THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, after a great deal of dedicated work by people in small business, interested coalitions, and concerned Members of Congress, the Government will soon be required by law to meet a simple but nevertheless crucial standard: To pay its bills on time or pay interest on those overdue bills.

Prompt payments legislation, which I cosponsored, passed Congress earlier this year and has now been signed by the President. This important law will take effect October 1; responsible payment of Government debt is at hand.

The significance of this law cannot be overemphasized. In uncertain economic times such as these, it has too often been "business suicide" to contract with the Federal Government. A high rate of late payments on Government contracts has often forced businesses—in order to meet their own financial obligations—to put off creditors, to go into the market to borrow money at high rates of interest, or to simply refrain from doing business with the U.S. Government. None of these alternatives is acceptable.

This new law, however, will help business and help Government. It will make it possible and feasible for businesses to solicit and, more important, depend on business with the Government. As a result, competition for Government contracts should increase, causing a drop in prices for the goods and services for which the Government contracts. This would also give the taxpayer a greater return on tax dollars.

On August 25 the Office of Management and Budget published regulations to serve as guidelines for the various Federal agencies as they begin using these improved payment procedures. These regulations are specific and their message is clear: Pay the bills or pay the interest. The choice—particularly in light of budget cuts to Federal agencies—should be obvious. The Government cannot afford not to pay its bills on time.

This is but a single step among the many which must be made in the crusade to give businesses—especially small businesses—the simple right not to be abused by their own Government. Our country owes much to family businesses, to entrepreneurs, and to others who have taken on the difficult challenge of achieving productive business existence. These dedicated people offer hope and inspiration to us, but they need Government's support if they are to survive and prosper.

From this point forward, we must demand the highest standard of business performance from the Government as it conducts its day-to-day business affairs. For if citizens cannot look to the U.S. Government to honor its debts and obligations, where can they look?

I will continue to work for the good of those who seek to secure a place for themselves in the marketplace. There is a great deal of reform and progress to be made—and no time to waste.●

TAIWAN

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a lot of what we westerners call hocuspocus or, in other words, hokey-pokey, took place in the President's reluctant recognition of the endeavors of the State Department for him to forgo responsibilities to Taiwan. One of the leaders in this movement was Mr. Richard Holbrooke, high in the echelons of the State Department, who has, repeatedly throughout his professional life, shown a complete dislike of Taiwan.

Ray Cline, a former CIA member and station chief in Taipei, has written an article on Mr. Holbrooke's activities, at least in a partial way, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

NO WONDER HOLBROOKE IS SO FULL OF GLEE

(By Ray S. Cline)

In a long, unctuous article, Jimmy Carter's assistant secretary of state, Richard Holbrooke, patronizingly lauds President Reagan for "promising to reduce arms sales to Taiwan" ["A Laudable Flip-Flop on Taiwan," Outlook, Aug. 22]. Well, he should! He wishes he could have done it himself.

Holbrooke is the trendy young thinker of the later 1960s who persuaded Carter and Zbigniew Brzezinski to woo Peking by withdrawing U.S. defense treaty security guarantees from the 18 million Chinese people of Taiwan. Holbroooke can hardly conceal his glee at the picture of President Reagan, a sincere friend of Free China, finishing off the job Carter started in 1978. Holbrooke points out that Reagan meant to make "no change whatsoever" in his China policy by issuing the White House communique of Aug. 17, 1982, but asserts flatly that Reagan did "back down" from 1980 campaign promises and has, in fact, "changed U.S. policy." Holbrooke endorses this sacrifice of long-term principle to short-term political expediency and diplomatic double-talk.

If the words in Reagan's communique mean anything, they go a long way toward undermining the security of the Chinese people of Taiwan. They do not want their open society and prosperous economy to become part of the one-party dictatorship of the People's Republic. They will fight to prevent it. All they want is American arms to defend themselves.

All Peking's leaders want is Taiwan, a juicy geostrategic and economic plum. They have demanded that American sales of arms to defend Taiwan's freedom be stopped so Taipei will be powerless to resist Communist rule. Holbrooke claims giving in to Peking will bring the "development of common strategic and political interests" between the United States and Communist China. This claim is nonsense.

The PRC leaders routinely attack the United States as a hegemonistic superpower scarcely different from the Soviet Union, except that it is worse ideologically and weaker in arms and will. In 10 months of eyeball-to-eyeball negotiation, they never offered to do anything in the American interest. They simply threatened over and over to denounce Reagan and distance themselves further diplomatically from the United States. The White House, under State Department pressures, finally caved in, calling it a compromise. Actually, all the concessions were made by Washington at Taipei's expense. This kind of diplomacy is a sure recipe for inviting more blackmail.

Ronald Reagan as a candidate denounced Carter's sellout to Peking. He also wholeheartedly endorsed the Taiwan Relations Act of 1979 to provide arms "as may be necessary to enable Taiwan to maintain a sufficient self-defense capability." He steadfastly declares he still does.

Most Asians, however—in fact, many Americans and most of our allies—are likely to think instead, as Holbrooke does, that the mighty United States has kowtowed to Communist China to keep up a pleasant relationship, as Carter had done before. The fuzzwords of the communiqué are openly interpreted in Peking as proving the United States has tacitly accepted Peking's claimed right to govern Taiwan. What the world sees is a tilt toward Communist dictatorship—against a free economic and political system.

Unlike Holbrooke, a lot of people are against that kind of tilt. President Reagan repeatedly says he is against it, too. He must be startled at getting applause from such an unlikely political bedfellow.●

NATIONAL COORDINATING COUNCIL

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor S. 2421, a bill introduced by Senator GLENN to establish a National Coordinating Council on Technical, Engineering, and Scientific Manpower and Education.

I believe that this bill, coupled with S. 2909, the legislation I am introducing today to improve the skills of secondary school mathematics and science teachers will go a long way toward meeting the Nation's future technological needs.

The National Coordinating Council would identify national manpower and educational needs, determine the national shortage of professional engineers, define goals, and recommend ways that deficiencies can be corrected. The Council would be established within the National Science Foundation, reporting directly to the National Science Board and preparing an annual report to the Congress.

A special 5-year engineering and scientific manpower and educational fund would be established in order to finance the Council's plans and recommendations. Moneys for grants expended from the fund would be matched with private or public sector funds. This insures that the Federal Government would not contribute more than 50 percent of the expenditures.

Almost every day there is evidence that the United States is not keeping pace with other industrialized countries—such as Japan and West Germany—in technological advances, breakthroughs in scientific research, and development of new services resulting from advances in applied research. With drastically reduced Federal funding in education and research it is highly unlikely that the United States will continue to be the foremost contender in worldwide competition in these vital areas.

According to the National Science Foundation report, "Science and Engineering Education for the 1980's and Beyond," the U.S. educational system is not mandating sufficient science or mathematics courses to meet the future technological needs of our society. By contrast, Japan, Russia, and West Germany are continuing to place far greater emphasis on these areas.

Although I have always been very proud of the advances made in education in my home State of Connecticut, I was most disturbed by the following statement from Senator GLENN's introductory remarks in the April 22 RECORD:

> In the State of Connecticut last year, there were no graduates produced that were equipped to teach high school science.

This is not a State or regional problem, but a national problem that demands our immediate attention.

In a survey conducted of 600 colleges and universities that offered teacher training programs, the National Science Teachers Association reported a 77-percent decline in the number of mathematics teachers and 65-percent decline in the number of science teachers adequately trained to teach in secondary schools. With the decline in the number of qualified teachers and the decline in the number of qualified persons going into teaching in these areas, there has been a 68-percent reduction in newly employed science teachers and an 80-percent reduction in newly employed mathematics teachers since 1971.

At the same time, there are currently few incentives for students to continue studies in science, health, or engineering when reductions in support have contributed to obsolete labs, inadequate resources, materials, equipment and supplies. Last year's budget cuts eliminated all primary and secondary school science programs of the National Science Foundation. Dr. Frank Press, president of the National Academy of Sciences, has warned "that the United States is in danger of raising a new generation of Americans that is scientifically illiterate."

In addition, there is a growing national concern over the increasing university faculty shortages in the areas of computer science and engineering. Universities cannot compete with benefits offered by the many successful private industrial companies. As a result, many faculty members are pursuing careers within the private industrial sector. The commercialization of the academic community has become a new "brain drain."

Mr. President, recent advances in our Nation's scientific and technological capability must be sustained. For example, applications of basic research in molecular biology and genetics offer the promise of new chemical processes for industry, improvement in agriculture, as well as drugs to treat human diseases such as interferon for cancer therapy.

Major technological breakthroughs in microelectronics are leading to an explosion of new knowledge and uses of computers for our Nation's expanding informations and communications industries for defense.

Unless our country's critical needs for scientific and engineering manpower are met, these important efforts which contribute significantly to our Nation's productive capacity would be seriously jeopardized. It is therefore imperative that the necessary foundations in education be provided if we are to continue to make major progress in these important areas.

Mr. President, I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in support of this important legislation.●

FREEZE VICTORY IN WISCONSIN

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to bring the attention of my colleagues to the overwhelming victory that was won by supporters of the nuclear freeze in the State of Wisconsin on September 14, 1982. The nuclear freeze was on the State ballot in yesterday's primary election in Wisconsin, and it won by a resounding 76 percent. In addition, many analysts have attributed yesterday's record high turnout of primary voters in Madison and Milwaukee to widespread support of the nuclear freeze.

Yesterday's vote was truly an historic achievement, a major milestone in the nationwide grassroots campaign to prevent nuclear war. Over the past year hundreds of town meetings, city councils, and State legislatures have added their voices to the nationwide call to halt the nuclear arms race. This popular demand for a freeze has produced referendums on seven different State ballots for the 1982 fall elections. Aside from Wisconsin, freeze referendums will be on the ballot in Arizona, California, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Oregon, Michigan, and Montana. The nuclear weapons freeze will also be on the ballot of the District of Columbia and in over 15 cities and counties across the United States. In all, over one-quarter of the American population will be considering freeze resolutions in this fall's elections.

Yesterday the people of Wisconsin sent a message to Washington and to the world: Enough is enough! Stop the nuclear arms race before it stops the human race. In November, the message will be heard even louder and more clearly.●

MOSCOW HELSINKI GROUP DISBANDS

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, last week on Wednesday, September 8, we received the disturbing and disheartening news that the Moscow Helsinki Group had been forced to disband.

The disbandment marks an end to 6 years of diligent and courageous efforts to monitor human rights transgressions in the Soviet Union. The self-styled "Public Group to Promote Observance of the Helsinki Agreements in the U.S.S.R." was founded by Yuri Orlov in May 1976, just 10 months after the signing of the Helsinki Final Act. In the late 1970's, the group was in its prime. It spearheaded a focused and well-orchestrated campaign to follow and report violations of the human rights provisions of the Helsinki accords and it provided the West with 194 documents detailing their findings.

But almost from the beginning, Soviet authorities waged a war of attrition against the tiny band of 17 dissidents. In 1978, Yuri Orlov was sentenced to 7 years in a labor camp and 5 years in internal exile. Many others, including Anatoly Shcharansky and Vladimir Slepak, are now serving terms in labor camps or internal exile. The systematic punitive measures taken by the Soviets whittled away at the group until they were reduced to only three active members, Yelena Bonner, Andrei Sakharov's wife, Naum Meiman, a 70-year-old physicist barred from emigrating, and Sofia Kalistratova, a retired 75-year-old lawyer. The war was expanded to the satellite groups in the Soviet republics of Armenia, Georgia, Lithuania, and the Ukraine where most members have been jailed.

The Soviets inflicted the final assault last Monday, September 6, when the KGB threatened to prosecute Sofia Kalistratova for "circulation of fabrications * * * which defame the Soviet state and social system." That threat coupled with threats of doubling the sentences of imprisoned members forced Ms. Bonner to issue the group's final statement, Document 195, which announced the disbandment. Document 195 concludes with the explanation, "In these circumstances the group cannot fulfill the duties it assumed, and under the pressure of the authorities is obliged to terminate its work."

I am genuinely saddened to see this handful of exceptional individuals wrested away from their human rights objectives. That they were able to persevere as long as they did is extraordinary and commendable. Monitoring a government known for its disrespect for human rights, and for its practices of persecution and repression, made their task especially difficult and dangerous.

History will remember the members of Moscow's Helsinki Group as valiant human rights activists who persisted in pursuing their goals in the face of tremendous adversity and who were able thereby to advance the cause of human rights.●

CARRIER ALERT PROGRAM

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I offer my praise to the U.S. Postal Service and the National Association of Letter Carriers for the initiation of the carrier alert program.

Under the carrier alert program, local sponsoring social service agencies such as the United Way, the Administration on Aging, and the American Red Cross will notify local post offices of customers who wish to participate in the program. The customer's letter carrier, in performing his or her daily rounds, will then be alerted to any unexplained accumulation of mail which might signify a sudden illness or accident. Through locally developed procedures, the incidence of accumulation of mail will be reported to the local social service agency for appropriate followup.

An outstanding feature of "Carrier Alert" is that it is an all volunteer program. It is also a natural extension of the care which individual letter carriers traditionally have displayed to their customers—not in just the delivery of their mail—but in their concern for their well-being. I am certain we all have heard stories of letter carriers risking their lives to save the lives of others—to save a child in a blazing building, to rescue a drowning swimmer, to provide first aid to a victim of an automobile accident. Over the years thousands of letter carriers have performed such tasks. This program will be a joint effort of management and labor of the U.S. Postal Service to maximize the positive effects of such Good Samaritan acts.

Mr. President, this nationwide effort which will engage our mail carriers in this truly humanitarian and public spirited effort comes at a most noteworthy period in our history. It is a time when America's population, 60 years and over, is increasing by three-fourths of a million persons every 12 months. While their number is increasing by leaps and bounds, the longevity of such aged individuals is increasing as well. Carrier Alert is especially meaningful in that its target group is the elderly and the handicapped who are homebound.

Persons of advanced age are more likely to be in poor health or unable to fully cope with some daily activities. Many of these individuals also live their lives in oppressive loneliness. People age 65 and over who are living alone in their own homes number well above 7 million, and 80 percent of them are women. Over half of these elderly are over the age of 75, and of the women living alone 80 percent are widowed.

To these homebound elderly people and to the handicapped of all ages, Carrier Alert will bring some degree of reassurance into their lives, as well as a comforting sense of not being all alone.

Mr. President, I wish the U.S. Postal Service and the National Letter Carriers success in this undertaking and I ask my colleagues to join with me in commending them for their effort.●

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR NUNN TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after recognition of the two leaders under the standing order tomorrow, the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) be recognized on special order for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONFIRMATION OF NOMINATION OF HERBERT M. RUTHERFORD III

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the President's nomination of Herbert M. Rutherford III, to serve as the U.S. marshal for the eastern district of Virginia.

Mr. Rutherford, who is now serving as a deputy U.S. marshal, stood high among the several persons recommended to the President.

He has a proven record of accomplishments in law enforcement and personal security—an essential requirement for this important post. In his military service, Herb served in the Military Police Corps; later he was selected to be an adviser to the National Police Field Force.

A graduate of the FBI Academy, he has served as deputy marshal for the District of Columbia and as an inspector for the Fourth Judicial Circuit in Richmond, Va. Deputy Rutherford previously served as the chief deputy marshal for the northern district of Ohio and currently is the chief deputy marshal for the district of New Jersey.

Herbert Rutherford has specialized training in hostage negotiations, gambling technology, judicial security, and special operations group training.

He is a family man with roots in Virginia through his marriage.

Deputy Marshal Rutherford's record of experience and performance make him an outstanding candidate for the position of U.S. marshal. I urge my colleagues to support this nomination.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see no other Senator seeking recognition.

May I inquire of the minority leader if he has any further business to transact?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have nothing. I thank the distinguished majority leader for his customary courtesy.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have one further matter.

ORDER EXTENDING TIME FOR BUDGET COMMITTEE TO REPORT SENATE RESOLUTION 447

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Budget Committee have until the close of business tomorrow to report Senate Resolution 447.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 6:01 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, September 16, 1982, at 9:30 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, September 15, 1982

The House met at 10 a.m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY).

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
September 15, 1982.

I hereby designate the Honorable THOMAS S. FOLEY to act as Speaker pro tempore on this day.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Most Reverend Andrew G. Grutka, Bishop, Diocese of Gary, Gary, Ind., offered the following prayer:

It was your confrere, ADAM BENJAMIN of northwest Indiana, who arranged for my prayerful presence here today. He earnestly looked forward to being present at this invocation. His sudden departure for the haven of souls forever vetoed all his plans along with this one.

ADAM is now in the presence of Him whose flawless way of legislating will make ADAM glow with everlasting delight. We who knew ADAM, the indefatigable, can be sure that ADAM will keep finding ways to focus the favorable attention of the Lord upon all his congressional constituents, his House confreres, his Hoosier State, and national projects, and especially on his beloved family.

If ADAM were permitted to address us now as a messenger from the haven of souls, he would emphatically plead that his confreres allow the Lord, God, to anticipate their plans and deliberations with His divine inspiration and further them with the brightness of His wisdom along with the power of His grace.

ADAM's own religious orthodoxy, now divinely enlightened, would prompt him to voice a thunderous agreement to the following words and sentiments:

Father, Creator of unfailing light, let that light shine through these Members of Congress. Let their voices resound with praises of You; let their lives proclaim Your goodness and their accomplishments give You honor.

Considerate Lord, You have favored our Nation like no other. In grateful response let it earnestly seek to be friendly with all other nations and ever strive to be kind and benevolent, even to nations that may sorely try it.

Merciful God, our country and many other countries are presently in a state of considerable imbalance and in need of an equilibrium—one that demands incentives, examples, and stabilizations.

Grant, O Lord, the Members of Congress, the patience, prudence, and perseverance to bring about this equilibrium.

Let the reechoing of our recitation of "one Nation under God" and "the Land of the Free and the Home of the Brave" bring us all closer to each other and ever nearer and dearer to God. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

Mr. HEFNER changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the Journal was approved.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 1710. An act to authorize the use of the frank for official mail sent by the Law Revision Counsel of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 5228. An act to amend title 18 of the United States Code to implement the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S.J. Res. 205. Joint resolution to designate September 1982 as "National Sewing Month."

THE MOST REVEREND ANDREW G. GRUTKA

(Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, our guest Chaplain today is the Most Reverend Andrew G. Grutka, bishop of Gary, Ind.

Mr. Speaker, much I would give not to be standing in this spot today. Our dearly departed colleague, ADAM BENJAMIN, had joyfully planned to be in this place at this moment to express his gratitude to the good bishop for coming here and opening the House with his prayer. But ADAM is not here today. He is in a much better place; he is in heaven.

Bishop Grutka recently celebrated his 25th anniversary in Gary. I can see ADAM's warm smile about this occasion.

The House of Representatives, I am sure, expresses its profound gratitude to Bishop Grutka for coming here at this important time in the emotional experience of this institution, and we thank him for his kindly prayer on behalf of our departed colleague.

THE PATENT TERM RESTORATION ACT

(Mr. KASTENMEIER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, the Patent Term Restoration Act will be voted on later this morning, and it will insure the continued development of lifesaving and cost-effective medicines.

Unless we act, we can expect that research and development of new pharmaceutical and chemical products may dramatically fall.

Adjusted for inflation, pharmaceutical research as a percentage of sales fell almost 35 percent from 1966 to 1980. During the same period, the effective patent term, because of regulation, declined from 14.6 years to 7.4 years in 1980, and in 1981 to 6.8 years.

Mr. Speaker, I should also add—and you will not learn this from opponents of the bill—this bill is prospective only. It cannot affect old people or consumers next year or the year after. It applies to patents issued after adoption of the act for which there are 17 years. There is no way that it can possibly negatively impact—you can speculate it might one day—until the year 2000. Until the year 2000 might these patent terms prospectively, which are 17 years, and be then extended, could possibly affect anybody negatively. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, we will have told the pharmaceutical companies that whether or not they make management decisions on new drugs, we will have at least held out the promise that they will have a little more adequate term patent protection. That is the purpose of the bill, and that is why, overwhelmingly, the Judiciary Committee reported it out. In fact, an even more stringent bill was unanimously voted on by the Senate.

CONDEMNATION OF VIOLENCE IN LEBANON

(Mr. RAHALL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I join in condemning the tragic violence that occurred yesterday in the country of Lebanon. Violence anywhere in this world cannot be condoned. The events of yesterday in Lebanon and those who are responsible for killing President-elect Bashir Gemayel should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the laws of Lebanon. We do not know who is responsible for that killing. We do not know whether it is a rival Christian faction, leftist Lebanese militias, Syrian forces, or whether it was other forces either within or from outside the country of Lebanon. No party to the fighting in Lebanon can be completely exonerated. Let us speak for peace among all factions within Lebanon. Whoever is to succeed President-elect Gemayel should be one who is able to be a moderating influence within the country of Lebanon, one who has not lived by violence in the past and one who is willing to lay down arms in an effort to talk with all factions within the country in order to rid that country of all outside foreign forces.

I have had the opportunity on many occasions over the last several years to have dinner and talk personally with President-elect Beshir Gemayel, his brother, Amin, and his father, Pierre. The latest such occasion came this past July 25 in Beirut upon my leading a delegation to the Mideast. Lengthy, personal conversation with the Gemayel brothers about Lebanese politics took place, as Beshir had just that day announced his candidacy for President of Lebanon.

To Beshir's wife and young family, to his brother, to his parents, and all his family and friends, I extend my sympathies.

PROMISES OF MODERATION IN THE MIDDLE EAST ARE FRAGILE

(Mr. SCHUMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I too join my colleagues in mourning the untimely death by assassination of President Gemayel. I would like to point up that that death indicates a problem that has occurred in the Middle East time and time again.

When moderate leaders have stood up—in Lebanon and other places in the Middle East—they have been assassinated. Moderate Arab leaders on the West Bank have periodically been assassinated by terrorists. Recently, the homes of the very people who voted for President Gemayel in Parliament were bombed and the world watched. Then the President himself was assassinated.

This administration is asking Israel to make agreements and give up solid, tangible gains—territory, security, and protection—for verbal promises that come from some of these leaders. As yesterday's tragic incidents illustrate, those kinds of promises are fragile, indeed. It is a lesson for all of us to learn.

We cannot, we must not, push Israel into making certain kinds of commitments and giving up tangible things for fragile verbal promises.

CHANCES OF A PEACE TREATY BETWEEN ISRAEL AND LEBANON DASHED YESTERDAY

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, just 23 days ago in the company of Congressmen SCHEUER and MCGRATH I was on the streets of Beirut. It was a day of jubilance and a day of danger. The jubilance was because, for the first time, a President had been elected. For the first time, there was the beginning of a semblance to government in a nation that had not had a formal government in 7 years—a nation which had been controlled by the tyrannical PLO. The danger of that election day was created by endless volleys of gunfire from countless automatic weapons and hand grenades. The contrast was genuine—the new election evoking new hopes for peace—the ever-present specter of violence so much a part of Lebanon's troubled history.

The most unfortunate consequence of President Gemayel's assassination is we may have lost the opportunity for a peace treaty to be signed between Labanon and Israel—an event which would have been such an important foundation upon which to build a lasting peace in the Middle East. One can only hope that the successor to the President-elect will follow a course of action which will revive the prospects of peace between Lebanon and Israel.

All civilized people must condemn the murder of President Gemayel—snatched from life at the young age of 34. Violence as a means of achieving a goal is reprehensible and as I said after the murder of Lord Mountbatten—I can only hope that the perpetrators of this heinous crime should be prosecuted and required to pay with their own lives.

ASSASSINATION OF GEMAYEL A COWARDLY ACT

(Ms. OAKAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, the assassination of Bashir Gemayel, whom I and Mr. RAHALL and others met not too long ago, is indeed unfortunate. It is a cowardly act of violence which, of course, is never the answer. I extend my deepest sympathy to the family of Bashir Gemayel.

As yet, we do not know who the assassins were. I think it would be extremely wrong to jump to conclusions as to who killed the young President-elect. But let us hope that the people of Lebanon who have been exploited so much can unite behind a new leader.

Let us also hope that all foreign forces leave Lebanon, quit exploiting the country, and leave it immediately. The people of Lebanon have suffered enough. They deserve to control their own destiny.

DEFEAT OF H.R. 6444, PATENT LAW RESTORATION URGED

(Mr. WAXMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, later today, we will be asked to vote on an issue on suspension, H.R. 6444, which seeks to extend the patent period for pharmaceuticals. The pharmaceutical industry argues that when the Government takes up the time during which they otherwise would receive profits from their drugs because of the drug approval process, they ought to have the patent time extended. They have an argument to make, but what they seek to do in this legislation is to extend the patent period to include the time that they take to do testing to see if the drug is safe and effective. If there were no Government agency involved, they would still have to do this testing to be sure they are not going to be hurting people and become liable for injuries.

The consequences of a longer patent period will mean that the seniors in this country who are the primary purchasers of drugs will be paying the highest possible price for those drugs. There cannot be competition with the generic equivalent until that patent period runs out.

This bill is excessive. It is going to do a great deal of harm to people on limited fixed incomes. I think it is unnecessary. If it were to be passed at all, it should be passed in a much more restrictive form.

STREAMBANK FAILURE TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1982

(Mr. MILLER of Ohio asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, millions of acres of valuable topsoil are literally going down the river. In fact, going down just about every river in America. Streambank failure and erosion, like a cancer, undercuts highways, public facilities, and private property.

I have joined my colleague from Indiana, JOEL DECKARD, and a bipartisan group of Members representing nearly every region of the Nation in introducing today a bill that will help the private property owner in his war with erosion. The bill directs the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to provide valuable technical assistance in methods to control erosion. Any person with riverfront property who requests such technical assistance from the corps would be entitled to it. The measure stresses prevention and good planning and it emphasizes public participation in a battle that threatens to engulf more and more property unless positive steps are taken to keep "Old Man River" within its banks.

I urge the House to act quickly on this very worthwhile bill.

PASS H.R. 6444, PATENT TERM RESTORATION BILL

(Mr. SAWYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I join the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) in urging support of the so-called patent restoration bill that is going to be voted on here today.

This bill, in effect, puts pharmaceuticals back on a par as far as patent term is concerned with toys and every other invention. All patents have 17 years and historically by the Constitution and statute have had.

Since the advent of the Food and Drug Administration and extensive premarketing testing requirements, that amount of actual effective life of the patent on pharmaceuticals has dropped to 6.8 years in 1981.

As a result, we have seen a dramatic drop in investment in pharmaceutical research. This will not have any effect on pharmaceutical pricing until the year 2000—if ever—but will have an immediate effect in inducing more investment in R&D by the pharmaceutical companies.

REGRET EXPRESSED OVER ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT-ELECT GEMAYEL

(Mr. DERWINSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I join the other Members who have expressed regret at the news of the assassination of President-elect Bashir Gemayel in Lebanon. The assassination was a tragedy for the entire country and for the fragile hope for peace in the Middle East. He represented the best hope for reconstitution of Lebanon as a viable country, as a bastion of peace, stability, and as the economic leader in the Middle East. He also represented the foundation for the diplomatic momentum that President Reagan developed to address the entire Middle East problem.

I have just returned from Lebanon, where I met with President-elect Gemayel. I realized from our talk his great hopes for his country and the fact that he represented an opportunity for unity and the hope for the future in that troubled country. The departure of Yasser Arafat and the PLO militia was welcomed by all Lebanese, and reconstruction efforts had already begun when I was there.

It is my hope that this tragedy will not set back the efforts for reconciliation in Lebanon. Under their constitution, a Maronite will be elected President by the Lebanese Assembly. It is my hope that they will retain the fragile unity they were developing; that the Syrian and Israeli troops, and the remaining PLO militia will all leave the country; and at long last the people of Lebanon will have the peace and stability to which they are entitled. The achievement of these goals will be a tribute to Bashir Gemayel.

I only hope that a successor can be chosen who will have the strength to maintain the necessary unity which Lebanon so desperately needs at this time.

PASSAGE OF H.R. 4374, SHIPPING ACT OF 1972, URGED

(Mr. McCLOSKEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, in a few minutes the House will take up the Shipping Act of 1982 which was debated on suspension on Monday. Because many of the Members were not present, I would like to stress the single argument which I think should be persuasive for passage of this bill.

The only opposition to the bill is that it expands the antitrust immunity for U.S. shipping conferences and U.S. steamship lines. That is nothing new. We gave to U.S. shipping conferences this immunity from the antitrust law back in 1914; but in a series of court decisions, that immunity has been eroded and confused.

What led the committee after 6 years of effort to come up with this compromise bill to expand antitrust immunity is that we found that U.S. exporters in U.S. shipping conferences are paying twice the freight charges that their competitors in Germany and Japan are paying to ship goods to similar markets, so that if you are a German exporter of refrigerators to West Africa, you pay half the freight rates under the monopolistic conferences accepted in Europe as you do under the open conference required by American law.

If we are to stimulate U.S. exports at the present time, we should give our shipping companies this additional and clarified immunity under the Antitrust Act closer to that given to the shipping companies of other countries under foreign law.

There is no way to extraterritorially enforce U.S. antitrust law on the high seas without unduly penalizing U.S. companies in their competition with foreign companies.

WAIVING POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST H.R. 6956, HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT—INDEPENDENT AGENCIES APPROPRIATION ACT, 1983

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 559 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 559

Resolved, That during the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6956) making appropriations for the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and for sundry independent agencies, boards, commissions, corporations, and offices for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1983, and for other purposes, all points of order against the following provisions in said bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2, rule XXI are hereby waived: beginning on page 2, line 19 through page 4, line 17; beginning on page 5, lines 5 through 25; beginning on page 6, line 22 through page 7, line 2; beginning on page 8, lines 3 through 6; beginning on page 8, line 15 through page 9, line 12; beginning on page 10, lines 1 through 10; beginning on page 13, line 7 through page 14, line 10; beginning on page 15, line 11 through page 16, line 6; beginning on page 16, line 20 through page 18, line 20; beginning on page 19, line 18 through page 22, line 10; beginning on page 22, line 20 through page 25, line 2; and beginning on page 32, lines 3 through 7; and all points of order against the following provisions in said bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 6, rule XXI are hereby waived; beginning on page 2, line 19 through page 3, line 15; beginning on page 4, lines 3 through 17; and beginning on page 8, lines 15 through 23.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MOAKLEY) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. QUILLEN), and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution (H. Res. 559) waives certain points of order which might otherwise lie during the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6956) making appropriation for the Department of Housing and Urban Development and independent agencies.

The rule waives points of order against a number of provisions under clause 2 of rule XXI, which prohibits legislation in matters reported from the Committee on Appropriations. In most cases the point of order might lie because action has not been completed on the applicable authorizing bills. Some provisions, however, are actually legislative in character.

The rule also waives points of order against three provisions which could be considered reappropriations in violation of clause 6 of rule XXI. In each case the provision simply makes necessary refinements to accommodate changed circumstances.

As is customary with rules on appropriation bills, the resolution indentifies by page and line those items to which the waivers apply and no waivers are granted on any provision other than those designated in the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the Committee on Appropriations for its handling of this bill, under very difficult circumstances.

As everyone knows, the private sector has been hard hit by high interest rates and—in terms of housing, economic development, and employment—the toll has been high.

But the damage has been seriously compounded by eroding certainty of the Government's commitment to assist the private sector is providing adequate housing.

Our Nation's housing programs are in serious jeopardy. Investors and localities are afraid to commit other resources when Federal policy is constantly shifting, in this area.

Mr. Speaker, the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND), and his colleagues on both sides of the aisle are certainly to be commended for their efforts to use the appropriations process to address the problem of providing a coherent national commitment in the area of housing. They each would be among the first to admit that this is not an ideal vehicle for formulating policy but little option seems to be available and I commend them for accepting the additional responsibilities forced on them.

The committee has faced equally serious difficulties in other areas covered by the bill as a result of the pressures that have been placed on the budget process. Particularly, it should be noted that the Environmental Protection Administration is covered by eight separate bills. All are at various stages in the legislative process but none has been enacted.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware of only one waiver which presents any controversy at all and that provision is expected to be addressed by an amendment.

Given the budget situation in the present session, the rule is fair and provides an open and orderly procedure for handling this matter. Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, the rule has been ably explained. We are far behind in passing the appropriation measures, this measure, and other measures. As I recall, we have only passed one appropriation bill. These must still go to the Senate; so it is time to get down to business. This appropriation measure is in the neighborhood of $47 billion, but it represents a number of agencies and departments. Mr. Speaker, the waivers are necessary.

I urge adoption of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) to speak out of order.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CONTE was allowed to speak out of order.)

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

REPRESENTATIVE CONTE THANKS VOTERS OF FIRST DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS FOR THEIR VOTES

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to thank publicly all the people of the First Congressional District—Republican, Democrat, and Independent alike—for their votes in yesterday's Massachusetts primary, which resulted in my receiving the nomination of both the Republican and Democratic Parties. From the tiniest towns in the Berkshires to the larger industrial cities, voters of my congressional district expressed their support of my candidacy for reelection to a 13th term in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, anyone who has run as a write-in candidate knows how difficult it is to be successful, but I have my workers and the Democratic and Independent voters of the First District to thank most sincerely for their support and their votes.

Again, I thank the voters of the First District of Massachusetts for allowing me to continue serving all the people, regardless of their political affiliation.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I would be glad to yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the gentleman from Massachusetts on the remarkable twin victories he won in yesterday's Massachusetts primary. I know how difficult it is to run a successful write-in campaign, and Mr. CONTE is to be congratulated for the considerable effort he expended in pursuit of the Democratic nomination. His victory was a tribute to his abilities and his record, and it certainly reflected the high regard in which he is held by the people of the First Congressional District of Massachusetts. I am familiar with the people of that area—whether they are Republican, Democratic, or Independent, they demand quality in their elected officials. It is therefore a singular honor for voters of both major parties to select the same nominee for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives. I hope that Mr. CONTE enjoys running as a Democrat; if the experience is so pleasant that he wants to permanently join the ranks of the Democrats, he will be more than welcome.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman. I really appreciate those kind remarks coming from the Congressman from the Second Congressional District. I have no doubt the gentleman is coming back here with a walloping majority.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman very much for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I take this time just to point out that under the provisions of rule XXI of the House, the taxpayers receive some assurance that we will properly consider all of the money that goes through the House of Representatives, that it will be properly authorized and then properly appropriated. When in this rule we do as we are doing, waive rule XXI in a number of instances, we come up with a situation where when you go through and underline the bill, as I have done, you find just page after page of this bill is literally waived from points of order against it under rule XXI, which as I say, is a protection for the taxpayers of this country.

I point this out, not to criticize the Appropriations Committee, because the Appropriations Committee is doing what it has to do, given the legislative situation we find ourselves in. I point it out as a criticism of where I think we are at this point in the legislation session. Early on in this session we went days and days literally doing nothing around this body. We would have pro forma sessions when we were not doing anything at all and now we come down to the end of the session and we find ourselves having to waive the rules of the House in order to consider appropriations and we find ourselves with authorizations that have not yet passed this body. We find ourselves in a position where we are going to have billions of dollars of legislation crammed through here on almost an emergency basis and told that we have to spend this money and waive the rules of the House in order to do it.

I think the American people will find that that is the kind of spending that adds up to those mounting budget deficits that we are faced with.

Time after time that is the process in this Congress that brings about the overspending that the American people have learned is such an economic problem for the entire Nation.

So I point out that the rule we are considering here will waive rule XXI and in so doing are dropping one of the main protections the taxpayer has against irresponsible spending.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made a good point. I think that we must get down to the business of acting of bills from the authorizing committees and the appropriation committee. I think the people of this country are tired of operating on a continuing resolution.

Let us start at this very moment, even at this late hour, and do whatever is necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisons of clause 5, rule I, the Chair will now put the question on each motion on which further proceedings were postponed on Monday, September 13, and Tuesday, September 14, 1982, in the order in which that motion was entertained.

Votes will be taken in the following order:

H.R. 4374, by the yeas and nays;

H.R. 6444, by the yeas and nays;

H.R. 6813, by the yeas and nays;

H.R. 6580, by the yeas and nays; and

H.R. 6355, by the yeas and nays.

The Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the time for any electronic votes after the first such vote in this series.

SHIPPING ACT OF 1982

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unfinished business is the question of suspending the rules and passing the bill, H.R. 4374, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4374, as amended, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 350, nays 33, not voting 49, as follows:

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, regrettably I missed the first two votes today because of some fog in the New Jersey area, and, therefore, I wish to have the RECORD reflect that had I been here I would have voted yes on H.R. 4374, the Shipping Act of 1982, and yes on H.R. 6444, the Patent Term Restoration Act of 1982.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 923, PRETRIAL SERVICES ACT OF 1982

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Senate bill (S. 923) to amend chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, relating to pretrial services.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the conference report is considered as having been read.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of September 8, 1982.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SAWYER) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES).

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to bring this important legislation to the floor of the House for a final vote. The conference bill is a combination of language from both the House and the Senate passed bills. The substance of the bill is essentially the same as that of the bill passed by this body on May 11 of this year. The language changes were adopted to clarify the intent of the bill, and to make absolutely clear that wherever possible, pretrial services are to be provided at no additional cost.

As discussed during debate on passage of the original bill, the 10 demonstration pretrial services agencies now in existence have shown that the information and assistance they provide to the courts have dramatically reduced the rates of pretrial rearrests and failures to appear in Federal courts. In addition, they have contributed to the reduction of unnecessary pretrial detention costs, and have assured the detention of defendants who should not be released pretrial.

S. 923 will provide for pretrial services throughout the Federal judicial system. I urge you to support the conference report on S. 923.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on S. 923, the Pretrial Services Act of 1982. I believe that it is absolutely imperative that pretrial services be made available to Federal judges in this country. Although I have some reservations about some of the mechanics involved in providing pretrial services under this conference report, the need for these services was amply demonstrated in testimony before the Subcommittee on Crime and by the recent experience in southern Florida.

I am encouraged by the fact that my amendments to the Pretrial Services Act were retained in this conference report. Those amendments require providers of pretrial services to provide Federal judges with information relating to the danger that the defendant may pose to any other person or the community. Under current law, judges are permitted to consider this factor in capital cases, when the defendant is awaiting sentencing or appeal, and where that factor has a bearing in noncapital cases on the defendant's likelihood to appear before the court when required. I believe this information will go a long way toward protecting the community and allowing judges to make informed decisions in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, one of the issues which arose during this body's consideration of the Pretrial Services Act involved the many problems presented by the Bail Reform Act of 1966 which it implements. Many of our colleagues have expressed concern that the Pretrial Services Act constitutes only a band-aid on the problem of bail crime and that it fails to remedy the substantial underlying problems in the Bail Reform Act. My bill, H.R. 4963, is designed to correct those problems. Unfortunately, that bill has not been processed with the same promptness enjoyed by the Pretrial Services Act. However, a light glimmers at the end of the tunnel. I am advised that the full Committee on the Judiciary may consider my bill on Tuesday, September 21 and I am hopeful that, with the strong support of proponents of reforms such as the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES), the bill will be favorably reported to this body.

As my colleagues are aware, there are precious few legislative days remaining in this Congress and I call upon all of them for their support and assistance in getting my bill to the floor of the House as soon as possible. As the primary sponsor of H.R. 4362, I have been showered with inquiries from my colleagues about the status of this important legislation. They have been contacted by many of their constituents urging them to do something about the problem of bail crime. I believe that this body should be permitted to vote upon the issue of preventive detention and I trust that they will have the opportunity to do so within the next few weeks.

Mr. Speaker, again I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of the conference report on S. 923. To the extent that there are problems in the mechanics of the bill, I am confident that they will be uncovered in the course of vigorous oversight by the subcommittee

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER).

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in very strong opposition to the conference report on S. 923, the Pretrial Services Act of 1982. In my judgment, the version passed by this body in May was a bad bill. The conference report, which incorporates many provisions from the other body's bill, is even worse.

Mr. Speaker, during this Congress and the last, the Members of the Judiciary Committee on both sides of the aisle have expressed two fundamental concerns about the pretrial services program. First, in recognition of the urgent need to reduce Federal Govenment spending, we were concerned about the cost of this program. For that reason, the committee adopted, and this body approved, a specific dollar authorization of appropriations for 2 fiscal years. This provision served not only as a limitation on appropriations for this program, but as a sunset provision. After 2 fiscal years, continuation of the program would be contingent upon a reevaluation by the Congress and appropriate adjustments. Unfortunately, the conference report does not mandate such a reevaluation. Instead, it provides for an open-ended authorization until the end of time.

Our second concern over this bill related to districts which preferred not to participate in the pretrial services program. Like some of my colleagues, I have been advised by Federal district court judges that pretrial services are not needed or wanted in their districts. For that reason, in both this Congress and the last, our committee insisted upon limiting pretrial services to districts that wanted them. This conference report, by contrast, mandates the provisions of pretrial services in all judicial districts. Our repeatedly voiced suspicions about the inevitable proliferation of pretrial services in this country have been confirmed at long last.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SAWYER) has pointed out, our colleagues on both sides of the aisle have consistently voiced their concerns about the fact that this Congress has processed a money bill in this area, but has so far failed to correct the alarming deficiencies in the Bail Reform Act of 1966. This is a matter of great concern to our constituents who are harrassed and intimidated by the criminal element in this country which makes use of the revolving door created by the Bail Reform Act in their activities. Support for a reform measure like the bill introduced by my colleague from Michigan is substantial. Not only has the Senate Judiciary Committee reported such legislation, but it is the centerpiece of the President's omnibus crime package. I sincerely hope that my colleagues will enjoy an opportunity in the next few weeks to consider the bail reform bill on this floor. Otherwise, we will have once again subscribed to the notion that problems can be solved simply by throwing money at them.

Mr. Speaker, once again, I call upon my colleagues to vote against the conference report on S. 923. This bill contains none of the fiscal precautions which were found in the original House bill. In my estimation, it is sheer folly to force these services on districts which do not want them.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE).

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I support the conference committee report on S. 923, but I am disappointed that the improvements that the House Committee on the Judiciary made in the bill were removed in conference. These improvements included specific dollar limitations on appropriations which encouraged the use of people who are already employed by the Federal Government as probation officers to perform pretrial services. I think that we have here an open-ended authorization which will encourage the hiring of additional personnel who will specialize in pretrial services. This could burgeon into another bureaucracy.

Now, that being said, I still want to support the concept underlying the bill. When people come into the criminal justice system as defendants initially, it is useful to the system and to the community to have some knowledgeable people interview them and investigate their backgrounds before they go to trial, because that information, which might have been useful to the judge, is ordinarily not available to him.

We must try to keep people out of the criminal justice system, and we must get people in the system that ought to be there and ought to be convicted. But the sooner we get to the problems of criminality and the accused, the sooner we can try to save human beings from being put into the criminal justice system who perhaps ought not to be there. The idea is good; the concept is good. I urge my friend, the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from New Jersey, to exercise vigorous oversight over the operation of this new and worthwhile program.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I have no futher requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Just briefly, I want to respond to the concerns of my colleague. First of all, there are sufficient moneys in the budget now to run the program. Second of all, it is an authorization bill, not an appropriation bill. And, third, the other body insisted that we utilize for an extended period of time the probation services, and it was on that basis that we relented. But I share the concerns of my colleague and I assure him that we are going to press vigorous oversight. The fact remains however, that it is a good bill, and a strong anticrime measure. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that in the conference to discuss the working out of the details of this legislation, the Republican House Members were excluded. And I certainly do not blame the Members of the majority party in the House for doing their thing, but I would like to record my sharp disappointment at the Members of the other body who are of the same party as the minority in the House for not including the House Members in the conference so that they might negotiate and have some input.

I just think it was wrong, and I would like to go on record as protesting that procedure.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand my colleague's concern and I share that concern. We do not operate in our committee that way. In fact, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. HAL SAWYER, the ranking minority member, could not be a better partner in developing our committee's legislative initiatives.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

So the motion was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 6956, with Mr. LEVITAS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous consent agreement, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND).

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I might require.

Mr. Chairman, I would hope we can complete consideration of the 1983 HUD-independent agencies appropriations bill today. The Senate is ready to move on this bill. If both bodies act expeditiously, we can bring a conference agreement back to the House sometime this month. That is what I would like to see happen—a separate appropriation bill sent to the President—and one he can sign.

The Committee on Appropriations recommends $46,995,739,000 in new budget authority for the Department of Housing and Urban Development and the 17 independent agencies funded in this bill.

Before I get into the details of the bill, let me run over where we stand in comparison to our section 302 allocation and the President's budget.

The table on page 48 of the committee's report shows how the HUD bill compares with the section 302 allocation. As you can see, we are under our allocation by $9.6 billion in budget authority. That occurs because the committee made a decision to defer all action on the major accounts dealing with the subsidized housing programs. We believe it is premature to make recommendations in this area for 1983 primarily because of two factors:

First, the authorizing legislation has not passed the House or Senate yet; and Second, the administration is currently looking again at exactly what it wants to do in the area of subsidized housing in 1983.

So it is our feeling that we should not make any recommendations in this area until we see what the bottom line of that legislation will be. Now that is the major reason that we are about $9.6 billion under in budget authority.

In the area of outlays, the bill has also come in under the 302 allocation. In total, we are under by about $2 billion. That is made up of $1.3 billion in mandatory outlays and about $700 million in discretionary outlays.

We are under in mandatory outlays largely because when CBO estimated the outlay impact of the $2.4 billion appropriated for EPA construction grants in the urgent supplemental—it over-estimated the outlay impact of that money for fiscal year 1983 by at least $1 billion. However, let me quickly add that offsetting that erroneous estimate is the fact that the HUD subcommittee has been given no allocation in outlays for what we expect will be about $800 million in additional requirements for veterans compensation programs in 1983. Additionally, the budget assumed over $230,000,000 in legislative savings in VA entitlement programs in 1983. Legislation has passed saving only $65 million. Thus, the subcommittee needs another $165 million for VA entitlement programs. So it would appear that the two more or less balance each other out.

In the area of discretionary outlays, we are under by about $700 million. The difference between what we have approved and our ceiling is largely made up of discretionary outlays that will be associated with decisions we ultimately make on the assisted housing programs that are being deferred.

That is the picture in terms of 302 allocation. Now as you also can see by the table on page 2 of the report we are about $353 million above the President's budget request in budget authority. We are approximately $310 million above the administration's request in outlays.

So it is true that we are over the President's budget. But the fact is that it was impossible to come in under that budget—because in one or two areas his request was so low, that regardless of your party affiliation—it would be very difficult to support the request. I am not even sure the President is supporting the February budget submission.

For example, let us look at the appropriation for public housing operating subsidies which is on page 4 of the committee's report. The President recommended $1,075,000,000 in 1983. You will notice that the 1982 appropriation was approximately $1,350,000,000. We added $275 million to the President's request to restore the 1983 funding to the 1982 level. But, and this is important, if you were to take the current performance funding system formula and simply pencil out what should be provided in this account—we would have appropriated something like $1,550,000,000.

But we did not do that. Instead, for the past 12 months the HUD Subcommittee has made an effort to change the performance funding formula so that those housing authorities that are doing a good job in conserving fuel will be rewarded and those that are not will be penalized. After a number of false starts, we think we have the Department and the public housing authorities on the same track—and we expect to be able to save some money in fiscal year 1983 from these efforts. We do not know how much money can be saved. After the new funding formula is implemented, we can get a look at what is needed. A supplemental appropriation can be made at that time. So we did not provide an additional $200 million above what you see here, but the bottom line is that we are still $275 million above the President's budget.

Now we had to find some ways to offset the increase. One way that we are recommending is a reduction of $100 million in the urban development action grant program. Let me say first that the HUD subcommittee has been one of the strongest supporters of the UDAG program. In fact, this subcommittee insisted last year that the program be funded and that it be funded as a separate program and not wrapped into the Community Development Block Grant account.

But we have some very reliable information which indicates that the Department cannot give away the money for UDAG small cities. The fact is that there are just not enough quality small city UDAG applications to fund. And it is also true that when we first looked into this problem we found that HUD expects to carry forward in fiscal year 1983 approximately $100 million of unused small city UDAG funds.

Now if we go ahead and appropriate the entire $440 million that was requested—then you would have a situation where the small cities would receive $110 million (which is 25 percent) plus the carryover of $100 million. In short, we could expect to have by the end of fiscal year 1983 an excess in the small cities area of $125 million.

We felt that that did not make much sense—and we reduced this appropriation for 1 year only and have included bill language which would allocate nearly all of the balance of $340 million to the large cities.

What does that mean? It means that no one—large cities or small cities—will get anything less than what they would have gotten if we appropriated the full amount of the request. The fact is the full request of $440 million could not be used—and it was our judgment that we could offset part of the increase for operating subsidies by this rather painless reduction.

If and when money is required to meet the demand for small cities UDAG applications, the committee will give favorable consideration to such supplemental funding.

Now let us turn to another area where the President's request was simply not realistic—and that is the funding for the Environmental Protection Agency which is described on pages 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 of the report. Here is the important point. EPA's operating budget was reduced in 1982 below 1981 by approximately $268 million—roughly a 20-percent cut. On top of that the President proposed an additional reduction of $125 million or 12 percent for 1983. That would represent a 32-percent cut over a 2-year period.

I would never argue that any agency of this Government could not stand a cut. But you cannot cut the Environmental Protection Agency by 32 percent and expect it to administer the myriad of environmental laws that Congress has put on the books. It is just that simple. It cannot be done.

So the committee restored approximately $73 million. We put back $12.5 million in the research and development account. We also added $6.9 million for salaries and expenses and $53 million for abatement, control, and compliance activities.

But our biggest priority in EPA was for State grants. On pages 13 and 14 of the report you can see that we added back a total of $47.5 million of the $55 million that had been deleted from the State grant area for 1983. That was the committee's highest priority—and from what I have been hearing from the constituent groups—it was their highest priority.

Now, again, to offset this increase and some other increases for NASA and the National Science Foundation we are recommending a reduction in the substantial increase for civil defense activities in the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Let me make one thing very clear—both myself and the committee are on record of having made the point that if the administration came forward with a plan to spend a signficant amount of money for a new civil defense thrust—we would give that request very careful consideration. But my friends, the plan that they came forward with is one that I just cannot support. I do not want to go into all the details about the plan here but briefly, it is based on the concept of crisis relocation. In other words, what FEMA proposes is to move roughly 60 to 65 percent of the population from approximately 450 high-risk areas to so-called "host" areas. The plan, of course, assumes that we will have about 4 to 7 days' advance warning—that the population in the high-risk areas will cooperate and will want to move—that the host areas will be equipped to handle the millions of people moving into these areas—and that the Russians will not launch an attack just about the time everybody has gotten into their cars and are stalled in an enormous traffic jam somewhere between Springfield and Amherst.

Now we could stand here for hours, arguing over whether or not there will be any survivors in a nuclear war or whether or not this plan is actually destabilizing. While those are important issues, and while I personally feel that this plan could be destabilizing—I do not believe that that is what the committee needs to look at. What we need to decide is, is it worth spending $4.2 billion, at a minimum, to institute this plan? And—will the plan work after we have spent the money?

My judgment is that it will not work. I may not be able to prove that it will not work—but anyone who has spent 6 to 7 hours trying to get to the beach from Washington in a drive that normally takes maybe 3 hours should have some idea of the problem. In the case of getting to the beach, we are talking about moving 100,000 people. This plan calls for moving 90 percent of the metropolitan area of Washington. Think about that for a minute—and I feel you would agree the plan is flawed.

Now let us talk for a minute about one or two other areas where we have added money above the President's budget.

First, for NASA, we have added $193 million—which is primarily made up of an additional $32 million for aeronautics; $23 million for planetary mission operations; $22 million for a new advance communications satellite and finally, $140 million for Centaur Upper Stage development.

Second, the committee recommended an increase of $40 million for the National Science Foundation. Of that amount, $25 million is targeted for Science Education activities—which for all practical purposes the administration is again requesting no funds—and $15 million for the primary research and related activities function of the Foundation.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, we have provided modest increases for certain programs of the Veterans' Administration. We have added $16.7 million to medical care for an additional 500 nurses and some additional community nursing beds. Also, in the area of medical research we have added $17.2 million for what I believe—and I think the committee would agree—is some of the best spent money in the Federal budget. VA medical research returns substantially greater benefits than the total dollar investment. And I believe that it is an area that we can add money to and be assured it will be well spent.

So, I feel that the bill we have brought to you today is a reasonable recommendation. We are well under our 302 allocation for the first budget resolution. We are a little over the President's budget request—but I tried to explain to you why we felt that some increases were required in various areas—and how we attempted to offset those increases with one or two major decreases.

Mr. Chairman, this is a good bill—and I believe that it is one the President can sign.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to yield to my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts who, incidentally, won the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Congress yesterday afternoon.

I am very pleased to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question.

I understand that the committee has not provided funds for subsidized housing programs in this bill. Instead they have explicitly deferred action in this area until further direction is provided by the authorizing committee regarding the content of authorizing legislation. Is that correct?

Mr. BOLAND. The gentleman is correct. The committee believes that it would not be appropriate to make any recommendations in connection with subsidized housing programs for fiscal year 1983 until we see the outcome of significant new housing authorization legislation now before the Congress.

The committee has deferred action on four accounts which comprise the principal thrust of the subsidized housing program: First, annual contributions for assisted housing; second, rent supplement (rescission of indefinite contract authority); third, low-rent public housing—loans and other expenses (by transfer); and fourth, Government National Mortgage Association, special assistance functions fund (Ginnie Mae tandem program).

Those areas have not been included in this bill because of lack of authorization.

Mr. CONTE. I thank my colleague and would like to make a further inquiry. The bill we have before us today is approximately $9.6 billion below the 302(b) allocation for discretionary accounts which the committee has adopted for programs in the HUD/independent agencies subcommittee's jurisdiction.

Can we have the gentleman's guarantee to the House that when the committee deems it appropriate to propose funding for subsidized housing programs, the level of funding provided will be no more than $9.6 billion in total new budget authority for fiscal year 1983, and that any contingent rescissions, for example in the rent supplement program, will not serve to offset higher appropriations in achieving the overall level of $9.6 billion?

Mr. BOLAND. I can assure the gentleman and the House that it is my intention to recommend no more than $9.6 billion in new budget authority for fiscal year 1983 for subsidized housing programs, under the conditions you have just described.

□ 1300

Mr. CONTE. I, in turn, Mr. Chairman, can assure the gentleman in the well and my good friend, EDDIE BOLAND, and the Members of the House, that the administration supports the House passage of the bill, and if not radically changed by the Senate we will have a signature on this one.

Mr. BOLAND. I am delighted with the assurance of the gentleman from Massachusetts. That gives me occasion to say this might be an appropriation bill that will be signed because it will meet the test the President has suggested with reference to funding for fiscal year 1983 for the Department of Housing and Urban Development and the 17 independent agencies included in this bill.

I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. In closing, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the gentleman in the well for his leadership, not only on this bill, but down through the years in the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to yield such time as he may desire to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FLORIO).

Mr. FLORIO. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this legislation, particularly the amendments to be offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHEUER) and the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GORE).

Mr. Chairman, the House will consider three amendments offered by Mr. GORE and Mr. SCHEUER to the HUD-independent agencies bill today which I believe are critical to EPA's continuing viability as a regulatory agency.

Over the past 1½ years we have witnessed a rather systematic and cold-blooded attempt to destroy EPA's inner structure of professional staff, emasculate the major regulatory programs, and cast the States adrift.

Fortunately, I believe that the Congress, the regulated community, and certainly the American people are waking up to this catastrophe and are prepared to stop the destruction and restore the resources needed to insure that EPA can operate an effective and efficient environmental program. The three amendments which will be offered today are important steps in this process.

Mr. Chairman, my subcommittee has jurisdiction over three major EPA programs, including the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, the Toxic Substances Control Act, and Superfund. We monitor EPA's progress in implementing the programs very carefully. I can say without any reservation that additional funds are needed for salaries, research and development, and State grants in each of the areas.

Perhaps a few illustrations of how these funds would be used would be helpful.

EPA has just begun the effort to issue permits to the over 10,000 hazardous waste treatment, storage, and disposal facilities around this country. Only last week this House passed overwhelmingly a bill which requires EPA to adhere to a rigid timetable for granting these permits. It is our responsibility to insure that EPA has an adequately trained, professional staff to write and monitor these permits. Without sufficient personnel and resources, the permit writing process will bog down hopelessly and American industry will be unable to obtain needed approval for new construction and upgrading of old facilities. It is clear to me that the present budget needs to be augmented in order to make sure that the permitting and compliance program works effectively.

I urge support for the amendment which will provide additional funds for the salaries and expenses of personnel engaged in permitting and enforcement work. Enforcement is the backbone of all of these programs and these funds will help assure that our environmental laws are properly adhered to.

I know that Mr. SCHEUER is going to offer an amendment to restore at least part of the funds which were slashed from the research and development account. I support this attempt because I know that basic research and development into environmental control technology and monitoring equipment to measure the impact of pollution on public health and the environment is absolutely essential if we are to continue to make progress toward cleaning up our environment and protecting it from further damage. No farsighted person could oppose the development of the science which will ultimately save us from further degradation of the environment and our quality of life.

Perhaps the cruelest budget cuts of all have come in the area of State grants. The administration's original request cut almost 20 percent across the board from State grants from all programs. I know that the Appropriations Committee restored some of that and the Gore-Schneider amendment will improve the picture even more. The fact is that the States are about to be gifted with the responsibility of running many of the air, water, and hazardous waste programs themselves. It is unfair to tell the States they must take on these tasks and cast them adrift with minimal resources. To do that is to deny them the ability to have an effective program and ultimately to cause more harm to the public health and the environment.

All of these amendments are worthy of your support and I hope you will join me in voting in favoring them.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished chairman of our subcommittee has, as always, very lucidly and accurately explained what is a very complicated piece of legislation, and I shall not bore the House by trying to gild the lily and repeat what he has already explained so carefully. I thought that it might be more useful in the time that I am consuming simply to emphasize where we are under the budget process and what the consequences are of what we do this afternoon.

As has been explained by the distinguished subcommittee chairman and by the colloquy between him and the distinguished ranking minority member of the full committee, the subcommittee has produced a bill which is approximately $9.6 billion under the section 302(b) allocation to this subcommittee which the subcommittee expects $9.6 billion to provide for housing—a subsequent bill. For the sake of those who may not be totally familiar with Appropriations Committee procedures, under the Budget Act the Appropriations Committee is allocated in the first budget resolution an amount of money covering all the funds to be appropriated that are called for by the first budget resolution, and, pursuant to section 302(b) of the Budget Impoundment and Control Act, the Appropriations Committee, by vote of the committee, then allocates that money among its subcommittees. So, in order to stay within the limit that the Appropriations Committee granted to the subcommittee, we can spend only $9.6 billion in the housing appropriation bill that we will be producing later in the session. I hope that will be shortly after the Banking Committee has produced a housing bill.

I want to be very explicit, that in order to stay within the 302(b) limit, that $9.6 billion represents an amount that is already less than the first budget resolution contemplated for the housing items that were enumerated by the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee. So, in a very real sense, the subcommittee has already chosen to take some of the budget authority that was available for housing purposes as contemplated by the first budget resolution and made that funding available elsewhere in this appropriations bill; particularly, as the distinguished chairman has pointed out, in the additional appropriations that the subcommittee has recommended above and beyond what the administration has requested with respect to EPA.

Now, I know that there are many Members who are concerned at the levels for various agencies in this appropriation bill, and in particular those for EPA. I want to say very candidly that I do share their concerns and I sympathize with those concerns. At the same time, I would ask them to sympathize with the subcommittee's situation and the situation that all of us in this House face as we consider this bill this afternoon because we have already taken funding from housing in order to give increases to EPA and elsewhere in this bill. Every Member should understand that, since it is only the housing piece that is not in this bill of the 302(b) allocation to this subcommittee, any amendment to increase spending this afternoon is in essence going to take funds away from housing assistance, because this subcommittee has committed itself and those Members who were listening to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee and the distinguished ranking minority Member of the full Appropriations Committee heard it just a couple of minutes ago to stay within that allocation. Therefore if this bill balloons by reason of amendments to it this afternoon, the amount that this committee will have to apply to the housing programs will shrink by the same amount.

So, I think all Members, as we go about our business this afternoon when we enter the 5-minute rule and start considering amendments, ought to be very clear that any amendment they vote for to increase funding for anything else has the effect of reducing what will be left to this subcommittee to provide for assisted housing.

Again, were we not subject to those kinds of constraints, not only would I be supporting some of the amendments that have been noticed to be offered this afternoon, I would be offering some of them myself. But we do have to operate under those constraints as part of the budget procedure that this House has enacted for itself in the Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974, and I hope that the House will abide by them as we do our work this afternoon.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to compliment the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) for the work he has done on this subcommittee. I do not know of any other subcommittee that has enjoyed the nonpartisan support that this subcommittee on appropriations has, and it is due to the willingness of the gentleman from New York to adhere to his own principles of spending for the various agencies that are in this bill. We have always come to general agreement on spending for the agencies in this bill.

BILL GREEN's advice has been a great help to the subcommittee. He has willingly given this committee a great deal of his time, his effort, and his talent—and he has plenty of talent.

The distinguished gentleman from New York served on the Banking Committee before joining the Appropriations Committee. His expertise and knowledge there was helpful to that committee and, I must say, is certainly helpful to this committee. I appreciate the services he renders to this committee.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he might desire to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO).

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Chairman, with a great deal of reluctance, I rise in opposition to H.R. 6956. However, I must oppose the direction and funding contained in this appropriations which is contrary to H.R. 5890, the NASA fiscal year 1983 authorization legislation which has been passed by the House. At the appropriate time I plan to offer an amendment to reduce the NASA research and development appropriations by $140 million which has been added above the President's request and the NASA authorization action to support the sole-source procurement of a Shuttle/Centaur upper stage.

The urgent supplemental recently signed into law included language directing that NASA develop, via sole-source contracts, the Centaur upper stage for its planetary missions and cancel procurement of the inertial upper stage vehicles being bought on an Air Force contract for the Galileo and International Solar Polar missions. This action was opposed by NASA, the Air Force, and the Office of Management and Budget. While this action had minimal impact in fiscal year 1982, the implications for the fiscal year 1983 budget are significant.

The fiscal year 1983 HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations bill would continue support to the sole-source procurement of Centaur by adding $140 million more than was included in the fiscal year 1983 NASA authorization already passed by the House. The Centaur development and required orbiter and launch pad modications will cost more than $634 million for two NASA missions. The Air Force has estimated that to meet Air Force requirements an additional $400-$900 million above the NASA estimate would be required to reconfigure the NASA version of Centaur and to modify DOD spacecraft for use on a short version of Centaur. Therefore, I believe the Nation would be better served if NASA is allowed to proceed with the Galileo and International Solar Polar missions utilizing an Inertial Upper Stage and if the Air Force and NASA are permitted to proceed with a carefully structured high energy upper stage program. This approach would be far more effective and beneficial since a high energy upper stage would be required in the future whether or not we develop the Centaur.

Recent communications from NASA and DOD suggest that NASA and the Air Force have cut a deal for a joint Centaur development program. But this change in agency position in itself is not justification for a sole-source procurement. The planned NASA missions can be accomplished with the Inertial Upper Stage and therefore sole-source is not required. The Air Force requirements are in the late eighties and beyond; therefore, there is adequate time for an orderly competitive procurement. I urge my colleagues to oppose the upper stage direction being mandated by the Appropriations Committee without prior authorization.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the distinguished chairman of our subcommittee for his very generous words, and express to the House what a privilege it has been for me to work with him in this Congress on the work of this subcommittee. His understanding of the work of an extraordinarily diverse group of agencies, his understanding of the workings of this House, and his concern for the members of his subcommittee has been something that I have deeply appreciated, and I would be remiss if I did not express that appreciation on the floor.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield such time as he may consume to my predecessor as the ranking member on the minority side of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN).

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague from New York for yielding me this time. I just simply take it to congratulate the very distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, as well as my colleague from New York, for the bill that they are bringing before this House. It is a product of a great deal of work. It is a very complicated bill, and yet it has been brought in a position to be within the section 302 allocation, and in a position to be supported by the administration.

I was particularly pleased that the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee indicated that the housing operating assistance for low-income housing had been increased above the budget, because what we are faced with in this area to provide is that while we may be able to defer some expenditures for some new programs, it is awfully important to keep the housing that we have presently operating, and operating in a decent way and operating under decent conditions.

So that is a tradeoff that we have to make sometimes in this budgetary process. Where we reduced UDAG grants, those were grants for new projects, and perhaps we have to defer some of those new projects for a period of time. But we cannot take projects and installations that are currently there and let them decay and be operated poorly.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I offer my congratulations to both the subcommittee chairmen and the ranking minority member for a very good bill. I urge its support.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he might desire to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan (Mr. TRAXLER), a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the severe budget limitations that Congress has imposed upon itself are forcing us to make many program reductions, and while I appreciate the need to reduce Federal spending, I am becoming increasingly concerned that while we are cutting spending in many programs, we are not sufficiently mindful of the need that we have for many of these programs.

A case in point is the fiscal 1983 appropriation for the Environmental Protection Agency, as proposed by H.R. 6956, the fiscal 1983 HUD-independent agencies appropriations bill. The situation is so critical that it prompted me to offer supplemental views in the report on this legislation.

President Reagan succeeded in obtaining a 20-percent reduction in EPA funding last year, and he seeks another 12-percent reduction this year. The Appropriations Committee has made valiant efforts to restore as much funding for EPA programs as the committee, in its collective judgment, felt prudent.

But while the restoration is good news, I am fearful that it is like telling a drowning man that help is on the way only to have the help arrive too late. Our restorations in salaries and expenses and research and development are important. However, even with these restorations, these programs will be $10.1 million and $33.1 million, respectively, below the fiscal 1982 appropriation.

With our environmental challenges mounting, it is pure folly to reduce the programs that can help us identify ways to improve our environment. While businesses are trying to comply with our various environmental laws, to cut staff at EPA will only make it more difficult for American business to receive timely review of the many certification requests that have to be approved by EPA before business can move forward with its many projects.

I am not, Mr. Chairman, attempting to justify each and every environmental law currently on the books. I think it is important to keep in mind that we can reach a balance between our many economic and environmental concerns based upon scientific fact, as we are currently trying to do with proposed revisions in the auto emission standards imposed by the Clean Air Act. But if we simply cut the EPA budget without adequate attention to the value provided by a responsibly funded EPA, we will doom many of our efforts to secure a healthy environment at a reasonable cost.

I truly wish that our committee could have provided greater restorations for EPA activities. But the restraints of the budget resolution have presented us with our current situation and limit our options. It is for this reason that I have to date supported the action of the Appropriations Committee and why, in the absence of a responsible alternative, I will continue to support the bill as reported.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment on the committee's decision to add $40 million to the budget of the National Science Foundation. Emphasis in this increase is given to science education and to restoring some of the previously made cuts in the social and behavioral sciences. I would like to comment further on the latter.

This committee worked hard and long to produce an acceptable compromise between our urgent needs to invest in scientific understanding and the need to be sensitive to fiscal constraints. The increases in the social and behavioral sciences are modest, and are not even enough to restore these areas to their 1980 levels.

It would be a mistake to seriously underinvest in exactly the kind of basic research and development needed to restore the vigor of our economy and the capacity of our society to adapt to the massive changes that are underway. I strongly support the recommendations of this committee, especially as it relates to the increased resources provided for NSF programs in the social and behavioral sciences.

As this body knows full well, the problems that we face as a Nation are dominantly economic, social, and behavioral issues, and they cannot be better understood or eventually resolved unless we increase our capacity to understand, analyze, and interpret these issues. The administration request was far too low to permit that urgently needed increase in economic and social knowledge, and the committee has recommended a modest, but critical, expansion of support in these areas.

I might note that research in the social and behavioral sciences is especially important during periods when major changes in social and economic policy are in process. This administration has adopted a set of policies designed to change significantly the way in which our economy and society function. If we cut away our capacity to monitor and understand what is happening in the economy and in our society, neither the administration nor this body will be able to judge the success or failure of those policies.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION BUDGET

I am pleased to support the committee's recommendation for an increase of $17.2 million for medical and prosthetic research in the Veterans' Administration budget. This small VA medical research budget, totaling $155 million, represents only 1.9 percent of the total medical budget today. In 1970, it represented almost 3.5 percent of that budget.

I can neither understand nor support the administration's position in cutting this budget. The VA has a long tradition of excellence in patient care, medical education, and medical research. The three are inseparably linked, and a proper balance must be maintained. If research in the VA is damaged beyond repair by these drastic cuts, the system will lose many of its high-quality physicians—men and women engaged in the care of veterans, the teaching of future generations of health professionals, and the development of new medical knowledge.

I fully support the restortion of these funds. The impact of allowing the cuts to go through would have a disastrous effect on the VA medical care system.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he might desire to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ).

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, I thank and compliment the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND), for doing a very efficient job under very trying circumstances, and I compliment as well the ranking minority member and my former colleague on the Banking Committee and, I believe, the Housing Subcommittee as well.

As the subcommittee chairman has well noted, the bill does not provide for funding the major housing production programs pending action on an authorization bill for those functions for which our committee has the responsibility.

The authorization bill was reported out of committee on a very timely basis last May. It was one of the first authorization bills approved by the committee. It is most unfortunate—and some of us have been auguished because of it—that it has not yet reached the floor for consideration. I want to assure my colleagues that we will bring the bill forward as soon as possible.

We are facing difficulties with the authorization bill, primarily and really mostly because the administration has until now adamantly opposed any kind of authorization that provides for housing production of any kind. They are opposed to new construction of public housing units; they are opposed to any funds for assisting the construction of multifamily units for moderate income families; they are opposed to any kind of assistance for home ownership; and they are opposed to any kind of housing stimulus program. They are even opposed to emergency mortgage assistance, even though the foreclosure rate on mortgages today is at the highest level ever reached.

I have been working to see whether it will be possible to bring forward a consensus bill for housing, and with that, I wish to note the very cooperative spirit of the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STANTON), who at this very time is attempting to meet with and negotiate with the White House and the Office of Management and Budget.

Now, this would be a bill that would provide less than the original bill reported from my committee. It is less than what I feel the Nation really needs and demands, but it would be a bill that would conform as closely and as reasonably to the budget resolution as possible. It would nevertheless be a bill that keeps intact our historic and bipartisan commitment to housing programs.

Our negotiations would be faster if the administration—and that is mostly Mr. Stockman—were not so adamant and fanatic in its position. Yet I am confident that we will be able to bring forward a good bill and do it as soon as possible.

Housing has been devastated, as everyone knows, by the economic forces of the past several years. There is not now any reasonable prospect for a sound recovery in housing, despite the fact that demand is strong and rising and we have a critical need, because the fact is that mortgage money is scarce and interest rates are still far beyond reach and mortgage conditions written into contracts place more risk on buyers than they can prudently assume.

We are in the midst of high unemployment and great uncertainly. These are times that normally would call for a major effort to stimulate housing production, but today the reality is that we confront an administration that believes the best way to cure a very sick patient is to inflict more cuts and apply more leeches.

Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the House that we will have a housing bill this year. It will be as comprehensive as possible, and it will hopefully be a bill that will be supported by every single Member who is concerned about housing and by every Member who realizes that jellybeans are no substitute and never will be substitute for workable policies.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this appropriation bill, H.R. 6956, and especially of the funding levels in it for the National Science Foundation.

The National Science Foundation maintains programs to encourage badly needed long-term, high-risk research. This research is accomplished by means which train future generations of scientists and engineers. There is a remarkably high return for this country in these programs. The broad impact of NSF science, engineering, and social science research and education programs in our economic and strategic interests is great in comparison to this relatively small part of the budget.

NSF programs conform well to the administration's view that long-term, high-risk research and resultant training are proper goals for Government expenditure. Indeed, the President's own budget requests an increase in funds for the NSF over last year's level. Nevertheless, I cannot agree with the administration's low figures for behavioral and social science research and for science and engineering education. Likewise, I must also object to alternatives which replenish these directorates by draining funds for all research activities.

The $1.1 billion contained in this appropriation bill for the National Science Foundation are an important investment in the economic and technological future of our country. Universities rely on these funds in carrying out their essential work, in remaining the research backbone of the Nation.

I urge my colleagues to support this funding level in this HUD-independent agencies appropriation for fiscal 1983, and oppose any weakening amendments.

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Chairman, 1 month ago, this House decided by nearly a 100-vote margin to increase the funding for the Environmental Protection Agency's research program to last year's appropriations level. At that time, it was made clear that such an increase was modest indeed, given the EPA's new responsibilities with regard to toxic wastes, and given the magnitude of the cuts in EPA's budget between 1981 and 1982.

If we want to reaffirm the commitment we made 1 month ago to the EPA budget and environmental protection, we must vote today to bring the appropriations for EPA's research closer to the fiscal year 1982 appropriations level. When we debated this issue previously, I think we made obvious a contradiction in EPA research policy. On the one hand, the Agency, is committed to improving the quality of scientific research that it uses to support our environmental standards. That is a goal that all of us can enthusiastically endorse.

At the same time, however, the Agency is cutting exactly those long-term research projects that keep the EPA in the forefront of environmental science. The point is obvious: If the Agency is going to focus its entire environmental program on short-term regulatory needs, the quality of its science will inevitably deteriorate. That point has been underscored by the American Chemical Society, which represents 125,000 chemists and engineers, and which has enthusiastically endorsed the amendment to restore appropriations for EPA research. Let me quote directly from the society's letter:

The Scheuer amendment would increase funding for extramural research, an area slated for drastic cuts by administration, thereby allowing the agency to draw upon qualified, creative experts outside EPA who can assist in solving environmental problems. The extramural program is critical because it is open to the entire scientific community, including many of the best environmental scientists, some of whom have become discouraged by their inability to have their work supported by funding through the EPA laboratories. The proposed additional funds will allow EPA to increase its long-range research on emerging environmental problems. It would be shortsighted to wait until such problems reach crisis proportions before attempting to develop the information that is needed for appropriate policies and regulations. A lack of fundamental information is a major reason the Agency has failed to meet some of the regulatory deadlines established by Congress. In summary, the American Chemical Society believes that the House would be wise to accept the Scheuer amendment.

I include the full text of the American Chemical Society's letter of endorsement at this point in the RECORD, and I ask that my colleagues support this important amendment.

AMERICAN CHEMICAL SOCIETY
Washington, D.C., September 14, 1982.

Hon. JAMIE L. WHITTEN,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WHITTEN: The American Chemical Society has a long-standing record for promoting the use of good science as the basis of regulatory decision-making. Research is needed to insure the integrity of environmental laws, regulations, and policies. This letter is to inform you of the Society's support for the amendment which Congressman James Scheuer, chairman of the Subcommittee on Natural Resources, Agriculture Research and Environment, is expected to offer to the HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations bill for fiscal year 1983.

Congressman Scheuer, whose subcommittee has been reviewing in detail the research and development efforts of the Environmental Protection Agency, proposes to increase funding for EPA's appropriation for "Research and Development" from $121 million, as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, to $146 million. It is our understanding that, even with this amendment, the total EPA appropriations would still remain within the first budget resolution's allocation.

The Scheuer amendment would increase funding for extramural research, an area slated for drastic cuts by the Administration, thereby allowing the agency to draw upon qualified, creative experts outside EPA who can assist in solving environmental problems. At the same time, the agency will continue to support research which is more appropriately conducted in-house.

The extramural program is critical because it is open to the entire scientific community, including many of the best environmental scientists, some of whom have become discouraged by their inability to have their work supported by funding through the EPA laboratories. In contrast to previous selection processes, under the extramural program all proposals received would be subjected to peer review by panels of top scientists and engineers in the environmental field, and only those containing the most competent research will be recommended. Such reviews are so stringent that typically only 30 percent or less of the proposals are recommended for support. Once a proposal is recommended by a review panel, it is then reviewed internally by EPA to insure that the work is relevant to the mission and current priorities of EPA. The result of these two levels of review is that the nation obtains the most competent, relevant research per dollar in the recommended fields.

The extramural program has funded a number of excellent studies of important atmospheric problems, such as carcinogenic materials in the atmosphere, and chemical and meteorological studies related to acid rain and the development of receptor models for atmospheric particles (which promise to be more reliable than presently used dispersion models for identifying air pollution sources). Projects funded in the water pollution field include development of a master analytical scheme for organic constituents in water, and development and validation of methods for analysis for priority pollutants.

Finally, the proposed additional funds will allow EPA to increase its long-range research on emerging environmental problems. It would be short-sighted to wait until such problems reach crisis proportions before attempting to develop the information that is needed for appropriate policies and regulations. A lack of fundamental information is a major reason the agency has failed to meet some of the regulatory deadlines established by Congress.

In summary, the American Chemical Society believes that the House would be wise to accept the Scheuer amendment. Good fiscal management of the funds appropriated, coupled with sound strategies for research and development, would help EPA meet its responsibilities. The American Chemical Society is a nonprofit scientific and educational organization with a membership of over 125,000 chemists and chemical engineers. These comments are endorsed by the Society's Board of Directors.

Sincerely,

ROBERT W. PERRY,
President.●

● Mr. ZEFERETTI. Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring to my colleagues' attention one small provision of H.R. 6956, Department of Housing and Urban Development-independent agencies appropriations bill for fiscal year 1983, but a paramount provision which is vital to our efforts in fighting this Nation's alarming fire death toll and property losses.

The provision to which I am referring is the addition of $6 million earmarked for the U.S. Fire Administration (USFA). As you are probably aware, the Reagan administration in its original budget request did not request any funding for the USFA in fiscal 1983. Fortunately, the House Appropriations Committee saw fit not to devastate the U.S. Fire Administration and included in H.R. 6956 $6 million for the USFA. Let me also take this opportunity to point out the forceful efforts of my colleague, DOUG WALGREN, chairman of the Science, Research and Technology Subcommittee, in leading the fight to save the U.S. Fire Administration.

Without doubt, we have come far and have many accomplishments in our Naiton's fire prevention programs. We cannot, therefore, let Reaganomics destroy these efforts to bring fire, death, and casualty loss to a minimum. We must support the U.S. Fire Administration and we must support the $6 million in funding to keep the USFA a viable and working instrument in our fire prevention efforts.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for giving me this chance to express my support for this valuable funding and important program.●

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the distinguished chairman and the members of the HUD-Independent Agencies Subcommittee for their fine work on H.R. 6956, the fiscal year 1983 appropriations legislation. I am particularly glad to see that adequate moneys have been earmarked for the National Science Foundation's reasearch functions. Obviously, the subcommittee recognizes the vital link between scientific research and the stimulation of our Nation's depressed economy.

Today's appropriations bill contains important additional support for social and behavioral science research under the NSF. Research sponsored by social and behavioral science helps to deal with problems in such areas as economic productivity, capital formation, savings behavior, learning, and cognitive development, and many others. The National Science Foundation's social and behavioral science programs support large scale data cases that provide information for scholars, for policymakers, and for the Library of Congress own Congressional Research Service, among others.

H.R. 6956 also provides an additional $25 million for science and engineering education. The growing gap in our Nation's research, science, engineering, and math capabilities is well documented, and must be of grave concern to all of us here who profess to be forward thinking individuals. This concern was noted in an article published earlier this year on "The Growing Science Gap" by D. Allen Bromley, a nuclear physicist, chairman of the board and immediate past president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science:

We have the urgent problem of developing scientific literacy on the part of our citizenry. Over 80 percent of our citizens receive their last exposure, if any, to mathematics and science during their high shcool years. In a society, such as ours, of growing technological sophistication where the questions of consequance increasingly have scientific and technological aspects, if our public cannot at least appreciate the nature of the issues, quite apart from contributing to their resolution, they inevitably will tend to become alienated from the society. (Hartford Courant, January 27, 1981.)

It was the Sputnik crisis several decades past that prompted this Nation to undertake a concerted educational effort to become technologically competitive. Today, we are in no less of a crisis and the need for scientifically and technically trained citizens is surely as urgent. In this respect, the HUD-independent agencies appropriations bill's $25 million for science and engineering education is a significant and necessary step in reversing our downward trend in science literacy.

The National Science Foundation took its fiscal lumps last year, as did so many important Federal initiatives. At the present time, the social and behavioral science research programs are still being funded at less than 40 percent of their appropriation level in fiscal year 1980. Still, the moneys for these programs contained in today's bill are essential for tomorrow's scientific development and I applaud the chairman for his foresight in this regard.●

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, on the appropriation for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, in future years, I hope that the committee can give more attention to the need for funding of the Earthquake Hazards Reduction Act of 1977.

The administration keeps requesting increases in FEMA for war civil defense purposes. The horrors which would be caused by a nuclear war would be so extensive that I question whether they can ever be prepared for even with a national commitment to a massive program costing hundreds of billions.

There are more certain disasters facing us, however, which FEMA could help moderate—but which this budget does not address.

Yesterday, we debated the authorization of money for the Earthquake Hazards Reduction Act. The Science and Technology Committee's report on that legislation noted that, and I quote:

Recently, several reports have been released which highlight the growing importance of and need for a coherent National Earthquake Hazards Reduction Program. A 1981 FEMA Report, "An Assessment of the Consequences and Preparations for a Catastrophic California Earthquake: Findings and Actions Taken," found that this Nation is essentially unprepared for the next catastrophic earthquake that is expected in California within the next 30 years. Moreover, the U.S. Geological Survey issued a report which stated:

"If an earthquake should occur today on the Newport-Inglewood fault near Los Angeles, it would probably cause losses of about $45 billion to buildings and as many as 23,000 deaths * * *. A repeat of the 1811-12 New Madrid, Mo. earthquake has been estimated to cause (roughly) comparable losses."

Our Nation, with extensive population growth and settlement in large cities located over seismically active zones, has been fortunate to date. However, it is only a matter of time before this nation experiences another damaging and quite possibly catastrophic earthquake.

I believe we need to do much more to detect pending large earthquakes and warn citizens of peak danger periods. Many areas of our country face the same earthquake dangers as Japan, yet compared to Japan, we are doing little to prepare for this emergency. The Washington Post of September 14 reported on Tokyo's $6 billion effort to construct earthquake-proof public structures. In Japan, scientists keep a 24-hour watch over data from detection devices located at 238 stations along the volcanic spine of the Japanese islands. The water tables are continually checked for sudden changes, and satellites monitor the Tokyo area for Earth changes that could warn of a killer quake.

In sum, I believe that we would be wise to invest more of our limited civil defense funds into detection, warning, and countermeasures to deal with major earthquakes.

Today's appropriations bill is a cut of $1.4 million below the amount we authorized yesterday, and $400,000 below the administration's request. FEMA advises me that these cuts will be felt in three areas.

First, earthquake preparedness projects will be reduced by $795,000—from $1,750,000 to $955,000. This will curtail the development of earthquake vulnerability analyses and contingency and mitigation plans for the southern California earthquake preparedness project, the Central United States, Hawaii, Alaska, Puget Sound, San Francisco, and Boston.

Second, support of the Building Seismic Safety Council's efforts to develop and deploy improved building codes and designs will be reduced by $100,000—from $600,000 to $500,000.

Third, support of efforts to develop and disseminate earthquake hazard information to the public will be reduced by $225,000—from $570,000 to $345,000.

I fear these are penny-wise, but pound-foolish savings. In a year of $155 billion deficits, I do not propose increases in spending. But next year, I urge the committee to give more attention to this pending emergency and to find funds within the administration's budget for increased earthquake detection and mitigation.●

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Chairman, the fiscal year 1983 HUD-independent agencies appropriations bill before us today is a measure which will continue some of the critical programs of the Department of Housing and Urban Development and other agencies.

I rise in support of this legislation. It is one of the first major appropriations bills to reach the House floor as we approach the end of the fiscal year and, if enacted, will give our local communities the funds necessary to continue the community development block grant activities that are ongoing activities of many large and small cities throughout the Nation and in Puerto Rico.

I am pleased to note that at a time when we have seen serious cutbacks in many domestic programs, the committee recomends essentially the same level of funding for the CDBG program in fiscal year 1983, including $3.4 billion for this activity, only a slightly lesser amount than that for fiscal year 1982.

In Puerto Rico, 9 of our larger municipalities receive direct funding for CDBG activities and the other 69 municipalities share in the small cities program. The amounts appropriated in H.R. 6956 will mean an estimated $107 million in Federal financial assistance to all the municipalities in Puerto Rico to carry on a wide range of community development and housing activities at the local level.

A companion program in this bill, providing incentives to the private sector to stimulate urban development, is the urban development action grant, or UDAG program. Puerto Rico has made an increasingly effective use of UDAG funds to carry out a variety of local development projects.

While the total amount of funds appropriated for UDAG constitutes a reduction to $340 million from the present level of funding of $435 million, the committee's action in adding a carryover of an estimated $100 million in unused UDAG funds will help our island's communities considerably and will allow the program to continue to operate in fiscal year 1983 more or less at the same level it has this year.

Other provisions in this bill to maintain and continue subsidized housing projects which are already in process, is welcome news to those of us who have consistently supported the HUD programs to help low- and moderate-income families to an adequate level of living.

I note that some major housing subsidy programs go unfunded in this legislation and I am hopeful that the House Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee will, in the near future, provide the authorizing means to continue such traditional and time-tested programs as section 8 low-income housing, section 235 and others.

Mr. Chairman, the legislation before us today is a sound, sensible, and reasonable measure. It merits all of our support.●

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the fiscal year 1983 HUD appropriations bill because it contains funding of great interest and importance to the elderly in our Nation. Not only does it provide funding for the section 202 program which is specifically designed to develop housing for the elderly and handicapped, but it also contains funding for the congregate housing services program.

Funding is this bill is minimal for the congregate housing services program and provides only for refunding of the projects which were started in 1979. This money will allow these projects to continue providing services to the elderly until the HUD evaluation of this program is completed.

I will continue to advocate funding for this important congregate housing program because it has been proven without a doubt that it saves money and is a more effective way of providing services to the frail and impaired elderly.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing and Consumer Interests of the Select Committee on Aging, I have received much testimony which documents that it costs approximately $4,000 a year per person to provide supportive services and shelter to the elderly as compared to over $7,000 a year for the Government's portion of nursing home costs or other institutions. Total nursing home costs averaged $13,000 in 1979. HUD data shows that it costs $9.85 per day to provide supportive services to the elderly participating in the CHSP. This amount of less than $10 per day includes all grant dollars and local contributions, including fees for participants. The actual cost to the Federal Government is about $6.15 per day.

These figures clearly prove that to provide services to the elderly through this program, which allows them to remain at home and in their community, is considerably less expensive than if these same elderly persons were to be institutionalized.

We must proceed with measures that assure continuation of the section 202 program and the congregate housing services program, not only for 1983, but beyond.

Therefore, I urge all my colleagues to vote in support of H.R. 6956.●

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I support increased Federal funding of basic research in the social and behavioral sciences and science education.

Last year, the President recommended that the budget of the Directorate of Biological, Behavioral and Social Sciences at the National Science Foundation be cut 75 percent, virtually eliminating NSF's program in the social and behavioral sciences. Happily, Congress saw fit to restore to the NSF budget more than half of the recommeded reduction. Unfortunately, despite that restoration, this important area of scientific inquiry now receives only half the support it did in 1980.

Some misunderstand what comprises research in the social and behavioral sciences. In general, the value of this kind of research is not appreciated. Although some say that social science is just "commonsense," the fact is that social and behavioral research has provided us with much information about society and human behavior that runs counter to conventional wisdom.

For example, because about 8 percent of American households receive some sort of welfare payments each year, while 10 percent are classified as below the poverty line, it has long been assumed that there exists a poor and dependent underclass amounting to something like 10 percent of the population. However, a very different conclusion is suggested by studies of income change. These longitudinal studies show that although 8 percent of American households did receive welfare during a typical year, about 25 percent received welfare during at least 1 year during the 1970's. Actually, only 0.7 percent were found to have been dependent on welfare throughout that decade.

These studies also contradict another view about welfare dependency. The data show that welfare dependency does not mean that recipients do not work. The studies suggest that most people who receive welfare also work, and that most welfare recipients get more than half their income from work rather than welfare. As a result of this research, we now know that families move on and off of welfare roles, utilizing Government support in times of crisis, whether it be the illness of the family's breadwinner or his or her temporary unemployment.

Facts such as these, which result from social science research, can inform our decisions and deliberations and lead to more reasoned and humane congressional decisions.

The additional $9 million earmarked, in part, by the Appropriations Committee for NSF's research in the behavioral and social sciences represents a small but important investment in better understanding how our society and our economy functions. The additional $25 million earmarked for NSF's programs in science education will help assure that this Nation will continue to have a trained pool of scientists and mathematicians and that our citizens will have the requisite skills to function in our increasingly technological society.●

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 6956, the appropriations bill for fiscal year 1983 which funds a number of agencies, including the Veterans' Administration. The Appropriations Subcommittee on HUD and Independent Agencies has brought us a good bill with respect to veterans and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) deserve our commendation.

Mr. Chairman, the amount of money recommended for the Veterans' Administration medical care program is most noteworthy. It is $545 million over 1982 up to a total of over $7½ billion. In these times of fiscal restraint this is a very adequate amount and I am confident it will provide VA with sufficient funds to continue to carry out its excellent medical program for the veterans of our country.

Mr. Chairman, I am also most pleased to note that funding for medical research has been recommended for an increase. Under the provisions of H.R. 6956, this appropriation will go up from $128 million in 1982 to $155 million in 1983. Research in VA is essential if its medical program is to flourish. It aids greatly in recruitment of good doctors, but even more importantly, its achievements in medical science are of great benefit to the nationwide practice of medicine.

Mr. Chairman, this bill provides funds that relate to a number of matters that have had considerable attention by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Under the leadership of our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY), we have been most cost conscious, and we have met our obligations under the reconciliation instructions. In doing so, however, we have not damaged the fundamental structure of veterans' benefits. In fact, we have improved that structure by such things as passing legislation calling for increased compensation for service-connected disabled veterans and recruitment aids for nursing personnel such as scholarship and premium pay. These matters are addressed in a positive manner by the appropriations bill before us.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I commend Mr. BOLAND and Mr. GREEN and the entire subcommittee. This is a bill we can all support while being very confident that it carriers out fully our Nation's commitments to our veterans and their dependents.●

● Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of the Appropriations Committee recommendation for funding of the National Science Foundation.

NSF is this country's primary basic science organization. Its policies and programs reflect national priorities in science research. Last year, the administration attempted to discredit the Foundation's research programs in the social and behavioral sciences by proposing cuts in their budgets of up to 75 percent. This attack on an area of scientific research that provides us with essential information on human factors in technological and economic development was later described by George Keyworth, the President's science adviser, as having shown "poor judgment." The committee's bill would restore some of the funds for social and behavioral science research that were lost during last year's appropriation. This restoration of funds would signal the Congress commitment to the importance of learning more about how technological and economic developments are affecting our citizens.

The bill also includes additional funding for NSF's program in science education. The administration's proposal to dismantle this program at a time when studies are documenting how much less science and mathematics training our children are receiving and how few college graduates are becoming science and math teachers, demonstrates poor judgment in my opinion. Our children must receive solid training in mathematics and science if they are to become productive members of American society and if we, as a nation, are to maintain our status as a world leader.

I wholeheartedly support the committee's proposed appropriation for the National Science Foundation.●

● Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to emphasize my strong support for the National Science Foundation funding provision included in H.R. 6956. The committee's bill provided additional funding for NSF's program in the social and behavioral sciences and for its program in science education.

Last year, the administration singled out NSF's program in the social and behavioral sciences for cuts of up to 75 percent, cuts that were large enough to destroy these programs. The Appropriations Committee wisely rejected this proposal. The cuts were later described by George Keyworth, the President's Science Adviser, as displaying "poor judgment." (See Washington Post, Dec. 2, 1981.)

It is unwise, if not downright foolish, for us to ignore the human factors in technological development. The most sophisticated machines are useless if the people manning them are ill trained or poorly motivated. Moreover, how are we to assure that our children will be able to participate productively in the America of the future if we neglect the science and math education they are receiving today?

I supported the Appropriations Committee recommendation for increased funding for the National Science Foundation. Research in the social and behavioral sciences is essential if we are to understand how rapid technological advances are affecting our citizens and improvements in science education are essential for our children to be able to face the future.●

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, today we are considering H.R. 6956, the HUD-independent agencies appropriations for fiscal year 1983. Included in this bill is a $728 million appropriation for the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). The discharge of one of FEMA's responsibilities raises an issue we should be aware of.

FEMA is the brainchild of the civil defense folly called crisis relocation. This plan, which follows the Reagan policy of anything you can do I can do better toward the Russians, is a $4.2 billion, 4-year plan designed to evacuate likely nuclear attack target areas and relocate millions of Americans to areas considered safe from nuclear attack or fallout and hospitable to the hordes of these nuclear refugees.

The crisis relocation plan would be laughable if it wasn't so dangerous. It gives people a false sense of security. It takes people away from shelter, leaving them more vulnerable to nuclear attack. And its cost far outweighs its benefits.

City, county, and State officials privately concede that the plan is unworkable, impractical, and foolish. But many jurisdictions make no move to abandon the plan foisted on them by FEMA because they are afraid FEMA has tied crisis relocation funding to other civil defense money, such as assistance for natural disaster cleanup. They have a valid point.

I recently asked FEMA if local jurisdictions would jeopardize their eligibility for other funds if they vetoed their local crisis relocation plan. FEMA's vague and roundabout response is worth sharing. It suggests that legislative clarification is needed to give these jurisdictions guidance:

FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., September 2, 1982.

Hon. PATRICIA SCHROEDER,
Member, U.S. House of Representatives, Denver, Colo.

DEAR MS. SCHROEDER: This responds to your letter of July 16, 1982, to Louis O. Giuffrida, Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), on civil defense funding and Agency policy regarding communities or States that refuse to participate in crisis relocation planning.

With respect to your questions concerning the funding structure for civil defense, the materials enclosed illustrate the major civil defense program elements categorized by appropriation. They also indicate whether States and local communities are direct recipients and, if so, what percentage of the program funding is provided by the Federal Government.

As to whether civil defense funds may be withheld if a State or locality refuses to participate in crisis relocation planning, the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950 (the Act) provides that communities participate in crisis relocation planning and other civil defense activities on a completely voluntary basis. FEMA does not have the authority and does not intend to mandate in any way participation in any civil defense program for any community. To the contrary, through our regional offices in Denver and other cities we work with the States and their local jurisdictions to assure that the emergency preparedness programs of each community are improved as much as possible within the funds made available by the Congress.

To date, we have published no regulations designed to implement a policy of denying any community its eligibility to receive other forms of Federal emergency financial assistance should that community, through its leadership, refuse to undertake crisis relocation planning. There are, however, requirements in Section 205 of the Civil Defense Act that the Director, FEMA, establish priorities and standards for a national civil defense program which are made applicable to States and local communities in the Federal funding of functions and activities authorized in the Act, including assistance for salaries and administrative costs for civil defense officials. Necessarily, the Director, in setting such standards, must look to legislative mandates for programs, found particularly in Title V of the Act, and to priorities established by the President. Both the civil defense program approved by President Reagan and forwarded to Congress as part of his Fiscal Year 1983 budget, and the legislative program endorsed by Congress in 1980 and called for in Title V of the Act, state that emergency relocation readiness shall be a key element of the nation's planning for population protection in case of nuclear attack.

In light of the statutory provisions at Sections 205, 207 and in Title V of the Act and the priorities established by President Reagan, it is possible that a community's rejection of crisis relocation planning could raise questions as to the authority and practicality of continuing other civil defense assistance programs in that jurisdiction, particularly where the community action is not in accord with Federal and State determinations that crisis relocation planning for that jurisdiction is essential for overall national emergency planning goals. Again, the Agency has not as yet issued any particular rulemaking on this issue; however, where a State or community refuses to participate in or undertake civil defense programs, such as crisis relocation, that action may be found to be inconsistent with the requirements of the Act and the national program objectives established by the Director. Should that occur, that jurisdiction's eligibility for other forms of financial assistance under the Civil Defense Act could be questioned under the terms of the Act itself.

We sincerely hope that this letter responds to the questions raised by your constituent communities in Colorado. FEMA is attempting to work closely with each State and its respective communities to improve all aspects of emergency readiness and response. We are confident that questions of participation and eligibility can be worked out. Of necessity, we are charged by the President and the Congress to carry out the program called for in the Civil Defense Act which does place continuing emphasis on emergency planning for a nuclear attack.

Sincerely,

JOHN E. DICKEY,
ASSISTANT ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR,
Emergency Management Programs Office.●

● Mr. ZEFERETTI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of my colleague, Representative THOMAS DASCHLE, to H.R. 6956 to appropriate $25 million in fiscal year 1983 for the veterans' small business loan program.

As you know, the Congress passed and the President signed into law the Veterans' Health Care, Training and Small Business Loan Act. While this legislation represented a major accomplishment for Vietnam-era veterans suffering from agent orange exposure and for the continuation of "storefront" readjustment counseling, the small business loan program aspect of this law has become nothing more than a mere dream. President Reagan did not want the readjustment counseling program, but Congress funded it. The President did not want the small business loan program, and now we have a chance to fund that vital program.

The act, as signed into law, authorized appropriations of $25 million for a small business loan program to be administered by the Veterans' Administration. Disabled and Vietnam-era veterans would be eligible for small business loans, if they had not received assistance from the Small Business Administration. Unfortunately, President Reagan has not requested any funding, either in fiscal 1982 or fiscal 1983, for the loan program.

The amendment being offered by Mr. DASCHLE would make available the necessary $25 million in funding for the loan program. It would finally make this dream come true, and it would help make the dreams of many veterans who want to start their own businesses come true.

At a time when we must be very careful with taxpayers' money, this program can give us a good return on our investment. First, it will help put disabled and Vietnam-era veterans into the productive mainstream. Second, those businesses pay taxes and employ people. While the numbers may be small, the businesses will only bear positive fruits in our communities. And, finally, it will assure all veterans that Congress remains committed to helping those who have served our Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I wholeheartedly support Mr. DASCHLE's amendment to H.R. 6956 to provide the needed $25 million for the veterans' small business loan program. And I strongly urge my colleagues in the House to stand with me in support of the amendment and vote for its approval.●

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment to H.R. 6956 offered by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Mr. FLIPPO. This amendment would delete the $140 million in fiscal year 1983 funding for the continued integration of the Centaur upper stage into the space shuttle. I oppose this amendment because the evidence regarding whether the Centaur or the inertial upper stage should be developed by NASA is strong and clear.

This is a controversial issue, Mr. Chairman, which the HUD Appropriations Subcommittee has examined in great detail. It has been thoroughly explored by our subcommittee in hearings with NASA. On the basis of evidence presented in these hearings, I am convinced that Centaur can best meet the interplanetary needs of NASA. Moreover, once developed for NASA, Centaur can also address the national security interests of the Department of Defense and respond to commercial applications as well.

Centaur is a tested and proven program which has consistently demonstrated its technical capabilities and reliability. The Centaur was chosen by NASA in early 1981 as the preferable vehicle for both the Galileo and international solar polar missions and this decision was upheld by the General Accounting Office. While the use of Centaur will require delaying the Galileo and international solar polar launches to May 1986 from September 1985, the total timetable for Galileo will be shortened by 1 to 1½ years because of Centaur's higher payload capability. It makes ultimate sense, on both technical and economic grounds, to continue with this program which, with minor modifications, can be adapted for integration into the space shuttle.

The Shuttle/Centaur integration program has been in full development for over a year now. We have already spent approximately $40 million on this effort with total project costs estimated at $634 million. If the Flippo amendment is adopted, not only will our current investment in Centaur be lost, but also we will be committing ourselves to more expensive and unproven alternatives. The costs of the alternative inertial upper stage have escalated from $150 million to $700 million, yet the inertial upper stage does not exceed the lift capabilities nor the specifications of Centaur. The development of a new high energy upper stage would cost even more—$1 to $1.5 billion—and would not be operational until the 1990's.

Additionally, Mr. Chairman, with the adoption of the Flippo amendment, we will lose the considerable expertise of the Lewis Research Center in Cleveland, Ohio and the jet propulsion laboratory in Pasadena, Calif. in the research and development of Centaur. I personally know of the worldwide acclaim which the Lewis Research Center has received in its work in aeronautics, communications and energy. It would be a great loss to the Lewis Research Center and to the space program if NASA is directed to the inertial upper stage in lieu of Centaur.

Mr. Chairman, in my estimation, cancellation of Centaur at this point in time would be highly counterproductive and could jeopardize the Galileo and international solar polar missions. The Congress has already spoken on this issue with the adoption of the fiscal year 1982 urgent supplemental appropriations bill which appropriates $80 million for Centaur's use with the space shuttle in launching NASA's planned interplanetary missions. We ought to maintain this policy decision by rejecting the Flippo amendment. I urge you to support the fiscal year 1983 HUD-independent agencies appropriations bill as reported, which will allow for the continued development of Centaur and continued progress in our Nation's space program.●

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Chairman, I endorse the Appropriations Committee recommendations for the budget of the National Science Foundation. The Foundation's budget is an important measure of the value the Nation places on science and technology. The committee is recommending an appropriation for NSF that recognizes how vital scientific research is to our future.

Particularly important is the fact that the committee's bill increases the budget for such critical areas as social and behavioral science research and science education. In both areas, we must increase rather than decrease our national commitment. For example, we face problems of unemployment, declining productivity, and an inadequately trained labor force—all of which can be better understood and dealt with through research in the social and behavioral sciences.

At a time when our problems are mounting faster than our ability to solve them, it makes sense to invest in research in those areas that can shed light on both the problems and the possible solutions.

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GORE's, amendment restoring funding to the State grants program. It is clear that we cannot increase State responsibility for managing environmental programs far beyond their current means and simultaneously decrease Federal financial support for these programs.

A survey of States' environmental management programs conducted by the National Governors' Association this year indicates that Federal support retains a key role in these programs, even where States have been able to increase their own support. Federal funds provide in aggregate terms: 45 percent of State air budgets; 46 percent of State water quality budgets; 48 percent of State water supply budgets; and 69 percent of State hazardous waste budgets.

Only a small number of States expect to be able to make up for a significant reduction in Federal support by increasing State funds, in the face of their own fiscal constraints. Most will not be able to rely on permit fees, for example, as they have no existing statutory authority to collect fees.

A large number of States indicate they are considering completely eliminating or not accepting delegation of important environmental protection activities, particularly in the air program. In addition, many will reduce activities in proportion to the reduction in Federal support for these programs. According to NGA this "reflects the States' belief that they have already streamlined their budgets and further savings cannot be achieved without actual reductions in personnel and equipment." I would like to submit part of the NGA report for the RECORD if there is no objection.

Although I addressed these concerns to the EPA Administrator when she appeared before the Science Committee, I was unable to receive a satisfactory response.

Federalism should be cooperative. While joint responsibility for environmental protection between the State and Federal Government is a good idea, we should be working with the States to determine what there budgets can and cannot handle. We should move gradually toward abdicating Federal financial support for these programs until the States have had a chance to better prepare for their expanded authority.

The level of funding provided for in this amendment brings the State grants program up to the fiscal year 1982 funding level. Last year's 13-percent cut produced drastic reductions in personnel and services in these agencies and I feel strongly that this amendment is necessary to avoid any further reductions in these vital programs.

I include the following:

NATIONAL GOVERNORS' ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C. September 13, 1982.

DEAR MEMBER OF CONGRESS: As you consider the HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations Bill (HR 6956), which contains fiscal year 1983 funding for the Environmental Protection Agency, I wanted to inform you of the National Governors' Association's support for funding the state environmental management grant programs at fiscal year 1982 levels. We are pleased that the Appropriations Committee has added $47.5 million to the Administration fiscal year 1983 request. However, this amount is still approximately $8 million short of the fiscal year 1982 levels.

This reduction from last year's levels comes at a time when states are struggling to assume increased responsibilities with fewer resources. At the same time, the problems of controlling toxic pollutants in the nation's air and water are becoming increasingly complex. In addition, while NGA policy does not address the general funding levels needed for the effective functioning of EPA, a number of states have expressed concern over the reductions in EPA's research and develoment budget from fiscal year 1982 levels: The results of R&D activities are important for state regulatory efforts.

We appreciate your serious consideration of our views.

Sincerely,
GOV. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER IV,
Chairman, Committee on Energy and Environment.

THE STATE OF THE STATES: MANAGEMENT OF ENVIRONMENTAL PROGRAMS IN THE 1980s

(By Thomas W. Curtis and Peter Creedon, NGA Committee on Energy and Environment)

FOREWORD

In the past decade, environmental management has been a primary concern of the state governments, with the states working in partnership with the federal government to develop and implement a wide variety of environmental quality programs. The commitment to a sound and healthy environment continues to be an important priority for states in the 1980s.

This report profiles the development and support of the state environmental programs, and looks at changes the states anticipate in the near future in the face of proposed reductions in the level of federal support for environmental programs. I hope that it will promote a better understanding of how the states manage environmental quality and how states are likely to adapt to the changing fiscal environment of the 1980s.

As governors, we must continue our efforts to ensure the best and most effective management of programs aimed at providing our citizens a safe and healthy environment.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER IV,
Chairman, National Governors' Association, Committee on Energy and Environment.

BACKGROUND

The landmark environmental legislation enacted in the 1960s and 70s helped establish a state-federal partnership in the management and protection of environmental quality. The partnership involved a division of responsibility for environmental programs, with the Environmental Protection Agency providing funds to help state agencies develop and administer federally mandated programs for managing air and water quality, hazardous waste, pesticides, and water supply. In fiscal year 1982, the federal assistance for these management programs totaled $227.8 million, and represented approximately 50 percent of total state expenditures on these activities. These figures do not include state or federal expenditures for sewage treatment plants.

For fiscal year 1983 the administration has proposed reducing funds that support state management of environmental programs by 20% and may propose further reductions in future years. In proposing these cuts, the Environmental Protection Agency has assumed that all environmental programs are now adequately funded and that improved management practices can reduce the cost of environmental programs without lowering the quality of environmental protection. Although states have indicated a willingness to assume greater responsibilities for environmental program management, the proposed 20% cutback comes at a time when most state budgets are reflecting the twin effects of last year's federal budget cuts and the continued recession. At least two-thirds of the states are experiencing revenue shortfalls from earlier projections. Virtually every state legislature meeting this year has raised taxes and/or made significant cutbacks in government activities while straining to cope with major reductions in federal support for human service programs. At the same time, the states have already absorbed inflation related "budget cuts" in environmental programs because of relatively flat funding over the past several years and an actual reduction in funding in FY 1982. State environmental program managers have streamlined their programs over the past several years and eliminated inefficiencies. This situation increases the difficulty of absorbing even relatively small cutbacks in federal support.

In order to assess the ways in which states will respond to the proposed reductions in federal support, the National Governor's Association Committee on Energy and Environment chaired by Governor Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, undertook a survey of states' management of environmental programs, in cooperation with the State and Territorial Air Pollution Program Administrators (STAPPA), the Association of State and Interstate Water Pollution Control Administrators (ASIWPCA), and the Association of State and Territorial Solid Waste Management Officials (ASTSWMO). The survey focused on sources of funds for environmental programs, with particular regard to permit fees and other non-federal sources, and on changes in management practices that the states anticipate if federal support is reduced. The survey covers state air program grants under section 105 of the Clean Air Act; water quality management grants under section 106 and 205(g) of the Clean Water Act; hazardous waste management grants under section 3011 of the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act; and water supply management grants under section 1443 of the Safe Drinking Water Act.

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

The survey strongly suggests that in most states a 20 percent reduction in federal support would require curtailment in a number of environmental protection activities by a level at least proportionate to the reduction in federal support. Because states may still be required to respond to federal mandatory requirements, the activities most likely to be curtailed by the states include resource intensive activities such as monitoring of ambient pollution levels, monitoring of compliance by emission sources, permitting, technical support, and enforcement, in all environmental media (air, water quality, and hazardous waste). A significant number of state agencies would seriously consider eliminating, not accepting delegation of, or returning to the federal government several environmental protection activities. This particularly applies to air programs, including PSD permitting, control of toxic pollutants, vehicle inspection and maintenance programs, and the development of emission trading systems. Some of these activities, such as emission trading systems, air quality banking, and bubble programs, could substantially reduce the cost of compliance for emission sources, but increase the states' cost for environmental program management. The survey also suggests that personnel reductions may in many states increase the time required for sources subject to regulation to obtain permits. The survey suggests that in the short run most states will not be able to increase non-federal sources of funds, including state appropriations and collections from permit fee systems, to make up for the reduction in federal support. Finally, most states suggest a strong need to increase their efforts in certain areas, such as toxic pollutant control, if increased resources were available. Such expanded activities will not be possible in the face of reduced federal support.

FINDINGS

The survey has revealed a number of facts germane to the debate about how, and how much, federal support for state environmental management activities could be reduced without reducing the ability of states to adequately implement federal environmental programs. The salient findings include the following facts:

Federal support plays an important role in environmental program management. While the figures vary widely from state to state, in aggregate terms federal funds provide about 45 percent of state air program budgets, about 46 percent of state water quality program budgets, about 69 percent of state hazardous waste program budgets, and about 48 percent of state water supply program budgets. The states have increased their support of environmental programs as the programs progress from the planning stage to implementation, but federal support remains important.See Table I.

Only a small number of states expect to be able to make up for a 20 percent reduction in federal support by increasing state funds, in the face of their own severe financial constraints. Six states hope to be able to make up at least part of the reduction in air program funds. Three states indicate the possibility of increased support to make up for at least part of the reduction in water quality grants, 11 states hope to replace at least part of the reductions in hazardous waste grants, and 6 states hope to make up for at least some of the reduction in support for water supply programs. Given the continuing pressures on state budgets, these figures may be optimistic.

Most state environmental agencies will not be able to rely on permit fees to provide funds for environmental programs, at least in the short run. Many states do not have existing statutory authority to collect permit or processing fees. About 21 states and territories currently charge for air quality permits, but in only 10 are the funds available to the permitting agency. In only 9 states and territories are water quality permit fees available to the permitting agency; only 7 hazardous waste agencies collect and keep permit fees, and only 2 water supply agencies actually keep permit fees. In other states that charge permit fees, revenues are deposited in the state general fund. Indeed, in most states it has historically been considered good public policy to place such revenues in the general fund to avoid the appearance of conflict of interest between regulators and emission sources. Given the budget pressures in most states, collections may not go to the environmental management agency even where permit fee programs are established or fees are increased. See Tables II–V.

Most states suggest the need to increase their efforts in a number of key environmental protection activities, if resources are available. The survey indicates that in the face of reduced federal support it will be impossible for states to develop more vigorous programs in these areas without retrenchment elsewhere. Those areas most frequently mentioned by the states as needing increased effort if federal funds for environmental programs were increased include:

Air: increased toxic emissions control, increased inspections and monitoring, increased enforcement, development of bubble and controlled trading systems, and increased staff for permit processing;

Water Quality: development of groundwater management mechanisms, increased water quality monitoring and bio-assay analysis, enhancement of toxic pollutant control programs, increased resources for sewage treatment plant operator training and technical assistance, and strengthening the NPDES permitting program;

Hazardous Waste: increased investigations of uncontrolled and abandoned waste sites, increased compliance monitoring, increased enforcement, increased efforts to protect groundwater, and increased staff for permit processing;

Water Supply: increased monitoring and inspections of municipal water systems, increased resources for water treatment plant operator training, increased technical assistance, and increased resources for small and non-community water supply protection.

A significant number of states expect a delay in the time necessary to process and issue permits under federal environmental statutes as a result of the reduction in federal support for environmental program management. In other states, many of which are subject to mandatory time limits for issuing permits, the quality of permit review is expected to decline. About 27 states have indicated they expect the time necessary to issue air permits to increase by an average of about 24 percent. About 18 states also expect water quality permitting time and about 19 states expect hazardous waste permitting time to increase.

These figures are tentative because many states are not yet certain whether or by how much their permit processing time will be increased by cuts in program budgets.

A large number of state agencies indicate that they are considering completely eliminating, not accepting delegation of, or turning back to the federal government certain important environmental protection activities, particularly in the air program. At least 11 states may eliminate or turn back PSD permitting in the air program, and 7 states may eliminate their activities to control toxic air emissions. At least 10 states indicate they will not have the resources to develop air emissions bubble and banking systems, which can reduce compliance costs for the business community but which increase the costs to state regulatory agencies. These findings raise questions about the states' capacity to assume programs for which they currently do not have delegation, such as hazardous waste management and underground injection control, in which the Administration would like the states to assume greater responsibility.

In addition, a large number of states have indicated that they may reduce certain environmental management activities proportionately to the reduction in federal support or more. This reflects the states' belief that they have already streamlined state programs and that significant further savings cannot be expected from management changes alone. Many states indicate that budget reductions will require actual reductions in personnel and equipment. At least 36 states indicate that they will reduce ambient air quality monitoring proportionately to the reduction in federal budget support or more; 25 states will reduce water quality monitoring proportionately or more; 20 states will reduce hazardous waste monitoring proportionately to the reduction in federal support or more. Other important activities including enforcement, toxic air pollutant control, general and PSD permitting, determinations of source compliance, technical support, and the development of emission trading systems will also be reduced at least proportionately to the federal cuts in significant numbers of states. In addition, program development, including the development of 1982 air program implementation plans for both mobile and stationary sources, will be curtailed proportionately to the federal cuts or more in a number of states. See Tables VI-IX.

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, I want to express my strong support of H.R. 6956, the HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1983. This measure would appropriate $47 billion in new budget authority for important national programs which address the housing and community development needs of our Nation, protect the environment and public health, serve over 30 million veterans and their families, and provide for a variety of other valuable activities.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 6956 is an austere bill. In my opinion, it is too austere in many respects. The overall amount of spending recommended in this bill for fiscal year 1983 provides virtually no increase over the current year's fiscal year 1982 level. Within the totals, there are some increases and decreases, but, overall, this bill recommends only the minimum amounts necessary to address the critical national problems which the programs funded through this measure are designed to address. Recognizing the budget constraints which are facing us, however, I strongly urge you to support the passage of H.R. 6956.

I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to several items in the housing portion of the bill. Most glaring by its omission is the fact that the committee has not made any funding recommendations regarding the assisted housing programs. I would like to emphasize that the absence of any funding recommendations in this regard is solely because no authorizing legislation has been enacted yet. Moreover, the legislation reported by the Senate and House Banking Committees are very different in their approach to what housing programs should be authorized for fiscal year 1983.

Thus, the committee has reserved $9 billion in budget authority for assisted housing in fiscal year 1983 and will consider funding for the housing programs when we have a better sense of how the authorizing legislation will be structured. I am certainly committed to having a strong Federal housing program next year, and I believe that my colleagues on the committee are equally as committed.

In other areas of the HUD budget, the committee has taken the responsible action of restoring some of the ill-conceived budget reductions recommended by the President. The committee has recommended $3.5 million for the housing counseling program which the president proposed to terminate. This valuable program saves more than it costs by providing comprehensive default and prepurchase counseling to homeowners. Many of these homeowners are faced with high mortgage deliquency rates or foreclosure.

Additionally, the committee has recommended $1.35 billion for public housing operating subsidies in fiscal year 1983. The administration's budget request to cut public housing operating subsidies to $1.075 billion was simply irresponsible given that public housing authorities are entitled to received $1.6 billion under HUD's own funding formula. The $1.35 billion provided in H.R. 6956 strikes a middle ground. It will help to protect our Federal investment in over 1.2 million units of public housing by providing minimally adequate funds to operate and maintain these units. The committee has also agreed to recommend supplemental funds for public housing operations should this action become recessary, and I commend Chairman BOLAND for his recommendation in this regard.

In the area of community and economic development, H.R. 6956 provides $3.445 billion for community development block grants, $340 million for urban development action grants, and $15.5 million for the Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation. These amounts will maintain current program levels in these activities which are vital to State and local efforts to conduct housing rehabilitation and neighborhood improvements projects. These activities help to preserve and revitalize our Nation's communities and will continue with the funds provided in this bill.

A recent HUD survey documented once again that housing discrimination remains a serious and pervasive problem around the country. A total of $5.7 million is recommended in the bill to continue a Federal fair housing effort which assists State and local agencies in rooting out housing discrimination where it exists.

Mr. Chairman, for our national space program, H.R. 6956 provides a total of $5.334 billion for the research and development acitvities of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA). The Lewis Research Center in Cleveland, Ohio—world renowned for its work in areonautics—will play a major role in implementing the committee's recommendations in the areas of the space shuttle, the Centaur upper stage development and the aeronautics research program.

The committee's recommendations for the National Science Foundation (NSF) are worth taking note of as well. Nearly everyone agrees that the future of America depends on the advancement of scientific knowledge, improved technology and enhanced productivity. The NSF plays a critical role in this regard by underwriting scientific and technological research and related activities. Accordingly, H.R. 6956 includes $1.109 billion for the NSF. This amount is desparately needed to prevent our Nation from becoming "technologically and scientifically illiterate".

Mr. Chairman, everyone should be aware that the prestigious National Academy of Sciences recently labeled science and math education in this country "scandalous." The committee has taken a very small step to address this growing problem by reversing the Reagan administration's illogical recommendations to terminate NSF precollege science education programs. The committee has recommended $40 million for NSF science education activities. This is not nearly enough to fully address the science crisis confronting us, but I urge your support of this meager increase.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to commend Chairman BOLAND for his recommendations regarding the Veterans Medical Center, Wade Park Division, in Cleveland, Ohio. H.R. 6956 includes $9.75 million for the construction of a new clinical addition at the Wade Park facility. This project is urgently needed to alleviate extant safety and health violations present at the current facility. The VA declined to request the necessary funds which, for a small price, will address a grave need among the veterans in Cleveland for a safe and healthy environment in which to receive medical care.

H.R. 6956 is a bill responsive to the vital interests of this Nation. I urge you to support its passage.●

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) desire recognition?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I had had one further request for time, but I do not see the gentleman on the floor, so if the gentleman from Massachusetts has any Members who are seeking time, I will defer to him.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. GREEN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read title I of the bill.

Mr. BOLAND (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title I be considered as read and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any points of order against title I?

The Chair hears none.

Are there amendments to title I?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SILJANDER

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The portion of the bill to which the amendment relates is as follows:

HOUSING PAYMENTS

For the payment of annual contributions, not otherwise provided for, in accordance with section 5 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended (42 U.S.C. 1437c); for payments authorized by title IV of the Housing Act of 1950, as amended (12 U.S.C. 1749 et seq.); for rent supplement payments authorized by section 101 of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1965, as amended (12 U.S.C. 1701s); and for payments as authorized by sections 235 and 236 of the National Housing Act, as amended (12 U.S.C. 1715z, 1715z-1), $9,538,000,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SILJANDER: On page 2, after line 18, add the following:

"MORTGAGE INTEREST REDUCTION PAYMENTS"

For mortgage interest reduction payments; $250,000,000 to be derived from funds available under section 305 of the National Housing Act, as amended (12 U.S.C. 1720) and to remain available until expended. Such amount shall be made available under the terms and conditions of the following paragraphs:

(a) For purposes of this section

(1) The terms "employee pension benefit plan", "fiduciary", "party in interest", "participant", "beneficiary", "employer", "employee organization", and "investment manager" have the meanings given such terms in section 3 of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974.

(2) For purposes of this section, the term "control" means the power to exercise a controlling influence over the management or policies of a person other than an individual.

(3) the term "established financial institution" means an investment manager described in section 3(38) of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 with respect to a plan, a savings and loan association subject to regulation by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, a housing agency of a State, or a bank.

(4) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development; and

(5) the term "State" means any of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Northern Mariana Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the Federated States of Micronesia, and any other territory or possession of the United States.

(b)(1) a bond is eligible for interest reduction payments under this section if it is—

(A) purchased by an employee benefit plan described in sub-section (a) of this amendment.

(B) a mortgage revenue bond which is sold to the plan by a housing agency of a State (or other similar functioning agency in States without housing agencies).

(2) a bond in which the funds obtained from the sale of which are used exclusively for the making of mortgages under this title to finance the purchase of dwellings described in subsection (e), or for contracting under subsection (f), to make such mortgages.

(3) a bond in which the rate of return is equal to the rate of return of tax-exempt mortgage revenue bonds.

(c)(1)(A) Subject to subsection (3), the Secretary may make monthly interest reduction payments to any housing agency of a State, with respect to a mortgage which is eligible under subsection (d), to assist an individual seeking to acquire a dwelling unit by using the proceeds of such mortgage.

(B) The amount of the monthly payment made under paragraph (A) with respect to a mortgage may not exceed the difference between the base interest rate of the bond issue sold plus the allowable maximum yield under the Mortgage Revenue Bond Act of 1981, as amended, and an interest rate of 11.75 percent for the year during which the payment is made.

(2) The Secretary may not make any additional monthly payment under subsection (1) with respect to a mortgage if the Secretary has made such payments with respect to the mortgage over a period of time of at least 7 years.

(3) The Secretary may not make any monthly payments under subsection (1) during a month if the Secretary determines that the rate of interest in subsection (1)(B) during such month is less than 11.75 percent for the year or is more than 15.75 percent for the year.

(d)(1) For purposes of subsection (d)(1), a mortgage, the proceeds of which are used to acquire a dwelling unit, is eligible for monthly interest reduction payments if the Secretary determines that—

(A) the terms of the loan or mortgage are consistent with customary practices in the residential mortgage industry, including—

Appropriate requirements concerning the income levels and credit worthiness of the borrower;

Fair market value appraisals of the collaterals;

Loan to value ratios; and

Title, hazard, and private mortgage insurance;

(B) such mortgage is—

Evidenced by a written note the terms of which are (i) at least as favorable to the housing agency as the terms of a loan involving unrelated parties and (ii) consistent with customary practices in the residential mortgage industry; and

Secured by a duly recorded first lien on the dwelling unit to be financed by the mortgage;

(C) the housing agency has adopted in writing reasonable proceedures, consistent with customary practices in the residential mortgage industry, designed to insure that the mortgage will be serviced in a diligent and systematic manner, including collecting mortgage payments, assuring that the taxes and insurance premiums for the dwelling unit under the mortgage are paid and making all decisions relating to, handling, and foreclosures.

(D) the principle obligation of the mortgage does not exceed the average cost of a dwelling unit bought in the United States;

(E) the mortgage is made to assist in the acquisition of an owner-occupied unit which is constructed, or is first owned after July 1, 1982, and which is not constructed as a dwelling unit for more than four families;

(F) the mortgage is to be paid over a period of time not to exceed 30 years beginning on the date the mortgage is made; and

(G) the mortgage may be renegotiated after a period of time of not more than 7 years beginning on the date the mortgage is made for a new amount of interest based on the prevailing interest rates in the residential mortgage market on the date of renegotiation.

(e)(1) Any housing agency of a State may contract with any established financial institution to make or administer any mortgage for which a monthly interest reduction payment is made under subsection (d)(1).

(2) The Secretary shall insure that—

(A) any mortgage for which a monthly interest reduction payment is made under subsection (d)(1) is eligible under subsection (e);

(B) the fee for administering any mortgage for which a monthly interest reduction payment is that which is set forth in the Mortgage Revenue Bond Act of 1981, as amended.

(C) the interest on any mortgage for which a monthly interest reduction payment is made under subsection (d)(1) does not exceed 12 percent for each year of the principal of the loan or mortgage.

(3)(A) Any housing agency of a State receiving monthly interest reduction payments under subsection (d)(1) with respect to a mortgage shall maintain for the duration of such mortgage records necessary to enable the person described in paragraph (B) to determine whether the requirements of this section have been met.

(B) The records referred to in paragraph (1) must be unconditionally available at their customary location for examination during normal business hours by any duly authorized employee or representative of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Department of Labor, or the Internal Revenue Service.

(f) Upon disposition by the homeowner of any property assisted pursuant to this subsection, the Secretary shall provide for the recapture of an amount equal to the lesser of (i) the amount of assistance actually received under this subsection, or (ii) an amount equal to at least 50 percent of the net appreciation of the property, as determined by the Secretary. For the purpose of this paragraph, the term "net appreciation of the property" means any increase in the value of the property over the original purchase price, less the reasonable costs of sale and the reasonable costs of improvements made to the property.

(g) The Secretary shall allocate between the housing agencies of the States, not withstanding any other provision of law regarding States without mortgage revenue bond authority, the amount of any funds appropriated for a fiscal year under the authorization contained in this section—

(1) one-half of the amount is allocated among the States on the basis of the population of each State; and

(2) one-half of the amount is allocated among the States on the basis of the unemployment rate of each State for the last period of 3 months occurring before such allocation.

(h) The Secretary shall issue final regulations to carry out this section, allocate amounts between the States under subsection (g), and make commitments to make monthly interest reduction payments under subsection (d)(1), not later than the date occurring 30 days after the date of the enactment of the first Act appropriating funds under the authorization contained in this section.

Mr. SILJANDER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I reserve a point of order on the amendment, and I would appreciate it if the subcommittee could have a copy of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I, too, wish to reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) is reserved.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There is no objection.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is due some explanation. The amendment is a revolutionary idea. It is consistent with a bill I introduced, the Housing-Auto Recovery Act of 1982, which has over 145 cosponsors, including the leadership of both the Democratic and Republican Parties.

What the bill basically does is to allow public and private pension funds to invest in revenue mortgage bonds, which would be an historical first. These mortgage revenue bonds, in the amount of $10 million, would then be issued to each State housing administration based on two simple criteria. One would be unemployment and the second population. Banks in the normal HUD process would obtain revenue bonds and issue 12 percent new housing start loans to the consumer.

Mr. Chairman, may I add that the concept of $10 billion of private sector money infused into new housing starts at this time—in one of the most depressed industries in the country—could create up to 2 million new jobs, and, according to a congressional study, 2 million new jobs could create a revenue base for the 1983 fiscal year of an additional $50 billion.

We are talking about an amendment that would cost the taxpayer approximately $100 million to $200 million in additional investment. The return would be anywhere from $30 billion to $50 billion.

Mr. Chairman, we have come to a point in this country, with such high unemployment—in my home State of Michigan, for example, with over 15 percent—that we need to deal with the cause for this heavy unemployment nationwide, the depressed housing industry. We are offering a viable alternative to other proposals that have not succeeded in this Congress. We are offering a proposal that is a private sector initiative. We are offering a proposal that needs timely discussion and deserves to be addressed immediately.

Mr. Chairman, it is a very simple concept. It is one that deserves bipartisan support. I urge the support of this amendment to the Housing and Urban Development appropriations bill.

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Chairman, will my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Michigan, yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER), for the introduction of his bill, which he now is offering as an amendment. And as the gentleman will recall, I am proud to be a cosponsor of it as a bill.

I want to salute the gentleman for his persistent efforts to alleviate the horrendous unemployment problem that exists in our State and to a certain extent across the Nation as well.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman deserves the commendation of all of us for this effort. I join with him, and I congratulate him on that effort.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) on his position, and I understand the reason why he has offered this particular amendment. I am also aware of the problems that the State of Michigan has. Our whole subcommittee understands it, and I sympathize with the amendment.

However, Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order, and I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will point out that the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) still controls the time.

Does the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) yield back the balance of his time?

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to request an additional minute of my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) still has time.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, let me say to my colleague that I appreciate the concern on the point of order.

We have attempted to take out of this housing bill, as best we know legislatively, an amendment to the HUD bill that would be in order and proper. I would certainly hope that my colleagues would not further object to it on a point of order.

We believe that this is consistent with the bill, and we believe that, especially in a time of economic crisis such as we are in, we have finally found something that we can support in a bipartisan way and within an ideological framework.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly encourage the subcommittee chairman, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) to withdraw his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) has expired.

Does the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) insist on his point of order?

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I reluctantly insist on the point of order under the circumstances.

This is not the place to offer this kind of an amendment. This is a far-reaching amendment. It is one that ought to be considered by the legislative committee. Clearly, the amendment is legislation on an appropriations bill, and it violates clause 2 of rule XXI.

So, Mr. Chairman, in short, the amendment is not authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

I, too, would like to commend the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) for offering this amendment and for bringing to the attention of the House the very real problems and bringing to the House an ingenious program. However, it is plain as one reads the bill, that it imposes extensive duties on the Secretary in the form of implementing the mortgage interest reduction program that is contemplated by the bill. There are long sections explaining the responsibilities of the Secretary and the requirements that he review instruments to be issued in connection with the bill and to make payments.

Mr. Chairman, it seems that is plainly imposing additional duties on the Secretary, and thereby it is legislation in an appropriations bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SILJANDER. No, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LEVITAS). The Chair is prepared to rule.

The Chair has examined the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) in light of the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND).

The amendment is an extensive amendment providing for definitions, providing for determinations to be made by the Secretary, and providing for allocation formulas and a variety of other items which appear to the Chair clearly to be legislation and thereby a violation of rule XXI.

Accordingly, the point of order of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) is sustained.

□ 1330

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to title I? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY

SALARIES AND EXPENSES

For necessary expenses, not otherwise provided for, including hire of passenger motor vehicles; hire, maintenance, and operation of aircraft; uniforms, or allowances therefor, as authorized by 5 U.S.C. 5901-5902; services as authorized by 5 U.S.C. 3109, but at rates for individuals not to exceed the per diem rate equivalent to the rate for GS-18; purchase of reprints; library memberships in societies or associations which issue publications to members only or at a price to members lower than to subscribers who are not members; and not to exceed $3,000 for official reception and representation expenses; $544,963,000: Provided, That none of these funds may be expended for purposes of Resource Conservation and Recovery Panels established under section 2003 of the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, as amended (42 U.S.C. 6913).

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GORE

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GORE: Page 13, line 18, strike out "$544,963,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$555,106,000".

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I want to begin by paying my respects to the chairman of this subcommittee, and note that there are few Members of this House with whom I would less like to disagree. However, I think Members of Congress on both sides of the aisle understand that this is a matter of great importance to the country because EPA in my judgment is having its effectiveness destroyed by the budget actions of the last 2 years.

The subcommittee, which I respect greatly, has put a little more money in above what the Budget Director, David Stockman, recommended. But the amount of money that has been put back in is still way below what the budget level was last year and still way below what the budget resolution provides for.

I might add that this is at a time when the responsibilities the EPA is being asked to perform are increasing significantly and the American people are demanding stronger enforcement of our environmental laws.

Let me also say that this additional money I am asking to add in this amendment is targeted at the enforcement program at EPA.

There has been a 79-percent decline in the number of enforcement cases referred to EPA headquarters from the regional offices and a 69-percent decrease in the number of referrals from EPA to the Department of Justice.

In terms of actual numbers, the EPA's civil litigation referrals to the Department of Justice fell from 252 cases in 1980 to only 79 in 1981. The record so far this year indicates that there will be even fewer in this calendar year.

In enforcement area after enforcement area we see this dramatic decline resulting in flagrant violators of the law going unpursued and unprosecuted.

What are we going to do about it? Are we going to look at the additional responsibilities added to EPA as the hazardous waste legislation begins to take effect, as TOSCA and other laws take effect, and then say that they need fewer people to do more work? That is not what the American people would like to see.

A recent Harris poll last week asked this question: Do you want to see vigorous enforcement of these environmental laws, and it then listed a number of them. The results were 85 percent to 10 percent, and this is not a partisan issue, I might add, because Members on both sides of the aisle have supported strong environmental legislation in the past.

I would say to my colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle that this is an issue where your constituents would have you separate yourselves from the record of disastrous damage being done by this administration to the environmental laws, to EPA, and to the enforcement of the environmental laws.

Let us talk about the numbers and the facts and the figures. The first budget resolution for fiscal year 1983 sets the appropriation level and a 4.8-percent pay increase. On EPA's 1982 operating budget $551 million was allocated for this item. The administration recommended a very, very sharp cut in that for this year. The committee added a little bit back in and the committee says that it provides additional funding for 300 positions.

But let me just point out some of the problems with the committee report.

I understand that the subcommittee is under a great deal of pressure in this budget year. But their calculations assume an average of $26,000 per position. EPA's comptroller, on the other hand, assumes a higher figure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. GORE was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. GORE. They have assumed this higher figure because they have to budget in their accounting tables for overhead, for benefits, and for other operating expenses. The EPA's comptroller then uses the figure of $45,000 per position.

Thus, according to EPA's Comptroller, roughly half, or 153 positions, would be funded by the committee's action.

However, the committee also did not take into account an anticipated pay raise, not to make up for inflation, not nearly that much, but a small pay raise to 8,645 full-time slots. That is the OMB ceiling for fiscal year 1983, which will cost approximately $10.8 million.

What the committee assumes is that this additional cost will be funded through a supplemental, but last year EPA reprogramed $15 million out of the R&D budget to cover this expense.

Additionally, in order to meet OMB's personnel ceilings for fiscal year 1983, EPA anticipates RIF'ing 300 to 400 personnel. Again, the estimate on the cost of a RIF per person is from $10,000 to $12,000 per RIF. This requires another $3.6 million out of the salaries and expenses account.

So when you add it all up the actual pay raise and RIF costs will absorb nearly $15 million of a budget account which is already being cut from 1981 levels that were themselves inadequate.

Now let us talk about what this issue is really all about. One of the chemical industry magazines, Chemical Week, had an editorial recently where they said, speaking for responsible people within the industry, and I quote:

In a highly competitive industry companies cannot afford to spend their resources on environmental protection, however, well conceived the rules—

And this is the key part—unless they perceive that those are backed up by credible enforcement policy.

That is the key point.

I go on to quote:

Without an effective EPA, industry's contribution to pollution, which has been diminishing, is bound to grow again. In the long run the American people will not stand for it.

That is really the issue. Are we going to acquiesce as a Congress in the destruction of EPA's ability to enforce the laws which come under their jurisdiction? When EPA comes to us, as they have in hearings before the Commerce Committee, and says, "We cannot possibly get out these new regulations you have asked us to get out, we cannot possibly speed up the enforcement of these cases because we do not have the people," are we going to reply, "Well, that is just too bad, we cannot do anything about it"? Or are we going to say we will solve that problem?

I had a discussion with the head of the enforcement office just before it was reorganized, and he said, "We have done a study and we have found that we need immediately 27 new investigators for hazardous waste dump sites," and this is the Anne Gorsuch EPA saying that they need these new investigators and my colleagues know that they have taken what many Americans regard as a very lax attitude.

How many of those 27 new investigators have they hired 6 months later? Three.

"Why," I asked in the last hearing. They say, "Because we do not know what action the Congress is likely to take on funding and on the budget."

It is up to us, I say to my colleagues, what direction are we going to take.

What I am proposing in this amendment is that we bring it up within the budget resolution to the fiscal year 1982 levels. It does not even account for the ravages of inflation on the ability of this Office to do its work. But let us at least bring it up to the 1982 levels and stay within the budget resolution. Let us not slash it lower than the budget resolution allows us to do.

I ask my colleagues to support this amendment and I yield back the balance of my time.

□ 1345

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It is with some reluctance that I do so because I have great respect for the gentleman from Tennessee, who serves with distinction in this body and on the Science and Technology Committee, as well as on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.

First of all, in response to the gentleman with respect to additional pay costs and any requirements that are essential, I think we can assure him—I am sure the gentleman from New York would agree with me—that we will take care of any requirements for overhead or added pay costs in a supplemental. We have always done that. Ever since I have been sitting on this committee we have had supplementals which have taken care of some of the overhead costs and also the pay costs.

The average salary is about $31,000 in 1983. When we compute the costs of 300 positions, we know that new people will be brought in at less than the average salary because they will be at lower grades.

Mr. Chairman, there will be other amendments offered to this section of the bill. First of all, let me indicate to the committee what this committee has done vis-a-vis the EPA budget in salaries and expenses, research and development, and abatement, control, and compliance.

As chairman of this subcommittee, in conjunction with members of the committee and also the ranking minority member, we offered a compromise package to the authorizing committees, but under no circumstances was that accepted. So I thought perhaps I would offer substitutes both to the salary and expenses amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee; the research and development amendment to be offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHEUER); and whoever offers the amendment on abatement, control, and compliance.

We have already increased funds for these three EPA accounts in this bill by $72.4 million over the budget estimate. We were willing to add some $17.5 million to research and development, another $3.6 million to salaries and expenses, and $2.6 million to abatement, control, and compliance. But that was not acceptable, and I do not quarrel with that. They have their own position on this.

With respect to salaries and expenses, Mr. Chairman, this committee added $6.9 million, which provided for some 300 additional positions for fiscal year 1983. That brought the total to $545 million for the S&E account in the EPA.

The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee would add $10.1 million, which would add another, perhaps, 300 employees.

But the fact of the matter is that we did add some 300 positions and $6.9 million. We think that the committee's position is reasonable. We think it is justified. And I think that we have a good chance of convincing OMB to release the 300 positions.

As the gentleman from Tennessee well knows, and as everyone else in this body well knows, the Congress is not the last arbiter on how many positions are going to be allocated by the respective agencies of this Government. The final arbiter is the Office of Management and Budget. As I have indicated, we think we have a good chance of convincing OMB that this addition ought to be taken by OMB and that the 300 positions provided for in this bill ought to be approved.

Further increases, such as proposed by the gentleman's amendment, will have little likelihood of actually making it to the agency, and it may very well jeopardize the 300-plus positions that we have in this bill.

Again, let me say that I think the increase provided in the bill represents a reasonable middle ground which gives the EPA the best chance of maintaining essential personnel levels and, consequently, I urge defeat of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Is it not true that in the calculations of the amount in the total bill for EPA, you have included some $40 million in an incremental increase in the amount collected from the private fees or taxes on chemical producers in the Superfund bill?

There are two separate accounts. One is the relatively small Government contribution; the other is the much larger contribution by chemical producers. If that amount were not included the way it is, the entire category would be significantly lower.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) has expired.

(On request of Mr. GORE and by unanimous consent, Mr. BOLAND was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. GORE. If that amount were taken out, in other words, you have taken the amount in the private fund collected from companies—no public funds involved there—and that is the only thing that has pushed it over the 1982 levels overall. And, even so, it is only $5 million above the 1982 levels. Is that not correct?

Mr. BOLAND. That is correct. But in the accounts the gentleman is interested in, this committee did add $72.4 million. That is the botton line. The addition that was made by this committee is $72.4 million in these three particular accounts. I think that is a significant figure.

Mr. GORE. If the gentleman will yield further, in the account that is in question, in 1982 the figure was $555 million, and the figure in this year's bill is $545 million. That is not only below the 1982 level but below the level in the budget resolution by that amount. This amendment would bring it up to the 1982 level and up to the level of the budget resolution. So it is really below, is it not?

Mr. BOLAND. That is true; the amendment would bring the funding up to the 1982 level. The budget resolution, however, does not go to individual appropriation accounts. I think the gentleman is a realist, perhaps as much as anyone else in this body. Some of the personnel reductions proposed result from changes in programs such as shifting administration of the construction grants program to the States. That action allows for a reduction in the number of employees.

You could add millions of dollars in this particular account for additional personnel. That does not mean you are going to get the positions. The gentleman understands that thoroughly.

Mr. GORE. If the gentleman will yield further, that is absolutely true. And the same administration is now saying that there is going to be another 1,000 personnel slots lost. Now, what are we going to say? Are we going to say, "OK, that is just fine with us"? Why do we not bring it up to our own budget resolution, well within the budget, at least to last year's level, so that we can say to them, when they come to us and say they are going to continue the process of destroying EPA's abilities, "Look, we have given you the same amount you had last year for this function; we are within the budget resolution; you tell us whether you can do the job or not. If you do not need them, then that is one thing. But do not blame it on us."

Let us give them what they need and then try to hold their feet to the fire and make them enforce the law.

Mr. BOLAND. I am trying to be a realist here. As I say, you can put all of the money in the world you want in here for personnel, but if OMB does not approve, the positions are gone. So we have put enough money in here to at least add 318 positions for fiscal year 1983. We think they will do it. We think they will agree to provide the additional positions. That is the bottom line. The gentleman has made his argument, and I understand it thoroughly. But the problem is—let me respond to the gentleman—the number of people who are working at EPA is not controlled by your committee or my committee. You can spend all the time you want talking about the Budget Committee and the authorizing committee, but I do not know of any particular instance where the Members of this body would want the Appropriations Committee to walk lock step with the Budget Committee or with the authorizing committee.

Mr. GORE. If the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman has described the importance of realism in dealing with OMB. We had an earlier discussion about the RIF money that is not accounted for in this bill.

Last year, did the OMB permit the use of the supplemental funds for those RIF's? Or did they, as they will almost certainly do this year, reprogram the RIF money out of the enforcement activities and out of the ongoing programs from OMB?

Mr. BOLAND. That was done.

Mr. GORE. Well, why is it not calculated for this time? We are asking for more of the same kind of damage to be done to EPA. We ought to tell them and not let them tell us.

Mr. BOLAND. I have indicated to the gentleman—I have said it once, I will say it again—that if there is additional funding necessary for pay costs, we will provide it in the supplemental for pay costs or any overhead costs which impact upon the——

Mr. GORE. What about RIF's?

Mr. BOLAND. We have assurances on the funding of any RIF in 1983.

Mr. GORE. OMB said you could not do it last year. They took it out of the programs.

Mr. BOLAND. Well, I think the Congress, this body, has some jurisdiction in this area. If we make moneys available in the supplemental——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) has again expired.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would first like to begin by concurring in the remarks of the subcommittee chairman that, of course, the subcommittee will deal, as it traditionally has done, with the problems that the pay increase and its absorption create for the agencies within our area of responsibility.

The second point I would like to make, since I think the subcommittee chairman has covered the issue very clearly, is that when you get down to the Appropriations Committee level, you cannot consider the budget process just in terms of what is in the first budget resolution. I think everyone has to understand that and what consequences flow from it, because the first budget resolution does indeed set targets for various kinds of activities.

But it is also true that under the Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974, that first budget resolution, in essence, provides a lump sum to the Appropriations Committee. The Appropriations Committee under section 302(b) of that act, then votes a division to that lump sum among the various subcommittees. Each subcommittee then has to live within its section 302(b) allocation. That may lead to some consequences that are different from those contemplated by the targets in the first budget resolution, but they are, nonetheless, results that are called for under the 1974 Budget and Impoundment Control Act.

As I said during the general debate we find ourselves in this committee in the situation where, if amendments which increase the amounts above those recommended by the Appropriations Committee pass on the floor today, we are going to be faced with resulting reductions in housing. We have not included a major housing element in this bill for lack of action on the part of the authorizing committee. However, when we come to deal with that, either when the authorizing committee has passed the housing bill or, for lack of it, we seek some other procedure to deal with the problem, as we will if that committee does not act, then, because of that section 302(b) limitation and the commitment which was made by the chairman of the subcommittee to the ranking minority member of the full committee during general debate, we are going to be faced with the fact that any dollar added today that survives the conference is going to be subtracted from the money made available for housing assistance.

What we have done in putting together this bill was within the limits of the section 302(b) allocation given us by the full Appropriations Committee, and that was a matter that was debated with some heat within the full Appropriations Committee. We have tried as best we could within those limitations to deal with all of the elements that this subcommittee deals with.

When you are talking of housing, for example, we are talking about $9.6 billion of budget authority for housing which the subcommittee has left itself to have available. That is an appropriation that used to run $30 billion a year. And we are going to have less than one-third of that available for housing assistance.

So we have had to face some very difficult choices. I do not like what has happened with respect to EPA. I am not happy with that. But we on the subcommittee have to make those choices. And if this House is going to live up to the budget process, it has to make those choices. Are we to take a housing program that has been cut by two-thirds and cut it still further? That is the issue we truly face this afternoon. I only ask that Members who, like myself, are very sympathetic to more funding for EPA—as I said, if I did not face those constraints, I would be offering this amendment, because I would have priority on the floor to do it—understand that issue.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I also rise to speak against the amendment, very regretfully. I have a great deal of respect for my colleague from Tennessee. I support the goals that he supports. But speaking as a member of the authorizing committee in the housing area, housing has been just cut to smithereens in the last 2 years. The Appropriations Committee, led by the able chairman from Massachusetts, and the able ranking minority member from New York, have done what I think is to make the best of a bad situation. First, they have brought an appropriations bill to the floor. The alternative, a continuing resolution, would simply allow Presidential manipulation, and the President has shown a desire and an ability to cut housing more than he has any other program.

Second, if the money goes to EPA, it can now only come out of one place, and that is housing. Housing cannot afford further cuts.

As worthy as some of these other amendments are—and certainly I consider myself a strong supporter of EPA—to take funds out of the hide of housing to feed EPA would be unfair and a misallocation of priorities.

□ 1400

So I really rise for two purposes: First, to salute the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee and the ranking minority member for doing the best they can; and I think they have done a magnificent job in trying to save what little housing is left and, second, to regretfully oppose the amendment because we are in a rob Peter to save Paul situation.

Mr. HOLLENBECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of my colleague from Tennessee's amendments for increased Environmental Protection Agency funding. I do so because of my firm belief that we cannot cut EPA funds at a time when the Agency's responsibilities have been greatly expanded. Just recently, Congress affirmed its overwhelming support for environmental protection through passage of a strengthened Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act, the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, and the Environmental Research, Development and Demonstration Act. In order to implement these programs effectively, it is imperative that EPA staff and resources be adequate to the task.

As currently written, H.R. 6956 sets funding levels for the EPA's operating programs at $1,033.75 million. This appropriation level is $54 million less than the targets agreed for this budget function by the House and Senate in the first budget resolution. I cannot accept this.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the amendments to bring each of EPA's three program accounts up to the 1982 appropriation levels. The amounts in each amendment are within the parameters established earlier by the budget resolution. In the first amendment, we would restore $10.1 million to EPA salaries and expense accounts to offset the massive cutbacks in enforcement personnel and EPA staff responsible for promulgating regulations and permits. Second, I ask your support for an amendment which would recover $33 million of cuts in EPA research and development funds. Without an adequate R&D budget, we cannot provide the information necessary for the implementation of environmental laws or make the right environmental policy decisions on acid rain or toxic wastes. Without this money, we would be jeopardizing our ability to make prudent decisions concerning our natural environment.

Finally, I ask that you vote with me to restore $8.4 million to the State grants program. Last year, as you may recall, these programs suffered a 13-percent cut forcing drastic reductions in State pollution control programs. Once again, this amendment, like the others, would merely bring funding for this program back to the 1982 appropriation levels.

While $54 million is surely less than the amount required to complete the full job, House support for these proposals will convey to the Environmental Protection Agency and the American public our determination and continued commitment to protecting public health and the environment. I urge you to join me in supporting these worthwhile amendments.

● Mr. ZEFERETTI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Gore amendments to HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations for fiscal year 1983. When the current administration came to Washington, vowing to dismantle environmental regulations opposed by business and industry groups, environmental activists assumed Congress would comply with administration and business interests. Instead, those of us in Congress believing that environmental regulations should be based first upon health rather than economic considerations have been scoring important victories. To date, however, the massive cuts in the Environmental Protection Agency budget have proved an exception to this rule.

While the EPA's congressionally mandated workload has nearly doubled in recent years, the agency's budget was reduced over 17 percent in 1982, and this cut ignores the toll of inflation. Without an adequate restoration of funds for fiscal year 1983, the agency could lose an additional 1,100 employees, environmental research will be reduced another 22 percent after last year's cut of 39 percent, enforcement actions will be reduced by 275 work-years, and illegal dumping operations are likely to once again increase rapidly.

In addition, risk assessments of hazardous pollutants will be cut back to a fraction of previous levels; congressionally mandated timetables for issuance of essential regulations will be so backlogged that billions of gallons of toxic wastes will be dumped in our rivers, lakes, and streams; and State grants will be cut $8.4 million on top of last year's 13-percent reduction.

Clearly, the level of funding provided in the committee bill is woefully inadequate for the Agency to carry out its mandated duties of protecting the environment and safeguarding public health. In fact, Congress should be expanding the EPA budget to fulfill the congressional mandates of the many antipollution laws the Agency must by law administer. That is why I strongly urge my colleagues to support the Gore amendments to restore $10.1 million in salaries and expenses and $8.4 million in the abatement and compliance account.

The Gore amendment adding $10.1 million to the salaries and expenses account for enforcement and inspection is especially vital. Without adequate funding and personnel, enforcement of environmental laws is an impossible task. At a time when an overwhelming majority of the American people demand stronger enforcement of environmental laws, it is absolutely essential that Congress provide the funds necessary to follow the people's mandate. I urge my colleagues to support the Gore amendments.●

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to urge my colleagues' support for the Gore amendment restoring $10 million to the EPA budget for salaries and expenses in fiscal year 1983. This amendment will add money to an Agency facing a dangerous depletion of manpower, while remaining within the limits mandated by the 1983 budget resolution.

EPA faces a great loss of experienced personnel next year—up to 1,100 employees according to some estimates. This loss of staff will seriously hamper the Agency's ability to issue final regulations and permits in carrying out the will of Congress.

Such losses to the staff of EPA could not come at a worse time. Administrator Gorsuch has stated that much of the needed research on environmental problems has been completed, and what remains is the formulation and implementation of the programs to achieve the environmental quality we must have. While I question her confidence in the state of environmental research, I agree that much of what needs completion in our environmental agenda requires a staff able to promulgate environmental regulations.

But EPA cannot honestly expect to promulgate the necessary rules for carrying out the intent of Congress on a timely basis without a strong, experienced staff.

As many of you know, I have for some time been involved in energy matters before Congress, among which has been the development of a program for waste oil recovery. While Congress passed legislation in 1978 to encourage the reuse of this costly resource, the EPA has not begun to issue regulations on the safe recovery of waste oil. Though the legislation required EPA to issue such regulations by October of 1981, Administrator Gorsuch has stated that no regulations are expected before the summer of 1983.

We cannot expect EPA to carry out the necessary research, rule promulgation, and permit issuances when we vote to cut the funds supporting these vital activities.

The problems I have experienced in overseeing EPA's progress toward issuing waste oil regulations are by no means isolated. Regulations on the permitting of new and existing waste dump sites under the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA), passed in 1976, were only recently issued this summer. EPA must give final permits by 1986 to 9,977 waste sites currently on interim status—with a staff of 178 working on this program it will be a miracle if they meet this deadline. In addition, Congress recently passed strong amendments to RCRA which will necessitate EPA regulate small generators of hazardous waste and underground injection of waste.

It is obvious to me that EPA cannot begin to meet its congressionally mandated deadlines at current staff levels. It would certainly be a grave mistake to call for reduced funding in the salaries and expenses of this Agency today.

Restoring the needed $10 million for EPA salaries and expenses will give the Agency a greater ability to fulfill its duties, while remaining within the constraints of the 1983 budget resolution. A commitment to fiscal responsibility and a clean, healthy environment are not mutually exclusive. I urge my colleagues to support the Gore amendment. Thank you.●

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GORE).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announces that pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the Committee appears.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

□ 1415

QUORUM CALL VACATED

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred Members have appeared. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole is present. Pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, further proceedings under the call shall be considered as vacated.

The Committee will resume its business.

The pending business is the demand of the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

For research and development activities, $121,204,000, to remain available until September 30, 1984.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SCHEUER

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHEUER: on page 13, line 24, strike out "$121,204,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$146,204,000".

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that we are offering is a truly modest proposal. In effect, it increases the appropriation of the Appropriation Committee by $25 million.

Now, I want to express my admiration for the outstanding leadership that the chairman of the subcommittee has provided and that the ranking minority member, my colleague, the gentleman from New York, has provided.

It is with the greatest reluctance that I make this proposal. I want to emphasize what a very modest proposal it is. I want to emphasize that even adding on $25 million would still leave the budget for R&D $8 million under the budget proposal, $8 million under the 1983 authorization proposal for EPA and, indeed, $8 million under this year's appropriation, $8 million under the 1982 appropriation.

So we are not only not making an adjustment of eroding effects of inflation of 9 or 10 percent from 1982 to 1983, but we are actually cutting the 1982 appropriation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in effect, what I am saying is that the research and development function of EPA has been cut. It has been savage, more than any other agency activity over the last several years. In fiscal year 1981, R&D was funded at $254 million. The current fiscal year 1982 appropriation is also $154 million, a 39-percent reduction from the 1981 level.

Now, for fiscal year 1983, the administration is requesting a $108 million reduction on top of the 1982 reduction, or a 30-percent reduction from fiscal year 1982.

Now, assuming a 7-percent annual rate of inflation, this request for $154 million comes out in real dollar terms to $94.1 million, $94 million in 1981 dollars and, therefore, represents a reduction in real dollar funding from 1981 to 1983 of 63 percent. These Draconian cuts in EPA R&D threaten the very foundation of environmental protection in this country and they threaten the very ability of EPA to regulate on a sensible cost effective basis the very kind of fine tuning and regulatory process that industry has been calling for.

Now, this just seems terribly counterproductive. We are ravaging the ability of the EPA to produce the information necessary to have cost-effective and intelligent administration of the environmental laws and we are ravaging the ability of EPA to make sensible, sound, cost-effective, economic environmental policy decisions on such desperate problems, problems that are piling up over the long run of acid rain, of ground water pollution, of indoor air pollution, hazard wastes, and toxic pollution.

Now, it just does not make sense to rob the regulatory agency that is mandated with making decisions that are going to cost industry billions and billions of dollars to comply with, to rob them of the ability to make intelligent, cost-effective judgments, that do not impose unnecessary burdens on our industry; but the only way that EPA can carry out its function is to give them a minimally adequate appropriation.

Now, Congress apparently agreed to this, because the issue was debated on August 17 of this year when EPA research authorizations were considered and the House overwhelmingly rejected the President's request, this so-called 63-percent reduction from 1981 to 1983, rejected by 314 to 94.

Now, this current authorization increases the President's request by $45.5 million, a minor request, when one considers the magnitude of cuts already made in this program.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SCHEUER was allowed to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.)

Mr. SCHEUER. Now, my amendment would add the $25 million, bringing the total appropriation up to $146.3 million and, of course, the funds would be spent in accordance with directives provided in the legislation authorizing such funds.

Now, specifically, the allocation would be as follows: $4 million for health research to identify cancer-causing pollutants in air and water; $4 million for environmental monitoring to gather the data needed to evaluate our environmental programs and to detect serious problems in need of action; $3.1 million would be for ecological research to understand the effect of pullution on our crops and in the oceans and on our natural resources; $900,000 for the Chesapeake Bay program to help protect the rich and valuable Chesapeake Bay, a program that our colleague, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DYSON) has been so assiduously promoting and diligently supporting; $6 million for community technology development to assist American industry in meeting sensible, cost-effective environmental regulations, to the benefit of our industry; and $7 million for long-term research to improve our understanding of environmental problems and to develop the experts and scientists who will provide sensible and cost-effective solutions to such pressing problems as acid rain, ground water pollution, and hazardous wastes.

Now, these increases and the research they would support have been recommended by the Science and Technology Committee over months and months of hearings and extensive investigations and oversight hearings of EPA research requirements.

This amendment would help preserve a basis for issuing sound environmental regulations, enabling our administrators to come up with cost-effective regulations that are not silly, that are fine tuned to meet the minimum needs of our environment and health and for helping industry to develop ways to meet regulations and to make only the necessary investments in antipollution technology.

Now, we think this is EPA's mission and we think that the $25 million that we have asked that is under the 1982 appropriation, under the 1983 authorization and under the 1983 budget resolution, is minimally needed and that it ought to be passed by this House.

The amendment, I think, is sound. It is minimum and I urge my colleagues to join me in voting for this amendment.

I will repeat the remarks that I made earlier of my utmost respect and high regard for the chairman of this subcommittee and the ranking minority member, the gentleman from New York. I feel very hesitant and reluctant to bring this amendment, but I feel that it is utterly necessary to fulfill the basic legislatively mandated mission of the EPA.

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHEUER. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of Mr. SCHEUER's amendment. The amendment includes $900,000 for the Chesapeake Bay program and I would like to take a moment to explain the purpose of this funding.

A 6-year $27 million study of the Chesapeake Bay by the Environmental Protection Agency is now being completed.

Research findings have identified three areas of serious concern: toxics, nutrient enrichment, and bay grasses. The findings, which are now being finalized, indicate that the main stem of this 195-mile-long estuary is losing oxygen. In addition, the upper reaches of the main tributaries are considerably more stressed than scientists have thought. All of these trends—the decline of the bay grasses; the increased nutrient enrichment and attendant loss of oxygen; and the continued loading of toxic chemicals and heavy metals into bay waters—portend serious problems by the end of this century.

Given the EPA findings, it is essential that we have a shared Federal and State commitment to assure the clean up of the Chesapeake Bay. A strong Federal presence on the bay must be maintained because of the interstate boundaries of the watershed. Moreover, it is critical that EPA's participation and expertise in the Chesapeake Bay be continued so that there can be a swift, orderly transition from the research phase into the implementation phase in 1983.

Management of the Chesapeake Bay is also a responsibility of the State governments of Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. Representatives of the three States have served on the Chesapeake Bay program's management committee. In addition, the States, particularly Maryland and Virginia, have been participants in and have made contributions to the research studies funded by the program. At present, an institutional arrangement to carry on this State/Federal partnership is being developed. The States have pledged their support for such an institutional structure, and have expressed their willingness to share in the costs.

I am including for the RECORD a breakdown of the necessary funding for EPA's participation next year. Basically, it is as follows: First, the bay program has generated an excellent baseline against which future research can measure trends and tell whether water quality is declining or improving, $250,000 is needed annually to maintain the computer base, a proportion of which will be defrayed by the States. Second, it is essential that an EPA Chesapeake Bay Liaison Office be located physically on the bay. The progress to date in interstate coordination of water quality and water resource issues will be hampered without such an office. Thus, it is important to continue the five present positions in Annapolis.

CHESAPEAKE BAY PROGRAM BUDGET, FISCAL YEAR 1983

1. Cost of maintaining the data base—Federal, $125,000.

The Chesapeake Bay program has assembled on computer a massive historical data base which is being used to define trends in water quality variables and living resources over a 30 year time period for the Bay and its tributaries. This water quality data base has conducted a water quality review of data from 1940 to the present.

2. The resource user program—Federal, $75,000.

The resource user program, which evolved from public participation efforts, is a key element in the implementation of alternative control strategies because it involves those entities such as agriculture and manufacturing who need to understand the impact of their activities on the Chesapeake Bay and what alternative corrective actions they can take.

3. Monitoring program—Federal, $400,000.

A monitoring program is the most important in order to determine the effectiveness of alternative corrective actions to improve water quality on the Chesapeake Bay (i.e., evaluating improvements in water quality and aquatic species productivity in the Bay).

4. Core EPA Liaison Office—Federal, $300,000.

There is a need to continue the technical expertise that has been developed over the course of the EPA study on the Chesapeake Bay, in order to assure that the information is transferred to the appropriate state regulatory agencies.

Total Federal appropriation needed—$900,000.

Approximately $300,000 is needed for this purpose. Third, it is important to utilize the knowledge gained to improve water quality in the bay. This can only be done through a carefully designed water quality monitoring program. Approximately $600,000 is needed to design and put into place such a program. Here again, the States indicated their willingness to cost-share for approximately $200,000. Finally, it is important to actively involve bay users in developing and implementing the strategies necessary to correct problems which have been identified by the bay program. A public awareness program is critical to this implementation phase. Approximately $100,000 is needed for this purpose.

I must emphasize that this funding is not for a continuing study on the Chesapeake Bay, but for the transfer of the results of the Chesapeake Bay study to the States for purposes of properly managing and preserving the Chesapeake Bay. This Federal assistance is intended to cover only 1 year, after which the States would assume responsibility for supporting this Chesapeake Bay program.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHEUER) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SCHEUER was allowed to proceed for an additional 2 minutes.)

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHEUER. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maryland.

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I certainly rise in support of this amendment. I think, as the gentleman from Maryland has said, we are in danger of having wasted the millions of dollars that we have spent in studying the Chesapeake Bay, one of the greatest natural resources that we have in this country.

The studies under the EPA's Chesapeake Bay program are coming to an end after 6 years. The results of the studies can provide us with a benchmark against which we can measure any future changes in the water quality of the Nation's largest estuary. I am rising in support of the amendment to H.R. 6956, because it would provide the $925,000 we need to maintain the data base that has been assembled during the $25 million study. We need continuing EPA involvement to help us monitor corrective actions to improve water quality in the bay and we also need a core EPA liaison office to work with State agencies as the technical information that has been gathered during the study is transferred to the State level. Without the $925,000, we may have wasted the millions of dollars we have put into the Chesapeake Bay program. I urge that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for her support.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. I do it rather reluctantly, because I am aware of the time and effort that the gentleman from New York has put into this particular activity within the Science and Technology Committee.

I think the membership ought to look at the figures with respect to the R&D activity. The 1983 budget requests $108.7 million. This bill carries $121.2 million. That is an increase of $12.5 million over the budget request. This amendment would provide for an additional $25 million in R&D and would raise this figure to $146 million.

Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that the arguments that have been used by those who want increases in these activities, these particular accounts within the EPA, are all predicated and based upon 1982 funding.

Our position on this bill, on the Environmental Protection Agency and the other agencies of Government, is that we have to look at the total spectrum and we have to determine whether or not there are other areas that have suffered as a result of reductions in the 1983 budget estimates. And, of course, other areas have suffered as much or more.

I think all agencies have to share the burden, not EPA alone, but all agencies. Our concern, as has been so well brought out by the gentleman from New York, the ranking member of this subcommittee and his colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHUMER), is that we have to have some concern about programs that touch the living conditions of millions of people throughout the United States, such as the assisted housing programs. We are vitally concerned with that.

□ 1430

Our concern with putting additional funds into this bill, as everyone realizes, is whether or not we are going to get a bill that is going to be signed by the President. We have all heard him on television and his reaction to the bill on which his veto was overridden by this House. Members all know his concern with other bills which will be going to the White House—specifically, the 13 appropriations bills. That is also our concern. I am sure it is the concern also of the membership of this entire House and the committee members.

Much of the reduction below 1982 in R&D, as I understand it, is tied to research areas which are nearing completion or, justifiably, are being rescheduled or redirected.

For example, research is nearing completion on the effluent guidelines program and on diesel particulates, as well as the initial Superfund research. Reductions also appear possible in the synfuel area, since commercialization of this technology has gotten off to a slower start than was originally expected.

I am satisfied that the increase provided in this bill will fund the essential—I am talking about the essential—R&D programs, especially in the high-priority areas, $121.2 million is a lot of research money. It would occur to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is sufficient to run the research and development program of the Environmental Protection Agency for fiscal year 1983.

The figure does not satisfy anybody. It does not really satisfy me, and does not satisfy the authorization committee. But we have to make some hard choices this year. Everyone recognizes that. It seems to me the hard choices ought to be spread across all of the agencies in this bill, and we have tried to do that equitable and reasonably.

So, Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from New York.

● Mr. ZEFERETTI, Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Scheuer amendment to HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations for fiscal year 1983. Few issues facing Congress are more complex and critical to our Nation than the quality of the environment in which we live. Considering the fact that environmental protection was not addressed as an important issue until the 1970's, progress made in this area has been spectacular, at least until the current administration came to power.

Throughout the 1970's, Republicans and Democrats alike cooperated in assuring every American the right to a clean environment. Tragically, it has become apparent that the Reagan administration has abandoned this commitment. Between the EPA Administrator, Anne Gorsuch, and James Watt, the Secretary of the Interior, this administration's environmental policies represent no less than a blueprint for the destruction to a safe and clean environment.

Nothing more clearly displays this administration's lack of concern over the environment than the savage attacks on the Environmental Protection Agency's budget. Clearly, the level of funding provided in the committee bill is woefully inadequate for the Agency to carry out its mandated duties of protecting the environment and safeguarding public health. In fact, this Congress should be expanding the EPA budget to fulfill the congressional mandates of the many antipollution laws the Agency administers. That is why I strongly urge my colleagues to support the Scheuer amendment to restore funds for EPA's research and development programs.

Since taking office, this administration's top EPA officials have consistently and repeatedly demanded that environmental regulations and policies be based upon sound scientific research. But unless this amendment is passed, funding for EPA's research and development program will have been cut by 60 percent over 2 years. The consequences of such a budget reduction could be catastrophic for the health of millions of Americans.

Environmental research, if adequately supported, will result in the achievement of environmental goals vigorously supported by an overwhelming majority of the American people. In addition, pollution control represents an investment in industries affected by environmental legislation. EPA research activities are designed to develop appropriate control strategies for these industries. Without this capability, public health and environmental quality will deteriorate under the pressure of mounting pollution discharges.

Considerable progress has been made over the last decade in cleaning up this Nation's air and water, in addition to safeguarding the health of Americans. I am proud of these accomplishments and deeply dismayed over the course of this administration's environmental policies. In adopting the Scheuer amendment, this House has the opportunity to show its resolve in maintaining adequate funding for EPA research and development. Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to vote aye.●

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHEUER).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXIII, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the pending question following the quorum call. Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The following Members responded to their names.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ABATEMENT, CONTROL AND COMPLIANCE

For abatement, control and compliance activities, $364,575,000, to remain available until September 30, 1984: Provided, That none of these funds may be expended for purposes of Resource Conservation and Recovery Panels established under section 2003 of the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, as amended (42 U.S.C. 6913) or for support to State, regional, local and interstate agencies in accordance with subtitle D of the Solid Waste Disposal Act, as amended, other than section 4008(a)(2) or 4009.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GORE

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GORE: Page 14, line 3, strike out "$364,575,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$369,075,000".

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I might say to my colleagues that I am going to try a little bit different approach on this amendment than I did on the first one that I offered. I want to try to get along with the subcommittee chairman this time. I have consulted with him in advance, and I think we have worked this matter out.

For the benefit of my colleagues who have looked at the notice of this amendment in the RECORD, let me explain that I had originally intended to offer an amendment restoring some $8.4 million to this budget category. This compromise amendment that has been worked out restores some $4.5 million in this category.

This is an extremely important program. It targets the State grants, it targets the operator training for waste water treatment, and, in addition, we seek, at the request of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DYSON) to insure a smooth transition of the Chesapeake Bay study.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding, and I am pleased at his remarks. I am a little regretful that we were not able to go along in the other areas.

Mr. GORE. So am I now.

Mr. BOLAND. But someday we will make the adjustment.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) has indicated, we have agreed to $3.6 million, plus a $900,000 addition for the Chesapeake Bay effort that the gentleman from the Eastern Shore in Maryland (Mr. DYSON) and the gentlewoman from Maryland (Mrs. HOLT), are interested in.

We are delighted to take the amendment. As the gentleman from Tennessee has indicated, abatement, control and compliance is one of the most significant functions of the EPA. Most of it is in grants to States. With the $3.6 million, plus the $900,000, we will have added more than $57 million for abatement, control and compliance above the budget request.

I might say that part of the $3.6 million is to maintain operator training for waste water treatment facilities at the 1982 level. We think that is advisable, and for my part, on this side of the subcommittee, we are delighted to take that amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) for his support.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I am glad to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to hear that the subcommittee chairman is supporting the gentleman's amendment, and I am sorry the previous amendment was not voted on favorably and adopted. However, I think this is a step in the right direction, and I want to commend the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) for his persistence in this area.

Mr. Chairman, I also want to comment in support of Representative SCHEUER's amendment increasing the funding levels for EPA's research and development activities, and also in support of an amendment Representative GORE will offer restoring EPA's salaries and expense appropriations to the fiscal year 1982 levels. As chairman of the Budget Committee's energy and environment task force, I have been particularly concerned over the across-the-board reductions the Reagan administration has sought for EPA. At a time when EPA's workload is doubling, President Reagan and Anne Gorsuch have attempted to cut EPA's budget in half. With the proposed cuts it is doubtful EPA can effectively administer its hazardous waste, clean air, clean water, and the toxic waste program.

Research and development activities are perhaps the most important function of any environmental protection effort. Discovering the levels at which we can coexist safely with the pollution our society creates is of the greatest importance to all people, and as a government we have an inviolate duty to pursue all obtainable information. I realize many of my colleagues share this view, but they also have budgetary concerns that must be given due consideration. The Scheuer amendment balances both these concerns—it adds needed funding for research and development programs while staying within the limits of the fiscal year 1983 first budget resolution.

Both the Scheuer and the Gore amendments will have the positive effect of maintaining EPA's ability to enforce our environmental laws. This is important because de facto substantive changes can occur under the guise of fiscal belt tightening. If Congress is prepared to undo much of the legislation it enacted in the 1970's, it should do so directly, and not through the budget process. If the administration and this Congress does not intend to effect substantive changes in EPA's responsibilities, then the Scheuer and Gore amendments should be supported, and EPA should be given adequate funding to implement its statutory mandate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the comments of my colleague, the gentleman from Colorado, (Mr. WIRTH).

Mr. ECKART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ECKART. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I applaud the gentleman on offering his amendment, particularly on behalf of northeastern industrial States, such as mine. I would point out the terrible difficulties that we have in these industrial areas of attempting a cleanup of older areas. The State grant additions that are envisioned in the adoption of this amendment, with the consent of the subcommittee chairman, are important to Ohio, particularly as it relates to several projects in northeastern Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, this is a good amendment, and I appreciate the subcommittee chairman's agreeing to it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ECKART), for his support.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, and I am sorry that I did not see him standing earlier or I would have yielded before.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I join with the subcommittee chairman in accepting this amendment. I am glad that on this one at least we were able to work out the differences.

This is an area that the committee, by increasing funding over the budget estimate from $250 million to $300 million, has been very concerned with. I think this is a constructive amendment, and I am delighted that we are able to accept it.

Mr. GORE. I thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN).

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland, who has been very persistent on this Chesapeake Bay matter.

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of Mr. GORE's amendment. The amendment includes $900,000 for the Chesapeake Bay program and I would like to take a moment to explain the purpose of this funding.

A 6-year $27 million study of the Chesapeake Bay by the Environmental Protection Agency is now being completed.

The EPA studied three areas of serious concern: Toxics, nutrient enrichment, and bay grasses. The findings, which are now being finalized, indicate that the main stem of this 195-mile-long estuary is losing oxygen. In addition, the upper reaches of the main tributaries are considerably more stressed than scientists have thought. All of these trends—the decline of the bay grasses; the increased nutrient enrichment and attendant loss of oxygen; and the continued loading of toxic chemicals and heavy metals into bay water—portend serious problems by the end of this century.

Given the EPA findings, it is essential that we have a shared Federal and State commitment to assure the cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay. A strong Federal presence on the bay must be maintained because of the interstate boundaries of the watershed. Moreover, it is critical that EPA's participation and expertise in the Chesapeake Bay be continued so that there can be a swift, orderly transition from the research phase into the implementation phase in 1983.

Management of the Chesapeake Bay is also a responsibility of the State governments of Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. Representatives of the three States have served on the Chesapeake Bay program's management committee. In addition, the States, particularly Maryland and Virginia, have been participants in and have made contributions to the research studies funded by the program. At present, an institutional arrangement to carry on this State/Federal partnership is being developed. The States have pledged their support for such an institutional structure, and have expressed their willingness to share in the costs.

I am including for the RECORD a breakdown of the necessary funding for EPA's participation next year. Basically, it is as follows: First, the bay program has generated an excellent baseline against which future research can measure trends and tell whether water quality is declining or improving; $250,000 is needed annually to maintain the computer base, a proportion of which will be defrayed by the States. Second, it is essential that an EPA Chesapeake Bay Liaison Office be located physically on the bay. The progress to date in interstate coordination of water quality and water resource issues will be hampered without such an office. Thus, it is important to continue the five present positions in Annapolis.

Approximately $300,000 is needed for this purpose. Third, it is important to utilize the knowledge gained to improve water quality and maintain the health of aquatic resources in the bay. This can only be done through a carefully designed water quality monitoring program. Approximately $600,000 is needed to design and put into place such a program. Here again, the States indicated their willingness to cost-share for approximately $200,000. Finally, it is important to actively involve bay users in developing and implementing the strategies necessary to correct problems which have been identified by the bay program. A public awareness program is critical to this implementation phase. Approximately $75,000 is needed for this purpose.

I must emphasize that this funding is not for a continuing study on the Chesapeake Bay, but for the transfer of the results of the Chesapeake Bay study to the States for purposes of properly managing and preserving the Chesapeake Bay. This Federal assistance is intended to cover only 1 year, after which the States would assume responsibility for supporting this Chesapeake Bay program.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to include at this point a breakdown of the proposed Chesapeake Bay program budget for fiscal year 1983:

CHESAPEAKE BAY PROGRAM BUDGET FOR FISCAL YEAR 1983

1. Cost of maintaining the data base: Federal $125,000. The Chesapeake Bay program has assembled on computer a massive historical data base which is being used to define trends in water quality variables and living resources over a 30 year time period for the Bay and its tributaries. This water quality data base has conducted a water quality review of data from 1940 to the present.

2. The resource user program: Federal $75,000. The resource user program, which evolved from public participation efforts, is a key element in the implementation of alternative control strategies because it involves those entities such as agriculture and manufacturing who need to understand the impact of their activities on the Chesapeake Bay and what alternative corrective actions they can take.

3. Monitoring program: Federal $400,000. A monitoring program is the most important in order to determine the effectiveness of alternative corrective actions to improve water quality on the Chesapeake Bay (i.e., evaluating improvements in water quality and aquatic species productivity in the Bay).

4. Core EPA Liaison Office: Federal $300,000. There is a need to continue the technical expertise that has been developed over the course of the EPA study on the Chesapeake Bay, in order to assure that the information is transferred to the appropriate state regulatory agencies.

Total Federal appropriation needed: $900,000.

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) for yielding, and I thank him for this amendment on behalf of generations yet to come who will benefit from the use of the Chesapeake Bay.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. DONNELLY). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GORE).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FLIPPO

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FLIPPO: On page 20, line 13, strike out "$5,542,800,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,402,800,000", and

On page 20, line 17, insert immediately before the period the following: ": Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated under this heading shall be obligated or otherwise made available for the sole-source procurement of the design, development, or production of liquid-hydrogen, liquid-oxygen (Centaur) upper stages".

Mr. FLIPPO. I will not take up a great deal of time congratulating the distinguished chairman from Massachusetts. He knows very well I have very high regard for him and the work that he and his subcommittee have done and his support for research and development over the years.

My concern here today is that I believe that the action of this subcommittee, and previous actions in the supplemental, and further compounded by the action that the subcommittee is proposing today, is about to start the Nation down the wrong pathway on an upper stage development.

Let me be very explicit about what this amendment that I am offering will do.

The amendment that I am offering will reduce the appropriation for NASA by $140 million. That is for the elimination of the Centaur upper stage that is propsed in this subcommittee action.

As my colleagues know, I am the chairman of the Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications and as I come before you it has generally been my position to ask for greater funds for NASA. But I am here today because this is an important amendment.

Let me explain essentially what we are talking about. The Space Shuttle gets us from Earth to lower Earth orbit and that is all that it can do. The real payoff in space in many cases is in geosynchronous orbit, so we need some type of vehicle to go from lower Earth orbit to geosynchronous orbit.

There are essentially two Federal agencies that have a great deal of interest in space. That is the U.S. Air Force and NASA.

What we are talking about in this bill is the NASA portion of that. So NASA's problem is how do they go from lower earth orbit to geosynchronous orbit and what is the most effective and efficient way to do that to fulfill its mission.

In the first place, NASA has two missions to fulfill there. It has the Galileo and it has the International Solar Polar Mission.

So to find the most effective way for NASA to carry out that mission the subcommittee which I have the privilege to chair has been looking at this issue for more than 2 years. We felt that the most appropriate thing for NASA to do would be to acquire two of the IUS's that have been developed by the Air Force. IUS is an upper stage, a means of going from lower earth orbit to geosynchronous orbit.

The IUS is already built. It is here. It is now. The development costs are sunk there. It is real. It is tangible. It is in Florida now being outfitted and it will fly next month. It is not a pig in a poke.

Our subcommittee wanted NASA to buy two of these real vehicles and equip them with a kick stage and carry out its mission, Galileo, and ISPM. It can do that for approximately $200 million.

The alternative to that, and what NASA has been talking about for a long time is an upper stage that is called Centaur. Centaur has been around for a number of years, in the neighborhood of 25 years. But what is required in order to meet this mission is really two different vehicles.

Two years ago NASA and the Air Force were working together on an upper stage and the upper stage that they were working on was called the IUS and it got into cost problems so NASA pulled away from it and said we will develop Centaur for our own purposes.

Our subcommittee looked at that, the authorizing committee, and said "We do not think this Nation can afford to build an upper stage for the military and another upper stage for civilian purposes." It said, "NASA, you and the Air Force sit down and come up with an upper stage that both parties can use."

They went back and studied and studied and they came back to us and they said, "We cannot do that." The Air Force, in order to meet our requirements, said they must have a 20-foot Centaur and in order to meet NASA's requirements they must have a 26-foot or a 28-foot Centaur.

That is not the Centaur that is in existence today. Those are two new development programs that would be required by that action.

The first bill to come before this House this year was the NASA authorization bill and it did not contain any authorization for Centaur and it was passed by this House by a very large margin. It is now in conference committee.

Then, following that action, a few days ago we had the urgent supplemental come along and this committee decided that they did not want to go forward with IUS. So they mandated that NASA could not spend any of those funds.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FLIPPO was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLIPPO. I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I appreciate my colleague yielding.

As I understand it, you prefer the IUS; is that correct?

Mr. FLIPPO. If the gentleman will let me complete my statement I will be happy to tell the gentleman.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. You prefer that?

Mr. FLIPPO. If I might regain my time, let me complete my statement.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I will get you 10 minutes, if necessary, but since you mentioned the IUS I thought I would have a little colloquy here.

Has that been tested?

Mr. FLIPPO. It will fly next month. It is scheduled to fly next month.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. So the IUS has not been tested.

Mr. FLIPPO. Yes, it has been tested, time after time after time.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Not really.

Mr. FLIPPO. No. The Centaur has not been tested.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. The Centaur has been tested 66 times.

Mr. FLIPPO. I would tell the gentleman that the Centaur that we are talking about has not been tested. It is not even built.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. We will get to that, but let me review some of the other reasons this amendment should be turned down:

First, NASA supports Centaur funding.

Second, the Air Force has withdrawn its reservations stated in Secretary Orr's letter of August 16, 1982, and now support Centaur development.

Third, NASA/DOD joint study supports Centaur development.

Fourth, inertial upper state (IUS) cannot meet our high energy upper stage requirements for NASA, DOD, and commercial missions beyond the 1985-86 timeframe; Centaur can.

Fifth, failure to develop Centaur for Shuttle now will result in an increasing loss of business to foreign competition.

Sixth, competing a new upper stage program now will result in unnecessary expenditures of $1 to $1.5 billion, take 2 years longer to complete, and yield no significant performance improvement.

Seventh, the scientific integrity of the Galileo mission to Jupiter will be significantly enhanced by Centaur.

Eight, changing back to IUS for the international solar polar mission will seriously jeopardize NASA's credibility with its foreign partners, most notably the European Space Agency.

Mr. FLIPPO. Yes, we will get to that. You know it does not exist today. It does not exist today.

I have a one-track mind so if I might conclude my statement along that track so I will not foreget what it was I was talking about before the gentleman made his point.

The Subcommittee on Appropriations mandated in the last urgent supplemental that NASA could not spend any of its money to acquire these IUS's to carry out its mission and it mandated that NASA go forward with the development of these two Centaur programs that NASA and the Air Force has testified before my committee time after time would cost $634 million, not $200 million, $634 million as a minimum. That would be a sole source procurement, not a competitive upper stage, but a sole source procurement, that they must go forward with.

The mission we are trying to deal with is in the late 1980s. It is not now, so there is plenty of time for a competitive upper stage.

My colleagues will hear many people talk about what is the Air Force's position. Let me tell you what the administration's position is as represented by a letter dated September 14 and sent to the honorable chairman of the full committee, DON FUQUA, and signed by David Stockman. He says that the proposed amendment, Flippo amendment, "is fully consistent with the budget requests the President submitted to Congress last February. As you know, the administration proposed termination of the Centaur program and use of the joint NASA/Air Force IUS for Galileo and ISPM."

That is the administration position, whatever NASA or anyone else may say.

Now, it is important what NASA says and it is important what the Air Force says. So let me tell you. Here is a letter signed by Verne Orr, the Secretary of the Air Force, and by Jim Beggs. They were opposed to the action of the subcommittee when it went through on the supplemental. This letter is dated July 13 and it goes on to say it opposes the action of the subcommittee very strongly and avidly and says that they have no requirements that the IUS cannot handle.

This is signed by both Verne Orr and Jim Beggs. They say the most beneficial thing would be to go forward with the IUS's and with the high energy upper stages.

Here is a recent letter dated August 16 from Verne Orr to Mr. JAMIE WHITTEN and it says that—

> The congressionally-directed use of the Centaur by NASA for their Galileo and ISPM plenatary exploration missions adds about $100 million to DOD IUS program costs. To be of use by DOD the Centaur would have to be modified into a 20-foot long version to be Shuttle compatible with DOD payloads.

Here is the important thing. The Secretary of the Air Force said that this action would cost between $400 million and $900 million additional in order "for DOD spacecraft to make the transition from" existing, "IUS to the modified Centaur."

So that is the position. That is the position of the Air Force dated August 16, and the position of the Air Force and NASA dated July 13.

□ 1520

Now, Mr. Chairman, you will be told in this debate that they have received some change of mind, that all of a sudden, like last Saturday, they had a vision, and they decided that that was not the way to go. They decided on Saturday night, after all these years of study, that they could now come up with a different viewpoint. Well, that is what the Air Force and NASA says.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FLIPPO was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FLIPPO. I just want to tell you this story. I know you will be interested in it.

Down in Alabama, during the Depression, there were not many jobs there. There was one little job open for a biology teacher in a small town there. This fellow went to apply for that job. It was a rather conservative school board there. They said to him, "Do you teach the Bible theory, or do you teach that new theory of evolution?" And he knew if he answered that board incorrectly that he would not get that job. So he thought long and hard about it. Finally he said to the board, "Well, I can teach it either way."

And that is the way NASA is and that is the way the Air Force is on this issue. They can teach it either way, just whatever you want. If the chairman of this distinguished committee—and I was in the Air Force—called me, or if he implied if his committee wanted, if they wanted a letter, I would get it to them. And that is the way Air Force and NASA is. Gentlemen, that is the wrong course to take on this. We need to eliminate this and bring it back within the budget that the President is talking about and reduce this by $140 million.

Mr. HOLLENBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLIPPO. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. HOLLENBECK and by unanimous consent, Mr. FLIPPO was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. HOLLENBECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama. As the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications, I share the same concerns over the upper stage decision with the chairman of the subcommittee.

Throughout the fiscal year 1983 NASA authorization hearings, my colleagues on the subcommittee and I repeatedly asked NASA and the Air Force if they had any missions planned through the late 1980's that would require the 10,000 pounds to geosynchronous orbit capability of the liquid-fueled Centaur upper stage. Their answer was a resounding: No. The Air Force-designed solid-fueled IUS is completely adequate to fulfill both the Department of Defense requirements, and meet the two NASA planetary missions to Jupiter and the Sun with the assistance of a kick stage.

My colleagues on the Appropriations Committee tell me that the Air Force will require the Centaur upper stage for missions that they cannot discuss. So, Mr. Chairman, this is our dilemma: If the DOD and NASA both testified that they did not have any mission requirements for a Shuttle-launched Centaur upper stage, and the existing IUS could be used for the classified and NASA Galileo and International Solar Polar Missions, it is the consensus of the Science and Technology Committee that there is no need to develop this upper stage. I believe that we should take a close and careful look at the needs, mission requirements, and capability for a new high energy upper stage that would meet the space launch demands of the late 1980's through the year 2000 and beyond.

The IUS and Centaur upper stage issue has continued to flip-flop during the last several fiscal years. We are now rapidly approaching the time where if we change our minds one more time, we will jeopardize the two civilian planetary exploration programs.

I just learned that yesterday the Air Force decided to support the Centaur. Mr. Chairman, this is a decision of convenience. Why, after testifying repeatedly that the IUS would meet DOD launch requirements through the late 1980's, has the Air Force reversed their decision? Why, after studying launch mission requirements for the IUS, the Air Force decided yesterday that it needed Centaur? I for one simply do not accept the gentleman from Massachusetts' unsupported contentions regarding an intelligence mission. This is a preposterous conclusion, and I personally abhor these last-minute reversals in philosophy. Especially, I note yet another attempt by the DOD to get a "free ride." This, on top of their already bloated budget—a budget deplorably unchecked by the administration and a Secretary totally oblivious to the damage he is doing to our economy by wielding a "shovel" instead of a "knife."

I repeatedly questioned NASA's decision to change, once again, from Centaur back to IUS during the 1983 authorization hearings. I did so because of NASA's previous testimony. However, NASA subsequently testified, along with DOD, that the IUS can easily meet their launch requirements through the end of the decade.

Mr. Chairman, I also disapprove of the sole-source procurement of the Centaur upper stage. I believe that a competition should be opened to all aerospace industries for a new high energy upper stage. This new upper stage could be best for the space program, as well as the most cost effective.

I urge my colleagues to support the amendment by the gentleman from Alabama and eliminate the $140 million of additional funds to NASA for what appears to be a wasteful use of tax dollars for an unnecessary upper stage: Centaur.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLIPPO. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to remind the gentleman of a 1981 joint NASA-DOD study which concluded, on page 95 of a report requested by him and his committee:

> The Centaur is the only vehicle capable of meeting near term NASA planetary requirements, particularly the need for a Galileo combined Orbiter/Probe mission on a direct trajectory to Jupiter in 1985. The Centaur will satisfy the future envisioned and proposed NASA planetary missions through the mid-1990's. The Centaur can also be adapted to meet both current and projected NASA and DOD earth-orbiting requirements and its early availability could provide considerable enhancement to DOD mission capabilities.

On that point, in the same study, it was projected that there will be DOD requirements in 1990 of lifts to geosynchronous orbit in excess of 8,000 pounds. I would ask the gentleman: Will IUS provide that lift?

Mr. FLIPPO. In response to the gentleman, first of all, the point he made about the only available vehicle, you are talking about a direct trajectory. There is another method to go except by a direct trajectory.

Mr. HUNTER. The slingshot approach.

Mr. FLIPPO. And as far as the availability is concerned, the Centaur is not available. The IUS is available. It is real. It is tangible. The Centaur is a development program, and it is not there.

In regard to the DOD mission for the 1990's, I am not knowledgeable in the DOD mission. I can only tell you about what was testified before my committee by Pete Aldrich, Under Secretary of the Air Force and he stated that the Air Force had no known requirements above the 5,000-pound capability.

Now, if you want to go way out there, then, yes, there will be needs for higher lift capability, bigger than IUS can be grown, and that is why we probably need a high energy upper stage down the road. But there is no reason to do it by sole source procurement. We have got plenty of time to complete it. I appreciate the gentleman's pointing that out. We can complete that.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLIPPO. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I have tremendous respect for the gentleman and I have often agreed with him, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry that we do not agree on this issue.

I did want to make a point in response to the gentleman from New Jersey, who indicated that now the Air Force has changed its mind, et cetera, that, in a letter to the chairman of the House Committee on Science and Technology, November 2, 1981, both the Deputy Administrator of NASA and the Secretary of the Air Force agreed that "NASA should undertake the adaptation of the Centaur to be used in the Shuttle and to support the near-term Galileo mission and the mid-term high energy requirements of NASA-DOD and commercial users."

I understand the Air Force had some problems with that.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. WINN and by unanimous consent, Mr. FLIPPO was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. WINN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLIPPO. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas, a gentleman who has followed this for many, many years, and who was the ranking minority Member on this subcommittee for a long time.

Mr. WINN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

I think at this stage, in this hour of the testimony today, that we should call this the flip-flop provision of this bill. The flip-flop was done by NASA and the Air Force within the last few days. I think many Members of this committee realize this. Those of us who have been briefed in the last few hours, have been given information that many Members listening to me and sitting on the floor might not be aware of. I am not going to debate the merits of the Centaur and the IUS. I am saying that we better look at the budget, because we already have an appropriation bill here, handled by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that is over the President's budget. Our President told us again the other day on public television that he is going to veto any appropriation bill that is over the budget. What we are doing here or the attempt to do here, if we do not protect and support the gentleman from Alabama, is to add additional money to the budget. I am concerned that we are going to lose the Galileo program, if we do not go along with what the authorization committee supports, and not necessarily what the most convenient decision by the Air Force and NASA may be in the last few hours.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Alabama has pointed out, NASA, the Air Force, and the OMB have been opposed to the sole-source procurement of Centaur for launching the Galileo and Solar Polar spacecraft which was directed by the recently signed urgent supplemental. We had every indication that the President would resist the action proposed in the supplemental and indeed the President's first veto message labelled the action on the Centaur upper stage as restrictive and wasteful. As we all know the President was finally forced to accept the Centaur language to avoid the unacceptable alternative of closing down a number of important Government activities and the action was purported to have no significant budgetary impact in fiscal year 1982. Well, the action may not have had significant budget impact in 1982 but today we can certainly see a significant budget impact in fiscal year 1983 through an increase of $140 million to the President's request.

Mr. Chairman, there is no justification for the sole-source procurement of a Centaur upper stage for only two NASA missions. These missions can be performed using the inertial upper stage with a kick stage as proposed in the President's fiscal year 1983 budget request.

NASA has stated that the Centaur development and orbiter and launch pad modifications will cost $634 million with recent indications that this total runout cost can be expected to increase by 10 percent. I must also point out that the Air Force cannot use the NASA version of the Centaur. The Air Force claims they need a shorter vehicle and would have to modify several spacecraft already under development and procurement. And how much would these additional costs be? The Air Force claims an additional $400 to $900 million.

I believe the Appropriations Committee has rushed to judgment on this issue. I believe we should take a more careful look at the need for a high energy upper stage. If the requirements justify such a stage, then we should pursue a carefully structured program with a normal competitive procurement process. Certainly the Centaur contractor could enter such a competition and we as a Nation could be assured of the most effective and efficient stage.

Again, I urge my colleagues to support the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama who serves with distinction as the chairman of the authorizing Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications and eliminate the $140 million of additional funds for NASA.

□ 1530

Mr. BURGENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLIPPO. I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BURGENER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

In the gentleman's earlier presentation he cited letters of evidence from NASA and the Air Force. For those of us who do not serve on the gentleman's committee or Chairman BOLAND's subcommittee, it is difficult for us to follow changes in position.

It seems logical to me that the most recent position for those of us who are not on the committee and hear the daily arguments, the most recent position would be the official position. The most recent position as I understand it—and I will wait to hear from Chairman BOLAND—is that NASA and the Air Force support this.

If so, I would like to have that either corrected or defined. It would seem to me if the gentleman would cite letters in evidence earlier, it would be quite appropriate and quite fair and reasonable for the side in opposition to the gentleman's amendment to cite later evidence.

Mr. FLIPPO. I think the gentleman has made a very good point. I would hope to clarify that.

I do have a chronological statement about how this thing has gone over the years that I would like to present to the Members. I received a letter this morning from NASA and the Air Force that they were now in support of the Centaur—the nonexistent Centaur, I might add—today. But 2 weeks ago, they were not. They were not. They fought hard and I will be glad to show the Members the letter that they sent to the chairman of this committee when they were opposing the action of the Appropriations Subcommittee in the urgent supplemental.

So it is a very good point. But my point is that OMB's position, however, is quite clear. OMB's position and the administration's position is in support of my amendment, as I indicated, and that is today and that has not been refuted and cannot be refuted.

So the Air Force and NASA support it. OMB opposes it and supports mine.

The letters follow:

OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET,
Washington, D.C., September 14, 1982.

Hon. DON FUQUA,
Chairman, Committee on Science and Technology, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DON: I am responding to your letter of August 16, 1982, in which you requested the views of the Administration on a proposed amendment to H.R. 6956, the HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations Act of 1983.

The proposed amendment would delete funding for the NASA Centaur upper stage program and release the statutory mandates and prohibitions contained in the recently-enacted Urgent Supplemental Appropriations Act. These restrictions force NASA to terminate its participation in the joint NASA-Air Force Inertial Upper Stage program and mandate development of the Centaur upper stage for use in the Galileo and International Solar Polar missions.

The proposed amendment is fully consistent with the budget requests the President submitted to Congress last February. As you know, the Administration proposed termination of the Centaur program and use of a joint NASA-Air Force Inertial Upper Stage for Galileo and ISPM.

It is important to note that the Administration is now obligated by law to proceed with the Centaur program pursuant to the Urgent Supplemental Appropriations Act. As Chairman of the committee with legislative jurisdiction over NASA, I assume that you have weighed the consequences of reversing current congressionally-mandated upper stage policy and believe that the beneficial effects of restoring the Administration's original requested program outweigh any harm that might result from prolonging the uncertainty in the upper stage programs.

I share the concern voiced in your letter that carrying out the mandates in the urgent supplemental bill will force Congress to exceed both the President's budget and the congressional budget resolution for fiscal year 1983 and subsequent years. We estimate that carrying out the Centaur mandate will generate additional NASA funding needs of $49 million in fiscal year 1982. Centaur will also add at least $140 million to fiscal year 1983 and comparable amounts in subsequent years unless severe reductions are made in other NASA programs. Adoption of the amendment proposed by Representative Flippo would, as you note, permit Congress to stay within the budget without making severe offsetting reductions in NASA programs other than Centaur.

I would of course be pleased to provide any further information on this matter that you might require.

Sincerely,

DAVID A. STOCKMAN,
Director.

July 13, 1982.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: We urge your careful review of a major issue regarding H.R. 6685, the Urgent Supplemental. The Bill, as amended by the Senate, contains direction for NASA to develop, via sole source contracts, the Centaur upper stage for its planetary missions and to cancel procurement of the Inertial Upper Stage (IUS) vehicles now being bought on an Air Force contract for these missions.

While the use of the Centaur for NASA planetary missions was cost effective a year ago, NASA has proceeded to develop these missions using the IUS for the past six months. The result is that a return to the Centaur will significantly increase mission costs. Moreover, since we have also proceeded with the procurement of the IUS vehicles and manufacturing effort has gone forward for a half a year, a NASA cancellation will increase substantially the costs of the remaining IUS vehicles for the DOD. NASA is presently discussing with contractors small improvements to existing stages to meet the near-term growth requirements for commercial payloads. If a small increase in payload capacity is required for DOD payloads, this can be similarly accommodated. Since there are no other NASA or firm DOD requirements for the Centaur upper stage prior to approximately 1988 in the 1980's, there can be no justification for these increased costs since a high energy upper stage (HEUS) can be developed when a requirement exists in the late 1980's.

We therefore believe the Nation would be better served if the Air Force and NASA are permitted to proceed with a carefully structured high energy upper stage program. This approach would be far more effective and beneficial since a HEUS would be required whether or not we develop the Centaur. The USAF and NASA have developed an agreement in principle for a joint HEUS program structured to meet commercial, scientific and military needs for the 1990's.

We therefore request your assistance to eliminate the restrictive and wasteful direction on the Centaur upper stage as was indicated in the President's first veto message.

Sincerely,

VERNE ORR,
Secretary of the Air Force.
JAMES M. BEGGS,
Administrator.

Hon. RONNIE G. FLIPPO,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications, Committee on Science and Technology, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We urge your careful review of a major issue regarding H.R. 6685, the Urgent Supplemental. The Bill, as amended by the Senate, contains direction for NASA to develop, via sole source contracts, the Centaur upper stage for its planetary missions and to cancel procurement of the Inertial Upper Stage (IUS) vehicles now being bought on an Air Force contract for these missions.

While the use of the Centaur for NASA planetary missions was cost effective a year ago, NASA has proceeded to develop these missions using the IUS for the past six months. Since there are no other NASA or firm DOD requirements for the Centaur upper stage prior to approximately 1988 in the 1980's, there can be no justification for these increased costs since a high energy upper stage (HEUS) can be developed when a requirement exists in the late 1980's.

We therefore believe the Nation would be better served if the Air Force and NASA are permitted to proceed with a carefully structured high energy upper stage program. This approach would be far more effective and beneficial since a HEUS would be required whether or not we develop the Centaur. The USAF and NASA have developed an agreement in priniciple for a joint HEUS program structured to meet commercial, scientific and military needs for the 1990's.

We therefore request your assistance to eliminate the restrictive and wasteful direction on the Centaur upper stage as was indicated in the President's first veto message.

NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., September 14, 1982.

Hon. RONNIE G. FLIPPO,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications, Committee on Science and Technology, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter responds to your letter of September 3, 1982, requesting data on Centaur and HEUS (High Energy Upper Stages).

Subsequent to the signing of Public Law 97-216, the fiscal year 1982 Urgent Supplemental, and as a consequence of your letter and a similar letter from Chairman Boland, the U.S. Air Force has continued to study requirements for a high energy upper stage in the mid to late 1980's. It appears, based on new information, that it would be advantageous from both a technical and cost point of view to plan on using a short version of the Centaur (Cryogenic Upper Stage G) starting in 1987. Thus, it is advantageous for the Air Force to initiate development of this stage in consonance with the NASA schedule for a long Centaur (Cryogenic Upper Stage G[1]). This joint program will, of course, minimize both development and operating costs for both the U.S. Air Force and NASA, and will ensure the availability of a short Centaur without modification of either the Shuttle program or upper stage through the mid-1990's.

NASA will, of course, continue to require the long version of the Centaur for the Galileo and International Solar Polar missions. In order to most efficiently construct a development program we would propose to make the short Centaur the baseline program and to develop the long Centaur on a schedule compatible with the 1986 Galileo and ISPM launch. This has the additional advantage of providing a flexible set of options for both NASA and Air Force future program requirements.

The Air Force and NASA are presently negotiating a Memorandum of Agreement which should be ready for signature by the end of this month. That agreement will recognize a NASA requirement for timely development of the long Centaur for the 1986 planetary missions, and the near-term funding requirements accordingly reflect NASA's schedule demands.

We believe that the joint program described above will result in the most efficient development of a high energy upper stage and will succeed in minimizing the transition costs since separate transitions to an IUS and then to a high energy upper stage would be avoided. Moreover, it will provide the benefits of scale to both NASA and the Air Force since our operational requirements can be aggregated.

We are prepared to provide any additional details you may require, including budget figures which, at the present time, are not yet fully developed.

It is most difficult to develop a thorough and complete set of options and cost them on short notice. We can provide the following considerations:

1. We have not completed a Phase B on a HEUS at this time. It is most difficult to estimate costs without requirements and attendant industry studies. It should be possible to develop a low non-recurring cost HEUS for three-quarters to $1 billion if requirements are minimized. If reusability and refuelability are added, the non-recurring cost could exceed $1.5 billion.

2. The Orbiter/KSC Modifications for Centaur are about $150-175 million.

3. The IUS Growth development has been performed by the USAF and can be obtained from them.

4. The Spacecraft Modifications are best estimated by the USAF since their payloads are most affected.

5. We do have preliminary revised estimates for the long Centaur which are provided below. The estimates of development costs for a short Centaur are still being worked at a staff level and have not been adequately reviewed.

6. IUS Growth and IUS Impacts are best estimated by the USAF.

NASA would be most pleased to do a thorough comparison study along the lines shown in your letter, but it will require a few months to complete.

With respect to a run-out cost comparison of IUS and Centaur, there have been some cost increases based on the submissions by the Centers for the Centaur. These increases are still under review by the Headquarters staff and the Centers involved. We should point out that since July 18, 1982, we have not engaged in further IUS planetary development activities and have been pursuing Centaur. Consequently, there may be increases in the development cost of IUS if NASA were again directed to reverse course due to time lost in proceeding with Centaur as the upper stage baseline.

The following table shows an estimate of the Centaur and IUS.

PLANETARY UPPER STAGES PROGRAM ESTIMATES

[In millions of dollars]

	Fiscal year—			EAC
	1983	1984	1985
Centaur version	150–160	190–210	120–140	630–680
IUS version	80–90	80–90	40–50	300–330

It should be realized that the planetary spacecraft effort is about $80 million higher for IUS than Centaur. It should also be pointed out that there would be costs incurred (probably on the same order of Centaur—$150–$175 million) for orbiter and KSC modifications for any future high energy stage. In summary, this joint program will provide NASA and DOD with a superior upper stage which will have performed to geosynchronous orbit two to three times that of the currently available IUS.

Sincerely,

JAMES M. BEGGS,
Administrator.

AUGUST 16, 1982.

Hon. JAMIE L. WHITTEN,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We have been asked by Representative Don Fuqua, Chairman of the House Committee on Science and Technology, to provide him with an assessment of the applicability of the Centaur Upper Stage for DOD Space Shuttle launches. We are providing the following assessment of Centaur performance and cost to Chairman Fuqua.

Currently designed DOD spacecraft will not likely grow beyond the 6000-7000 pound range which could be accommodated by improvements in the Inertial Upper Stage (IUS) performance. However, we expect the next generation of DOD spacecraft which fly in the late 1980's and 1990's will be designed with extensive survivability measures (including large maneuvering propellant reserves) which will probably increase total weight well beyond IUS capabilities. Consequently, it appears that a new higher energy upper stage (HEUS) will be required for the next generation of DOD geosynchronous spacecraft.

The Congressionally directed use of the Centaur by NASA for their Galileo and ISPM planetary exploration missions adds about $100 million to DOD IUS program costs. To be of use to DOD, the Centaur would have to be modified into a 20 foot long version to be Shuttle compatible with DOD payloads. It would cost an additional $400-900 million (above the $634M NASA Centaur budget) for DOD spacecraft to make the transition from IUS to the modified Centaur. Our situation differs from NASA's in that we have several existing—and continuing—operational spacecraft programs configured for the IUS. Thus, our cost estimates include reconfiguring the NASA planetary Centaur and the DOD spacecraft to use the 20 foot version of Centaur.

Independent of the Congressional direction to NASA on the use of Centaur, we continue to believe that DOD requirements beyond IUS capability can best be met by a competitively developed new Higher Energy Upper Stage. A Centaur derivative would, of course, be a logical alternative in the HEUS competition. We do not see how legislation which dictates specific technical upper stage decisions can be helpful in giving DOD the flexibility it needs to develop a HEUS which is both optimized for DOD missions and is cost effective.

I hope this assessment of Centaur applicability for DOD missions satisfies your needs. Please advise me if I can be of further assistance.

Sincerely,

VERNE ORR,
Secretary of the Air Force.

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE
Washington, August 16, 1982.

Hon. DON FUQUA,
Chairman, Committee on Science and Technology, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter responds to your request for an assessment of the applicability of Centaur for DOD use. Our assessment covers both Centaur performance and cost.

Currently designed DOD spacecraft will not likely grow beyond the 6,000-7,000 pound range which could be accommodated by improvements in the Inertial Upper Stage (IUS) performance. However, we expect the next generation of DOD spacecraft which fly in the late 1980's and 1990's will be designed with extensive survivability measures (including large maneuvering propellant reserves) which will probably increase total weight well beyond IUS capabilities. Consequently, it appears that a new higher energy upper stage (HEUS) will be required for the next generation of DOD geosynchronous spacecraft.

The Congressionally directed use of the Centaur by NASA for their Galileo and ISPM planetary exploration missions adds about $100 million to DOD IUS program costs. To be of use to DOD, the Centaur would have to be modified into a 20 foot long version to be Shuttle compatible with DOD payloads. It would cost an additional $400-900 million (above the $634M NASA Centaur budget) for DOD spacecraft to make the transition from IUS to the modified Centaur. Our situation differs from NASA's in that we have several existing—and continuing—operational spacecraft programs configured for the IUS. Thus, our cost estimates include reconfiguring the NASA planetary Centaur and the DOD spacecraft to use the 20 foot version of Centaur.

Independent of the Congressional direction to NASA on the use of Centaur, we continue to believe that DOD requirements beyond IUS capability can best be met by a competitively developed new Higher Energy Upper State. A Centaur derivative would, of course, be a logical alternative in the HEUS competition. We do not see how legislation which dictates specific technical upper stage decisions can be helpful in giving DOD the flexibility it needs to develop a HEUS which is both optimized for DOD missions and is cost effective.

I hope this assessment of Centaur applicability for DOD missions satisfies your needs. Please advise me if I can be of further assistance.

Sincerely,

VERNE ORR.
Secretary of the Air Force.

CHRONOLOGICAL EPISODE

January 1981—NASA made a unilateral decision to pursue the sole-source procurement of a modified Centaur for two NASA missions: Action opposed by Air Force and House Science and Technology Committee.

November 1981—NASA/Air Force submitted joint report on Upper stage requirements:

NASA requirement for two missions.

Air Force had no firm requirements.

January 1982—NASA announced a decision to terminate Centaur procurement and plans to launch Galileo and ISPM using the Inertial Upper Stage being developed by the Air Force: NASA Administrator stated in testimony before the Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications that the sole-source procurement for development of Centaur was not justified for only two missions.

February 1982—Under Secretary of the Air Force testified that there were no Air Force requirements for the Centaur upper stage: "We investigated a Centaur configuration and found that it does not envelop the Defense payload requirements."

June 24, 1982—President's veto message on Urgent Supplemental: Opposed language mandating minimum spending levels for certain NASA programs that will severely disrupt two important scientific missions and lead to the waste of more than $150 million.

July 13, 1982—Joint letter from Administrator of NASA and Secretary of the Air Force:

Use of Centaur no longer cost effective for NASA planetary missions.

No other NASA or firm DOD requirements.

Nation would be better served by proceeding with a carefully structured high energy upper stage program.

A high energy upper stage would be required whether or not we develop Centaur.

July 18, 1982—Urgent Supplemental signed into law (included direction that NASA proceed with sole-source procurement of Centaur).

August 16, 1982—Secretary of Air Force letter:

New higher energy upper stage required for next generation of DOD spacecraft.

Currently designed DOD spacecraft can be accommodated by small improvements in the Inertial Upper Stage.

Would cost an additional $400-$900 million above NASA costs for DOD spacecraft to make the transition for IUS to the modified Centaur (20 foot version).

DOD requirements can best be met by a competitively developed new Higher Energy Upper Stage.

Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Appropriations Committee's decision to provide funding for procurement of the Centaur high-energy upper stage rocket. I hope Members of the House have had the opportunity to read the Science magazine article, "Centaur Wars," which I believe correctly summarizes the issues we face today. As the Science article makes clear, our space program is going to require the Centaur sooner or later. The Centaur will provide twice the payload lift capability of the inertial upper-stage rocket we must depend on today. That capability will be critical to giving us the ability to lift heavier satellites into orbit, and could greatly enhance the value of the Galileo Jupiter Mission. Postponing procurement of the Centaur will only delay the delivery of this vital component of our space program, and would add hundreds of millions of dollars in costs to its development.

In October of 1981, NASA and the Air Force released a report recommending that NASA develop the Centaur. I quote directly from the Science magazine article describing the reaction of the space and scientific community to that recommendation:

It was a popular move: The planetary science community liked Centaur because it would allow Galileo to get to Jupiter faster and carry more fuel to encounter more satellites. NASA's advanced planners, meanwhile, liked Centaur because of its legacy for future planetary missions. "Our biggest problem is always getting there," says one. "IUS is spotty, but Centaur has more than enough power to go anywhere but the far outer solar system." The communications industry liked Centaur because of its lifting ability to geosynchronous orbit. Orbital communications traffic is expected to grow 30-fold by the end of the century, and the trend in the industry is to centralize more and more equipment on bigger and bigger satellites. the combination of the shuttle plus the two-stage IUS will lift only some 3,000 kilograms to Geosynchronous orbit, however, whereas the Centaur would increase that limit to between 5,000 and 10,000 kilograms. The NASA front office liked Centaur because it could be ready by 1986, when Europe's Ariane series is expected to surpass the 3,000 kilogram IUS limit. Without a High Energy Upper Stage of some sort, the shuttle could be shut out of a very lucrative market. The Air Force, although irritated at NASA's withdrawal from the IUS project, at least had a foreseeable need for the Centaur.

I include the full text of the Science magazine article at this point in the RECORD, and I ask my colleagues to support procurement of the Centaur as provided by the House Appropriations Committee:

CENTAUR WARS

(BY M. MITCHELL WALDROP)

Even as the Europeans are moving aggressively forward with their Ariane rocket (p. 1010), Washington has once again bogged down in bickering over the one tool that would do the most to keep the space shuttle competitive.

That tool is the high energy upper stage, or HEUS, a booster that would carry heavy payloads from the shuttle's maximum orbit of 1000 kilometers to the geosynchronous orbit at 35,900 kilometers, or even into interplanetary space. A long-simmering controversy has reemerged in recent weeks: Should the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) go ahead now and adapt an existing rocket, the Centaur? Or should the agency wait and build a totally new vehicle later, when the budget crunch has eased?

Arcane though it sounds, the issue has ignited a free-for-all between feuding congressional committees, the aerospace lobby, the Reagan White House, the Air Force, and NASA, with the latter caught mostly in the middle. At stake is the shuttle's viability as a launch vehicle for the massive new communications satellites being developed for the latter half of the decade—as well as the viability of any new NASA plans to send spacecraft into remote parts of the solar system.

Also at stake is the sanity of the scientists and engineers in charge of the Galileo orbiter/probe mission to Jupiter: the $850-million Galileo, currently NASA's only approved planetary mission, is once again being whipsawed from one launch configuration to another, and its scientific productivity is once again under a cloud.

The problem goes back to the original plan for upper stages, formulated in the mid-1970's. The idea was to use solid-fueled devices because of their convenience and safety. The Air Force agreed to build a two-stage, solid-fueled booster for launching moderate-sized payloads. This booster came to be known as the Inertial Upper Stage, or IUS. NASA agreed to develop a third solid-fueled stage to be added on for occasional high-energy missions such as Galileo or the International Solar Polar Mission.

Unfortunately, developing that third stage turned out to be more difficult than anyone had imagined. By 1980 it was becoming clear that the IUS contractor, Boeing, would not be able to deliver a vehicle powerful enough to launch Galileo to Jupiter. So the mission was reconfigured: instead of a single launch in 1982 there would be a dual launch in 1984, with the orbiter and probe traveling separately.

Even so, when Boeing still had not resolved the third stage problems by the beginning of 1981, NASA terminated the third stage and announced that henceforth the agency's HEUS needs would be met with the Centaur.

It was a popular move: the liquid oxygen/liquid hydrogen burning Centaur had been a reliable NASA workhorse for more than a decade. It was far more powerful than the IUS, and at the same time more gentle. Its slowly building thrust would be kinder to spacecraft than the instant jolt of a solid rocket. Best of all, as a liquid fueled rocket the Centaur could be turned on and off as needed; once ignited, the IUS, like all solid boosters, would have to burn out like a skyrocket.

The planetary science community liked Centaur because it would allow Galileo to get to Jupiter faster and carry more fuel to encounter more satellites. The mission was quickly reconfigured for a single Centaur launch in 1985. NASA's advanced planners, meanwhile, liked Centaur because of its legacy for future planetary missions. "Our biggest problem is always getting there," says one. "IUS is spotty, but Centaur has more than enough power to go anywhere but the far outer solar system."

The communications industry liked Centaur because of its lifting ability to geosynchronous orbit (GEO). Orbital communications traffic is expected to grow 30-fold by the end of the century, and the trend in the industry is to centralize more and more equipment on bigger and bigger satellites. The combination of the shuttle plus the two-stage IUS will lift only some 3000-kilograms to GEO, however, whereas the Centaur would increase that limit to between 5000 and 6,000 kilograms.

The NASA front office liked Centaur because it could be ready by 1986, when Europe's Ariane series is expected to surpass the 3000-kilogram IUS limit. Without a HEUS of some sort, the shuttle could be shut out of a very lucrative market.

The Air Force, although irritated at NASA's withdrawal from the IUS project, at least had a foreseeable need for Centaur. In the late 1980's and the 1990's, Soviet antisatellite technology is expected to advance to the point that the Pentagon's own geosynchronous communications satellites will have to be "survivable." Among other things this means having a large propellant reserve for evasive maneuvers, which means weight, which means a HEUS of some sort to get the things up there.

But the White House Office of Management and Budget (OMB) did not like Centaur. It had nothing to do with the vehicle's merits, it was simply that extensive modifications would have to be made in the shuttle and its launch pad to handle Centaur's cryogenic fuel. Moreover, the booster's own fuel tank would have to be shortened and widened to fit it into the shuttle's payload bay. All this meant that money would have to be added to NASA's upcoming budgets, and in the budget-slashing frenzy of 1981, OMB was not about to do it.

Thus, NASA was ordered to drop Centaur from its fiscal year 1983 budget request, which went to Congress in February 1982. Galileo was reconfigured for a 1985 launch on a two-stage IUS, using a trajectory that would delay its arrival at Jupiter until 1989, and allow enough fuel for only half as many satellite encounters when it did arrive.

First, however, Congress had to approve the budget. Senator Harrison H. Schmitt (R-N.M.), Chairman of the Senate's subcommittee on science, technology, and space, was outraged at the Centaur decision and said so often. Both the House and Senate Appropriations Committees, although quieter were equally convinced that the need for a HEUS was real, and that dropping the Centaur now would be false economy. But Representative Ronnie G. Flippo (Ala.), chairman of the House subcommittee on space science and applications, sided with the White House. And there matters stood for 6 months: three of the relevant committee for Centaur, one against.

In July, however, the Centaur proponents made an end run. In the Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Bill, signed by President Reagan on 18 July, there appeared language restoring $140 million for Centaur development in NASA's 1982 budget, and ordering both NASA and Boeing to stop work on the two-stage IUS's for Galileo and the International Solar Polar Mission. (The Air Force IUS program, of course, continues unchanged.)

The scientists were overjoyed. The two missions were reconfigured for 1986 launches aboard Centaur.

In late August, however, the opposing side counterattacked. When the FY 1983 NASA appropriations came up to a vote on the House floor (as part of the HUD-Independent Agencies Bill), Flippo and Representative Don Fuqua (D-Fla.), chairman of the full Science and Technology Committee, offered an amendment that would kill Centaur and order NASA back to the IUS. The vote was promptly postponed until after Labor Day, but the showdown could come any time after 8 September.

Flippo and Fuqua explained themselves in a letter to their House colleagues, dated 16 August. They cited the cost of the Centaur modifications ($140 million this year and a total of $634 million), the limited usefulness of the vehicle (just two NASA missions), and the poor example of sole source procurement (presumably the modified Centaurs would be purchased from the traditional Centaur contractor, General Dynamics, instead of being put out for competitive bidding). Far better, they said, to go with the IUS now and let the Air Force and NASA build a new HEUS later.

That same day Fuqua received a supporting letter from Secretary of the Air Force Verne Orr. It would cost still another $200 million to $350 million to modify the Centaur for (classified) Air Force needs, he said. Besides, he too was uncomfortable with sole source procurement.

Centaur supporters, however, find the explanations unconvincing. A planetary scientist within NASA, who prefers not to be quoted by name, pointed out to Science that Flippo and Fuqua did not include the cost savings to NASA that accrue from having Galileo spend less time in space. Ground operations will cost roughly $40 million per year. Moreover, all the cost of launch pad and shuttle modifications for cryogenics handling are charged to Centaur, even though similar modifications would be required for any liquid-fueled HEUS. "The net cost of Centaur over IUS would be closer to $50 million or $100 million," he says. "And for that you get more science on Galileo, the legacy for inter planetrary missions, and the potential for commercial uses."

• • • (In fact, the cost of a new HEUS has been estimated at about $1.5 billion.)

Besides, he says, the Air Force indulges in sole-source procurement all the time. And if Orr does not want to use Centaur, nobody is forcing him. The Air Force still has its IUS's.

So what is going on? It must be said that Flippo's district includes NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville, Alabama. Marshall is the lead center for the IUS work, and will be the lead center for any new HEUS. However, the Centaur would continue to be handled out of NASA's Lewis center in Cleveland, as it has been for 20 years. Thus, there are jobs involved for Marshall.

It is also true that every aerospace company except General Dynamics has been lobbying hard against Centaur. "If they shoot down Centaur now, they all get a shot at a new HEUS," says a staffer in the office of Representative Bill Lowery (R-Calif.). Since General Dynamics assembles the Centaurs in Lowery's San Diego district, he has been in the thick of the fight. The Air Force, Lowery's assistant suggests, has a similar reason for opposing Centaur: "If Centaur is defeated, I guarantee you that a year from now the Air Force will be back asking for HEUS studies of its own—without having to share it with NASA." That is why the Air Force has been trying to whip up support for its position on the Armed Services committees, he says.

NASA, meanwhile, is split on the issue. In the late 1980's or 1990's the agency would like to build a reusable orbital transfer vehicle (OTV) that would ferry spacecraft from low earth orbit to GEO and back again. Eventually the vehicle might even be manned. From that point of view the Centaur is a dead end, because modifying it to be an OTV would cost more than starting from scratch. On the other hand, the Centaur would be an excellent HEUS in the interim.

The Galileo team could live with either an IUS launch or the Centaur, but they want a final decision on something. The endless flip-flops have been agonizing, wasteful, and demoralizing. Besides, work on the Galileo IUS ceased in July. If the Centaur is canceled now, the whole program will be months behind schedule.

NASA headquarters has managed to stay fairly neutral in all this (perhaps in part because administrator James M. Beggs was formerly a vice president of General Dynamics). Soon however, the agency will officially come out in favor of Centaur on the basis of its usefulness in scientific missions and the need to compete with Ariane. The various divisions are now drawing up lists of specific missions that could utilize Centaur, and the agency is talking to the Air Force about ways of sharing the cost.

Given the forces arrayed against Centaur, however, it seems unlikely that its fate will be decided anytime soon.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHNEIDER. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GEJDENSON. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentlewoman on her statement. I think it takes the long view which will benefit the American taxpayer and the science that we are looking to develop in outer space.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think when the gentleman from Alabama spoke of the recent decision by NASA and the Air Force to execute the Centaur program jointly, spoke of that in somewhat disparaging terms, the gentleman was really looking at the situation in the wrong way, because this Congress, and specifically the Appropriations Committee and the House Armed Services Committee, have been working for years to try to get the services and the agencies of our Government to work together, to have more joint programs, and more cooperative programs. Often we have seen these agencies tied up in what I would call turf battles where everybody wanted to develop their own private system.

In allowing the services to go their separate ways, we have encouraged redundant research and development, all to the detriment of the taxpayers. We would often maintain parallel programs which essentially accomplished the same thing; and when Congress moved to require agencies to work together, to have joint programs, and to cooperate, we were met with great resistance.

I will have to tell the Members, Mr. Chairman, I was very, very happy to see the Air Force and NASA finally come together. If they did so because of the actions of the Appropriations Committee, then more power to that committee.

I would like to quote what I think is a most important paragraph in this letter that was written jointly by Edward Aldridge, Under Secretary of the Air Force and Jim Beggs, Administrator of NASA:

> We believe that the joint program described above will result in the most efficient development of a high energy upper stage and will succeed in minimizing the transition costs mentioned by Secretary Orr in his August 17 letter, since separate transitions to IUS and then to a high energy upper stage would be avoided.
> Moreover, it would provide the benefits of scale to both the Air Force and NASA since their operational requirements can be aggregated.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, in this time of budgetary constraints, it is absolutely necessary that we move NASA and the Air Force to work together in our space programs. Taking this first step, I think, is very beneficial. It is something that had to be taken if we are going to move ahead in a cost-effective manner.

Second, Mr. Chairman, I would like to talk about what I think is the real crux of this matter. Let us talk about capability of payload. That is really the name of the game. That is the only reason IUS has had as much trouble—aside from the 500-percent cost overruns—as it has had. The IUS can carry about 5,500 pounds. They can modify it by the end of the 1980's to carry a little bit more, around 6,500 pounds.

Centaur, which has flown over 40 times successfully—can carry in excess of 13,000 pounds. Let me tell the Members, payload, whether one is talking commercial, or talking defense is the name of the game.

Let me give the Members an example of one country that realizes how important payload is. Let us look at the commercial area. The Intelsat and the commercial payloads on Intelsat have gone up rapidly. Let me give an example. In the late 1960's, Intelsat 1 and 2 were 350 pounds. By mid-1970, they were up to 1,500 pounds. It took a fivefold increase.

In the early 1980's, it was up to 2,200 pounds. By 1986, Intelsat 6 will be up to 4,400 pounds, and it is projected Intelsat 7 in 1990, will be 9,000 to 12,000 pounds. That is an excess of twice what IUS can carry.

Who is responding to this commercial market? The French are responding with Ariane. Let me tell the Members what they have done with Ariane: Ariane 1, carries 2,500 pounds; Ariane 2 and 3, 3,000 pounds; Ariane 4, 5,000 pounds, in 1986. Ariane 5, which will be fielded in 1989, will carry 8,500 pounds; and Ariane 5 was planned to only go to 7,000 pounds, but they have changed recently at great expense to get that extra 1,500 pounds, to go from 7,000 to 8,500. They want to capture that commercial market.

Let me tell the Members also that the Department of Defense in this report, the joint NASA-DOD report, has also indicated they are going to be requiring well beyond 8,000 pounds lift capability by 1990.

The only way we can accommodate our DOD and NASA requirements and accommodate the requirements of the commercial users is to go with Centaur.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we move ahead on this joint program. It is going to be good for the country, for the Air Force, and for NASA. We are finally getting them to work together.

I would ask that we defeat this amendment and proceed with the Centaur program.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. DONNELLY). The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER) has expired.

(At the request of Mr. DREIER and by unanimous consent, Mr. HUNTER was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. DREIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DREIER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

We are talking about two particular missions for either the Centaur or the IUS. I was wondering if the gentleman could tell me what particular advantage there is to the Centaur over the IUS for the Solar Polar mission?

Mr. HUNTER. Let me tell the gentleman—these are the two missions incidentally that were mentioned by the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO).

Let me raise my exhibit here. We have the Sun here, we have Earth over here, and Jupiter over here; and basically this is a mission around the Sun where we can observe the Sun from angles in excess of 70°. What occurs is the Centaur, because it has more power than the IUS, can remain in this area greater than 70°, much longer than the IUS can, for scientific observation.

It can remain in that area for 200 days because it has enough power that it can travel further away from the Sun and stay within that sector for a longer period of time. The IUS can only stay there for about 100 days. That is one scientific advantage of the Centaur on Solar Polar.

Mr. DREIER. If the gentleman will yield further, if we could look at the other mission that was being discussed, I am curious to know what the disparity on the Galileo mission would be comparing Centaur to IUS.

Mr. HUNTER. Let me briefly go over the Galileo mission. This is a mission the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO) described. The gentleman said while it may be true that IUS does not have the capability of making a direct shot to Jupiter, they can in fact make an indirect shot. What we must do with IUS is slingshot around the Earth to gain the power to be able to make it to Jupiter. What that means is although IUS will launch earlier, about 1985, they are not going to complete the amendment until 1990. They have to go out here, pull around the Earth, and slingshot out to Jupiter.

When they do that, the vehicle that is launched is going to have to use some of its own power. Because of that, when it gets there, the vehicle is only going to be able to make 8 satellite encounters.

The Centaur we can launch in 1986. It will be there in 1988. In other words, even though it launches a year later, it will arrive a year earlier than the IUS, and it will be able to encounter 11 satellites because it will have plenty of power, plenty of fuel, plenty of payload capability.

Mr. DREIER. I thank the gentleman.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO).

Mr. Chairman, the issue really is very, very clear. One should really ask what are the advantages, technologically and economically, in terms of our national security, in terms of the project that has been tried and tested.

In all those issues, the pluses fall on the side of the Centaur. Indeed, the Centaur has been the work horse in this area for more than a decade and has consistently demonstrated its technological capabilities and cost effectiveness.

□ 1540

Now we see as they did initially, the Air Force and NASA, both agree that the Centaur project should be maintained. Centaur has demonstrated its reliability; its reliability of performance is 97 percent.

The IUS, as my friend, the gentleman from California pointed out earlier, has never been flown. In addition Centaur is more cost-effective.

The total estimated cost of this project is $634 million, whereas it will cost by estimates more than a billion dollars to develop the IUS as an alternative high energy upper stage.

Centaur can carry almost three times more the payload weight into orbit than the IUS can. This is very important just in terms of securing our competitive lead in this area of technology over our nearest competitor, France. Their French-built Ariane space launched vehicle will be commercially available to lift 9,500 pounds by 1986 and 1987, of course, only the Centaur will surpass that ability to lift, whereas the IUS does not.

Congress and the President have already approved legislation in the urgent supplemental, signed into law in July, that appropriates $80 million for the Centaur's use with the Space Shuttle in launching NASA's two planned missions in 1986; $40 million of that money has been spent.

In addition, according to Associate Administrator for Space Science and Applications at NASA: "The performance of shuttle Centaur is adequate to satisfy all Science and Applications launch requirements to the end of this century."

It is about time our country plans ahead. We ought not to take the short-term immediate really political avenue, we ought to be thinking and planning ahead so that we can save our taxpayers money and in addition to that still maintain our excellence in the areas of technology.

In reference to cost, I notice that the distinguished minority leader from the Space and Technology Committee mentioned that the IUS would save money. That is simply really in many ways not true. The shuttle Centaur cost is $14,000 per pound of payload, whereas the IUS cost per pound of payload is $40,000.

Now, $80 million has already been appropriated for continued development of the upper stage program of the Centaur, of which $40 million has actually been spent.

Are we going to retract that and just allow those people to have those contracts and just forget the entire $40 million the taxpayers have already spent on this project?

The cost of the Centaur launch, in 1986, is estimated at $49.8 million, compared to an IUS cost of $71.4 million; so again, it is even more cost effective in that area.

Centaur, in addition, would provide a flight time of 26 months for NASA's Galileo mission and would guarantee 11 satellite encounters. By comparison, the IUS would need 54 months to reach Jupiter and would result in only six satellite encounters.

Again, the IUS is inferior in terms of its capabilities.

Cancellation of the Centaur project during the fiscal year 1983 budget year would be highly counterproductive and wasteful, because both the Galileo and Solar Polar missions would be jeopardized.

The result of this cancellation, as has been noted in many "Dear Colleague" letters would be to antagonize our European partners who have jointly agreed to take part in the international Solar Polar mission, and both NASA and the GAO and the Air Force have approved sole source procurement for Centaur.

In addition to this, people have talked about vested interests and regional interests and so on. Well, I do not think that ought to be discounted. I make no apologies about the fact that this means jobs for our area. Lewis Research Center is an integral planner and developer of the Centaur. More than 150 jobs would be lost and millions of dollars in revenues. Our great dedicated Federal employees are second to none in this area of technology. They deserve to continue the project.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio has expired.

(At the request of Mr. ROUSSELOT, and by unanimous consent, Ms. OAKAR was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

In addition to being a far superior project, as I have tried to evidence, this project means additional jobs, not only for the great State of Ohio, members from California, Arizona, Arkansas, Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Utah, Virginia, and Wisconsin, should have an interest. Not only that, the Northeast-Midwest Members ought to be pretty close to agreeing on the fact that we do not want to lose any more jobs for our region. We cannot afford to. Studies have pointed out that in the Northeast-Midwest, our States are the ones to lose whenever there are defense-related projects and we cannot afford to have that happen again, particularly when we have the superior project and it has already been tried and tested.

□ 1550

So, my friends, really in the interest of our national security, our space science, our U.S. preeminence in commercial space operations, fiscal responsibility, et cetera, support the continued efforts of Congress and the space science community to continue the Centaur integration into the Space Shuttle, support the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the minority leader of that committee, and the Committee on Intelligence of the House and the Committee on Intelligence in the Senate, the Senate Commerce Committee and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and the Committee on Appropriations of the House in assuring that this Centaur project continues, that we not delete money from this project, and that we think of our own national security.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Ms. OAKAR. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I appreciate my colleague yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the very complete detail the gentlewoman has given about the Centaur project. One of the things she mentioned that occurred to me might have some extra importance is that she has mentioned that the Centaur has the capability of carrying three times as much as the other project that has been deleted.

Now, does that accrue to the benefit of the commercial development as well as our defense needs?

Ms. OAKAR. That is very definitely true. I mentioned the French-built Ariane, which will have the capability of lifting 9,500 pounds. The IUS cannot come close to competing in terms of that capability. But the Centaur already has the capability of almost 14,000 pounds in terms of payload weight.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. 14,000 pounds?

Ms. OAKAR. Yes, almost 14,000. As a result, we will remain competitive. I think most Americans are a little tired of the situation of not remaining competitive and losing jobs to other countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(On request of Mr. ROUSSELOT and by unanimous consent, Ms. OAKAR was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Ms. OAKAR. I think Americans are tired of seeing the Japanese, the West Germans, and other countries taking over our jobs, our projects, because technologically in some areas they have surpassed us. Is it not time we think of the future? Is it not time we think of our own commercial competitiveness beyond our national security and, of course, beyond the fact that it is by far the superior project?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. If the gentlewoman will yield further to me, do I understand that retaining this project in the appropriation bill is important for our ability to compete in space development? Is that not correct?

Ms. OAKAR. Absolutely.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I appreciate the point the gentlewoman has made, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Ms. OAKAR. I would be happy to yield to my colleague from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman has again expired.

(On request of Mr. MOTTL and by unanimous consent, Ms. OAKAR was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. MOTTL. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to commend the gentlewoman from Cleveland for giving her outstanding statement in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak against the amendment. I am disappointed that the Science and Technology Committee, normally such a strong supporter of NASA programs and policies, would take a position that would essentially have NASA play second fiddle to the Air Force. I understand the gentleman from Alabama's problems and his great concerns about where the NASA work should be done. Nevertheless, I am stunned that the parent committee, which sired NASA as an agency nearly 25 years ago, would take a position which shortchanges their great organization.

The issue, I believe, is clear. If NASA is not allowed to have the lead and go-ahead, the development of Centaur into a second stage for the Shuttle, a so-called Tug, they will have to depend on Air Force development and their high energy missions will be compromised to Air Force requirements. The DOD is the agency that most benefits if this amendment is passed and NASA needs come in a clear second. I am puzzled that the Science and Technology Committee which on one hand has shown increasing concern about the military emphasis of the NASA role in Shuttle should take the position that NASA should effectively function as a military support organization in the development of space technology. The track record of NASA-Lewis Research Center in developing the Centaur with the General Dynamics Corp. was impressive and the Atlas/Centaur and the Titan/Centaur vehicles have outstanding launch records for a wide variety of payloads.

There is no question that the modifications for storing propellants—which is really the Shuttle "Tug" development for Centaur—is straightforward for the NASA-Lewis/General Dynamics team. Instead, however, this amendment would arrest that important development activity, and have the agency wait on the Air Force and its contractors to develop a high-energy second stage available a decade later for NASA needs. I am afraid that is what the amendment means and with great reluctance I must oppose it. Thank you.

Mr. BURGENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BURGENER. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I commend the gentlewoman for her position and wish to associate myself with her remarks.

We have been fighting the battle of the letters here today. There are two lead agencies involved here, NASA and the Air Force. It is my understanding that some years ago they were together, and until very recently they were apart, and now they are together again on this thing.

Let me quote one line from today's letter, the most recent of all: "It appears based on new information"—and that is the key phrase—"that it would be advantageous from both the technical and cost point of view to plan on using a short version of the Centaur."

It has been argued here before that the Centaur has flown many, many times and that the size is not all that relevant. So it would seem to me if they are together again, it is the best of all worlds technologically and economically to go with them, and I urge that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FLIPPO. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can shed a bit of light on the gentleman's concern. He states a very good point about them being together.

If I might point out, August 16 the Secretary of the Air Force wrote a letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio has again expired.

(On request of Mr. FLIPPO and by unanimous consent, Ms. OAKAR was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield further to me?

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Chairman, on August 16, the Secretary of the Air Force, in a letter to DON FUQUA, said that the Centaur would cost an additional $400 million to $900 million above NASA's cost for DOD spacecraft to make the transition for the IUS to the modified Centaur, and it is the 20-foot Centaur that they are talking about now.

He concludes by saying that DOD requirements can best be met by competitively developed new higher energy upper stage.

Now, that was on August 16. The gentleman made the point that the most current letter is now a refutation of that, they say, because new information has come forth. What is the new information? What has happened since August 16?

Please ask yourself that question. What would cause them to go back together and change their position?

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO) and I know that on November 2, 1981, when the further talks concerning this entire project were underway, the Air Force and NASA both agreed that Centaur was to be used for the Shuttle.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman has again expired.

(On request of Mr. HUNTER and by unanimous consent, Ms. OAKAR was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentlewoman's comments about the need for us to develop commercial users of the STS. I point out that the joint NASA-DOD study requested last year indicated that at this time there are no commercial companies planning to use IUS.

While Intelsat is planning up through, I believe, Intelsat-6, to use Ariane, they have indicated that if we go ahead with Centaur they will, in fact, use Centaur for Intelsats 7 and beyond. That prognosis was included in the report that the gentleman from Alabama requested last year.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is right.

Mr. ECKART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield to me?

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ECKART. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman from Ohio has done a more than thorough job in delineating clearly for the Members the economic, military security advantages for proceeding with the Centaur program under its current form in the manner recommended by the committee and in opposition to the Flippo amendment.

In a way, the question is, in our economic consideration, foreign cars or, as the gentlewoman pointed out, foreign rockets.

The American economy, the American working people everywhere need a government that is responsive and sensitive to their needs. The failure to develop the Centaur as currently envisioned in the proposal by the gentleman from Massachusetts will result in an increasing loss of business to foreign competition.

□ 1600

That is the bottom line, and it is indeed rare when there is a confluence of politics and public policy that has taken place today. I urge rejection of the Flippo amendment for the purposes of preserving jobs for American workers everywhere.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague from Alabama, and commend him for his effort to save both time and taxpayer money. The bill before us today contains $140 million for further development of the Centaur. Yet the House, in passing the NASA authorization bill for the coming year, agreed to fund the inertial upper stage, or IUS, and not the Centaur. That was a decision based on several important facts.

IUS is a program which is ready to go. In fact, it will be aboard the Shuttle flight scheduled to depart in January 1983.

The Centaur will increase the cost of the Space Shuttle, and I want to make sure my friend from California is here to hear this, by $1 billion to $1.5 billion.

The Centaur will delay two important NASA projects, the Galileo and the International Solar-Polar Mission (ISPM) by several years.

There is no guarantee that the Centaur can meet our long-term space needs. In fact, there is no certainty that Centaur can meet the needs even of Galileo and ISPM.

IUS can be acquired for substantially less money than Centaur. To develop Centaur at this point would be to waste the dollars we have already invested in the development of IUS. It would cost us as much to cancel the IUS program at this point as it would to go ahead and build the two units necessary for Galileo and ISPM.

IUS can be ready to go sooner than Centaur. To delay ISPM, which is a joint venture with our European allies, would put a further strain on our international relations.

IUS is "manrated," or capable of carrying men as well as equipment and machinery. IUS will serve NASA's needs through 1987, while Centaur will not.

According to the Defense Department, Centaur does not "envelope DOD requirements," while IUS does.

In short, IUS fulfills the needs both of NASA and DOD more quickly, more cheaply, and more safely. Its technology is more up-to-date; its capabilities more in keeping with the current focus on the space program. It is, in fact, the only alternative available which can meet our projected launch dates for Galileo and Solar-Polar. We can have it cheaper and faster, and get an end product which truly meets our needs for at least 5 years into the future.

I believe we should support Mr. FLIPPO in his efforts, and vote for his amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKS. I yield.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I would like to comment on his statement to the effect that we could get underway with the Solar-Polar Mission and Galileo Mission faster with IUS. It is a fact that we will start the Galileo Mission earlier—that would be 1985—with IUS as opposed to 1986 with Centaur.

However, because IUS is so weak that it has to slingshot around the Earth before it can get enough power to get to Jupiter, it will not finish the mission until 1990, and the Centaur can finish the mission by 1988. So, the Centaur will complete the mission in excess of a year earlier, and while the IUS will be slingshotting around the Earth to get power, we are going to be paying $40 million to $50 million to monitor the activities of that vehicle while it is flying for that extra year.

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Chairman, I would point out that NASA has two missions, the ISPM and Galileo Mission. If we proceed with Centaur, the cost to NASA alone would be $634 million. That would be an average cost for two missions, I believe, of $317 million for transporation costs for each of those. If we do it under IUS, the cost is in the neighborhood of $200 million, and you can then have $100 million cost of transportation for each one.

So, I would suggest to the gentleman that if we really look at the hard cost, the hard costs are in favor of doing it under the existing IUS, and not under the to-be-made Centaur we are talking about.

Mr. DICKS. Is it not true, though, that we really can save the taxpayers some money, and we are hearing all this rhetoric—important rhetoric, and rhetoric that I agree with—about the necessity of balancing the Federal budget or getting expenditures under control; is not this amendment the gentleman has offered a chance to do that?

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO). First of all, I want to say that I have the highest and utmost regard for my good friend of long time, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND), chairman of the subcommittee, and the ranking minority member and the members of the appropriations subcommittee. Rarely, do we have items of disagreement, but in this case we do.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that I come here with clean pockets. None of these things are built in my district, unfortunately, so I think I can take somewhat of an objective view, as I have always tried to do, and look at it in what is best for the people that are picking up the tab for this, the taxpayers and the American people. The bottom line is the dollars involved.

Centaur has a very excellent record. It is a very fine vehicle, but it must undergo substantial modification before it can be flown inside the Space Shuttle for several reasons. One is size to fit the cargo bay. It must be reduced in length and increased in width. Also, the Shuttle must be adapted to take care of cryogenic-type of propellant it uses. The IUS is already under development and will be flying in January on the STS 6 mission and was designed for the Space Shuttle.

I am sure both of them are very good vehicles and both of them will take care of the missions that we have before us. If they would not do that, then I would be down here asking for something else. The only two missions NASA has are the Galileo and the ISPM mission, and NASA has repeatedly told the Committee on Science and Technology over the last 2 years and before that, it could satisfactorily care for those missions.

Some mention was made, "Well, they should work together." As a matter of fact, the NASA and Air Force have been working together—many years ago and by the way we are not militarizing NASA—many years ago when the Space Shuttle was under development the question was, Who was going to do what part? Would the Air Force buy certain Space Shuttles? The decision was made at the highest levels of Government that NASA would provide the orbital vehicles and all the component parts connected with that. The Air Force would provide the interim upper stage and develop the launch facility on the west coast at Vandenberg Air Force Base. That decision was made before many Members even thought about running for Congress, probably about 10 or 12 years ago.

Where are we today? The bottom line is that earlier this year we passed a NASA authorization bill overwhelmingly in this House that said we would go with the IUS (the interim upper stage). Now, we have a problem. We are in conference with the Senate right now. We have already had to put $49 million in fiscal year 1982. That was in the supplemental for the Centaur. Where did that come from? Well, it has got to come out of the hide of NASA.

Now, in this bill we are asking for another $140 million in 1983 and another $140 million-plus in 1984, and where is that money coming from? It may come out of the project that my friend, the gentleman from California, is interested in. It may come out of Galileo. It may come out of some of the other programs that NASA has, the ISPM and the aeronautical programs. I say that the Members had better think of that, those who represent the Lewis Research Center. That could be in jeopardy because we put money in for this Centaur.

The Langley Research Center and Ames Research Center in California could very dramatically be affected by what happens on this amendment.

I say to the Members, you can vote any way you want. I have no vested interest in it. But I want the House to know now that we are sending a signal, because if you vote to keep the Centaur in with the additional money, $140 million, then, when we come back from conference, we will be $140 million over the budget request. We are within it now, but we will be that much over. But I say, you put yourself on the line if that is what you want. If that is what you want, I am a big enough boy that I can buy it.

But I want the Members to know what they are doing, and I say to them, "don't be misled." That is what you are doing, going $140 million over the budget, and that is the bottom line.

They are both good vehicles. I love all of them. They are fine people, and I could not say any more nice things about the NASA Centers and all the people who work in them. I wish they were in my district, but they are not.

But that is what you are doing, and furthermore, in the letter from the Director of OMB Mr. David Stockman, he went on to say this. This was dated yesterday and written to me. He said he is still opposed to the language in the appropriation bill, and he said that there would be severe reductions in other NASA programs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FUQUA was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, he said that it is fine if we want to do it, but there will be other reductions in NASA programs so that we can keep that budget within the President's budget.

I think it is not a very complex argument. Either we want to stay within the President's budget or, if we want to go over by $140 million this year and $140 million next year—and that is what we are talking about—that is what we will do, then, and that is the vote.

The Committee on Science and Technology has looked at this for over 2 years. We did not come in yesterday and change our minds or come in the day before or come in on August 16. We even asked that there be a study between NASA and the Air Force. We still have to build a high energy upper stage. Whether we go with IUS or Centaur, we still have to have a high energy upper stage.

The Air Force is already going to use the IUS for its programs, so instead of having two programs, we will have three. If that is the way we want to spend the money, then that is your choice, but I want the Members to know what they are doing. They are going to cause us to have to come back with the budget $140 million over.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the adoption of the Flippo amendment.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have no parochial interest in this matter. Sometimes I wish I had never heard of IUS or HEUS or Centaur or any one of them.

But the fact of the matter is that this committee has carefully looked at this program, not yesterday and not last month, but as far back as 3 years ago, back to 1979, when at that time NASA made the decision to go with IUS, the inertial upper stage, to launch Galileo and the International Solar Polar Mission.

At the time we asked NASA to get a look at the cost of the IUS as compared to some other system and Boeing quoted the cost of IUS at $18 million in 1979. Now, one IUS costs $60 million.

Here we have a vehicle, the Centaur, that has been flown more than 65 times. There have been three failures, three faults, but it has had some 30 continuous successful flights. It has the finest rocket engines—I believe it is the RL-10—that have been developed by industry for space flight—not a single failure.

I can understand the position of the Committee on Science and Technology, but I think it comes too late. This item was in the urgent supplemental. We did not put it in. It was put in by the Senate because we thought that we ought not to pounce upon the preserve of the Committee on Science and Technology. And they do a great job under direction of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA) and also of the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Alabama, who chairs the Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications.

There has been a great deal of discussion and meetings in the past 3 years between NASA and the DOD on the question of an upper stage, and there have been some questions raised by some Members here as to why the DOD comes so late to the Centaur program.

The gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO) says that he questions new information not available to NASA and DOD. Well, there has been new information, and based upon the new information, the DOD came to its conclusions and to an agreement with NASA yesterday. That new information resulted from the STS-4 Shuttle mission and recent tests on that flight. Those tests indicated there was contamination in the orbiter bay that would require additional shielding for some payloads.

What are the payloads? Well, I cannot tell you here. I know what they are. Some of the other Members do, too, as well as the managers on the part of the Air Force who concern themselves with the classified program. They are the most sensitive, perhaps the most important, and certainly from the point of view of national security, they are the missions that prompted the Air Force to reach the decision that Centaur was the best way to go. I am not talking about the top people; I am talking about the program managers, the technical people who have been looking at this program, not just in the last month or so but for many months. They came to the decision to go the Centaur route.

Concerning the $140 million, the chairman of the legislative committee says that that $140 million will be taken out of the hide of NASA or taken out of the hide of some of the other programs in NASA. That is not so. We provided the $140 million in this bill for NASA. We do not take it out of anybody's hide. But it is a program that deserves the funding and it is a program that enjoys a high priority in this Nation.

What about OMB? OMB just released $49 million in the 1982 budget for this program. How does OMB feel about it? I do not know how Mr. Stockman feels about it, but I do know something about this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BOLAND was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, what I do know is that OMB does not oppose this new joint program. That issue was raised, as to whether or not OMB supports this new joint agreement.

I want to assure the members of this committee that I have no idea what the implication or what the purpose of the letter is that was read here from OMB. But what I do know is that OMB told NASA and the DOD yesterday that they would support the joint agreement.

An argument has been made here about competitive versus sole source procurement. The GAO looked at Centaur last year and that GAO report indicated that there was no necessity for any competition in this area; the Centaur filled the bill.

There is some concern about whether or not the cost of this program is going to be as great as some Members have indicated. The Committee on Science and Technology has indicated that somewhere along the line there will have to be an HEUS, a high energy upper stage. Do the Members know what it will cost?

□ 1620

These are not my figures. These are the figures of NASA and people in DOD. They say from $1.5 billion to $2 billion.

The claim is made here that Centaur G, the 20-foot Centaur, that the Air Force will require more than just the Centaur G to lift its payload into a geosynchronous orbit.

No one really knows that, but that is the argument that those who oppose Centaur are making now, that somewhere down the road, and maybe it will, but it is a way down the road, perhaps at a time when we can afford $1.5 billion or $2 billion. But we have the Centaur now. It is here. It can propel, as has been said so many times by so many Members here, up to 14,000 pounds in a geosynchronous orbit, and that is clearly something the IUS cannot do.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I am delighted to yield to my friend from Florida.

Mr. FUQUA. I appreciate my friend for yielding.

As I said, I have the utmost respect for the gentleman from Massachusetts and we agree together about 99.9 percent of the time on things that we have a mutual interest in.

But one of the questions I have is on the gentleman's statement that the Air Force had suddenly recognized that they had requirements that would require a Centaur vehicle. Are we talking about a 20-foot Centaur or 28-foot Centaur?

Mr. BOLAND. We are talking about a 20-foot Centaur.

Mr. FUQUA. How much is the Air Force planning to pay for that since they have the payload requirements and not NASA?

Mr. BOLAND. The Air Force would not like to pay for it at all, of course, and that will present a problem. But I think that can be ironed out.

That has been a problem, as the gentleman knows, as he is familiar with one of the amendments on the other side with respect to the $409 million that the Senators put in to have the Air Force pick up that tab that NASA now pays. We can meet that problem.

The problem here is you have a vehicle that will get Galileo to Jupiter. It may be launched a year later, but as compared to the IUS and the kick stage, it will get there a year earlier.

So dismiss from your mind the fact that it is going to injure the Galileo program. The gentleman from Florida would not permit it, nor would I permit, any money to be taken away from Galileo or the International Solar Polar Mission.

At least that has been my pledge and view, and I am sure it is the gentleman's pledge and view.

Mr. FUQUA. Here again, though, if there is a requirement for the Air Force, NASA is going to be stuck with picking up the bill and that is one of the problems we have and why we think we should go ahead with the IUS rather than the Centaur.

The Air Force has gotten a free ride, as the gentleman knows, for many of the development costs that they have used, and here again NASA is getting stuck.

I am afraid that it is going to come out of some of the other NASA programs.

Mr. BOLAND. Let me answer that point that NASA is going to get stuck with the whole bill. That is not my information.

My information is they will split it and that 50 percent will be paid by the Air Force and 50 percent by NASA.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) has expired.

(At the request of Mr. HUNTER and by unanimous consent Mr. BOLAND was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I am delighted to yield.

Incidentally, I want to commend the gentleman for his scholarship on both the Galileo and the International Solar Polar Mission and the flights they take and why Centaur. I felt the gentleman did an excellent job.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman.

I would like to point out that in the joint letter sent today by the Under Secretary of the Air Force and James Beggs they indicated that the U.S. Air Force and NASA will split the development costs. They stated further that—

While we have not yet fully completed the negotiation of memoranda of agreement, that work is in progress and should be completed by the end of September.

I have great faith in the Science and Technology Committee's ability and the Appropriation Committee's ability to monitor that agreement and that negotiation.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FLIPPO. In regard to the gentleman's point, I think it is a very important point. The only agreement between the Air Force and NASA is to agree to split the cost on the 20-foot Centaur that NASA is not going to use. Only the Air Force would be using the 20-foot Centaur so it is not a big deal for the Air Force to yield, to agree to split the cost on something that NASA is not going to use.

But NASA must incur the cost of the 28-foot Centaur and I present that for the gentleman's clarification.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. ROUSSELOT and by unanimous consent Mr. BOLAND was allowed to proceed 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I would yield first to the gentleman from Florida, a member of the Science and Technology Committee.

I understand there is a split within that committee and I am delighted to see it.

I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. NELSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just want to state for the record that there is a difference of opinion, regardless of the great respect that I have for the chairman of the subcommittee and the chairman of the full committee.

I support the gentleman from Massachusetts' position and oppose the Flippo amendment.

The reasons have been well stated here. But I would just underscore the fact that in the development of a high energy upper stage we are talking about an additional cost to the tune of $1 billion to $1.5 billion of probable additional costs that we could avoid by going ahead with the Centaur.

So I would underscore that.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I appreciate my colleague, chairman of the subcommittee, yielding and I appreciate the way he has brought to the House the information we need to make an appropriate judgment on this amendment.

Is not part of the answer to the question of our colleague from Alabama that $80 million has already been appropriated for the continued development of the Centaur in July of this year in the supplemental appropriation. So a portion of the gentleman's concern is answered because the House has already appropriated dollars for that.

His genuine point that he has tried to make with my colleague from California (Mr. HUNTER) that even though the Air Force and NASA have arrived at this agreement, his concern is that there will not be adequate dollars. My understanding is that we are already well on the way toward the $140 million and, as has been pointed out, the Air Force has agreed now that they will be responsible to pick up part of the cost on this project.

Is that not correct?

Mr. BOLAND. That is true.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I wonder if the gentleman could elaborate a little bit, since he is chairman of the Intelligence Committee. Is there a value to be received in that area in this project?

Mr. BOLAND. The value that will be received in that area is extemely high, let me say.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Extremely high?

Mr. BOLAND. Extremely high.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I appreciate my colleague yielding, and especially for placing emphasis on the last point relating to the intelligence value.

Mr. BOLAND. Incidentally, let me say that that particular agreement comes as a result of what some of the Air Force needs are in the future in some areas.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I have two reasons to claim disinterestedness as to this amendment. One, as far as I know there is no procurement in my district that relates to either of the vehicles, unfortunately.

Also I have no prior commitment to one side or the other through my role in this House or otherwise, since I am new to the Appropriations Committee and this subcommittee in this Congress.

So, for me, as this controversy has unfolded this year, the look has been a completely fresh and unbiased one.

I think the Members who have preceded me, because many of them have worked on this for many years, have laid out all of the technical details and the history; I would not presume to try to go over the ground that they have gone over so well.

But I think it might be helpful to my colleagues simply to state that having gone through all of the technical detail and complications that have followed this issue over the years, it seems to me that where one comes out ultimately is that the IUS is basically a very limited capacity vehicle because of its thrust limitations and, in terms of the future, its future is not for long.

□ 1630

Whereas the Centaur, because of its much greater thrust, essentially gives us much broader opportunities over a period of years. The Galileo mission, plainly, would be improved by the Centaur because of the greater thrust. The more rapid time in which the mission could be completed from launch to completion reduces the possibilities of things going wrong, and that is simply illustrative of the benefits that the Centaur appears to have over the IUS to this newcomer to the issue.

So it seems to me that the Centaur in terms of long-run economies and long-run potential really offers far more than the IUS, with its obvious limitations. I would, therefore, hope that the members of this committee would defeat the amendment.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It appears that once again we are managing to create ways to irritate our European allies.

This amendment would adversely affect the International Solar Polar Space Mission (ISPM). This mission is supposed to be an internationally cooperative mission between the United States and our European friends.

The last time we downgraded this mission, the Europeans were very upset. Let us look at the history:

Original agreement with our European allies was for the United States and Europeans to develop their own spacecraft and fly on a solid booster, called the IUS (inertial upper stage).

The first problem was a lack of performance of the IUS causing NASA to change boosters and use Centaur, a more capable liquid stage, causing a delay in the program.

Next, the United States renegged on supplying one of the spacecraft.

Third, the administration decided to go back to the IUS for shuttle because of budget pressures, causing a degraded ISPM mission.

Fourth, the Congress directed that Centaur be used for the ISPM mission in order to get a full science return from this important international cooperative effort.

All of these problems caused a considerable loss of faith on the part of our European allies in the U.S. commitment to this joint effort.

This amendment would make this situation even worse by reverting once again to the less capable IUS booster which would cause unnecessary degradation to this important international mission.

We have upset our friends in Europe enough on this issue. It is for these reason I support my good friend from Massachusetts and rise in opposition to this amendment. I urge your support of the Appropriations Committee bill.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think probably everything has been said that needs to be said on this issue, and I am somewhat hesitant to address it further; but I will risk that.

I am a member of the Science and Technology Committee and I have shared in some of the debate on this issue over the years. I think that the views arrived at in the Science and Technology Committee are thoroughly justifiable on every ground at the various stages that they have been reached. I do not happen to agree with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, my esteemed chairman of the Space Subcommittee, but I think that is because events have moved beyond the situation which originally justified the position that he is taking.

The real fault in this situation is that there has been a failure to adequately define the range of missions which was needed and which was to be met by either Centaur or IUS, or the future high-energy upper stage. There really has been a failure to adequately plan and define the missions. And this is the main factor that has caused consternation within the scientific community and within the other communities that are concerned with this matter. The scientific community, the community involved in planetary exploration, has always favored the Centaur for a number of reasons, including the ones that have been mentioned here. It is a liquid fuel rocket which is maneuverable, which can be started and stopped, something that the IUS cannot be and, as a consequence, it can access a great many more satellites in the Galileo Mission than the IUS, as well as getting to Jupiter earlier than IUS. So there has never been any doubt in the minds of the planetary scientists. What they have doubted is whether there was really a commitment to planetary science by this administration or by whatever administration, because it has seemed to have a declining priority.

Now, what has developed most recently is a new urgency about defining missions; first, the civilian commercial missions, and, second, the intelligence missions referred to by the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee who is also the chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Obviously, there have been new and fairly rapid developments in both of these areas. In the intelligence area I am not bound by the same need for secrecy as the chairman. I can report what I see in the open press; and the open press says that we must have in the near future reconnaissance and communication satellites which are hardened, are heavier, and are maneuverable, more than the present generation, and, therefore, require a greater boosting capacity. We have only come to this decision in the fairly recent past. In the civilian commercial sector, frankly, NASA has not known where it was going. There were no particular policies or guidance coming to it from this administration until quite recently. It is becoming clear, because of international forces—and there are many—not only the competitive forces that we are getting from the French and the Japanese, but pressures from the underdeveloped nations which are urging us to move rapidly toward a new generation of large communication satellite platforms or satellite antennae farms which can be put in the geostationary orbit. Such satellites would be very heavy, but would substantially reduce the number of geostationary slots required for projected communications traffic. I am sure that most of you who have followed the international aspects of this know that we are being condemned by many nations for preempting all the present geostationary orbital slots with our existing generation of communication satellites.

So we are now being forced to move rapidly—and NASA is well aware of this, as are other agencies of the Government—into a new generation of much more massive, but more efficient communication satellites, which will require the heavier boosting capacity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BROWN of California was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. BROWN of California. The point that I am making here and trying to illustrate is that we have quite recently come to recognize the need for a set of more clearly defined missions. We are moving toward that. It is reflected in the flip-flops that are taking place within the administration as to which way they want to go on the IUS or the Centaur.

Now, the fact of the matter is, we can probably use beneficially the IUS for a short period of time to meet existing and planned missions. Beyond that, we will need a heavier boost capability which the Centaur can provide for another reasonably limited period of time, and beyond that we are still going to need the high energy upper stage, and we had better start preparing for it. It is going to be expensive, as the chairman has said.

But what I would like to get across to the Members here is the realization, the exciting realization, that we really are on the verge of a space age which is going to require a great deal more activity and more sophisticated activity in space than we even dream of now. We should not think of this great space program as something static, as a program where the present generation of anything is going to suffice. Progress in space is going to take more than we have in the way of booster capacity, and that "more" will be the high-energy upper stage, and probably several future generations of that.

I hope that what we are seeing reflected in this debate today is a new indication of an awareness of the importance of better planning and better mission definition in the space program. It is because of my own sense that such is the case—and the new position taken by NASA and the Air Force reflects that—that I reluctantly am going to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama and urge that the Appropriations Committee be supported in their recommendation that we continue with the Centaur, for all of its obvious virtues.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MINETA. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, since there is a question about OMB's position, I have just had the opportunity to speak to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, Mr. Stockman, who wanted to make it clear that OMB favors the cancellation of Centaur and going ahead with IUS, and that they are still standing behind their letter and that they have not taken a position of neutrality on this issue.

Mr. MINETA. I appreciate the gentleman's bringing that to us.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by our colleague, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO), that continues funding the inertial upper stage (IUS) for use in the Galileo and International Solar Polar Missions and that deletes funding for Centaur.

There are four major reasons why this amendment should be adopted. First, replacing the $715 million IUS with the Centaur would lessen the return on the investment that has already been made in the IUS.

Second, the Centaur is nonexistent at this point and would undoubtedly delay the proposed mission, the Galileo, in 1985.

Third, the Centaur has several significant problems in physical compatibility with the existing spacecraft and Shuttle, and it also has operational problems that have been documented by NASA.

But the most important drawback of the Centaur is the notion of legislating a technical decision, as well as violating the competitive bidding procedure by dictating a sole source contract for the Centaur. Mandating the outcome of the competitive bidding procedure really is an unacceptable method for determining the technical merits of a product.

I would like to ask my colleagues to consider these arguments carefully and to prevent a legislative fiat that wastes funds, overturns sound management and technical decisions, and produces questionable results.

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the House Space Science and Applications Subcommittee, I must take strong exception to the amendment offered by my chairman, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. FLIPPO). However, before I continue, I would like to thank the gentleman from Alabama for his fine efforts as chairman of the Space Science Subcommittee. The gentleman has done an excellent job.

It has been suggested here today, and I would like to summarize a few points, it has been suggested today that there are some parochial constituent interests, and there are. I do not think that comes as any shock or any surprise to anyone, be it a Boeing in Seattle, Wash., or a General Dynamics in San Diego, Calif., or a Marshall Space Center in Huntsville, Ala.; put the parochial interests aside, because the debate has been on the merits of this issue, I would like to assure my colleagues that my opposition to this amendment is founded on sound principles of fiscal responsibility and what I consider after a year and a half of intense study on the Space Subcommittee to be in the best interests of our civilian space program, our telecommunications industry, and our national security.

To begin, let me offer a bit of pertinent upper-stage history. Last year the Space Science Subcommittee, as you have heard, directed NASA and the Defense Department to conduct a joint study to determine our needs for a high energy upper stage. This is that study, Upper Stage Alternatives for the Shuttle Era, A NASA-DOD report to Congress. We have had it for over a year.

The study concluded that NASA should begin developing a Centaur for Space Shuttle use. Since the report's completion, nothing significantly has changed to warrant deleting Centaur from NASA's budget. In fact, on page 81 of this report that we commissioned, it specifically rejects the end effect of the Flippo amendment; namely, an IUS/Galileo combined mission.

Fortunately, the President accepted the urgent supplemental last July 18 and sustained the funding for the Centaur high energy upper stage integration into the Shuttle. The President's acceptance is consistent with NASA's 1982 authorization and appropriation bills and recognizes the technical superiority of Centaur as well as the fact that Centaur integration obviates the need for an otherwise redundant $1 to $1½ billion for an Air Force high energy stage program for military and intelligence uses which we will have need for in the 1987 timeframe.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to briefly outline four compelling reasons why the House should support the NASA/Air Force recommendations and reject the Flippo amendment.

First, IUS cannot meet our high energy upper stage requirements for NASA, DOD, and commercial missions beyond the 1985-86 timeframe. Our high priority space missions are increasingly finding weight to be a limiting factor. The IUS can currently lift only 5,000 pounds, compared to the 10,000 to 14,000 pounds provided by Centaur.

Second, the failure to move decisively now to develop a high energy upper stage for Shuttle will result in an increasing loss of business to foreign competition, specifically the French Ariane. The Ariane vehicle will lift approximately 9,500 pounds to geosynchronous orbit by 1986-87, thus exceeding IUS capabilities. Without Centaur, the United States will lose this commercial market.

Third, development of a "new" high energy upper stage, coupled with the decision to fly Galileo and the international Solar Polar mission with an IUS will cost taxpayers at least $700 million to $800 million more than Centaur, take at least 2 years longer to complete, and yield no significant performance improvement. Indeed, it has been estimated that a brandnew stage, as I say, will cost between $1 and $1½ billion and will basically involve reinventing the Centaur.

Fourth and finally, launching Galileo and Solar Polar on Centaur has a number of critical advantages over using IUS for these missions. Centaur would provide a flight time of 26 months for NASA's Galileo mission and would guarantee 11 satellite encounters, compared to a flight time of more than double, 54 months, and 6 satellite encounters for an IUS launch, plus the increased risk of the increased time.

In the case of Solar Polar, Centaur restores the maximum possible mission, as well as NASA's credibility with its foreign partners, most notably the European Space Agency. It is very likely that another change in launch vehicles will cause our international friends to question our resolve and ultimately conclude that NASA is an unreliable partner. Such an attitude may devastate our future plans for cooperative space ventures of the solar system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

(At the request of Ms. OAKAR, and by unanimous consent, Mr. LOWERY of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. LOWERY of California. In sum, Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleagues to consider the following:

First, the findings and conclusions of the NASA/DOD joint study.

Second, the cost and performance comparisons of IUS and Centaur.

Third, the clear threat from foreign competition to our space program.

Fourth, the unacceptably high costs of developing a new high energy upper stage.

Finally, the integrity of the Galileo mission to Jupiter and the International Solar Polar Mission.

In light of these important considerations, I urge my colleagues to oppose the Flippo amendment and continue Centaur integration into the Space Shuttle.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWERY of California. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the gentleman on a very precise and concise statement that really truly outlines the rational reasons why we should be supporting Centaur.

Also, I want to add, if I may, there has been a lot of debate about whether Mr. Stockman agrees with the project or disagrees. I am not sure that I know the answer. I am not sure anyone does.

We do know for a fact that the President signed into law the supplemental appropriation bill in July that included $80 million for Centaur and that $40 million of that $80 million has already been spent for the Centaur project.

Mr. LOWERY of California. I thank the gentlewoman. She is absolutely correct.

Developing Centaur today will save the taxpayers money. The need is clearly there. For the first time we have the Air Force telling us that they have a need for more than 5,000 pounds of lift capability to geosynchronous orbit in the 1987 timeframe. Now, Centaur can lift 10,000 to 14,000 pounds to geosynchronous orbit, and for the first time we are seeing the Air Force come to the table with money for a high energy upper stage. They have wanted Centaur developed. Now they are finally bringing money to the table so that we can meet those very critical intelligence missions that the chairman of the Intelligence Committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) outlined earlier.

If I might make just one final point. We have heard a lot about the configuration. Centaur is proven. Forty consecutive successful missions, only 2 failures out of 66 launches; a 97-percent success ratio, the changes are in the fuel tank configuration to meet the specifications for the Shuttle bay. There is no change in the engines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. LOWERY of California was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. LOWERY of California. There is no change in the Centaur engine. There is no change in the electronics. There is no change in the guidance system, no change in the avionics; merely a change in the physical configuration of the fuel tank.

It is a proven bird. It has served this Nation well. Let Centaur continue to serve the Nation and her taxpayers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. BADHAM, and by unanimous consent, Mr. LOWERY of California was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWERY of California. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have been concerned about the debate here and about the very programs that we have under consideration.

I understand that the IUS is now already 2½ years behind schedule and is 500 percent in an overrun situation; whereas on the other hand, the Centaur has extremely high credibility, has a 40-for-40 success rate, or 100 percent, and it underran in contract costs and it is an available vehicle and it has very high credibility. Does the gentleman concur with that?

Mr. LOWERY of California. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BADHAM. I think, therefore, that it would be very simple to make the decision on which way we should vote on this with the program that has high credibility, proven efficiency, and has a higher thrust of almost three times the thrust that the IUS is projected to have.

I thank the gentleman for yielding. I support him in opposition to the amendment.

For those of us who have followed the "upper stage for Space Shuttle" debate over the past several years, there is a growing sense of frustration over the inaccuracies of official schedule and cost estimates.

Let us consider the credibility of the IUS program. The IUS is over 2½ years behind schedule and has experienced a 500-percent overrun. The fact is that the IUS is a national disgrace. But . . . there are still those who would change from the Centaur back to the IUS for two expensive science missions.

What kind of credibility does the Centaur program have? How about 40 consecutive launches at a success rate of 100 percent? What about cost? The last program evolution that the Centaur went through was its integration into the Titan vehicle. The Centaur underran the contract price by 5.7 percent. The Centaur has credibility.

When you add on top of these competitive histories the technical superiority of the Centaur which can lift 14,000 pounds into space versus 5,000 pounds for the IUS, my vote on this issue becomes simple.

I will vote for a 5.7-percent underrun and against a 500-percent overrun.

I will vote for a proven 100-percent success rate and against a vehicle that has never flown.

I will also vote for a program that remains on schedule and against a program that is over 2½ years late.

In short, I will vote for the Centaur which is credible and against the IUS that can only be described as incredible.

Mr. DREIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, on the simple question of performance, Centaur is unquestionably the best choice for NASA's near term Galileo and International Solar Polar Missions. If the Shuttle-Centaur integration is allowed to continue, Centaur promises, first, greater payload capability; greater operational flexibility; a proven flight record; and, therefore, less mission risk.

NASA realized this when it chose Centaur as the sole Shuttle upper stage in January 1981. In October 1981, the joint NASA-DOD report on upper stage alternatives for the Space Shuttle also recognized Centaur as the only satisfactory upper stage for these two missions.

More important, if Centaur is scrapped, it will cost the taxpayer between $1 and $1.5 billion for the development—not the integration, procurement, or deployment, but only the development—of a new high energy upper stage, and once made operational that new stage will not outperform Centaur. It seems foolish to lose a proven and dependable program now that will be necessary in the future.

It seems even more foolish to replace that proven program with one that will cost over $1½ billion.

Last, let me add that switching upper stage systems now would deal an unfortunate blow to our space program and our commercial opportunities in space. What the space program needs is consistent policy support, not inconsistent reversals, and I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in pressing for the continued integration of Centaur into the Space Shuttle program, and I urge my colleagues also to strongly oppose this amendment.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the HUD-Independent Agencies appropriation bill for fiscal year 1983 as it was reported from committee with respect to funding for the Centaur high-energy upper-stage vehicle.

There is considerable controversy over this project; however, the facts remain clear and speak for themselves.

To begin, the Centaur is the sole source upheld by GAO in August 1981. It is the only available upper-stage that can meet both NASA and military requirements over the next 10 or 15 years.

In addition, development of the Centaur was approved in the urgent supplemental appropriations bill and work is now underway to integrate the vehicle in the Shuttle payload bay. On September 14, the Department of Defense and NASA reached agreement on a joint development program for the Centaur which will have significant benefits to both NASA and the Department of Defense. For NASA, it means that the cost of Centaur will be reduced. For DOD, it means acquiring an upper stage that will insure that this Nation's most sensitive military payloads can be flown without any weight limitations.

Although opponents of this project have claimed that NASA, the Air Force, and the Office of Management and Budget oppose Centaur development, Centaur was the sole source procurement approved by NASA in early 1981. In fact, in October 1981, NASA and the Air Force released their "Upper Stage Alternatives for the Shuttle Era"—a report specifically recommending that NASA develop the Centaur. While OMB originally resisted Centaur funding, primarily due to near-term budget constraints, they no longer oppose its development—particularly since the urgent supplemental allocated $80 million for Centaur and we have already invested $37.5 million to date.

I believe our country is better off by staying with the Centaur project. I intend to continue my support for this vehicle for technical, economical, and national security reasons.

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of Mr. FLIPPO and I would like to point out some commercial concerns that should affect this debate.

The trend of commercial communications satellites is for continued growth in mass as more communications capability continues to be developed, is offered to the user community and, in fact, is expected by the consumer. This trend holds true for projected increased traffic in voice, data, secure data, video, image transfer, teleconferencing, and television direct to home broadcast services.

The satellite growth trend is further encouraged as the desirable positions in the geosynchronous orbital arc become filled and approach saturation. Current proposals before the ITC and the FCC to reduce the spacing between satellites help alleviate this problem but do not provide a permanent solution. The need for larger spacecraft with large multifed antenna systems, higher power, and advanced switching and time sharing techniques continues to be recognized by advanced communications systems planners.

These growth trends require a launch capability greater than that offered any existing Shuttle upper stages other than the Centaur. The Centaur's capability to provide low-thrust placement in the geosynchronous orbit also becomes desirable as the growth spacecraft appendages become larger and more flexible.

As a practical matter, the commercial communications community shows little interest in the IUS because of its prohibitive cost, growth limitations, and lack of versatility.

The alternative launch capability would be a growth Ariane launch vehicle produced by a European consortium and launched from Kourou, French Guiana. The Ariane vehicle is projected to exceed the Shuttle IUS capability by 1986. An unrecognized need by the United States to satisfy the growth commercial communication community has already resulted in several American companies contracting with Ariane for launch services and a need to reverse this trend is clearly evident.

Several American companies and an international consortium have expressed direct interest in being assured that the Centaur will continue to be developed for integration in the Shuttle.

NASA Associate Administrator Edelsen, in his previous position as senior vice president of Comsat General Corp., expressed his interest in a letter to Dr. Hans Mark, NASA Deputy Administrator, and in fact included remarks on the Shuttle/Centaur in a presentation before the House Committee on Space Science and Applications on September 5, 1979.

The president of Direct Broadcast Satellites Corp., one of the accepted applicants before the FCC for providing direct-to-home satellite television expressed his support for Centaur in a letter to our colleague, RONNIE FLIPPO.

In a letter to Dr. Hans Mark, Deputy Administrator for NASA, Mr. K. M. Chitre of the Intelsat Corp. disclosed some of Intelsat's long-range plans and reiterated his continuing interest in the Shuttle/Centaur integration program.

These desires are strengthened by the history of reliability the Centaur has experienced and the positive return on investment that the using companies experienced.

A new, different, high energy upper stage with its usual accompanying schedule delays and cost growth is not the answer for a commercial user who sees his future requirements satisfied by the existing Shuttle/Centaur.

I, therefore, support the position of the committee, Mr. BOLAND, and oppose the Flippo amendment.●

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIRECT LOAN REVOLVING FUND

During 1983, within the resources available, gross obligations for direct loans are authorized only for specially adapted housing loans and obligations for such loans shall not exceed $1,000,000 (38 U.S.C. chapter 37).

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DASCHLE

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DASCHLE: Page 32, after line 7, insert the following:

SMALL BUSINESS LOAN REVOLVING FUND

To carry out the purposes of the "Veterans' Administration Small Business Loan Revolving Fund", as authorized by law (Public Law 97-72, title III), $25,000,000.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering to H.R. 6956, the HUD/independent agencies appropriations bill will provide $25 million for the revolving business loan program in the Veterans' Administration authorized in Public Law 97-72, but not yet funded. The purpose of this amendment is to provide a modest, direct, and guaranteed loan program for disabled and Vietnam veterans seeking to start a business. This amendment will fulfill a pledge made by Congress last year to initiate a business loan program in the VA where funding will be available strictly for veterans.

Oversight hearings in the 96th and beginning of the 97th Congress confirmed that the Small Business Administration was not following through with a congressional mandate established in Public Law 93-237, which stated that veterans were to receive special consideration from the SBA when applying for loans or technical assistance relative to starting or owning a business. Repeatedly, SBA assured the Subcommittee on Special Investigations that special consideration would be provided and repeatedly it was not.

Thus, the able chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, SONNY MONTGOMERY, last year introduced legislation to authorize a 5-year $25 million revolving business loan program within the Veterans' Administration. The program is limited to Vietnam veterans and veterans disabled 30 percent or more. This modest effort was overwhelmingly endorsed last year by the House of Representatives and Senate and signed into law by the President.

Since passage of this legislation last year, the unemployment rate of veterans of the Vietnam era has increased by over 40 percent to approximately 700,000. Clearly, there is a need for this program and clearly the Veterans' Administration is the best place to provide loans to veterans.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation is needed to reaffirm the commitments made last year. I have been besieged with calls about this program as I am sure many of my colleagues have. Unfortunately, I have had to relay the fact that even though the President had signed this legislation into law, there was no money available. Many cannot understand this apparent contradiction and feel that once again their Government has let them down. This amendment will not by itself improve the situation for most of the 700,000 unemployed Vietnam-era veterans in our country, but it will offer an opportunity for a few to participate in the American dream and start their own business.

Mr. Chairman, I am inserting letters of support from the Veterans of Foreign Wars, American Legion, and Disabled American Veterans:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., August 16, 1982.

To: All Members of the U.S. House of Representatives.

From: Arthur J. Fellwock, national commander-in-chief, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.

Subject: Appropriation for the veterans small business revolving loan fund.

It is our understanding that Mr. Daschle and other members intend to offer an amendment to H.R. 6956, the Department of Housing and Urban Development and Independent Agencies Appropriations for FY 1983, to provide a one-time appropriation of $25 million for the veterans small business loan program authorized by Public Law 97-72.

Funds appropriated for this program, as provided in Public Law 97-72, are to assist Vietnam-era and certain service-connected disabled veterans, who continue to suffer a significantly higher unemployment and underemployment rate than their non-veteran peers.

It should be noted that Small Business Administration programs in this area have not produced meaningful results and that the VA successfully administered a similar program for many years.

We therefore request, on behalf of the 1.9 million men and women of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and all veterans, that you support and vote for the passage of Mr. Daschle's amendment.

Sincerely,

ARTHUR J. FELLWOCK,
National Commander-in-Chief.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS,
Washington, D.C., August 16, 1982.

Hon. THOMAS A. DASCHLE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DASCHLE: This letter is in reference to the upcoming floor action on H.R. 6956—making appropriations for HUD and various independent agencies including the Veterans Administration.

At the outset, let me state that the Disabled American Veterans strongly favors the adoption of your proposed amendment to H.R. 6956 that would provide full funding ($25 million) for the VA Small Business Loan Program for Vietnam Era and certain more seriously impaired service-connected disabled veterans.

As you know, last year the Congress enacted Public Law 97-72 which, among other things, established a Small Business Loan Program for veterans of the Vietnam Era, as well as extending its provisions to service-connected veterans evaluated by the Veterans Administration as 30 percent or more disabled. The new program was essentially created in response to the Small Business Administration's failure to comply with a 1974 mandate (P.L. 93-237) requiring that agency to give "special consideration to veterans of the Armed Forces of the United States and their dependents and survivors."

Today, nearly eight years later—and, it would seem, in response to your efforts to adequately fund the VA program—the Small business Administration has finally embarked on a program to enforce the provisions of Public Law 93-237. Frankly, we are unconvinced of the Small Business Administration's commitment to make the 1974 law a successful program for America's veterans and their dependents.

In our view, when combined with SBA's "foot-dragging" on the original 1974 program, failure to fully fund the VA's Small Business Loan Program under Public Law 97-72 serves only to foster the belief that the Administration and the Congress remains unsympathetic to the needs of Vietnam Era and disabled veterans.

Accordingly, we favor the adoption of your amendment to add some $25 million to H.R. 6956 to fully fund the Small Business Loan Program under Public Law 97-72. On behalf of the more than 700,000 members of the Disabled American Veterans, I wish to thank you for your sincere efforts on behalf of America's veterans.

Cordially,

EDWARD G. GALIAN,
National Commander.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Washington, D.C., August 16, 1982.

Hon. THOMAS DASCHLE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE DASCHLE: With the understanding that the HUD-Independent Agencies Appropriations bill, H.R. 6956, is due for House floor consideration very soon the American Legion takes this opportunity to lend its full support for your VA small business loan amendment. The addition of $25 million to H.R. 6956 is entirely appropriate recognizing that the VA small business loan program established last year has never been funded.

Moreover, as enacted in P.L. 97-72, this modest program was authorized for a period of five years ending on September 30, 1987. Already, nearly 25 percent of the new program's life has expired without a single business loan having been made.

It is our belief that Congress intended this program to be funded at the time it was authorized despite and perhaps even because of the economic hard times that are gripping the nation. Apart from the inherent promise small business investment holds for economic recovery and the creation of new jobs, Congress has long recognized the failure of the Small Business Administration in honoring its obligation to provide veterans with special consideration in their small business loan applications.

In the Legion's judgment Congress was wise to create a small business loan program within VA last year and would be equally wise to fund the program as soon as possible. We applaud your efforts on behalf of veterans, Mr. Daschle, and we look forward to assisting you in this matter to the greatest possible extent.

Sincerely,

E. PHILIP RIGGIN,
Director, National Legislative Commission.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. TOM DASCHLE, on this particular amendment. I must say that I have some problems with accepting the amendment for a small business loan program to be administered by the Veterans' Administration for a number of reasons.

First of all, the Small Business Administration is the better place in which to lodge this particular program—for the administration of the program itself. The Small Business Administration has some 120 field offices throughout the United States, many more than the VA has.

The SBA is now set up to administer small business loans.

I would agree with the gentleman that in past years insufficient attention has been paid to Vietnam veterans by the Small Business Administration. This resulted, of course, in the authorization of $25 million for small business loans targeted specifically to Vietnam veterans. That passed this House overwhelmingly under suspension, as I remember.

I would prefer, and I think the program itself would be better administered by the SBA. Let me repeat again, because of the expertise it has in this area.

If this program were lodged with the Veterans' Administration it would necessitate additional personnel. It would also necessitate developing some expertise in the VA to administer the program.

I think we have a solution to what the gentleman hopes to attain. But it requires a little bit of finessing by this subcommittee and by the Appropriations Committee with respect to the 302 allocation of funds that are given to the 13 subcommittees.

This would be a program that would be better lodged under the jurisdiction of the Commerce, Justice, State, and Judiciary Subcommittee. The problem there is that the subcommittee does not have enough 302 ceiling remaining to include this program within its allocation.

I have talked with the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. SMITH, chairman of that subcommittee, and I have indicated to him that I would be willing to transfer some of the 302 allocation from the HUD-Independent Agencies Subcommittee to the Commerce, Justice, State, and Judiciary Subcommittee and that would satisfy him.

I do not want to misdirect the gentleman because the Commerce-Justice bill may not get by in this session. It might very well have to be wrapped up into a continuing resolution.

I think we can meet that problem, though, and we might include it in a continuing resolution.

Another area in which we can pursue this is in conference. Hopefully, if the other body puts the $25 million in the Commerce-Justice bill we can get the House to agree.

That about covers the question. The nub of the issue again is that this program would be better lodged with the SBA.

If the gentleman is willing to withdraw his amendment then I will make every effort to see that this program is funded under the Commerce, Justice, State, and Judiciary bill with the agreement, of course, of the chairman of that subcommittee accepting the allocation that we are willing to transfer to his subcommittee. I will also make every effort to be sure that this program is taken care of in the continuing resolution or in the conference agreement with the other body on the Commerce, Justice, State, and Judiciary appropriation bill.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. DASCHLE. Could I ask if the gentleman has obtained the support of the chairman of the Small Business Subcommittee on this proposal and also the chairman of the Appropriations Committee? Have they indicated a willingness to go along with this plan?

Mr. BOLAND. I must indicate that I have not conversed with the chairman of the Small Business Committee on this matter. The only area on which I thought there was real concern was the $25 million appropriation for it, and it occurred to me that the chairman of that subcommittee dealing with funding for the SBA would be the person to communicate with.

I have done that and he has indicated his willingness to accept an allocation from our subcommittee to his subcommittee in order to take care of that $25 million.

I do not know what the position of the Veterans' Committee is. I assume that it would be agreeable, though I am not sure.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the Chairman. I sincerely hope that we can get unanimous support by all committees involved. The Chairman has given me sufficient confidence that we will find this worthy program and with those assurances I would be willing to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) has expired.

(At the request of Mr. DASCHLE and by unanimous consent Mr. BOLAND was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. DASCHLE. I would also hope that the Veterans' Affairs Committee might have oversight hearings sometimes next year in order to insure that this earmarked funding is indeed utilized for this purpose.

With that assurance I would withdraw the amendment.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentleman from South Dakota for offering his amendment at this time. I think it is up to the gentleman from South Dakota to decide whether or not he wishes to withdraw.

I simply want to stand as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Education, Training, and Employment, and one of the authors of this particular provision, along with the gentleman from South Dakota. It seems to me that the Small Business Adminstration has had a disastrous record even though on several occasions they have been directed to target some of their limited resources to aid those who are Vietnam era veterans in establishing a loan program for them and helping them to get into the mainstream of our society.

It was the intention of our committee that because the Small Business Administration had done such a poor job that perhaps there were persons over within the administration of the VA who could in fact, with their increased sensitivity to Vietnam era veterans' needs, focus attention on the $25 million loan program and commit those funds in a targeted way to those many Vietnam veterans who are looking for reasonable rates for loans to establish new, entrepreneurial small businesses.

So I commend the gentleman from South Dakota and would urge that whether or not the VA cares for it, or the Small Business Administration cares for it, that we not find ourselves back here a year from now finding that while moneys were allocated, nothing again has been done.

The Vietnam-era veteran has waited too long for these limited resources.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota which would provide funds for the veterans' small business loan program as authorized by Public Law 97-72.

During the 97th Congress, the House Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee on Education, Training, and Employment has conducted seven hearings on the employment and economic needs of Vietnam-era and disabled veterans.

The result of this study has clearly indicated that a significant segment of the Vietnam veteran population has not been able to fully take advantage of economic opportunities within the Nation's business and working place.

The Congress clearly expressed its intent through the passage of Public Law 97-72 with the authorization of a small business loan program within the Veterans' Administration to extend targeted assistance to this group.

The overwhelming passage of that provision within the House and Senate was based on three major points:

First, the Small Business Administration was unwilling and, in fact, incapable of providing special consideration for veterans' small business loans as required by law.

Second, the primary agency within the Federal Government for the implementation of all veterans programs and services is the Veterans' Administration.

Third, a modest small business loan program within the Veterans' Administration designed for Vietnam-era and disabled veterans would only restore for this target group the same type of assistance that was extended to World War II and Korean war veterans.

Mr. Chairman, recently the administration admitted its mistake, on pressure from our subcommittee and many other Members of Congress, and revised its restrictive regulations governing the extension of job training benefits also included in Public Law 97-72. Legislation currently pending in the Congress will fully extend that benefit again to undertrained and underemployed Vietnam-era veterans as originally intended by the Congress.

I believe it is unfortunate that we have to re-do most of what was fought long and hard for last year in order to see provisions of law fully implemented. However, in the absence of any movement to fund the small business loan program from other quarters, I believe we have no choice but to support the amendment before us today.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the gentleman from South Dakota for offering this amendment. As chairman of the Vietnam Veterans in Congress he is in a unique position to understand and to fight for the rights of all those who served with him in the Armed Forces during the Vietnam era. I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

Mr. BOLAND. In response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I am not sure that the Small Business Administration has not paid much attention to the applications of the Vietnam veterans. I have a note before me indicating that SBA put out $24 million to Vietnam veterans.

Both of you are in a much better position than I to justify that or indicate whether that is so.

Mr. EDGAR. If the gentleman will yield further, they have done some but in terms of their total allocation it has not been the commitment over the years. The additional $25 million we were hoping would be on top of what the Small Business Administration had done. But they do not have a record of being in advocacy.

Mr. BOLAND. Let me give my assurance to the gentleman from South Dakota and the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I will do everything that I possibly can to be sure that a program targeted directly at Vietnam veterans is set up and that the moneys will be administered by the Small Business Administration.

I am sure that we can get a look at that, as the gentleman has indicated, at the end of the year or sometime during the coming year. If the SBA is not carrying out the direction of the Congress then, we can take another look at it.

Mr. ECKART. Mr. Chairman, Vietnam veterans of this country face difficult unemployment problems throughout the country.

At the same time, Mr. Chairman, we have reduced veterans benefits by a piecemeal process. This year has already seen elimination of correspondence courses for education, the placement of new fees on veterans applying for a VA guaranteed home loan, and the reduction of the age of majority for children to 18, for purposes of obtaining veterans benefits.

Veterans from the Vietnam era should now be approaching the most productive years of their lives. Congress, realizing the conditions of unemployment and reduced business vitality, last year passed, and the President signed, a $25 million revolving fund loan program for the use of Vietnam veterans and disabled veterans. The funds were to assist them to acquire, expand, or start their own businesses, through loan guarantees or direct loans.

The Congress, in a move I wholeheartedly agree with, decided to put a sunset provision in the program, bringing it to an end in 5 years.

The program has not, to this date, been funded, so it has not begun. Nearly a year out of the 5 has gone by, and the Veterans' Administration has not even begun to draw up regulations for the program.

For our disabled veterans, and veterans who served in Vietnam, the Nation's rewards to them have been few. This small measure would lead to financial independence, and greater strength in our national economy for veterans.

Mr. Chairman, we need to reverse the lack of action from the executive branch. The Congress has spoken that the program is needed. The failure of the Veterans' Administration to fund this program is a "head in the sand" approach to our current economic condition. Mr. Chairman, we should stop the foot dragging of the bureaucrats who have effectively vetoed this program without our consent and pass the Daschle amendment.

□ 1730

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, if there are no other comments, I ask unanimous consent at this time to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, to follow up on the colloquy on the amendment that has just been withdrawn by the gentleman from South Dakota, I want to assure him that if I do have the privilege next year of chairing the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations, I will certainly try to assure that Vietnam veterans receive their fair share of loans from SBA for small business purposes.

The gentleman from South Dakota as well as the gentleman from Pennsylvania are exactly right. The Small Business Administration has not done a very good job in making loans to Vietnam veterans. Its batting average with the Vietnam veteran is very low. SBA has done a very poor job. I hope what we have said here today to the SBA will have a positive effect and the agency will do more for Vietnam veterans.

Mr. Chairman, I had planned to support the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota (Mr. DASCHLE), a very able member of the Committee on Veteran's Affairs.

Mr. DASCHLE is a Vietnam veteran; and since being elected to the Congress, he has been a leader in this body in working to enhance the lives of Vietnam veterans. Mr. DASCHLE is known as an activist when it comes to Vietnam veterans, and I am sure the amendment he had planned to offer would have received the strong support of our colleagues. I think the efforts of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee to have funds available for small business loans to be made through the Small Business Administration is a step in the right direction and will have a positive impact on the ability of Vietnam veterans who seek help in the future.

Mr. Chairman, let me also take this time, since this is the section of the bill on funding for veterans and for their families to commend the very able chairman of the subcommittee, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND), and the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN), for the tremendous work they have done for our Nation's veterans in bringing this bill to the floor.

These are tough times, and most programs are having to absorb large reductions. Our Committee on Veterans' Affairs recently reached agreement with the other body on several cost-saving provisions affecting veterans' programs. However, the reductions we have made will not result in a substantial adverse impact on benefits and services for veterans. What is good about this appropriation bill, Mr. Chairman, is the appropriation for fiscal year 1983 for the veterans' hospital and health care program.

Early this year there seemed to be a strong feeling in the Congress that all discretionary programs should be frozen at the fiscal year 1982 level and that the freeze should continue for 3 years. This would have been disastrous for the Veterans' Administration, and I am delighted that the Appropriations Committee has seen fit to appropriate the funds that were suggested by the Veterans' Affairs Committees and authorized in the first concurrent budget resolution.

The appropriation for medical care for the coming year, although not overly generous, is adequate. In addition, the appropriation for medical and prosthetic research will support an average employment of 4,454. This funding level confirms the strong feelings of the Congress that the VA research programs are vital in providing quality medical care.

I am pleased that the account for medical administration and miscellaneous operating expenses contains $300,000 for 13 staff years to administer the "Roberts" nurse scholarship program. This program is going to be a great help in solving the critical shortage of nurses that exists in the private as well as the public sector. The $12 million that will be used to fund the Roberts scholarship program for VA nurses in fiscal year 1982 and 1983 will mean that the program will be implemented at the pace expected by the authorizing committees.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, it should be noted that the construction program approved by the Appropriations Committee closely tracks the recommendation of the administration and the Veterans' Affairs Committee. I am most pleased to note that the funds for the new replacement medical center in Minneapolis are contained in this bill, as well as $3 million for the design and site preparation for a new outpatient clinic in Los Angeles. The administrator should proceed with the design and site preparation for this project since the current leasing arrangement will terminate in a few years. The leasing agreement will not be extended.

Mr. Chairman, this is a good appropriation bill as it relates to veterans' programs, and I want to again commend Mr. BOLAND and Mr. GREEN, the distinguished chairman and ranking minority member of the subcommittee, and the very able chairman and ranking minority member of the full committee, Mr. WHITTEN and Mr. CONTE, as well as all the Members of the Appropriations Committee, for the work they have done for the veterans of our Nation. I can assure my colleagues that the funding levels contained in the bill for VA programs are adequate, and I am sure that veterans throughout the country will be very pleased with what the committee has done in their behalf.

I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) and members of his excellent staff for a job well done. This bill will be a tremendous help to our Veterans.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOLAND. I thank the gentleman very much for his remarks, and I know that the gentleman from New York feels the same way about the leadership that the gentleman from Mississippi has given to the Veterans' Affairs Committee. We want to commend the gentleman and his staff for the work they have done in this area.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GREEN Mr. Chairman, I would like to join in the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts and express my appreciation for the kind remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY) and also for the privilege of being able to work with him on these very important matters relating to veterans.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I thank both the chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member. You never get enough money for any program, but we have certainly been treated fairly by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which handles the veterans' programs.

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman from South Dakota efforts, however. On the one hand it would have merely provided modest funds for a provision of law that this body legislated just last year. But on the other hand, I fear that we may well have made a mistake by the passage of that legislation and perhaps we ought to wait a while to see if we really ought to fund it and if it was and is really needed. In this connection, let the record show that last year I supported this effort.

Mr. Chairman, we are talking about $25 million to provide small business loans or guarantees to a very few Vietnam veterans and a very few disabled veterans. In 1983, if this amendment passes, the total number of such loans would probably not exceed 250 or 300. It occurs to me that we might lead a much larger number of veterans to great expectations that have no real chance of materializing. In addition, the Small Business Administration is the proper agency for this type of endeavor. They have not done a very good job in the past, but it is my understanding they are trying to improve in the field of priority for veterans and I think they need and deserve another chance.

Mr. Chairman, the administration opposes this amendment and I must agree that in these times of great fiscal restraint that it is concerned with a new veterans program that should not command our priority attention and so I believe the gentleman of South Dakota is wise in withdrawing his amendment.●

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of title II.

The Clerk proceeded to read title III.

Mr. BOLAND (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title III be considered as read and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any points of order against title III?

Are there any amendments to title III?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded to read title IV.

Mr. BOLAND (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title IV be considered as read and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Are there any points of order against title IV?

Are there any amendments to title IV?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WYDEN

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WYDEN: Page 42, immediately after line 18, insert the following new section:

SEC. 416. No funds appropriated by this Act may be obligated or expended to issue, promulgate, implement, administer, or enforce any standard or rule under sections 108 and 109 of the Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. 7408 and 7409, which changes the national ambient air quality standards for carbon monoxide to permit multiple days of allowable exceedances on an annual basis as described in 47 Federal Register 26407.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, today I am offering an amendment to H.R. 6956 to prevent what charitably could be called vodoo environmental protection.

Just 1 year ago, EPA Administrator Anne Gorsuch released 11 principles President Reagan adopted for rewriting the Clean Air Act, including 1 supporting existing health-based ambient standards.

Many of us were very pleased at the President's support for current health stadards, the cornerstone of the Clean Air Act.

Recent administrative rulemaking activities, however, suggests our sense of relief may have been premature.

The EPA is in the final approval stages of a proposal to weaken the national health standards for carbon monoxide pollution by an average of 33 percent nationwide.

The health implications of this proposed relaxation are very serious.

Carbon monoxide (CO) is a colorless, ordorless but poisonous gas that interferes with the transportation of oxygen from the lungs to the rest of the body.

For persons with cardiovascular disease and arteriosclerosis, increased levels of CO means aggravation of their disease.

For pregnant mothers it means possible physical and mental retardation of their unborn child.

All told, the health of some 7.7 million pregnant mothers, children, elderly, and persons with chronic respiratory and heart disease would be threatened by relaxation of CO standards.

Here is how the EPA's proposed relaxation would work. Under current regulations, an area is allowed to exceed the existing daily average CO standard of 9 parts per million only one time per year.

Under the proposed change, this standard could be exceeded five times per year.

On the surface, this relaxation may not sound too significant.

The facts shows it is—that is why the American Heart Association, the American Lung Association and the American Public Health Association oppose it and support my amendment.

EPA cites the desire to help the States as one of their key reasons for advocating this relaxation; yet, over 15 of 25 States and localities that officially commented on the proposal oppose it.

At a Health and Environment Subcommittee hearing I chaired in Oregon on August 27, distinguished elected officials, State and local public health officials, public health groups and health scientists all testified against the proposed relaxation.

So why does EPA want this change? One reason may be because it makes attainment of national CO standards easier on paper.

If the proposed change is accepted, for example, the projected number of areas still in violation of the CO health standard by 1987 would drop overnight from 60 to 15.

In short, the proposed change is an administrative sleight of hand.

The problem in all this is that pretending we have attained health standards for CO would not make it so. Shuffling figures around on paper would not make the air any cleaner for the 60 million Americans that still breathe air worse than the national health standards—and it would not make the adverse health effects they suffer any less.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I find EPA's proposal astonishing—particularly in light of the data it has before it.

To come up with this proposal, EPA had to blatantly ignore an EPA-funded 1981 study on the health effects of CO which clearly shows that 61 percent of persons with heart disease—or 4.7 million people—could be adversely affected by this change.

Even EPA has not questioned the accuracy of this study, although it chooses to reject its results.

EPA also had to ignore its own 1980 review of the CO standard which concluded that the existing 9 parts per million standard should be maintained.

Mr. Chairman, the facts show there is no justification for relaxing the CO standard.

By prohibiting the EPA from using any funds appropriated in this act to issue, promulgate, implement, administer or enforce any health-threatening changes in the CO health standard, my amendment will send a clear message to the EPA that the Members of Congress do not believe in simply waving the wand to make our problems go away—that we live in the real world where results are what counts.

My amendment does not prevent EPA from revising the CO health standard. It only prevents it from revising it in a manner that would weaken the public health protections of the current standard.

A vote to adopt this amendment will send a clear message to the American people that we will not tolerate rule changes that will threaten their health and well-being.

I urge my colleagues to support my amendment and join me in sending this no-nonsense message to the EPA and the American people.

Finally, I wish to thank Chairman BOLAND and the ranking minority member Mr. GREEN for their assistance.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

I think it is most important that we understand exactly what this amendment would accomplish. First, it does not tie the hands of EPA by precluding a change in the carbon monoxide health standard. This amendment simply would require that EPA make any such change openly and in a straightforward manner and not by manipulating the complex scientific yardstick used in setting the standard.

Without a doubt, there are some very serious health problems at stake here. I believe these problems should be met head on, not simply defined out of existence. That is what EPA wants to do.

The EPA proposal to move to a 5-day exceedance under the nine parts per million standard would loosen the carbon monoxide standard substantially. Overnight the air would be declared safe for carbon monoxide in two-thirds of the current nonattainment areas. Just changing the method for figuring the carbon monoxide health standard does not make the air any safer to breathe.

This use of a standard permitting 5 exceedance days per year is unprecedented and unorthodox. However, I do not believe this amendment would preclude a three exceedance in 3 years approach, similar to the ozone standard.

Mr. Chairman, under those circumstances, I support the gentleman's amendment. I think the gentleman has made a good case for it.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise to support the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize on this and at least one other amendment which I believe is pending at the desk we are seeing to some degree the frustrations arising because of the difficulties of reauthorizing the Clean Air Act. I do not think we should deny that that is why these amendments are coming to an appropriations bill. I must say I would prefer that we could get a Clean Air Act on the House floor and let the House act its will in some sort of coordinated way. Clean air is an issue where there are very considerable interrelations among its many aspects, and it is, therefore, desirable to have an omnibus approach rather than the piecemeal approach we are inevitably going to get from these amendments to appropriations bills.

Having said that, it does seem to me that this amendment is essentially trying to hold the status quo, as I understand it, and would, of course, give way if we were subsequently to produce a Clean Air Act reauthorization that provided for some different standard. That does seem to be an appropriate thing to do while an omnibus approach to the problems of clean air is worked out first by the Energy and Commerce Committee and then, we hope, by the full House.

As an opponent of weakening the Clean Air Act, I therefore support the amendment.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my opposition to this amendment is based on the fact that under the Clean Air Act Congress has required the Environmental Protection Agency to periodically review and as appropriate to revise the air quality standards.

It is a fact, as the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WYDEN) has stated, that a review of the existing ambient carbon monoxide standard is currently underway.

I might point out that the carbon monoxide standard was established in 1971 and it is only logical that it be reviewed based on new scientific evidence.

The gentleman has mentioned several public statements that have been made with respect to these proposed versions which have been proposed by the agency.

I would like to have the gentleman's attention and ask him if he could tell the Members how many comments were filed on this CO standard inasmuch as he has passed out a sheet characterizing the results of those comments as being all against the proposed changes in the standard.

Would the gentleman have any idea how many comments were filed on the CO standard?

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROYHILL. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. WYDEN. The number of comments is about 25, and a strong majority opposed the actions being advanced by the Environmental Protection Agency.

Mr. BROYHILL. If I can reclaim my time, the fact is I have just checked with the agency, and I find that the comment period has been open for 2 years and if stacked, the comments would be several feet thick. The sheet that the gentleman has been handing out provides comments of carefully selected States and counties.

I would ask the gentleman were there other comments in support of the proposed standard.

Mr. WYDEN. If the gentleman will yield further, the comments I referred to were in response to the revised proposals dated June 18, 1982. They are the comments of States and localities around the country.

Mr. BROYHILL. There were a number of comments in support of the proposed changes. I know the gentleman is familiar with the Clean Air Scientific Advisory Committee which we call CASAC. This is an independent scientific review group. I know the gentleman is familiar with the fact that the CASAC has been considering this issue for 3 years and has made recommendations with respect to this particular standard and has reached a consensus that a multiple exceedance has not only scientific, but also administrative merit.

Mr. WYDEN. I would like to read a letter sent by the Clean Air Advisory Committee or a small portion of it on August 31, 1982, because they have advocated a multiple exceedance approach which my amendment does not prohibit; but they in no manner endorse the 5-day exceedance approach. In fact, on August 31, they caution that five exceedances were a danger.

Mr. BROYHILL. May I reclaim my time on that basis. I am not standing up here and defending the five exceedance per year approach.

All I am saying is that under the Clean Air Act we have mandated the Agency to periodically review these standards, and this review is presently ongoing. What the gentleman is doing here in his amendment is prohibiting the Agency from carrying out its legislative mandate.

Mr. WYDEN. In no way do we prohibit EPA action with respect to a carbon monoxide standard. We are prohibiting the spending of funds on one particular action, an action which amounts to a 33-percent increase in carbon monoxide in this country. That is all we are prohibiting.

Mr. BROYHILL. Is the gentleman saying he does not object to a multiple exceedance standard?

Mr. WYDEN. It so happens there are a number of multiple exceedance approaches that I think would be attractive that would give State and local governments some flexibility. All we are doing in this amendment is prohibiting the expenditure of public funds on one particular alternative.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BROYHILL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman oppose the use of a statistical standard?

Mr. WYDEN. If the gentleman will continue to yield, would the gentleman repeat the question.

Mr. BROYHILL. Does the gentleman oppose the use of a statistical standard such as presently used for the ozone standard?

Mr. WYDEN. No. It so happens that the ozone model is one that is attractive, but the ozone model is not a five exceedences per year model. An ozone model is one that allows one exceedence per year.

□ 1750

Mr. BROYHILL. My concern here is that we are again by legislative mandate trying to write standards into law.

I must admit that the gentleman's amendment has been very adroitly written and drawn in such a way as to be within the rules of the House. But it does give me concern that amendments of this kinds are changing previous law which has mandated an agency to review and if necessary to revise various standards based on good science. It seems to me that the gentleman is trying to tie the hands of the agency.

I am glad to see that the gentleman would agree that perhaps some changes in this standard should be made and could be made. I just hope that the gentleman's amendment is not going to tie the hands of the agency to that extent. I am concerned that it will. That is why I oppose the gentleman's amendment. I think that it is too strictly written and will tie the hands of the agency so strictly that they can make absolutely no changes in the standard itself.

The gentleman apparently is interpreting his amendment otherwise; is that correct?

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, that is absolutely right.

I want to repeat that we in no way restrict the agency's options. They have a number of options in front of them for being more flexible, for adopting approaches that deal with the various regions of the country; and in no way does this restrict their options.

Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. Chairman, it is rather amusing to hear the gentleman from North Carolina express this alarm that the gentleman from Oregon might be changing other law which mandates an agency to do something and tying an agency's hands. I think the people down at the Federal Trade Commission must be having a good chuckle over that comment, because I do not think there is any doubt that the gentleman from North Carolina has tried to do that in this body.

The gentleman is offering a critical amendment. It is not that complicated, really. It relates to the 9 million people suffering from heart disease. It relates to the asthmatics. It relates to the unborn. It relates to a number of people in this country who suffer greatly from carbon monoxide emissions.

I think the gentleman has done an excellent job on the amendment. I hope we get to a vote soon. I hope today is the only discussion we have about carbon monoxide this year and that we do not have a gutting of the Clean Air Act coming along later on.

I congratulate the gentleman for his amendment.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOFFETT. Oh, I would be happy to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very much.

I would simply like to add that it seems to me that to accuse this amendment of tying the agency's hands is ridiculous on the surface. It is not going to do that at all. The agency, however, has mounted a direct and concerted attack on the carbon monoxide standards of clean air.

For the gentleman from North Carolina to suggest that the Congress should have nothing to say about an agency which independently decides to set itself off on that course of lowering the quality of the air standards of this country is, first of all, inconsistent with where we normally hear the gentleman coming from in terms of bureaucrats who decide they are going to do their own thing rather than paying attention to what Congress and the people of the United States want; but beyond that, it seems to me that the gentleman from Oregon has offered something here which Congress can reassert what it originally intended, and that was not for the EPA to reduce the air quality standards of the United States.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out to clarify this debate that this discussion of multiple exceedences is not, as the gentleman from Washington has alluded to, an all-out attack on the CO standard, but it is a scientific method of trying to provide for a national ambient air quality standard that is realisitic for CO. The multiple exceedence idea was supported by the Clean Air Science Advisory Committee. The Clean Air Science Advisory Committee reached a consensus that a multiple exceedence standard has both a scientific as well as an administrative merit. From a scientific point of view, the approach recognizes that there is a random like character of meteorological events; administratively it reduces the element of chance in determining compliance with the standard.

In recommending that EPA adopt the multiple exceedence standard, the committee notes that an increase in the number of allowable exceedences may relax the existing standard if the standard level remains unchanged; but the salient feature here is that with multiple exceedences could come—and this is what is being discussed—a CO standard which could result in greater protection of public health.

Now, in order to provide protection to the public health with an adequate margin of safety, EPA should scientifically and medically consider which standard over a period of time would minimize CO exceedences. For example, studies done show that the 9-parts-per-million standard level taken over an extended period of time with potentially five exceedences actually provides for a lesser CO exposure than 12 parts per with one violation.

Now, I know that we are in an election year and any talk of trying to look at some of the demerits, some of the problems of the Clean Air Act, immediately bring on charges of gutting the Clean Air Act. Well, nothing could be further from the truth.

Not only is the Clean Air Science Advisory Committee active here, but the EPA Science Advisory Boards are active.

Now, these are concepts which have been developed by scientists, by medical and public health specialists; these are not an attempt, as the gentleman from Washington has stated, to mount an all-out attack on the CO standard. This is to make some intelligent air quality regulations to the American people.

A standard that focuses on a more stable value, perhaps such as the fifth, but not necessarily highest expected 8-hour concentration, would tend to reduce the impact of some unusual weather event and could be used to provide a more predictable, more understandable, more meaningful, perhaps even higher quality CO standard for this country.

I doubt if many Members of this Congress—and this is really the key point—feel that they have either the scientific or the medical expertise to second guess the Clean Air Science Advisory Committee on this issue, the Science Advisory Boards on this issue.

I think the amendment by the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WYDEN) is simply inappropriate. It would set a terrible precedent for how Congress handles complex scientific issues.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise on behalf of Representative WYDEN's amendment to the HUD-independent agencies appropriations bill. This amendment prevents the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) from devoting its resources to raising the primary national ambient air quality standard for carbon monoxide (CO). As my colleagues know, under the Clean Air Act EPA must establish and revise ambient air quality standards as appropriate. The standards are set at levels that protect the public health with an adequate margin of safety—in other words, the CO standard is intended to make our air safe to breathe.

On May 5 I joined with several of my colleagues from the Energy and Commerce Committee in releasing two EPA documents that proposed a relaxation in the CO standard. The revised standard in the EPA's draft final rule would raise carbon monoxide pollution by an average of 33 percent nationwide. In some already severely polluted urban areas like my own home, the Denver metropolitan area, the new, weakened standard may permit increases of up to 50 percent in CO levels.

In the back door fashion we have grown accustomed to under the Reagan administration's EPA, the proposed change in the CO level is not the product of open and clear debate. Instead, it is subtle, technical, and equally effective at reaching EPA's ultimate goal. If EPA implements the change suggested in its draft final rule, both the 9 parts per million (PPM) level of the 8-hour primary standard and the 35 parts per million level of the 1-hour primary standard would be unchanged. Instead, EPA plans to increase the allowable exceedances of those standards from once per year to five times per year, and to liberalize the data requirements the State must meet. In short, the EPA proposal is one of the most cynical abuses of administrative power I have seen in 8 years in the House.

Higher levels of CO will result in greater health risks for all Americans. Of course, the greatest impact will be felt by the 7.7 million Americans suffering from cardiovascular diseases. For these people, ordinary exposure to higher levels of CO can routinely lead to angina attacks, and the risk of fatal heart attacks is correspondingly increased. Perhaps the most respected researcher in CO's health effects, Dr. W. S. Aronow, has found that blood concentrations of only 2 percent CO compounds produced observable symptoms in individuals suffering from heart ailments. Under the draft final rule, 2.7 to 3 percent is officially considered the lowest level for which protection is necessary, and 2.5 percent provides an adequate margin of safety.

The new standard would pose a special danger to unborn children. Pregnant mothers who breathe high levels of CO can affect their fetus' mental and physical growth. The general population will also face higher risks through this mere administrative action—the health danger that the 60 million Americans living in CO nonattainment areas would not be solved. It is simply ignored.

For the 10 million people living in high altitude areas the relaxed standard presents an extraordinary danger. Studies have shown that both CO exposure and high altitudes reduce the oxygen available to human tissues. For tissues with high oxygen requirements, such as exercising muscles, the heart, and the brain, the risk is severe. For those Americans living in high altitude areas, there is little comfort in knowing EPA did not hold the combined effects of the high altitude and CO factors to be a significant consideration.

EPA's action on the CO standard is both consistent, and extraordinary, when contrasted to other environmental and energy policies of the Reagan administration. I say extraordinary because of the immediate danger the change in the CO standard presents for millions of Americans. None of us would choose to breathe dirty air, but we have little choice, for despite the administration's claims, Government is the only institution which now insures we have clean air to breath. By retreating from our national commitment to clean air, EPA is acting most irresponsibly.

I urge my colleagues to support the Wyden amendment. As Representative WYDEN pointed out, the amendment does not prevent EPA from reviewing the CO health standard. Rather, it limits EPA to changes that do not pose a significant threat to the public welfare.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WYDEN).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to title IV?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALGREN

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALGREN: Page 42, immediately after line 18, insert the following new section:

SEC. 417. None of the funds appropriated by this Act may be obligated or expended to promulgate, issue, prescribe, implement, administer, make, or enforce any finding, rule, order, or sanction under the Clean Air Act on any State or political subdivision thereof for failure to adopt, implement, conduct, or enforce a vehicle emission control inspection and maintenance program. Nothing in this section shall be construed to preclude the use of funds for the purpose of providing technical assistance under the Clean Air Act to any State or political subdivision thereof or to terminate in accordance with such Act any sanction imposed under such Act for such a failure.

□ 1800

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would prohibit the use of EPA funds to mandate automobile emission inspection and maintenance programs during fiscal year 1983.

The amendment would, in effect, provide a 1-year moratorium on the imposition by the Federal Government of automobile inspection and maintenance with respect to emissions.

I believe this kind of moratorium is only reasonable in view of the massive resistance to auto I&M programs by the public and in view of the fact that the Congress is presently considering changes in the Clean Air Act, which may change completely the circumstances under which any such auto I&M program would be considered appropriate.

It should be understood that this amendment would not prevent any State that chose to have an I&M program from having such a program; but it would prevent the EPA from forcing States to adopt I&M programs by threatening to cut off Federal funds or to ban all new construction.

Under the present Clean Air Act, States that cannot meet the December 1982 deadline for national ambient air standards for ozone and carbon monoxide can request an extension. But they can receive that extension only if the State agrees to establish an inspection and maintenance program for automobile emissions. And if the States refuse, Federal sanctions must be applied and these sanctions include the withholding of Federal highway funds, Federal sewer funds, air quality funds and, worst of all, the imposition of a ban on construction of new facilities or major modifications of other industrial plants.

This is a very unpopular program. In Pennsylvania, for example, the State legislature refused to appropriate funds for an inspection and maintenance program and then even overrode a veto by the Governor in order to protect their constituents from the expense and inconvenience of an automobile inspection and maintenance program.

EPA has now published in the Federal Register notice that it may impose a construction ban on Pittsburgh and other areas of the State of Pennsylvania. But Pennsylvania is not alone in being under the gun of this kind of mandate by EPA. In April of this year, EPA notified 11 States that they intend to impose sanctions for their failure to require automobile emissions inspection and maintenance. These States include: North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, Wisconsin, Texas, Missouri, and Nevada.

I am asking my colleagues to stop I&M for 1 year because I just do not believe that an I&M program forced by the Federal Government can be effective. I do not think it will result in significant improvement in air quality because it will be so easily circumvented.

Federal mandates that are little understood are usually vigorously resisted. The results are paper programs, replete with loopholes—programs that are unable to be enforced.

I would add that anyone who has seen the little brass plugs available at auto supply stores that very simply bypass the collecting manifold for most emissions systems will know how easy it is to bypass emission control systems. Many States who do not want I&M do the least possible, and the result is a program that does not significantly contribute to clean air.

THE WALGREN AMENDMENT WILL HELP PENNSYLVANIA

On I&M, Pennsylvania is probably in a unique situation. In 1978, the State signed a consent decree agreeing to implement I&M, but in 1981, the general assembly refused to appropriate funds for it; the legislature then overrode the Governor's veto. A Federal judge has ordered that Pennsylvania lose $91 million in highway funds. The State's lawsuit requesting judicial relief has not been successful even though it has been appealed all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The district court decision makes clear that the sanctions now imposed on Pennsylvania can only be lifted by modifying the 1978 consent decree. The decree specifically provides that—

Jurisdiction is retained by this court for the purpose of enabling any party to apply to the Court at any time * * * for the modification or termination of any of the provisions herein upon a showing of changed circumstances and good cause.

The State's request to modify the decree to eliminate the I&M requirement has been denied. In denying that request the district court stated that—

There has been no change in the Clean Air Act * * * upon which the present consent decree rests. In effect, the Court is saying that to satisfy the "changed circumstances" test of the consent decree, the requirements of Federal law must be changed.

Ideally, the basic statute should be changed. It is not certain that we will be able to do that. With $91 million at stake, Pennsylvania needs help now.

I believe that the adoption of my amendment would create "changed circumstances" by changing Federal clean air policy and would meet the requirement established by the U.S. district court.

I have obtained from the Congressional Research Service a legal opinion that my amendment would achieve a changed Federal policy regarding the imposition of sanctions on States which chose not to enact I&M. The opinion notes, "Your amendment would effectively bar EPA/DOT from withholding highway, Clean Air Act, and sewage treatment plan money on account of I/M-related noncompliance." It also says that "the fact that the proposed restriction on use of H.R. 6956 funds undermines a mandate contained in a substantive (nonappropriation) statute in no way lessens its force and validity. There is no reason why Congress if it so wishes, cannot do by a provision in an appropriations act what it could do in a separate act."

Thus, I believe that approval of this amendment would represent a change in Federal policy of which the Federal judge in the Pennsylvania case could take note.

I&M puts the responsibility for air cleanup on the wrong person, the car owner. The auto industry is the one who should manufacture clean cars with emission devices that work and that last. Effective testing and certification by the manufacturer should insure that purchasers get cars with good emissions equipment that will continue to function.

I believe that good government, in addition to politics, is the art of the possible and to run roughshod over public opinion is to create public resistance and that can truthfully end up destroying necessary public support for reasonable environmental regulations that are important to everyone. There is no question that automobile emission inspection, in the eyes of the public, is an extremely unpopular program.

Under these circumstances, clearly, a 1-year moratorium before proceeding down this road, is the only prudent way for the Congress to proceed.

I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will rise informally.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its sitting.

DEPARTMENT OF HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT-INDEPENDENT AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 1983

The Committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN), the ranking member of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, rise?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

This is very similar, Mr. Chairman, to an amendment which was defeated last year during consideration of last year's HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations bill, and I hope that the House will give the same fate to this amendment.

Unlike the previous amendment, which essentially sought to hold the status quo in place while the Clean Air Act was under consideration, this amendment seeks to make a major weakening of our Clean Air Act and regulations through this appropriations bill. Essentially what it wants to do is to take out the enforcement of the requirements that States, under certain circumstances, have to have vehicle emission control inspection and maintenance programs.

I happen to think that where you have an air pollution problem, that kind of a program is a very important part of the process of cleaning up our air.

I very much hope that Members of this House would not use the vehicle of a rider on an appropriations bill to weaken our clean air legislation through the vehicle of this amendment. The fact of the matter is that what we have done in Clean Air Act amendments in the past to improve the quality of the air by restrictions on motor vehicles will, to all intents and purposes, be significantly dissipated if this amendment is allowed to pass, at least for the period of time it takes effect; and from the fact that this is the second year in which it is offered, it seems rather obvious that its sponsors intend this to be an ongoing thing.

Again, it seems to me that if we ought to make changes in the Clean Air Act, the vehicle through which the House should consider them is the Clean Air Act itself. I only can express my hope that we can, in the Committee on Energy and Commerce, and then in the full House, at some point proceed to consideration of that act. But plainly, this would be a serious weakening of the present legislation.

I think that is wrong, and I do not think it should be done by a rider on an appropriations bill.

Mr. HOLLENBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HOLLENBECK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, for the past 5 years my home State of New Jersey has operated a popular and cost-effective program to clean up its air—the inspection and maintenance program for automobiles. Polls in our State have found that automobile owners are willing to help do their part to clean up our air by participating in the program.

But I have been disappointed that other cities and States which violate national health standards for automobile pollutants have not adopted this program. The present Clean Air Act requires that cities, which need until 1982 to meet the national ambient health standards for carbon monoxide and ozone, must adopt an inspection and maintenance program.

Today, I urge my colleagues to join with me in voting against the amendment to H.R. 6956 which attempts to block EPA enforcement of requirements for State inspection and maintenance programs. I believe that EPA enforcement of I&M programs is a crucial deterrent in preventing the deterioration of national air quality standards. What is more, inspection and maintenance programs are working quite effectively. I have reviewed EPA projections which State that auto I&M programs are critical in determining whether areas attain air quality standards.

Cooperation between States and the EPA has reduced hydrocarbon emissions by as much as 20 percent and carbon monoxide by up to 36 percent a steady increase in auto use. We simply cannot ignore the very real contributions which I&M programs are making in the fight for clean air. And I fail to see why we should reward inaction and gross disregard for the public health and welfare.

Finally, the amendment before us this afternoon does not change the law requiring State auto inspection programs. It merely eliminates EPA's ability to enforce this statute opening the way for enforcement by the courts. I believe that leaving a program mandated but unadministered creates a tension in the law which would no doubt lead to a rush of citizen lawsuits and a depreciable decrease in air quality.

We cannot afford to gut a program which is effective in maintaining national air quality standards. I urge my colleagues to join me in voting against the amendment to eliminate I&M enforcement by the EPA. A vote against this amendment is a vote for the environment.

Mr. GREEN. I thank my colleague from New Jersey for his comments, Mr. Chairman.

This is an area which has concerned me deeply—when I was in our State legislature a sponsor of legislation which put on the books what I think is one of the first State laws in the country requiring a State inspection program to include automobile air pollution control equipment inspections.

I would hate to see the House today make this major step backward.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks and those of my colleague from New Jersey (Mr. HOLLENBECK). I, too, was the author of clean air/clean water legislation in my State assembly and have cared about this for a long time.

Mr. GREEN. I thank the gentlewoman for her comments.

□ 1810

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin by complimenting the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALGREN) for bringing this amendment up, for the foresight in trying to at least do something about a problem that I think needs, for the benefit of the House, to be properly outlined.

The vehicle, incidentally, which Mr. WALGREN has decided to try and use today is necessary because we have tried to get a hearing for some amendments which we thought could constructively change the law before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. We had a great deal of help from the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL), and I would like to thank him also. But, we are now left here today with this route, and we have been working on this problem for 2 to 3 years now and we do not have much alternative.

The State of Pennsylvania presently suffers under a consent decree. To give the Members an example of the absurdity with which this law has been applied to us, in a four-county area, should a resident of one of the affected counties who lives in the furthest boundaries of the affected district drive out of it to work, that person is subject to an inspection. Should someone who lives outside of that area, yet drives into it to work and spends most of his traveling time within the affected area but not reside within it, that person is not affected by an inspection requirement.

Data indicates that the degree to which it would perhaps, if fully enforced, affect the peak period emissions within the affected consent-decree areas as a result of this law, which might affect emissions during peak periods, is up to 4 percent. Meanwhile, elderly citizens with older automobiles, automobiles that mechanically are leaving our roads because of attrition, in the face of and facing the lack of those very industrial standards that Mr. WALGREN referred to, do not have recourse to that new car, but are subject instead to a consent decree that burdens them unfairly.

Interstate traffic, of course, is not affected. Traffic moving through that area on interstate highways is not affected.

The intent of the law is good. Its application is very unfair. It impacts on those least able to pay. It impacts on those who by accident of residence happen to fall within the confines of the decree.

I have personally, 2 years ago or so, spoken with Judge Bechtel, whose private opinions were that the law was very unreasonable, but he was confined by the way it was written.

I would hope that the Members of this House would understand that the way to deal with this difficulty is to get back to the authorizing committee and rewrite the law the way it should be written. But, that the avenue available to Mr. WALGREN and the rest of us in Pennsylvania is precisely the one we have chosen because we have no other choice, and that is to deny the funds necessary to make the enforcement possible of a very unfairly applied but well-intentioned law.

I thank the Chairman.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend Mr. WALGREN of Pennsylvania for his bipartisan effort to bring this amendment to the attention of the committee, and I am proud to be one of eight Members—four Democrats and four Republicans—who have signed a "Dear Colleague" letter to our colleagues asking them to adopt this amendment when the time for a vote comes.

I think it is appropriate to say at the outset that this legislation of mandatory inspection and maintenance is a part of the Federal Clean Air Act, and is applicable to 29 States of the Union and the District of Columbia. If a Member represents one of those States in this body, he should carefully listen to this debate because his citizens will sooner or later be impacted by what this means to them. The States that now have it in operation are Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Georgia, Colorado, Arizona, Virginia, Washington, and Oregon.

The ones that are on the line to get it very soon by way of this mandate of Federal law are Connecticut, Massachusetts, District of Columbia, Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, Wisconsin, Texas, New Mexico, Missouri, Utah, California, Nevada, and Idaho.

In 1981, last year, we had a vote on the floor of the House on a substantially identical amendment. That vote was 177 for and 184 against. It came on a Thursday afternoon. The total vote was 361. We had a substantial number of the Members not voting, and I think it is appropriate today that we have a full expression of the House on how this matter should be resolved. I would have preferred, frankly, to have the authorization action on the Clean Air Act which the Commerce Committee, on which I serve, has been working lo these many months here in 1982, but for a variety of reasons we are not able to get that bill to the floor of the House for consideration this year because, frankly, there are some deep philosophical differences of opinion on what it should contain, but I can say to the members of the committee that on the issue that is involved right now on mandatory inspection and maintenance of motor vehicles, by the hammer of the Federal Government, on that issue in the subcommittee which considered this matter, by record vote, the subcommittee voted 14 to 6 to in effect adopt the amendment that is now pending before the committee.

In addition, when the matter came before the full committee, the full Committee on Energy and Commerce voted 25 to 12 by a record vote to adopt the amendment now pending before the committee. The point of these votes is this: We are doing something here on an appropriation measure, but we are doing something that expresses the concensus of the members of the policy committee that has considered this legislation.

Now, what is the benefit of inspection and maintenance? One can find studies all over the map reflecting some of the reductions in smog to be anticipated if we inspect every motor vehicle in America. The Automobile Club of Southern California has produced some credible studies indicating that if we adopt annual mandatory inspection and maintenance in southern California, we can reduce hydrocarbons in that region of the country by 3.6 percent. We will reduce oxides of nitrogen by 2.2 percent.

Now, that is a pretty modest reduction for the cost, which is a relevant question. What do we have to pay for it? Well, we have 7.3 million motor vehicles in southern California, and every motorist, if such a law is adopted, is going to have to spend $11 a year to have his or her car inspected. Now, statistically, 46 percent of those vehicles will fail when they are tested, and that has meaning to those people who are in the category of failing because they have to come back and have them test it again, and for those motorists it is going to cost them an additional $47. So, 3.6 million motor vehicle owners in southern California will have the privilege of paying $47 a year plus the privilege of standing in line twice, plus the privilege of discussing with some motor repairman whether or not the work should be done.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DANNEMEYER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. This cost to the motorists of just southern California, and we represent roughly 12 percent of the motor vehicles in the Nation, comes to some $211 million a year—$210.7 million a year, to be precise.

□ 1820

So if we extrapolate that nationwide we would have a factor of at least 10 times that for the cost nationwide on the consumers of this Nation for a modest reduction in smog.

Is it really worth it?

I mention this because I think it deserves repeating time and time again. There is nothing in the pending amendment that precludes any State from adopting annual inspection and maintenance of motor vehicles if it chooses to do so. We are not dealing with that.

All we are saying here today is shall we continue the Federal mandate which says to the States of the Union, independent of what their legislature says, if you do not do this, friends, in those States of the Union, some 30, if you do not do this you are going to lose highway funds, you are going to lose sewer construction funds, you are going to have a construction ban imposed on your region of the country precluding any economic development of any type at all.

In conclusion, just let me make this observation: I think that the prudent thing for us to do is to adopt this amendment, to tell the EPA that they may not use the appropriated funds in this bill for the purpose of enforcing a measure which the people of this country do not want, which has marginal benefit in terms of smog reduction, which is going to place a regulatory burden on all of the automobile owners of our country.

I think the prudent thing for us to do is to adopt the amendment.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment as I did last year and the House rejected the amendment last year as well. We should follow the precedent again this year.

What we have before us is an attempt to legislate the Clean Air Act on an appropriation bill by telling EPA they cannot use money to enforce the law.

Let me begin by explaining what the automobile inspection and maintenance, or I&M, as it is usually called, is all about.

Automobiles emit harmful pollutants such as carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons which are known as causes of chest pain and aggravation to cardiovascular diseases.

Because of the Clean Air Act automobile manufacturers have designed and produced cars that emit less of those pollutants.

The 1983 cars that are now being certified emit 90 percent less hydrocarbons and carbon monoxide than pre-1970 cars.

But experience has shown that even though we are manufacturing cleaner cars, cars get dirtier on the road because of poor maintenance by motorists. Often drivers neglect to have their cars kept in tune. Some even remove the pollution control equipment altogether or poison it by using leaded gasoline.

That is why Congress in 1977 decided that motorists had to be given an incentive to maintain their cars properly and we adopted this requirement of inspection and maintenance in areas that would not be able to meet the clean air standards for health, protection of the public health by 1982.

Now we have I&M as a reality in 10 areas of the country including the States of Rhode Island and New Jersey. In my own State of California I am proud to announce they have adopted an I&M program this last month.

Experience clearly shows that the program is successful. It works. It reduces the auto fleet emissions of hydrocarbons by 20 percent and carbon monoxide by 36 percent.

The real issue, if there is controversy over whether I&M works or not, is one to be resolved by the authorizing committee, not to offer a proposal here to deny EPA funds to enforce the law.

Will it help the people in Pennsylvania who do not like the I&M program there? I do not believe it will. The courts there are the ones who impose this requirement on Pennsylvania, not the EPA. To deny EPA funds will not deny the court the ability to carry out the law.

Furthermore, I want to point out that even the administration, which vigorously opposes the I&M requirement, has opposed this amendment because they do not believe this is the way to deal with these issues through an appropriation bill.

This amendment does nothing to deal constructively with the I&M program. It is going to confuse the legal situation.

EPA will be told by the Congress not to spend the money to enforce the law but a lawsuit will be brought because the law is clear that I&M must be part of a program where the air is dirty. So EPA will be forced by the courts.

I do not think we are doing anything constructive along these lines.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAXMAN. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to commend the gentleman for his comments.

I may be one of the few members of the Pennsylvania delegation to oppose this amendment and I do so reluctantly.

In Pennsylvania we do have a problem but I think the gentleman is correct in stating that this amendment will not alleviate the pain on Pennsylvania. The signing of the consent decree back in 1977 in my opinion will in fact mean that this amendment will not take away from the courts jurisdiction their obligation to administer the law which is in place.

I think it is important for the State legislature to proceed in a careful and concise way with putting in place an operation and maintenance system for air quality in the five-county metropolitan area of Philadelphia and in Pittsburgh because a priority over and above the crankiness of the State legislature is that we have clean air for our generation and for future generations.

Mr. WAXMAN. I appreciate the gentleman's comments and want to commend him on his courage. I know the people in the Pennsylvania delegation seem to be quite agitated about this whole issue, but this is really not the place to solve Pennsylvania's problems. We ought to deal with it in the Clean Air Act reauthorization which I would have hoped we would have had on the floor at some point.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAXMAN. I yield to my colleague from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER).

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank my colleague for responding.

Would the gentleman from California be kind enough to give the source of the spokesman from the administration who the gentleman from California says is opposed to this amendment?

Mr. WAXMAN. Yes; I have a letter in my hand which I will share with the gentleman and in fact make a part of the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN) has expired.

(At the request of Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania and by unanimous consent, Mr. WAXMAN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. WAXMAN. This is a letter from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency dated September 13, 1982:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In view of the approaching debate on H.R. 6956, and in response to your letter of August 25, 1982, I thought you would like to have the enclosed position statement.

The administration sets out their position agreeing with the gentleman on the substance but disagreeing with the gentleman on amending the appropriations bill.

I will be pleased to share this with the gentleman and make it a part of the RECORD.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Does the gentleman interpret that letter as a position of this administration in opposition to this amendment?

Mr. WAXMAN. I will share this, and I do. I do understand that that is their position.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. If the gentleman would be kind enough to put that letter in the RECORD I think it will speak for itself.

The administration cannot, in my humble opinion, by any stretch of the imagination be concluded to be in opposition to this amendment on the basis of the letter before the gentleman from California.

Mr. WAXMAN. I would like to quote from their position.

In most cases sanctions would be instituted only after EPA makes a finding that a State plan or the implementation of it is deficient. Since the amendment, by prohibiting expenditure of funds, would stop EPA from making such a finding on I&M programs it would prevent any new sanctions from occurring as a result of EPA action. It is possible, however, that sanctions could be imposed by the courts as a result of citizen suits, which would not be prevented by this amendment. In a recent case in Pennsylvania—

As was the case of concern here—

A District Court judge enjoined the U.S. Department of Transportation from awarding highway funds in areas of the State which have not implemented an I&M program, as a result of a citizens suit.

They say:

Since the amendment prohibits all expenditures of funds by EPA regarding failure to adopt an I&M program the amendment may have two additional effects:

One, for those areas of the country in which sanctions have already been imposed, EPA might be unable to conduct a rulemaking to remove those sanctions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. DANNEMEYER and by unanimous consent Mr. WAXMAN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

□ 1830

Mr. WAXMAN. I do want to read one sentence which I think is key. The administration's position paper indicates:

To provide this flexibility in a proper context, any amendment should be directed to the provisions of the Clean Air Act itself in the authorization process rather than to an appropriations measure.

The complete letter is as follows:

U.S. ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., September 13, 1982.

Hon. Henry A. Waxman,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Health and the Environment, Committee on Energy and Commerce, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In view of the approaching debate on H.R. 6956, and in response to your letter of August 25, 1982, I thought you would like to have the enclosed position statement.

I hope this will be of some assistance.

Sincerely,

LELAND E. MODESITT, JR.,
Director, Office of Legislation.

RESTRICTIONS ON IMPOSING SANCTIONS OF THE CLEAN AIR ACT FOR FAILURE TO IMPLEMENT I/M

ADMINISTRATION'S POSITION ON I/M

The Administration is opposed to the mandatory requirement for I/M. Requiring its use in all areas of nonattainment nationwide, without regard to local circumstances and needs, is inappropriate. The States should be allowed more flexibility to choose among available strategies, including I/M, in devising their air quality attainment and maintenance plans. To provide this flexibility in a proper context, any amendment should be directed to the provisions of the Clean Air Act itself in the authorization process rather than to an appropriations measure.

EFFECT OF PROPOSED RESTRICTION

In most cases, sanctions would be instituted only after EPA makes a finding that a state plan or the implementation of it is deficient. Since the amendment, by prohibiting expenditure of funds, would stop EPA from making such a finding on I/M programs, it would prevent any new sanctions from occurring as a result of EPA action. It is possible, however, that sanctions could be imposed by the courts as a result of citizen suits, which would not be prevented by this amendment. In a recent case in Pennsylvania, a district court judge enjoined the U.S. Department of Transportation from awarding highway funds in areas of the State which had not implemented an I/M program, as a result of a citizen suit.

Since the amendment prohibits all expenditures of funds by EPA regarding failure to adopt an I/M program, the amendment may have two additional effects:

1. For those areas of the country in which sanctions have already been imposed, EPA might be unable to conduct a rulemaking to remove those sanctions.

2. The Agency is currently involved in processing 1982 SIP revisions. The amendment might prevent EPA from taking regulatory action on that portion of a SIP revision related to I/M, unless it were approvable, because the amendment prohibits use of funds for rules or sanctions relating to failure to implement I/M. EPA is now reviewing the 1982 SIPs and some may be determined to have deficiencies.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAXMAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Is it not correct to say that the EPA, within the last few days, has issued a position which states that "the Administration is opposed to the mandatory requirement for I&M?" Is that not a correct statement of fact?

Mr. WAXMAN. It is a correct statement to say that they would like to see the Clean Air Act amended, but they are specifically saying to us in this position paper they do not want to see the appropriations process used to amend the Clean Air Act because it is going to lead to a great deal of confusion for them to figure out how to enforce the law, to be faced with citizens' suits, and to have otherwise their activities disrupted.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAXMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. I just have one question.

Does the gentleman have a figure on the percentage, the effect that the program would supposedly have on emissions in the Pittsburgh area? Does the gentleman have any figures on the affected Pennsylvania areas?

Mr. WAXMAN. No, I do not have the figures on that.

Mr. JAMES K. COYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment today. And, of course, I am pleased to hear the comments of many of my colleagues from other parts of the country when they speak in glowing terms of their own States' commitment to clean air and clean water and a better environment. As a Pennsylvanian, I would like to add my own voice to those who are proud of the track record of this Nation over the past 10 or 15 years and, furthermore, I would like to say that Pennsylvania holds a candle second to no other State in this country with regard to our own commitment to clean air. In fact, I invite any of you to come to Pennsylvania and compare it to the State that we had 20 years ago and tell me if you can think of any other part of the country that has advanced as our State already has.

At the same time, I want to point out that what we have here today is an example of a bureaucratic agency perhaps cutting off its nose to spite its face. The EPA, of course, is committed or tries to be committed to improving air quality standards across the country; but in this particular case it appears that if this amendment is not enacted quickly, Pennsylvania will be faced with a hardship where many of its own programs and the Federal Government's programs to improve our air quality will be set back for at least a year if not longer. Millions of dollars of EPA programs will be held up. And if this is allowed to happen, clearly our own Commonwealth's track record of improving its air quality will be forced to turn backward.

I think we must support this amendment. It has bipartisan support. I am pleased to join with the overwhelming majority of the other Members from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to pledge my support for this amendment and at the same time to continue to pledge my support for improving air quality in our Commonwealth.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES K. COYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for his fine statement. Also, I would like to comment on the remarks we had earlier about the impact of the State's decision and the effect of this particular amendment on the ability of the court to enforce the consent decree in Pennsylvania. And it would alter that ability. I would like to join the gentleman, particularly in regard to his remarks about the progress we have made.

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES K. COYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALGREN. Particularly on the point of Pennsylvania's relationship, this amendment, of course, is one that has both local and national elements to it, and it should not be decided just on the case of Pennsylvania. But we have heard some opinion as to whether or not it would be effective in helping Pennsylvania avoid mandatory inspection and maintenance. In my view, it clearly would. And I would like to simply quote from the Court's decree which says that the Court specifically states—

> Jurisdiction is retained by this Court for the purpose of enabling any party to apply to the Court at any time for the modification or termination of any of the provisions herein upon a showing of changed circumstances.

I would submit that if this National Government goes on record that we should have a moratorium of 1 year so that we could evaluate in the direction of how fast and how we should proceed, that that would be a changed circumstance that any court in the land would respect.

Mr. JAMES K. COYNE. I thank my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Of course, I would also like to add that all of us would prefer not to be using this process to be making this statement on the floor of the House. We do not have any more time. The State of Pennsylvania is running out of time, and we are looking forward to a deadline where we really do not have any opportunity to pursue perhaps a more traditional legislative course to make the statement we would prefer to make.

Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOFFETT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman who was in the well previously exactly what this amendment would do.

As I understand the amendment, the amendment forbids EPA from prosecuting cases of I&M, but in no way touches the fact that Pennsylvania is going to lose $90 or so million because Pennsylvania has not complied with the consent decree it signed back in 1977.

So it is my impression that, while this may stop future prosecutions and future efforts by the courts to shut down States that do not comply, the State of Pennsylvania will in fact have the obligation to comply or lose this October 1 the kind of money in the neighborhood of $91 million. I have checked that with Drew Lewis, the Secretary of Transportation here, and also the State secretary of transportation.

Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Chairman, I hope we defeat this amendment. It is obvious that there is not as much of an appetite in this Chamber at this moment and in this year as there might have been in the past for imposing things on the States, and that is not all bad, that kind of change; but there are some areas where we have to take responsibility and we have to assert leadership from a national legislature, and this is really one of them.

This amendment, with all due respect to its author, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for whom I have the greatest respect, is really an example of the New Federalism of environmental control.

The gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) talks about, "Well, they can do it if they want to." We all know what the track record was before the enactment of the 1977 clean air amendments, what the track record was under a voluntary program. Almost no State availed itself of this opportunity.

This is never pleasant, imposing deadlines. And we have discussed the deadline on Pennsylvania here today. There have been deadlines on other States. It is never pleasant. It is a tremendous hassle for the States. It puts the legislature on the spot. But it is aimed at a very important goal that is perfectly consistent with the Clean Air Act in the 1977 amendments.

If we adopt this amendment we are sentencing communities to unhealthy air for an unlimited period of time. It is as simple as that. You can talk about, "Well, there are other alternatives, and we can do it some other way," but we all know what the direction of the markup has been in the Commerce Committee. And I think there is no question that we are, in fact, handing out a sentence.

Finally, we are saying that it is not a choice of either cleaner cars or nothing. It is a choice of: Do you want to take your chunk out of the automobile? Or do you want to take it out of factories and other sources?

And it could well be that if we do not make progress with regard to hydrocarbon pollution, for example, through the inspection and maintenance program, we run the very real risk of damaging economic growth; because if cars do not control their pollution, factories and other sources will certainly have to.

Take a look at the list. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Bailey) was looking for a list. This is one I will be happy to share with him in a moment. But there is a real difference, a world of difference between where we find attainment by a variety of communities—I believe in 29 States—under the inspection and maintenance program and without the inspection and maintenance program. And it comes from an EPA which I think has been less than dedicated to a strong Clean Air Act implementation.

I know in Stamford, Conn., for example, there is a world of difference between reaching attainment with I&M and reaching it without. We are in danger of becoming the CO capital of the world, the Los Angeles of the East, if the gentleman from California will excuse the expression. And we need an inspection and maintenance program. It is not pleasant to insist that it happen, but I think we have to do it.

□ 1840

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOFFETT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I hope the gentleman will understand. I recognize the gentleman in the well as someone who probably is as or more sincere than anyone in this body when it comes to environmental concerns. I think the gentleman has a good track record.

I also would wager a friendly bet that yielding to his judgment, were he to evaluate the consent decree under which Pennsylvania now labors, that the gentleman would reach the conclusion that it is rather counterproductive and quite frankly, the legislation that all of us introduced that dealt with strict industrial standards went more to the heart of the problem.

I think the gentleman would probably be far more supportive than that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MOFFETT) has expired.

(At the request of Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania and by unanimous consent, Mr. MOFFETT was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield further, I think if the gentleman had an opportunity to go over the consent decree that he would agree with us there are wider obligations and unfortunately we were stuck with this procedural route.

Mr. MOFFETT. I understand that. I think we all know something about what it means to be stuck with a certain procedural route that may not be pleasant. My point is this is not a free ride in one direction. If we do not do this, we end up paying for it in health costs.

I do not want to be overly dramatic, but the infants in an area that does not reach attainment now and reaches it 5 years later do and can suffer some damage.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. I am glad to learn the gentleman supports us in our efforts to spend these limited resources more wisely. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ATKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in 1978 there were some 9 million automobiles coming off the assembly lines in this country. Twenty-five percent of these failed to meet the standards. So we are asking the motoring public to do what the manufacturing process has not done.

In addition to that, there is not a real good scientific method for testing. I went to region 3 in Philadelphia and asked them the question. They said there is not. They said it is still on the drawing boards at Ann Arbor and costs them $18,000 to produce a piece of equipment that would properly test.

I had a town hall meeting in Richland, Pa., in my congressional district to show this is not a Pennsylvania question only. A lady stood up and said she was in the Carolinas and she brought her car into a testing area. She tested it there and it failed. She took it outside the garage and sprayed the exhaust system with heavy perfume, brought it back through, and it passed.

So it just proves to me that is about the most unscientific thing that could be done.

In my view, the recommendation and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALGREN) asking for a 1-year delay is certainly in order.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. It is a good amendment and it should be adopted. Last year I opposed the amendment because I felt that the Committee on Energy and Commerce could amend this rigid and I believe unworkable provision to the Clean Air Act along the lines suggested by the National Commission on Air Quality.

The committee in its deliberations on clean air legislation did so. However, we have been unable to bring the bill to the floor in a timely fashion as I had hoped.

I no longer oppose this amendment. I believe the amendment is needed to afford the States the needed flexibility in achieving the clean air requirements of the act by the deadlines established in the act. The amendment will not in any way weaken the clean air requirements of the law. The amendment does not preclude the States from adopting an inspection and maintenance program. It only precludes EPA from requiring such program for a period of 1 year.

Some have suggested this amendment would bar EPA from lifting sanctions already imposed. That is not true. The amendment precludes EPA from enforcing sanctions against a State, and I quote, "for failure to adopt, implement, conduct, or enforce" an I&M program. It does not in any way affect whatever EPA authority exists under the Clean Air Act to terminate sanctions imposed by EPA for a failure to comply with the inspection and maintenance requirements of the act.

The act does not specifically provide authority for terminating sanctions. Indeed, I am uncertain about the basis for EPA taking such action. This amendment does not affect whatever meager authority EPA retains on such termination.

I support and I believe it is necessary that we should have a fair, a clear, a consistent, and ongoing inspection program where it may be needed for the most seriously polluted areas of the country.

However, the present law and its implementation has not provided such program. Inspection and maintenance is required regardless of the seriousness or term of the pollution problem. Indeed it is fair to observe that many areas in the country under the law as it is now constituted will be compelled to spend not millions or thousands but hundreds of millions of dollars to establish a program where it is unnecessary to achieve clean air quality after a very brief period of time.

The adopted program exempts many vehicles that are heavy polluters such as trucks, buses, and older cars. Certainly if cleanup is to occur, this is one of the beginning points where cleanup should be commenced. It places dollar limits on the repairs that benefit fleet owners, commercial users, the more affluent while individuals such as the occasional driver and the poor are compelled to pay.

Some States have adopted biennial programs which raises extreme doubts about the effectiveness of clean air. I would observe that the State of New Jersey, whose program has just been lauded for its popularity, was the subject of comment in a press release put out by the Governor and the attorney general wherein New Jersey has found it necessary to go to a biennial program, and the reason? Because motorists are being compelled to wait long periods of time—up to 3½ hours in line—to try and deal with the problems of inspection and maintenance, because the State has not been able to establish a program that will deal more expeditiously with the concerns of the State.

Beyond this, there are some other things that need to be observed.

The National Commission on Air Quality made recommendations about eliminating the inflexibility of the program now in law which was written more in enthusiasm than in knowledge. The Commission's recommendations, if adopted, will move us toward air quality; and if we are not able to deal with that question statutorily by legislative behavior, then at least we can prevent excessive hardship from being imposed upon the people by a provision of law that is uniformly recognized as being both excessive, inflexible, imposing hardships, and contributing only modestly to our progress in clean air.

I believe that since we are finding it enormously difficult to deal with the matter legislatively, we should at least deal with it on the basis of handling the matter under the appropriations law by withholding the funds.

I urge the adoption of the amendment. I believe that it is good, it is desirable, it is just, and it is fair. It meets the problems of the Nation and will not impair air quality.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the ranking member from Michigan for yielding to me and would like to say I strongly endorse what the gentleman in the well is saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) has expired.

(At the request of Mr. DUNN and by unanimous consent Mr. DINGELL was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. DUNN. If the gentleman will continue to yield, the gentleman in the well should be recognized as one of the original coauthors of the Clean Air Act. For him to endorse this as good policy should be good enough for all of us. I thank the gentleman for his leadership in this role.

Mr. DINGELL. I thank my dear friend. I would observe my colleagues in Pennsylvania like Mr. BAILEY and the author of the amendment have a legitimate complaint that should be met by the House.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM J. COYNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAM J. COYNE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment, a measure which makes light of the established committee process of this body while attempting to strike at the heart of the Clean Air Act.

If a Member has a disagreement with a portion of the Clean Air Act, a public law supported by more than 80 percent of the American people, according to recent polls, the House floor appropriations process is not the place to express that disagreement. The many complicated issues associated with the renewal of the Clean Air Act have been considered by the House Energy and Commerce Committee for months. It is in that forum, and in the House debate on the reauthorization of this very important act, that objections to specific provisions should be heard.

I am not sure of the purpose of this amendment, coming as it does in the midst of debate over an appropriations bill. Do the sponsors believe that by cutting off funds for a program they do not approve, that somehow their objections will be met?

Surely they know this is not the case. Funding sanctions in effect for areas in violation of clean air standards would not be lifted. Individual citizens will retain the right to sue for enforcement of the law where there are violations of emissions standards. If we are to relax the antipollution effort as it relates to autos, we can only expect the number of such suits to multiply, thereby turning over enforcement of the law to the courts.

The buck should stop with the Congress, which authorizes antipollution laws, and the administration, whose duty it is to enforce those laws. By agreeing to this amendment, we would be passing the buck to the courts. The air would not be less polluted, the basic law would not be changed, and the arguments over the inspection and maintenance program's effectiveness would continue. We risk, however, having those arguments ultimately settled in court if we strip the EPA of its ability to enforce existing law.

I believe the inspection and maintenance program of the EPA has proved effective in reducing pollution. According to a 1981 EPA study, estimates of emissions reductions average over a year included a 20-percent reduction in hydrocarbons and a 36-percent reduction in carbon monoxide. Carbon monoxide, we should remember, can cause chest pains and cardiovascular diseases. Hydrocarbons can lead to asthma, eye irritation, and breathing difficulty.

The inspection and maintenance program is also cost effective. A 1981 EPA update showed the cost of inspection to range from $17 in Portland, Oreg., to $30 in California.

Cutting off funds for this program will mean a rise in air pollution from automobiles. If we are to maintain our current clean air standards, we can then expect to hear demands for more stringent controls on industry. By relaxing our antipollution effort for mobile vehicles—the largest single source of pollution in the United States—we encourage more comprehensive controls on industries such as steel. This is an uninviting prospect indeed for an industry already hard pressed by imports and a general economic slowdown.

Mr. Chairman, by cutting off funds for a Federal antipollution effort, the advocates of this amendment argue in favor of States rights when it comes to controlling automobile emissions, conditions do indeed vary from State to State, and flexibility is an important part of the Clean Air Act. A retreat to States rights when it comes to reducing air pollution would undermine, however, one of the most basic rights of the entire population—the right to breathe clean air.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to reject this amendment.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I join with the distinguished ranking minority member of the subcommittee in opposing this amendment. We have been over this course before. It is a retread of the amendment that was defeated last year. I associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN) and the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MOFFETT) in opposing this amendment.

While the amendment would restrict EPA's activities, it does nothing to change the statutory requirement for inspection and maintenance programs in nonattainment areas. The requirement to implement I&M programs, and the sanctions for failure to do so, can still be enforced by citizen suits.

I am well aware of the funding sanctions currently in effect in Pennsylvania and I can understand that the gentleman would hope to provide some relief. But, let me assure you that this amendment would not, in any way, solve the problem of sanctions in Pennsylvania. The amendment is ineffective and at most will only serve to muddy the waters and confuse States over their legal responsibilities. Inspection and maintenance programs are now in operation in 10 States and will soon be initiated in at least 5 others.

And, the track record to date with inspection and maintenance is most encouraging. Initial fears that inspection and repair costs would be exorbitant and that the public would strongly reject I&M programs have proven wrong in cities across the country. The costs have been within acceptable levels and the benefits in reduced emissions have been substantial. In comparison to other techniques for reducing emissions—from both mobile and stationary sources—inspection and maintenance is a high payoff, cost effective strategy. I appreciate that in some areas of the country this is not a popular program. And I understand that the authorizing committees in both bodies have been carefully reviewing changes to fine tune inspection and maintenance requirements, and better tailor them to address the areas with the most serious pollution problems. This emphasizes the complexity of the issue and the need to undertake changes with care and deliberation. This is not the time and this bill is not the place to attempt to change inspection and maintenance.

I urge defeat of the amendment.

□ 1850

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to clear the air, if that is possible, on a few items that I know are very important to many of the people who will be called upon to make a difficult decision on this issue.

For one, this is the only provision of the Clean Air Act which actually mandates a process by which standards are to be met. By doing away with this provision for a 1-year period, in order to wait on overall action by the proper committee, in doing away with that we are not changing the standard. The State still has to meet the requisite ambient air quality standards. All other provisions of the Clean Air Act allow this kind of flexibility.

The gentlemen from Connecticut said that if it does not come out of autos, it will come out of factories.

Well, maybe there are States in this Union which feel that such a balance can be arrived at more effectively, more cost effectively and with less inconvenience to motorists.

Let us not make any mistakes here. There are 29 States involved to a greater or a lesser degree. We are talking about 44 million cars. That is large hornet's nest of dissatisfied motorists.

The irony is that many of these 29 States will meet the standards by the requisite date with or without the automobile inspection and maintenance program.

The fact remains, and this is so important, that there are certain areas which do need an automobile inspection and maintenance program and we are not arguing with it; but to say that Beverly Hills, Calif., should have the same air quality control program as Bethlehem, Pa., is making a serious mistake.

In Ohio, the Ohio EPA in a report to the general assembly found that a motor emissions I&M program will produce a relatively small improvement in air quality in Ohio at a relatively high cost.

Recent studies performed by the Illinois and Texas environmental agencies strongly disagree with previous estimates concerning the inspection's ability to reduce tailpipe emissions and challenge the program's overall costs and benefits. Each of these agencies recommended against adoption of an I&M program, although it must be admitted that all noted that such adoption might be a prudent action solely because of the possibility of Federal sanctions.

So that is the motivation in many of these 29 States—rush to judgment, push your motorists and consumers through the strainer, because otherwise Uncle Sam is going to cut off your Federal money, including air cleanup moneys, sewage moneys to make for a cleaner environment.

In other States, fraud and abuse runs rampant where this program is forced on the public. For example, in Rhode Island, a study done by the State attorney general's office showed that required emissions inspections are actually conducted less than 50 percent of the time. Many of these emissions inspections are conducted on a cursory basis, simply to put up with the existing law and have no positive effect, other than to financially burden consumers and motorists and inconvenience them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BAILEY) made a point that many of the cars that are going to see a negative effect on these tests are going to be the older cars and they are going to be owned by the poorer citizens. The repair on these cars will be extremely costly to those who can least afford it.

You know, if you have looked at what your own motorists are thinking about such a program and if you are in one of these 29 States, think of what the consumer must pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. RITTER was allowed to proceed for an additional 30 seconds.)

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, I urge Members in these 29 States consider what their motoring public thinks about an additional inspection burden on their automobiles. In my district, in response to a questionnaire, some 89 percent of the motorists said they did not think it would contribute to air quality in our region.

So when it comes to a vote, let us give those motorists a chance to have their voices heard in Washington.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to fully endorse and affirm the remarks made by my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL).

I think the point was well taken when a Member indicated that the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) in all his career in this House has been unequalled as far as his position on clean air is concerned and all the ramifications thereof; so I think that endorsement is important in itself and is illustrative of how the Pennsylvania delegation feels.

In conclusion, I want to make this point. Pennsylvania has always been in the vanguard of all the States, and I say that advisedly, all the States as far as the clean air act precepts are concerned and also the initial adoption of the Clean Air Act as we have grown to know it.

I think Pennsylvania now needs and it is obvious the need has been met, as illustrated by our many colleagues who have said that Pennsylvania deserves this consideration at this time; so I would ask our colleagues to support the position as set forth by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) and the Pennsylvania delegation.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAYDOS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I merely wanted to agree with the gentleman and say that it is not only the State of Pennsylvania, but all the States of the Union who deserve the amendment.

I thank the gentleman.

I strongly support the Dannemeyer amendment, which attempts to strike a provision to force States to institute vehicle emission control programs by withholding Federal funds from States which do not have programs.

Absent this amendment, we will have another situation like the seatbelt interlock or the mandatory airbags.

It is not a bad idea to impose Federal standards. It is a remarkably lousy idea to force States to create specific programs whether the States want them or not.

The Dannemeyer amendment should be passed.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment forbidding EPA from enforcing the Clean Air Act's requirement that automobile inspection and maintenance (I&M) programs be established in areas that violate air pollution standards. This effort, which prohibits EPA from using its funds to enforce the I&M program, is another in a series of actions to undercut our Nation's environmental laws in an indirect fashion. My colleagues are well aware of the strong public support for many of our Nation's environmental laws; from clean air to wilderness protection, the public has made its voice heard. That voice is very clear, and the message is simple. The public is telling Congress to keep its hands off environmental laws.

Already this year there have been efforts to significantly weaken the Clean Air Act, the Endangered Species Act, the Wilderness Act of 1964, the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act, and the Clean Water Act. Last week the House overwhelmingly affirmed its commitment to the safe disposal of hazardous waste with the passage of the reauthorization of the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act. Despite this strong support, an attempt is now being made to weaken one of the most important sections of the Clean Air Act by barring EPA from using funds to enforce a legislative program.

I urge all my colleagues to oppose the Walgren-Dannemeyer amendment. The substance of this amendment is not appropriate for an appropriations bill. Rather, the merits of the I&M programs should be debated in the Energy and Commerce Committee as it reviews amendments to the Clean Air Act. If the committee sends a bill repealing the I&M requirement to the House floor for a vote, then this body will be meeting the merits of the question directly. That is the best way to proceed on this issue; by repealing the program by withholding funds, we not only lose the benefit of a thoughtful discussion of the merits, but we also cheat the American people by avoiding an issue that deserves our careful attention.

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Dannemeyer-Walgren amendment to H.R. 6956, the HUD-independent agencies appropriations bill.

The Dannemeyer-Walgren amendment would prohibit the Environmental Protection Agency from expending funds to enforce Clean Air Act provisions requiring States to implement motor vehicle inspection and maintenance (I&M) programs for nonattainment areas. Although the intent of this amendment is clearly to prevent EPA from requiring implementation of I&M, the effect of the amendment may be completely different. Let me cite an example in my own State of California.

The State of California has encountered considerable difficulty in devising an acceptable I&M program. This is largely due to questions of management, not substance. For the past several years the Environmental Protection Agency has strictly enforced the sanctions required under law for States not complying with the mandated inspection and maintenance programs. Just last month, due to the tireless efforts of State Senator Robert Presley, the California Legislature approved an I&M program. It seems ironic after taking this action that the EPA should change the ground rules just as these sanctions were to be lifted. But even more astonishing is the possibility that if this amendment passes, EPA may be actually be prohibited from lifting the sanctions against California.

Inspection and maintenance is a major policy issue that ought to be resolved in the context of the Clean Air Act reauthorization. The administration opposes the amendment because of the administrative nightmares it could cause. This is especially significant in light of the fact that the administration would favor such a change in the Clean Air Act reauthorization. My own view is that I&M works, and is one of the ways we can work for cleaner air. I have pointed out before in debate on this same issue that my district is the second most air polluted region in the country. Let us not send the wrong signal to States like California that have implemented these programs by voting for this amendment. The public supports the Clean Air Act and has shown its willingness to pay for cleaning up the air. Let us start with I&M.●

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, my home district of Denver, Colo., still has a severe air pollution problem: According to the Council on Environmental quality, the fourth worst in the country. It took the threat of EPA sanctions to get the Colorado State Legislature to pass an inspection and maintenance program. Today that progran is in place and working. Without the EPA's power to impose sanctions, I fear the air in Denver would have been allowed to continue to deteriorate. Shackling EPA's power to enforce the Clean Air Act will undermine this program as well as other inspection and maintenance programs already implemented.

The citizens of Colorado, Illinois, California, and those of every other State in the Union have a right to breath air that is not harmful to their health. The fight for clean, breathable air is an obtainable goal, but it is far from being won. Let us not stop the march in midstride. I urge my colleagues to reject this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALGREN).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

□ 1910

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Boner of Tennessee for, with Mr. Zeferetti against.

Mr. Thomas for, with Mr. Akaka against.

Messrs. EDWARDS of California, GIBBONS, STRATTON, RHODES, LONG of Maryland, MITCHELL of Maryland, SMITH of Iowa, FORD of Tennessee, and MINISH changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. HERTEL, BRODHEAD, and FOLEY changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 6956. As many Members will understand, this subcommittee bill actually exceeds by several hundreds of millions of dollars in budget authority the programmatic assumptions which underlay the budget resolution.

□ 1920

It is not unusual for the Appropriations Committee to fund discretionary items more than the budget assumptions would have called for and then later to come at us with supplementals which then tend to raise the total outlays, as well as later in the year, beyond the ranges we have approved in the budget.

However, Mr. Chairman, in this case the distinguished subcommittee chairman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND) has met with administration representatives and has agreed, as he stated earlier on the floor, to restrict the housing supplemental to the level of not more than $9.6 billion which in fact would make his total appropriation within all of the limits of the budget resolution and all of the programmatic assumptions, as I understand them, as they were passed by this House.

I would prefer a smaller appropriation and yet, because I think this is a signal achievement of the Appropriations Committee and of the gentleman from Massachusetts in prenegotiating and trying to obviate a possible veto of this bill, I want to congratulate the gentleman and the distinguished ranking member also from Massachusetts.

I would suggest that we should all vote for this bill as a sign of encouragement for future negotiations and cooperation and to encourage the committee and its members to indulge in the same sort of conduct in the future as they work their way through the appropriations bills.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the chairman of the subcommittee and all of its members for a splendid job.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I now yield to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, recently endorsed by both parties, and thereby elected.

Mr. CONTE. I thank the gentleman.

I just want to commend the gentleman for his remarks and say that I did have a colloquy earlier today with the very able chairman of the subcommittee, EDDIE BOLAND, and based upon that colloquy we have had the assurance of the White House that they will sign this bill.

Hopefully the other body will not tamper too much with it and mess it up and pass it down to the President, because this will be the first appropriation bill signed by the President this year.

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike the requisite number of words.

I am pleased to inform the membership of the Committee that there are no more amendments pending at the desk. If there are no more amendments in the pockets of Members, that will conclude the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY) having assumed the chair, Mr. LEVITAS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6956) making appropriations for the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and for sundry independent agencies, boards, commissions, corporations, and offices for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1983, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 343, nays 38, not voting 51, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 562, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, 1982

Mr. MOAKLEY, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. 97-810) on the resolution (H. Res. 582) providing for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 562) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982 which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST H.R. 7019, TRANSPORTATION AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS, 1983

Mr. MOAKLEY, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 97-811) on the resolution (H. Res. 583) waiving certain points of order against the bill (H.R. 7019) making appropriations for the Department of Transportation and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1983, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF S. 2177, COLORADO RIVER BASIN PROJECT ACT

Mr. MOAKLEY, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 97-812) on the resolution (H. Res. 584) providing for the consideration of the bill (S. 2177) to amend title III of the Colorado River Basin Project Act, Public Law 90-537 (82 Stat. 885), as amended by Public Law 95-578 (92 Stat. 2471), and Public Law 96-375 (94 Stat. 1505), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

A TRIBUTE TO GRACE KELLY

(Mr. FOGLIETTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, rarely does the world have the opportunity to observe a public figure who personifies the title of Princess with such dignity and grace. Princess Grace of Monaco was such a figure. Her passing yesterday leaves a void in the lives of everyone she touched that shall never be filled. It is with a very deep sadness that I rise to pay my respects to her, to her family, to the people of Monaco, and the people of Philadelphia, the city she called home for many years. As a woman, she had no peer. She personified dignity, style, and intelligence. She represented her new nation well, and earned the trust and respect of the entire international community. In every situation, from the simplest public ceremony to the most intricate diplomatic function, she was unfailingly gracious, courteous, and unpretentious. But she was more than just gracious, she was a talented, capable advocate of her beliefs and concerns. She was an extraordinary individual. The pressures of stardom from her film career were great. The responsibilities that that career created kept her constantly in the spotlight, constantly the focus of attention. Although she never disappointed her fans in her public life, she never allowed her career to endanger the devotion to her family life, which was so important to her. She found time to be a mother, a wife, a spokeswoman, and an example to everyone of the meaning of intelligence, beauty, and charm. Princess Grace, a dear friend and a bright light in every corner of the world, was a unique and wonderful person. We are the poorer for her passing as we were the richer for her presence in our lives.

THE LESSON IN BASHIR GEMAYEL'S DEATH

(Mr. SCHEUER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, we all mourn the tragic assassination yesterday of Bashir Gemayel, the President-elect of Lebanon. Compounding Gemayel's loss is the fact that his murder may have ended more than just the life of a promising, pro-Western moderate Arab leader.

Bashir Gemayel's death represents another major setback for hopes of peace in the entire region and represents, once again, the pattern that has become all too familiar in the deadly poison and complicated politics of the Middle East.

Gemayel, like Egypt's Sadat before him, was pragmatic, moderate, staunchly pro-American and increasingly amenable to reaching a peaceful accord with Israel. Gemayel was an enemy to the radical Arab factions, particularly the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Syrians. And so he was murdered.

Just 23 days ago, at the very moment of Gemayel's election by the Lebanese National Assembly, I stood in the streets of Beirut and saw the effect of his charisma and the hope his election held out for the people of his war-torn nation. Two of my colleagues, Representative MARIO BIAGGI and Representative RAY MCGRATH, stood in the street with me as all around us the air was punctuated with crackling Kalashnikow machinegun fire, teenage children running ecstatically up the sidewalks, people hanging from every window and spilling out of cars to catch a glimpse of Gemayel sweeping past on his way to the National Assembly to accept their nomination. Hope was in the air, mixed with genuine relief that peace and a stable government might be restored at last.

Now Gemayel is gone, and the hope may also be gone.

There are lessons in this tragedy for the United States and clear implications for the wider concerns of an overall Middle East peace.

It is time for the Reagan administration and the United States to stop publicly pointing the finger at Israel as the sole instigator of unrest in the Middle East. This has become the principle indoor activity for the United Nations and radical Arab States in other world forums. It is unseemly for the United States to appear to be sinking to this simplistic and unrealistic course. Moreover, it is downright counterproductive.

Gemayel's death underscores, once again, the fragile nature of moderation in the region—particularly for leaders who oppose the murderous policies of the radical Arab States and the PLO. His death illuminates the stark reality that assassination is a high probability risk for any moderate Arab leader who seeks accommodation with Israel.

It is one thing for the United States aggressively to pursue peace plans in consultation with the only stable, democratic country in the region, our ally Israel. It is quite another to attempt to superimpose master plans for territorial reorganization that are orchestrated halfway around the world in Washington not with Israel but rather with Jordan, Saudia Arabia, and others who have been degrading the Camp David process since its inception.

Even if Israel were to disappear entirely from the face of the Earth, the fervent historical wish of her neighbors, violence and diplomacy by assassination will still be the order of the day throughout the turbulent Arab world.

The history of the Near and Middle East is violence. Murder is the political weapon of choice. From Israel's first breath as a sovereign state it has been surrounded by the thunder of gunfire. The endless wars launched from neighboring Arab countries, the terrorists, the bombings in crowded markets, the children lost as school buses were dynamited, the shelling of villages that produced an entire generation of people who think a bomb shelter is a basic room in any house—these are Israel's history.

For the Arab States, violence with or without Israel as an excuse—is endemic. Perennial conflict and bloodshed between Shi'ite and Sunni Moslems, civil wars between Christians and Moslems in Lebanon, bloody fighting between King Hussein's Bedouin tribesmen and the West Bank Arabs, deadly confrontations between leftist Moslems and rightist Moslems are background noise to the assassinations of Anwar Sadat and Bashir Gemayel. As war rages between Iraq and Iran, the decades old murderous enmities among Egyptians, Syrians, and Libyans, continues unabated.

No, the Arab world does not need Israel as a reason to be engulfed by violence.

All the evidence of the past 50 years, so vividly underlined by yesterday's assassination, suggests that moderate Arab leadership, inclined toward peaceful coexistence with Israel, is an endangered species.

Israel knows, as do the Arabs, that any agreement, any treaty, is subject to the bomb and the bullet at the hands of the PLO and its radical allies throughout the Arab world. Murder, assassination and political violence is an integral part of the political mix in the Middle East.

When President Reagan presented his peace plan for the Middle East it failed to take into account this vital equation. Leaving aside the obvious difficulties in the method and timing of President Reagan's proposals, we are left with a plan that essentially asks Israel to trade away her security on the marginal hope that moderates, whether Fahd of Saudi Arabia, Hussein or Jordan, or even Bashir Gemayel of Lebanon, will survive. The surrender of land, vital to Israel's physical security, is forever—while the promises of moderate Arab leaders is a transitory moment between gunshots.

Is it any wonder that the Israeli Government appears reluctant to negotiate giving up territory in the hopes that moderate Arab leaders will be in a position to deliver on promises of lasting peace and security for Israel?

The message for the United States is that simplistic quick-fix solutions which ignore the almost incomprehensibly bloody history of the last thousand years and the murderous legacy of hatred that nurtures the Arab radical's approach to Israel is to not contribute to the solution but instead become a major part of the problem.

Israel has been described as a country that is one bomb wide. No country in such a position is going to compromise the modest security it has won at such a terrible cost to its own people.

For the Reagan administration to expect this is to ignore history and reality.

OPPOSING TRANSFER OF NIOSH TO NIH (H.R. 6355)

(Mr. JOHNSTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Speaker, we have been asked to suspend the rules in order to consider on the floor the matter of the organizational placement of the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health. But I must raise two warnings. In the first place, this is not a minor technical amendment to legislation, but rather a substantive reordering of programs that would have a significant impact on the health operations of NIOSH, a $60 million agency. And, we are being offered political shenanigans that would be sold to us under the label of improved organizational effectiveness. We should not let ourselves become victims of the hoax.

Let us examine the impact of this amendment. NIOSH is now a part of the Centers for Disease Control, which is the principal agency of the Public Health Service concerned with the prevention of illness and premature death. NIOSH fits well in this organizational environment where the focus is on pragmatic and service-oriented health programs. NIOSH conducts field investigations to evaluate health hazards in the workplace—an activity akin to the well-known epidemic assistance provided by CDC. There are other similarities. NIOSH provides scientific recommendations to regulatory agencies as CDC does in the area of clinical laboratory practice and immunization. NIOSH carries out regulatory powers in its testing and certification of personal protective equipment, whereas CDC enforces the Nation's foreign quarantine requirements.

The amendment would move NIOSH out of this compatible organizational environment, and place it in the National Institutes of Health. Although there is some similarity between the two in that both conduct research, there is a significant difference in the focus of that research. NIOSH focuses heavily on identifying workplace hazards that cause injury or disease. This is directed research that must be related to prevention through regulation or other means. At the Bethesda campus we have, on the other hand, the Nation's premier biomedical research organization whose sole mission is to acquire new scientific knowledge. I submit that even in the one area of apparent similarity, research, there are very important differences between NIOSH and NIH. The Director of NIH has stated that the NIOSH mission is incompatible with that of NIH. Therefore, we must consider carefully the diversionary and detrimental impact that would result by the mismatch of the other mandated NIOSH activities, which can be confrontational in nature, on the basic research environment of NIH. To do this work, we, the Congress, have authorized NIOSH to use warrants and subpenas in the execution of right of entry and right of access to data. These are hardly the tools of Nobel Prize winners. I reiterate, this bill is not a technical amendment.

I contend that the motivations are purely political. The amendment is being offered as a part of a partisan political effort to reverse the move of NIOSH headquarters from the Washington area to Atlanta, Ga. More than a year ago, the NIOSH headquarters was transferred to Atlanta, Ga. However, appropriation language was passed which stopped that move midstream, with the top NIOSH leadership in Atlanta, and a dissident support staff remaining in Rockville, Md. Obviously, it is more difficult to exert day-to-day influence on an organization located more than 600 miles away. This current amendment is a blatant maneuver to deepen the disruption of NIOSH by having it report to another organization located in the Washington area—NIH. This ploy is being proposed by those who, under the cover of last year's budget conflicts and crises, slipped through an apparently innocent provision which has handcuffed an important health agency. For 12 long months, the move of the NIOSH headquarters has been in limbo. This hiatus has resulted in the discontinuation or delay of program activities and in missed opportunities. For example, we are still waiting for the production of the scientific document on radio frequency microwaves. Plans to upgrade some 20 standards have for the most part been delayed and, it has been impossible to proceed with plans to improve the effectiveness of the NIOSH safety program. We cannot allow this sort of thing to happen again. In fact, we should take steps to assure that last year's mistake is corrected.

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE KEITH SEBELIUS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous matter, on the life, character, and public service of our late colleague, Hon. Keith Sebelius.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have taken this special order today in behalf of our former colleague Keith Sebelius who passed away September 5. I am joined in this special order by my good friend and colleague, Mr. WINN, the dean of our Kansas congressional delegation.

One week ago today, funeral services were held for Keith in his hometown of Norton, Kans. The services represented a genuine outpouring of affection and love for Keith Sebelius, the public servant and the man.

Mr. Speaker, I have had the privilege of working for Keith during his tenure in the Congress. And, having this privilege, afforded me the opportunity to know Keith as a close personal friend, a mentor, and in such a way that we enjoyed a father-son relationship. My deepest sympathies are extended to Keith's wife, Bette, his sons Gary and Doug, and their families. My family and I share in their sense of personal loss.

We have been blessed with many fine public servants in Kansas, but with Keith, his record, his service, and most of all his relationship with people was something unique and special. Since his passing, leading newspapers in Kansas have eulogized his service and his contributions and his memory. In accurate and eloquent terms, they describe his life in full. Following my remarks, I will include editorials from the Wichita Eagle, the Larned Tiller & Toiler, the Hutchinson News, and the Topeka Capital-Journal. And a personal biography. These columns, editorials, and eulogies are representative of many others published in newspapers throughout Kansas.

Mr. Speaker, when I think of Keith Sebelius, I think of his impressive record of public service, his legislative accomplishments, but the one attribute that I feel was so special and unique was the example he set for me and for others. In working for Keith you were not just a staff member, you were a member of a family. And, throughout his entire career, through demanding and tough times in Kansas and here in Washington, I never once saw Keith Sebelius lose his temper. He was truly a Christian in practice.

Even during his battle with his personal illness, when he was receiving treatment in the early morning hours and going through a very difficult time, he did not complain or he did not rail against his fate. He was, in fact, a source of inspiration and hope to those who were around him.

What a wonderful tribute to a man that can be said he was truly beloved by all who knew him. For you see, Mr. Speaker, the more you knew Keith, the better you liked him. He never sought higher office or desired anything other than being the best Congressman he could be. It was the way he went about the job of fulfilling that responsibility that was so special.

For myself with memories that will last my lifetime, for fellow staff members whose lives he touched and whose memories of him are so special and unique, for the citizens he represented so well, our feelings can be summed up with the words that were on a sign in front of the Norton High School during the day of his funeral services. With flags in Norton at half staff, with businesses closed, with hundreds of friends attending the services, the sign simply read, "Goodbye Keith, thanks for everything."

The editorials follow:

BIOGRAPHY OF KEITH G. SEBELIUS

Keith Sebelius of Norton, served six terms in the U.S. House of Representatives from the First Congressional District of Kansas. The district is comprised of 57 counties, takes in 60% of the state and is known as the "Big First."

Representing the nation's largest wheat producing district, the Congressman was appropriately a member of the House Committee on Agriculture and the ranking minority member of the Livestock and Grains Subcommittee. He authored numerous amendments to farm bills enacted by Congress and was the principal sponsor of major farm legislation.

Sebelius was instrumental in locating one of the first Youth Conservation Corps Projects at Fort Hays Kansas State College.

His interest in conservation, water resources and national parks led him to seek membership on the Interior Committee. He was the ranking minority member of the National Parks and Insular Affairs Subcommittee. He played a leading role in enlarging the Indiana Dunes Lakeshore and expanding the nation's wilderness system.

Sebelius' goal was to help make government more responsive to the needs of rural America. His legislative programs dealt primarily with agriculture, small business, senior citizens, postal service, health care and government programs as they apply to rural areas.

Before entering the U.S. House of Representatives, Sebelius served six years in the Kansas State Senate.

In 1968, he was elected to the 91st Congress and has returned in five successive elections. He led the Republican ticket in Kansas in 1976 with over 73% of the vote. Sebelius received the Wheat Man of the Year award from the Kansas Association of Wheatgrowers in 1975. He has received several Watchdog of the Treasury awards from the National Association of Businessmen and several Man of the Year awards from the National Federation of Independent Businessmen for service to small businessmen in Kansas.

Born and reared in Almena, Sebelius graduated from Fort Hays Kansas State College. He received his law degree from George Washington University Law School. Sebelius served in the Army during World War II and was recalled during the Korean Conflict. After WWII, he returned home to practice law in Norton County where he became active in civic and political affairs. He served as city councilman, city attorney and mayor of Almena. He was elected Norton County Attorney and served as Norton's city attorney.

Sebelius and his wife, Bette, also a native of Almena, had two sons, Gary and Doug. Gary graduated from Georgetown University Law School and is a lawyer in Topeka. Doug graduated from Washburn University Law School in Topeka and is currently in practice with his father in Norton. Both sons are graduates of Kansas State University.

Sebelius served as lay leader, president of the Board of Trustees and Sunday School teacher of the United Methodist Church, and past commander of the Kansas American Legion.

He was a member of the Board of Directors of Valley Hope Alcohol Treatment Association, member of the Endowment Association of that Fort Hays Kansas State University and was past president of the Fort Hays Alumini Association, and member of the advisory board on National Parks, U.S. Department of Interior.

[From the Wichita Eagle Beacon, Sept. 12, 1982]

SEBELIUS WAS A KANSAS'S KANSAN

(By George Neavoll)

I'm sorry Keith, I never called.

I had been going to, and in fact, I did try a couple of times.

But, each time, the secretary in his law office said Keith Sebelius was out, either away on business or taking care of some party work.

Keith always was a workhorse for the Republican party, and seldom turned down any request for him to lend his name and his efforts to assure a GOP victory at the next election.

I remember the time a couple of years ago I heard him speak to the gathered faithful at Kansas Day activities in Topeka. His longtime administrative assistant Pat Roberts, had been elected the fall before to take his place in Washington, and he was exhorting party workers to take advantage of the country's swing toward Republicanism after four years of Democratic rule.

Now that the Grand Old Party had regained the White House and held a majority in the House of Representatives, he said, it was "time to plant the potatoes" of fiscal responsibility, and get the country back on the road to economic recovery.

His voice broke a couple of times, as he alluded to his own mortality. But Keith Sebelius was a man of faith, and if his bout with cancer ever scared him—and I'm sure it must have—he never let it show.

That was the same year Keith was named Kansan of the Year by the Native Sons and Daughters of Kansas.

A more appropriate honor never was bestowed. If anyone ever epitomized the heat and soul of Kansas, it was Keith Sebelius He was a "straightshooter," as they used to say, and he was the same before presidents or plains folks.

He knew his sprawling 1st district constituency as perhaps no one did before or since, and he was at home wherever a human being hung his—or her—hat.

Keith was a politician, first, last and always, and knew the importance of the political process in changing things for the better. He was a Republican, but he was as much at ease among Democrats as among his party colleagues. And the Democrats—though some probably would have been reluctant to admit it when he was in public life—loved him in return.

His modus operandi, when the time came for him to announce his candidacy for another election, was to mount the courthouse steps in his hometown of Norton, and tell the people why he wanted to invest another part of his life in their future.

The last time he did that was in May 1978, as he was contemplating his sixth term in Congress. "My primary goal," he said then, "will be to continue to work to make government more responsive to our needs in our rural and small community areas, to fight for that fair shake we have not been getting."

If anything summarized Keith Sebelius' attitude toward government, and the role of the public servant in a position of authority, that was it. He saw government as the means for an informed people to assure their livelihoods and the quality thereof.

He was the champion of the American farmer, and never tired of telling the world outside Western Kansas of the problems the farmer faced as he attempted to feed a world that sometimes seemed to think food on the table originated in the supermarket.

Keith was one of the first people I contacted when we moved to Kansas, and soon after that, when he was in Wichita to address some group, we got together for lunch.

I wanted advice on how an outsider such as myself might best get to know Kansas and the Kansas people, and particularly how to inform myself on the farm problem.

"The thing to remember about the farmer," he said then, as best I remember the conversation, "is that no one person speaks for him. If 20 farmers get together, you'll get 20 different views on the farm problem and how to deal with it. That just demonstrates the complexity of the situation."

It was my first insight into how hard some of the solutions to the farmer's plight might be, and why more hadn't been done to address it.

Good government and agriculture were only two of Keith's many abiding interests. Another was the preservation of the nation's natural and historic heritage in the National Park System.

He was ranking minority member of the House Interior Committee's national parks subcommittee at the time of his retirement, and one of his last acts was helping shepherd through the House a critical package of land additions to the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore. Keith knew of my interest in the dunes, since I had lived in both Indiana and neighboring Michigan, and had editorialized many times on their behalf.

After he left office, and was appointed to the National Park System Advisory Board, he wrote me a little note informing me of that, and scribbled on the back: "I'll try to look out for Indiana Dunes for you."

I'm sure he did that, to the extent that he could, just as he looked out for the interests of all his people, of whatever political persuasion or philosophical stripe.

He was indeed a Kansan's Kansan, and no son or daughter of this state could aspire to a greater task than to emulate the life of the man from Norton.

He's gone from among us now, but the example he set will live forever. Rest well, dear friend. You planted some good potatoes.

[From the Larned Tiller & Toiler, Sept. 9, 1982]

A LOOK AT KEITH

(Editor's note: The following editorial was written by Lee Musil of Burdett, who served as agriculture assistant to Congressman Sebelius in Washington from 1976-1979.)

Keith Sebelius was a politician in the finest sense of the word. During his years of campaigning and representing, he acquired admiration and respect based on honesty and trust rather than back biting and intimidation.

He set a fine Christian example for his staff and Congressional colleagues. He never lost his temper; he never held a grudge. He insisted that his staff give proper respect to all members of Congress, whether they were Republican or Democrat, and always preface their names with "Congressman" or "Mr."

He prided his office in providing the best constituent services of the Kansas Congressional delegation. His staff size was leaner than most but extremely dedicated and was among the lowest in personnel turnovers of any Congressional office. He made it clear that we were not working for the glory of Keith Sebelius but for the people of the big First.

He was amazingly efficient with his time management. I have never been associated with a more punctual person. Despite the intense demands of his time, I can never remember him missing a roll call of the Agriculture Committee.

One time after a crucial vote, he was asked if he considered himself a follower or a leader. "Both," he said. "I try to follow the wishes of my district as much as possible but there are times when I must take a tough stand that I know will be in the long range best interest of my people."

When once accused of being too parochial in his voting, he replied, "If I don't represent the best interests of the Big First, nobody else will."

Another time he was asked if he considered himself an important person. "No, I don't feel important," he said. "My hometown people wouldn't ever let me."

Henry C. Clausen, sovereign grand commander of the Scottish Rite Bodies of Freemasonry, has said, "Modesty with our superiors is a duty; with our equals a courtesy; and with our subordinates, nobility." Keith Sebelius, himself a 33rd-degree Mason, was truly noble to those who knew him. We of the First District can be deeply grateful for the footprints he has left in the sands of time.

KEITH G. SEBELIUS

Keith G. Sebelius, the former Congressman from Western Kansas, who died last week after a long battle with cancer, didn't care whether he made headlines. He just cared whether he helped make good legislation.

He didn't have that magical quality called charisma. He just had the trust of his colleagues and his constituents.

He wasn't regarded as an eloquent speaker. He just had that rare ability to be a good listener.

He was not especially innovative. He just was able to get both sides to agree when before they couldn't.

He didn't have his name on a lot of bills and laws. He just attended all the committee meetings, always cast his vote, always kept his appointments.

He wasn't showy about being a congressman, just effective.

When he first learned he had cancer, Sebelius scheduled his cobalt treatments at 6 a.m. so he wouldn't miss any time on the job. Throughout his illness he worked despite considerable pain, but never complained, never lost his temper, noted his long-time aide and eventual successor in the House of Representatives, Pat Roberts.

Though many people remember Sebelius as a congressman primarily and properly concerned with laws regarding agriculture, he played an influential role in much of the legislation dealing with the National Park System. Here again, it was his ability to get environmentalists and industry to see eye to eye that resulted in laws being passed where a stalemate appeared likely.

Among the crowd of people at Republican Keith Sebelius' funeral last week were many prominent Kansas Democrats—including one whom Sebelius had defeated in an election.

That was not a "political compromise" of the kind in which Sebelius was so skilled. It was simply a fitting farewell tribute to a good congressman, and a good man.

[From the Hutchinson News, Sept. 8, 1982]

KEITH SEBELIUS

Keith cares.

With those two words, Keith Sebelius carved a niche in the history of Kansas. Used in one of his campaigns for Congress, the slogan was simple. Yet it carried the message of a dedicated man, with undoubted clarity.

When Mr. Sebelius died this week, agriculture lost one of its most valued friends. Kansas lost a good citizen. Thousands of folks lost a friend.

During the 12 years he spent in Washington, Mr. Sebelius carried the concerns of his beloved "Big First" district on his sleeve, as well as in his heart. He once wore a bread wrapper to remind big-city representatives that farmers were not reaping the benefits of spiraling food costs.

Keith Sebelius was not a recognized speaker, but the sincerity with which he approached the nation's problems was recognized as an eloquence all its own. His strength rested in his ability to reason and compromise without giving up the ideals in which he believed.

When the time came for him to return to his hometown of Norton, he did so with grace. He was retiring from Congress, he announced, but not from involvement in the things that had interested him all his life.

One of the areas he served well during his congressional tenure was the national park system. Interior Secretary James Watt recognized his interest and appointed him to the national park advisory board.

His office motto was: "Smother them with the milk of human kindness."

The motto wasn't born of political motivation, but of belief in its message.

The belief, the service and the life which it embraced will remain a part of the heritage of the state he loved so well, so long, and so effectively.

□ 1950

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sorrow in which I rise today to participate in this special order for our departed friend and former colleague from Kansas First Big District, Keith G. Sebelius.

For over a decade, Keith epitomized the role of a Member of Congress through his dedicated hard work both for his constituents in Kansas and the Nation. And, I had the distinct privilege in serving with Keith through his tenure in this Chamber.

A graduate of Fort Hays Kansas State College and George Washington University Law School, Keith served his country in both World War II and the Korean conflict. Thereafter, he served as city councilman, mayor, city attorney, county attorney, State senator (6 years), and legislative council (4 years). Also, he became a member of the Kansas Department of Economic Development and the Capital Area Planning Commission.

It was through his diligent efforts on two committee assignments—Agriculture and Interior and Insular Affairs—in which he gained our tremendous respect. Although I represent a large metropolitan area in southeast Los Angeles which, of course, is not directly involved in the developments of these two committees, I came to admire Keith for his efforts on behalf of our Nation's farmers and rural America. In his 12 years in Congress, Keith did more in influencing legislation for America's heartland than many Members accomplish in their lifetime in Washington. Through his position as a leading minority member of the Agriculture Committee, Keith not only introduced legislation for the farm community but, most importantly, he usually got it enacted into law. When Keith retired at the end of the 96th Congress, America's farmers truly lost one of their strongest allies.

However, Keith also directed much of his energies toward the protection of our country's wilderness areas. In his capacity as a senior member of the Interior Committee, Keith was a consistent and strong advocate for conservation. In fact, he was instrumental in establishing one of the first Youth Conservation Corps projects at his alma mater, Fort Hays State University.

In recognition of his contributions and efforts, Keith was the recipient of numerous awards and honors by many distinguished organizations. For example, he was named as "Wheat Man of the Year" award by the Kansas wheatgrowers in 1975; five "Man of the Year" awards by the National Federation of Independent Businessmen; and five "Watchdog of the Treasury" awards from the National Association of Businessmen.

Mr. Speaker, as you well know, when one enters service in the House he or she does not earn a respectable image through lackadaisical efforts; they earn it. Keith was one of those who genuinely earned this respect from Members on both sides of the aisle. His contributions to the betterment of America were countless. We can only hope that those who are elected to Congress in the future will be of the same high caliber that Keith was.

My wife, Lee, joins me in extending our heartfelt condolences to Keith's wife, Bette, and their two sons, Gary and Doug.

Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, on September 5, 1982, the State of Kansas and the United States lost a true and loyal friend. Those of us in the Kansas delegation had the privilege of knowing and working with this fine human being. Keith Sebelius epitomized the public servant. He was dedicated to the people he represented in the "Big First District" of Kansas. On his retirement from Congress he returned to spend his last days with the people he knew and loved. I would like to repeat my floor comments of July 30, 1980 when our former colleague retired, but I will not.

Keith has spent the last 2 years fighting a losing battle with cancer, and now he has left us.

Keith was a pillar of strength in his defense of the Nation's farmers and rural Americans. Each of us know that his priority list had always been headed by a deep concern for the future of American agriculture—an industry whose health and survival are critical to the continued vitality of the country. During his 12 years in the Congress I frequently called on Keith for his counsel on matters concerning agriculture and he was always there and with the answer that was right. His love and work for our National Park System is well known, and after retirement the President had the good judgement to appoint Keith to serve on the National Park Service Advisory Council which he did as unselfishly as he had always served.

He was a good person. He was hard working, dedicated, honest and honorable and a great family man. People of his caliber do not come along every day. Joan and I were proud to call him our friend, and our heartfelt sympathy goes out to Bette, and Keith's sons Doug and Gary.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that along with the many editorials that have been written about our former colleague, Keith Sebelius, that two be placed in the RECORD; one from the Kansas City Star, which is titled "Unpretentious Lawmaker Left Worthy Legacy," and another from the Olathe Daily News.

I would also like at this time to include a letter written to me, Mr. Speaker, from our former colleague from the Fourth Congressional District, Garner E. Shriver, who was a very close friend of our deceased colleague, Keith Sebelius.

At the same time, I would like to include along with my remarks the remarks of Congressman GENE TAYLOR from the State of Missouri:

[From the Kansas City Star]

UNPRETENTIOUS LAWMAKER LEFT WORTHY LEGACY

(By Stephen C. Fehr)

TOPEKA.—"When you go into a restaurant, if you don't eat the rolls, mess them up a little."

Keith Sebelius of Norton in northwest Kansas came up with that maxim for wheat farmers, who were a major part of his constituency in the 12 years he represented the 1st District of western Kansas as its Republican U.S. representative.

Tearing up a roll, Mr. Sebelius reasoned, would mean that the restaurant couldn't serve it again. More rolls require more wheat.

Mr. Sebelius died Sunday of cancer at the age of 65, leaving a legacy of fighting for farmers and the rural way of life that was the dominant characteristic of the 61-county district, one of the nation's largest. Western Kansans know the district as the "Big First."

Though Mr. Sebelius wasn't much of a force in Congress—he never had any of his own legislation approved in 12 years—he was one of the most loved members of the Kansas delegation. Genuine and homespun, Mr. Sebelius was unpretentious and seemingly immune to Potomac fever, an affliction that causes politicians forget their home state.

"I may not go down in history for writing a lot of hallmark legislation on everything under the sun, but the ones I've worked on have done something," Mr. Sebelius said in a candid self-appraisal when he retired in 1981. "I think I've helped farmers, and I think the national park system is better because I was here."

The practical impact of Mr. Sebelius's death on Kansas politics will be minimal. He had built up a network of supporters throughout the heavily Republican district who worked to make his seat secure. When he retired, his Washington assistant, Pat Roberts, capitalized on knowing everyone in that network and won the seat.

[From the Olathe (Kans.) Daily News, Sept. 8, 1982]

KEITH SEBELIUS

Every year that he served in Congress, Keith Sebelius at least once, and more often twice, would visit each of the 57 Western Kansas counties that he represented in Washington. Those ten or 12-day tours were exhausting to all who travelled with Keith—but not the congressman.

Sebelius, who died Sunday at Norton after a two-year fight with cancer, was a passionate conservative and selfless servant through his long political career—from his election to local offices in Almena, a defeat in campaigning for Congress in 1958, election to the Kansas Senate in 1962 and then to the U.S. House in 1968 where he served until 1980 when he declined to seek reelection to a seventh term.

Sebelius' political passion was twofold: his was a deep belief that each citizen bears a responsibility in private life and in community life as great as any responsibility the government may have to shape that life and community. And he believed that the state is best served by letting the individual express himself. That is why he insisted upon the grueling tours of Western Kansas, that is why he always stopped to listen for long hours; and he always remembered what he heard when he returned to Washington.

Sebelius was never infected by the power games and tawdry mechanics of some colleagues and many lobbyists that swarmed Capitol Hill. He insisted that his constituents, not political action committees or well-heeled influence peddlers, were the best and most influential lobbyists. For that, he was criticized at times for not playing the game, for being out-of-step.

When he retired from politics two years ago, Sebelius did what few other members of Congress do when they retire; he returned to his home in the district that elected him. He loved his work in Congress but he was never attracted to the city of Washington, never tempted to peddle his contacts or experience for the quick buck.

Sebelius often said he never felt important because his hometown people wouldn't let him. But he was important because he was of a rare breed of public servants that continues to diminish. He was important because he will be missed.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1982.

Hon. LARRY WINN, Jr.,
Congressman, Third District of Kansas, Rayburn Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR LARRY: I was saddened by the death of my good friend, Keith Sebelius. I appreciated the prompt notification from your office of Keith's untimely passing.

It was my privilege to serve in the House of Representatives with Keith over a period of eight years, and I know of no member with whom I have served who was more conscientious, more devoted to the interests of his constituents and the citizens of his state than Keith.

There was no pretentiousness about Keith Sebelius. He was the same pleasant, cheerful, friendly person day after day. He was honest and straight forward in his relations with all. He displayed to those who knew him the qualities of fairness, dedication, service and belief in the strength of America.

As a legislator he had many interests. As a member of the Agriculture Committee of the House he had a real understanding of all phases of farming, ranching and rural life. He diligently and successfully worked to solve the tremendous problems of Agriculture and related industries.

Keith was greatly interested in his other committee assignment—the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee. I have often heard him speak with pride of our Nation's great system of Parks and the work of the National Park Service. He took the time and made the effort to visit many of our national parks.

Keith had a distinguished service record as an enlisted man and officer during World War II and the Korean conflict. He was very active in our State in veterans' organizations and before coming to Washington was Department Commander of the Kansas American Legion.

It is well known that Keith was a champion in securing and defending the rights and benefits of veterans, their survivors and dependents. He was a patriot who gave freely and unselfishly of his time.

I know that for his wife, Bette, and his sons, Gary and Doug and their families, there is and will continue to be a tremendous loss. Our sympathies go out to them. I, too, have sustained a loss as have all of Keith's friends and acquaintances. His memory and good work will indeed live on for years to come.

Sincerely,

GARNER E. SHRIVER.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincere regret that we speak today about our former colleague Keith Sebelius of Kansas. No more dedicated or knowledgeable Member ever served in this House and no Member more strongly felt his obligation to district, State, and Nation than did Keith.

I considered Keith to be a close personal friend and a man of wise counsel who could always be depended upon to get to the heart of any issue and then vote his conscience which usually proved to be the proper vote. No Member of Congress had a deeper concern for American agriculture. His perceptions of the importance of the family farm and his articulate presentation on behalf of American farmers earned for him the recognition of the "Farmers Best Friend in the House of Representatives."

We are going to miss Keith Sebelius. We have lost a friend and the Nation has lost a public servant who served his people with integrity and statesmanship in the many offices he held.

To his family and many friends I extend my condolences.

Mr. WHITTAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WHITTAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from Kansas, for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it seems like only yesterday that I stood in this well to pay honor to Keith Sebelius on his retirement and to sadly proclaim that a true friend of American agriculture would not be answering the first quorum call of the 97th Congress.

It was my first term in Congress and I had grown to rely on Keith for his sound advice and his guidance during difficult moments. As I stepped into the well with mixed emotions, I was saddened by the thought that we would be losing one of our most able and hard-working Members, but heartened by the realization that Keith had served Kansas and the Nation for a good long time and had earned the opportunity to return to Norton to spend more time with Betty and his family and the people in Kansas he had served so well.

Many of my colleagues who followed on that special day in July of 1980 recounted his many accomplishments, and justly praised his efforts on behalf of agriculture and the Kansas farmer. It was a proud day for Keith and a proud day for Kansas, and I know for a fact that Keith was both honored and moved by the tributes paid and by the friendship and comradery exhibited that day.

Keith's retirement was tragically cut short just 10 days ago, but those of us who knew him well realize he made the most of the short time he had left in his beloved hometown of Norton. Above all else, Keith will be remembered by all who came into contact with him as a true and loyal friend and a dedicated public servant who in his retirement did not turn his back on the Nation and institution he so loved. He was always there with a helping hand, an encouraging word, or a sound piece of advice for a freshman colleague.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for this opportunity, and at this time I would like to reiterate the comments from the Wichita, Kans., Eagle-Beacon editorial previously entered in the RECORD by my colleague, Mr. WINN.

Mr. JEFFRIES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. JEFFRIES. Mr. Speaker, I fear all of the appropriate adjectives have already been used to describe our dear departed colleague Keith Sebelius, whose recent death brought sadness to us all. He has been called wise, thoughtful, understanding, direct, honest, fair, and down-to-earth, and all of them are accurate.

But, Keith Sebelius was more than that. He was one of nature's true nobleman, a quiet, thoughtful man whose everyday life was an example for all of us—a man who exhibited great courage in the final days of his exemplary life, accepting the will of the Lord without complaint.

When I decided to run for Congress several years ago, Keith Sebelius was one of the first people with whom I talked. I reached him at his home in Norton, Kans., and his wise counsel was helpful to me then, and has remained so through the years. He was always friendly and willing to discuss the issues honestly and forthrightly, as he saw them.

I am sure Keith understands how difficult this is for all of us today as we struggle down here to find the words to express our deep appreciation for all he has done, and for all he has meant to us, but I am sure he knows of the love and affection we feel for him and his family.

This great Nation, the State of Kansas, and the U.S. Congress were all enriched because Keith Sebelius passed our way. Only if we fail to live up to the ideals and principles that guided his life will we have failed this truly great man.

I thank God for the opportunity to have known and served in the U.S. House of Representatives with my fellow American and Kansan, Keith Sebelius.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I yield to my colleague and friend, the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GLICKMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as was stated by my other colleagues from Kansas, Keith Sebelius was liked by everyone; he was a friend to everyone. Everyone who served in this House could call him his friend.

To my personal experience, he was more than that. He was a teacher. It is no secret that when I first came to Congress I did not know much about set-asides, target prices, summer fallow, and Keith was not only kind but he was generous in the hours that he would spend with me instructing me on things that were at that time foreign to me.

He would be pleased to know that his successor in the well today, Mr. ROBERTS, is doing a good job of continuing that instruction, which means Keith did a darn good job teaching him as well.

In addition to that, it is no secret that the majority party in Kansas is not the party with which I am affiliated. But when I came to Congress, Keith was most helpful to me in assuring me that the fact that I was not a member of the same party as he was would make no difference, particularly when it affected issues involving Kansas, agricultural issues, and other issues on which we could reach some consensus. It is also no secret that Keith knew more about our national park system than most forest rangers or Department of Interior employees. He did not brag about it a lot, but I do know it myself from talking with Interior Department people that he was an expert in those areas.

He did not try to climb the ladder of fame. He was not a man of headlines. But let me make no mistake about it, he was a darned good politician. I thought Keith Sebelius was able to deal with the most aggressive, the most meek, the most manipulative, and the most gentle Members of Congress. He had this kind of charming quality about him that he was able to speak forthrightly and honestly and with a smile on his face, and was able to get done far more for his district than a lot of the more aggressive Members were able to get for theirs. He was a true representative of the district, but he was no robot.

He was a leader and a statesman for his country on issues that at times were not altogether that popular, but he knew he had to do for America.

I would close, Mr. Speaker, that when Mr. Madison, Mr. Hamilton, and Mr. Jefferson got together and decided what kind of human beings ought to fill this institution in which we serve—a combination of a Representative of the folks at home but an independent leader on issues that are necessary for this country—I think they had in mind a man like Keith Sebelius.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I am glad to yield to my colleague and friend, the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. I want to thank my friends, PAT ROBERTS and LARRY WINN, Mr. Speaker, for obtaining this special order today to pay tribute to our former colleague, Keith Sebelius. He was a man for whom I had great respect both personally and professionally. He was a great friend and a distinguished Member of this body.

Keith and I arrived on the scene here in the Congress in the same year, and we were neighbors over in the Longworth Building the first 2 years that we were here. I learned to respect him very much, and I learned to have a lot of respect for him, as DAN GLICKMAN has just mentioned, because he knew the story about agriculture.

I served for many years with Keith on the House Committee on Agriculture. While we represented different parts of the country and different political parties, I always found him to be very cooperative and sincere in his efforts on behalf of the farmers of this country.

He was dedicated to assuring that farmers operated in a climate conductive to their survival. He brought constructive comment to any issue before us relating to agriculture.

On the personal side, he was a man who commanded great respect and admiration. He conducted his work and his life with dignity and always dealt with others with the same respect and dignity.

He was straightforward, without being offensive. He was sensitive to the feelings and self-respect of others.

The State of Kansas and this great Nation will miss Keith Sebelius, his wisdom and his guidance. I will miss him as a sincere and dear friend.

I am so proud of the fact that within the last 30 days, when he was ill, I called him on the telephone and had a very good visit with him while he was lingering there, no doubt awaiting death, as he knew that he was.

I want to extend to his family my deepest regrets and sympathy, my sincere sympathy, for the loss of Keith Sebelius.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, we were all saddened on Labor Day to learn of Keith Sebelius' passing. But our sadness was tempered with gratitude at having had the opportunity to know Keith and to serve with him in the House, and with fond memories of that time.

Keith was something of an institution in a body already replete with high achievers. His efforts on behalf of wheat farmers and the First District of Kansas are well known. Perhaps less well-known to the general public was his work on behalf of our national parks and his solid contributions to all the legislative deliberations of Congress.

Keith was something of a mentor to me when I first arrived on the Hill. His office was in Longworth near mine and we both served on the Interior Committee. Keith eventually became the ranking Republican on the National Parks and Insular Affairs Subcommittee, and it was on that subcommittee that I got to know him well.

He took an interest in everything. He instigated the new areas study program for the Park Service and the inventory program, now known as the State of the Parks report. Many individual park bills and the historic omnibus parks bill unmistakably bear his stamp. It was said that he visited more units of the park system personally than any Member of Congress, and I believe it. In fact it was on several of those trips I was privileged to make with Keith that I came to truly appreciate his depth of knowledge of the parks system and his thorough and conscientious efforts to improve and preserve it. His was an old-fashioned kind of conservationism—the best kind—which respected the beauty and unity and function of our natural resources.

Keith was a hard worker who believe in the motto that if you are unhappy about something, you should not complain, you should try to improve it. That is what he did. He improved all our lives, and the Nation is better for having had him in its service. Norma and I join all the Members of the House in extending our condolences to Bette and the family, and our appreciation for all that Keith did.

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I thank my colleague.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I will be happy to yield to my colleague and good friend from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman for setting up this special order.

It was my pleasure to serve on the Agriculture Committee with our good friend, Keith Sebelius. As with some of the other Members who have spoken, I was in the other party, but it was very clear that Keith never really cared whether you were a Republican or whether you were a Democrat. Keith was there to try to do the best he could for the farmers of our great land.

But, I think he did more than that on that committee. In my opinion, one reason there was a limited amount of partisanship on the committee, and the reason the committee worked for the good of the farmers, was to a great extent because of the example that Keith Sebelius set for the rest of us. It was certainly my pleasure to know him personally. I many times say that what we accomplish in life is not really measured as much by the honors we may receive as by the example we set for others.

Certainly, if there was ever anyone that set an example for me and for many of the other colleagues in the House, it was Keith Sebelius. I think he would, however, be pleased to know that since he is not here. one of his prize students, PAT ROBERTS, is here carrying on for him and carrying on in that same fine tradition. I am sure Keith would be pleased, PAT, that you are here carrying on for his area in the State of Kansas.

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I am happy to yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WAMPLER).

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, when I first became a Member of this body in 1953 a distinguished Kansan, the late Clifford R. Hope, was a Member of this body, and he was chairman of the House Committee of Agriculture. When I returned to the Congress for the second time in 1967 a distinguished Kansan, then the Representative from western Kansas, now our senior U.S. Senator from Kansas, was a Member of this body, Senator DOLE. Then our dear friend Keith Sebelius, and now PAT ROBERTS, so I have been privileged, Mr. Speaker, to have the opportunity to serve with the last four Representatives of that great district.

Mr. Speaker, I have lost a very dear and close friend, and the American farmer has lost a strong advocate, with the passing of Keith G. Sebelius some 10 days ago. I served in the House with Keith Sebelius for the 12 years that he served here. I served on the Committee on Agriculture with him during that entire period.

Mr. Speaker, I must say in all candor that I know of no more articulate advocate or any greater friend of the American farmer than Keith Sebelius. A beloved husband and father, he was a thoroughly honest and decent individual whom I have missed since he retired 2 years ago to take up the practice of law once again in his home in Norton, Kans.

Mr. Speaker, Keith Sebelius took his civic obligations seriously, and he served in a variety of capacities as a public servant during his career. He was a city councilman, mayor, city attorney, county attorney, State senator, and held a variety of other appointed positions in his home State of Kansas. Moreover, since his retirement from Congress in 1980, he served on an advisory committee of the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

My friend, Keith Sebelius, served his country during World War II and again during the Korean conflict, and also served for a number of years in the U.S. Army Reserve. He was a graduate of George Washington University Law School. He practiced successfully in his native Kansas for a number of years in private practice before coming to Congress, and relished the idea of returning to that law practice upon his retirement from the House.

We who served on the Committee on Agriculture had great admiration for Keith Sebelius's grasp of agricultural issues, which dominate the district that Keith served for so many years. His constituents in that district were well served, and the interests of Americans generally were well served by the legislative endeavors of Keith Sebelius during his terms in Congress.

I and others who have served with him will sorely miss him. He was a good friend and an articulate and much-admired Member of this body.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my condolences to his wife, Betty, and sons, and to all those in Kansas and throughout this country who mourn his loss.

I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I thank my colleague.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. I will be happy to yield to my friend and colleague from Nebraska.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I thank the gentleman from Kansas for taking this special order.

Mr. Speaker, as has been noted, on September 5 of this year the State of Kansas and the Nation lost a great citizen and public servant, and all of us who had the pleasure and privilege of serving with him in the 1968 through 1980 sessions lost a valued colleague.

Keith Sebelius served his district and our Nation extremely well in this House for 12 years. He left his mark on many pieces of legislation and earned warm friendships on both sides of the aisle. Keith Sebelius consistently displayed sound judgment in his goals, his statements, and his actions. His actions were very widely noted as being consistent with the best interests and needs of his Kansas constituents, and the best interests and needs of his country. It is not an easy balance to achieve.

Keith Sebelius and this Member served together on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and as members of National Park and Insular Affairs Subcommittee during the 96th Congress we represented adjacent districts in Kansas and Nebraska. Through that period that we served together this first-term Member developed a deep and sincere respect for his knowledge, his ability, and his leadership that led me to consider him to be one of the most valuable Members of the House of Representatives. There was certainly no Member more helpful to me during my first term in Congress. There was certainly no Member whose advice I sought more frequently, and he gave it freely and willingly, and I might say he gave it with a great deal of humility.

Keith Sebelius brought many fine qualities to this institution—integrity, leadership, dedication. His contributions in the area of agriculture and national parks were invaluable and will be lasting. It is significant that during the week of his death that the Interior Committee's Subcommittee on Public Lands and National Parks began markup of the national parks legislation, to which he contributed so much insight and energy.

While Keith Sebelius made many contributions to agriculture, an area in which I relied upon him for advice so often, I want to mention a few of his many contributions on the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. He had a particular fondness for the national park system, and prided himself on the fact that he believed that he had personally visited more of the 333 units of the national park system than had any other Member of Congress. Undoubtedly that was true, and it gave him an insight which benefited us all.

During the last 4 years of his congressional career, he served as the ranking minority member on this subcommittee, and during that time he helped assemble some of the most significant legislative achievements in the history of our national park system. That certainly is no exaggeration, the most major significant item being the Omnibus National Parks and Recreation Act of 1978, something he started, called the "State of the Parks" bill which we are now considering and hope to institutionalize.

While Keith made major contributions in assembling and moving key bills to protect specific national park sites around the country, he also devised some major generic efforts which have already had wide-ranging impacts on the entire national park system. He authored the "section 8" new area studies process, which was designed to constitute a professional methodology for systematically identifying and evaluating potential new units for the national park system and reporting on such candidates to the Congress. That process also embodied further emphasis and visibility for national natural and historic landmarks. Following that, he instituted the inventory and study process to identify and assess ongoing and impending damage and threats to national park system units a survey conducted by the National Park Service and finally evolving into the "State of the Parks" report, issued in May, 1980. That report revealed some rather shocking insights into some very troublesome damage and threats affecting our national park system. As an outgrowth of that effort, the Interior Committee is currently marking up major legislation to address this very issue.

I visited with Keith during the last year and a half several times on the telephone and wrote him. He continued his interest in what we were doing in the many areas that had been his concern for so long. Keith Sebelius served his State and his country with distinction and respect. He brought honor and dignity to his position. We are all better because he was here.

I share with my colleagues the sense of loss. May God comfort his family, his wife Betty, his sons Gary and Doug, his brothers and sisters. Those of us who knew him and worked with him will always remember him fondly. We will sorely miss him.

In conclusion, I would like to say that we in the Great Plains were and are proud of Keith Sebelius. He epitomizes what we like to think are some of the best characteristics of our region and our people. In the words of the popular ballad, he was a "Big, big man."

He possessed an uncommon degree of commonsense. He approached his job in the U.S. House of Representatives with integrity, high principle and good will toward the common man.

I thank his wife Betty and family for sharing this man with the American Nation. This world is better because Keith Sebelius passed this way. That should be a dominant goal in all of our lives.

Thank you, Keith Sebelius.

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments, and I yield to my colleague and friend from Montana (Mr. MARLENEE).

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, if I had to summarize the service of Keith Sebelius into a single sentence, it would be that of Socrates, who stated, "No man qualifies as a statesman who is entirely ignorant of the problems of wheat." With that statement in mind I believe that we have lost one of the great statesmen of the modern era. With the passing of Keith Sebelius the country has lost a man of vision, a symbol of rural America; a liaison between the agricultural industry and the people it serves. It goes without saying that Keith was a most ardent supporter of farmers and ranchers. I had the pleasure of having "Mr. Wheat" travel with me through my congressional district during my freshman year in Congress. His unwavering stand and forthrightness quickly became evident to all the producers who had the pleasure to meet and chat with this great advocate of rural America.

We all know the feeling of wonderment, unease, and uncertainty that freshman Congressmen experience during our first few months in this body. I had the unique opportunity to serve with Keith on two committees—Agriculture and Interior. He took two of the most precious commodities of a Congressman—time and energy—to further teach me the committee process, to fully understand floor procedure, and to better serve the people of my district. Keith did this for me and for all the freshmen who served on either of these committees.

Often we get caught by the daily rush of activities in Congress. We move a day at a time without the foresight to stop, assist our colleagues, and improve on the programs that we have implemented to serve the farmer. Not Keith Sebelius. He shared his time with other Members. But more important, he always took the time to listen and work with the farmers from his State and throughout the West. He was a man who found the time to stop, listen, and help those about him.

Let me touch briefly on one other point. Often those of us who serve on the Agriculture Committee and come from rural areas think of Keith only as a proponent of the American farmer. While a strong advocate and voice for American agriculture, he also served with distinction on the Interior Committee.

Dedicated to improving rural living, Keith worked within the Interior Committee for the establishment of policies that would assist agriculture and protect the natural heritage of the West. Keith fought to expand water resources, promoted and improved health care to rural areas, and advocated agricultural export expansion and improved trade. His foresight is evident in the fact that he argued against any constraints on agricultural development during formation of the Alaska Lands Act. Today Alaska is well on its way to having a viable small grains industry.

Yes, Keith will be remembered for a lot of things. But most of all I will remember him as a compassionate man who was never vindictive, who was never devious, who was never mean, who was never abrasive. But he was always effective, he was truly a representative of the people of Kansas. The country, the world, needs more men like Keith. God bless his family. God bless his memory.

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague and I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JACOBS).

Mr. JACOBS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I incorporate by reference every good thing that was ever said about Keith Sebelius. We know him as a legislator, everybody who served with Keith. We know him to have been efficient, partly because of his kindliness and mostly because of his immense intellect.

But I know Keith Sebelius as a person who had a sturdiness of justice and a faultless sense of fairness. When all about you are losing their heads and blaming it on you, if you can keep your head—he was such a person. And when the moment of opportunity for shortcuts in politics, either on the campaign trail or in this Chamber, presented themselves to Keith Sebelius, the door was shut and he shunned such opportunity to a fault.

Even when it perhaps hurt his own political prospects, he was fair, he was warm, he was human. He did not want to hurt or see anyone else hurt, any one of God's children on this Earth.

If anybody ever went to Heaven, Keith Sebelius is there with that big, warm grin, looking down on this Chamber now.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague.

I now yield to my colleague and good friend, the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA).

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me and I have come to join with my other colleagues, both from the House and the Committee on Agriculture, who had the privilege to know and work with Keith Sebelius.

I did not have the privilege to have him here since I have become chairman of the Agriculture Committee. But I did see him afterward and he rejoiced with me and regretted that he was not here as I assumed the chairmanship.

But part of assuming the chairmanship is the fact that for whatever ill or good that my service will be, it has been as a part of those who have touched my life along the way. Certainly Keith Sebelius did that, through his diligence in the committee, through his interest for his country, but most of all exemplary to all of us was his dedication to his oath of office and his dedication to rural America and the farm sector which he so ably represented and for whom he worked so hard all the years that he was here.

I guess some of us remember fondly that even while working hard, as this job is, and even while working long hours, which we do, he never lost his sense of perspective and/or humor.

In the late hours of the night many times when we needed a little reawakening of our endeavor, always there was Keith to come in either with an amendment, or breaking into debate to bring us that lighthearted interruption that brought us back to reality and to the work that we would be doing.

So I know that it is repetitious to say we will miss him. But I think probably it is more important to remember that the contribution he made for his State, for his constituency, for America, and for the people of the world will be there and he cared. He cared deeply.

I know many times we discussed hunger and the countries that needed assistance. We traveled together. I traveled with him. I traveled to Kansas with him. We visited his constituency.

If any man can be categorized as, "He never had met someone that was not a friend," that was Keith, that he either patted someone on the back or had a joke or had a kind word. If he did not do it, they did it to him, expecting that generosity and bigheartedness that he had.

So I join my colleagues with sadness but yet with pride and with the hope that generations henceforth will remember, and even what we say here tonight will be recorded forever in the history of our country, that we had a man named Keith Sebelius who served and who served well and who left many friends who admired and respected him.

I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman of the Agriculture Committee.

● Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of loss that I recently heard of the death of my good friend and colleague Keith Sebelius.

Keith was a champion of the farmer and was a leader in the effort to make Government more responsive to the needs of rural America. It was a great privilege to work with Keith during his 12 extremely productive years in Congress. No one cared more deeply about the American farm family and its wrenching problem of debt cost and income than did Keith Sebelius. As ranking minority member of the Livestock and Grains Subcommittee and on the Family Farm and Rural Development Subcommittee he was a tireless worker for American agriculture.

Keith had an unlimited faith in this country and its ability to do anything that needed to be done. The memory of his leadership and spirit will continue to serve as an inspiration to many of us in the Congress. Heather joins me in expressing our heartfelt sympathy to Betty Sebelius and all the other members of the Sebelius family.●

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the late Keith Sebelius was my friend. I am grateful to be able to make this statement, and I can prove this by relating a favor he rendered me during the 95th Congress. I was chairman of the Subcommittee on Tobacco, Oilseeds and Rice, and frankly, we had a difficult time getting people to serve on this particular subcommittee, and this was particularly true of the minority side. To complete the required number of members, at my suggestion Keith offered to serve. This, in spite of the fact that not 1 pound of tobacco was grown in his district or State, and certainly there was no political advantage to be gained for him. So, I can only conclude it was an act of friendship. Later on the subcommittee went into the States of Georgia, North Carolina, and South Carolina to hold field hearings, and as I recall, Keith attended each of these meetings and participated in the hearings. And being the fine gentleman that he was, made some very kind remarks about the Democratic member in whose district the hearing was being held.

I mention this one instance merely to show the kind of man Keith Sebelius really was. He will be missed, and to his family I express my sincere sympathy.●

● Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to learn of the death, on September 5, of our former colleague, Keith Sebelius of Kansas. As a native Kansan, I have a particular fondness for the Kansas delegation, and Keith was a fine member of that special group.

As was widely noted upon his retirement from the House at the end of the 96th Congress, Keith Sebelius was a dedicated Member of this body who served his constituents and his country well.

He was known for his tireless efforts on behalf of the farmers in his district and for all Americans in his concern for the preservation of our national parks.

I am pleased to have had the opportunity to work with Keith for the 12 years he served in this House, and was sorry to see him leave the Congress.

Also, I am sorry that his retirement years were cut so short, but I am grateful for the opportunity to have known and worked with him.

Mrs. Rhodes joins me in extending sympathy to Mrs. Sebelius and to Gary and Doug Sebelius.●

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that we take this time to honor our friend and former colleague from Kansas, Keith Sebelius.

No one better exemplified the hard work ethic of rural Americans than Keith, who for 12 years staunchly supported the American farmers and the people of Kansas "Big First" Congressional District. Little if any agricultural legislation passed through this body during the past decade without Keith playing a major role.

With the same determination he used in helping our Nation's farmers, Keith also sought to preserve and protect our country's natural beauty. As a member of the Interior Committee, he helped expand our national park and wilderness systems, and promoted the need for all Americans to conserve our national resources, especially our precious water supply. It is fitting that one of the last actions this body took before his retirement in 1980, was the naming of the Keith Sebelius Lake behind the Norton Dam in Kansas. The Keith Sebelius Lake shall stand forever as a tribute to this great American, who served the people of his beloved State of Kansas so well.

More important than his work in Congress, was Keith's devotion to his wife Bette and his sons Gary and Doug. Having known Keith as a friend and colleague, I share with his family, and all Americans, in the loss of this great man, whose service and achievements shall stand as an inspiration to those who in the future will serve the State of Kansas and our country.●

● Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I feel privileged to join my colleagues in memorializing the late Keith Sebelius who died last week at the age of 65.

All of us were shocked to learn that our beloved friend and former colleague had passed away. I commend his friend and successor, the gentleman from Kansas, Representative PAT ROBERTS, for arranging this time so that we can say what is in our hearts about this man.

Keith Sebelius was a fighter who did not lose many of the battles in which he participated. He fought for his Kansas constituents and won. He fought for a strong agriculture and won. He fought for high moral principles and won the admiration of all who came in contact with him. But he lost to the one adversary who did not fight fairly—the killer cancer. The knowledge that he was suffering from this disease caused his premature retirement from this body 2 years ago. Since then he has made a characteristically valiant fight only to have life slip away.

This House was ennobled by the presence of Keith Sebelius. He was a friendly, open, sincere, dedicated, and decent man. I do not think he had an enemy. Everyone I know on both sides of the aisle here liked him and respected him. He added an important dimension to this position—representative of the people.

He was a special friend of mine. Because of the similarity of our agricultural districts that adjoined each other along the Kansas-Nebraska border, we had much in common. We represented the same kind of constituents. They were in the same high-risk business of providing food and fiber for this Nation and countries overseas. They needed special attention and special representation in an economy that had been transformed from agrarian to one highly industrialized in nature. The voice of agriculture was being drowned by the deafening whir of industrialization. Those of us representing agriculture had to stick together and fight together and make ourselves heard.

Keith Sebelius and I sought each other out when I came to Congress. He knew the ropes. He knew how to get attention for agriculture's needs. He took me in tow and let me profit from his experience. I leaned on him and learned from him. I could not have had a better teacher. He had been an effective spokesman for agriculture over a span of many years. Keith Sebelius knew how to go along and how to get along. He had a practical philosophy that served him well in this give-and-take business where the art of compromise is the art of winning. Keith Sebelius may not have coined the phrase but he adopted it and used it to good advantatge: "50 percent of something is better than 100 percent of nothing," he said many times in hammering out critical provisions in farm bills.

All agriculture benefited from his service and his leadership. His closest disciple was his assistant PAT ROBERTS who won the seat when Keith retired and who now represents his Kansas constituents and agriculture with the same understanding, the same practical know-how, and the same distinction that made Keith Sebelius one of the best.

Even though Keith Sebelius has been taken from us, his spirit lives on here and he has left an indelible stamp upon the House of Representatives. He will be long remembered for his kindness and his decency, and all the other sterling qualities that elevates a good man to a cut above his peers.

When I am faced with a thorny problem or a decision on what is best for agriculture and the welfare of the country, I often ask myself: "What would Keith Sebelius do?" When I apply his guidelines and think things through the way he did, I know I will be on target. Keith Sebelius set a high standard. Measuring up to that standard will make all of us better representatives of the people.●

● Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, it was with sadness that I learned last week of the passing of our former colleague, Keith Sebelius of Kansas. I commend the gentlemen from Kansas, Mr. PAT ROBERTS and Mr. WINN, for arranging this special order to eulogize this splendid man.

When Keith retired from the House at the end of the 96th Congress, the accolades were many and varied. He earned the admiration of those from both parties, of varying philosophies, from all regions.

Those accolades were well deserved and are well remembered, as we again pay tribute to Keith Sebelius, this time in celebration of his life and in mourning for its end.

Keith and I served together on the House Agriculture Committee, a setting in which he—"Mr. Wheat"—taught me a great deal about production levels, price supports, soil conservation, and commodity prices. Although we—the farm activist and the consumer supporter—did not always agree, we always respected each other's motivation, position, and constituency.

In an amusing aside, Keith often advised his urban colleagues—many of whom were on diets—to do our part for the farm economy by "mussing up the rolls" when we went out to dinner, so that restaurants would not serve them again, thereby saving flour—that is, wheat. We always remembered to "muss up the rolls," for Keith.

It was under Keith's patronage that I visited Kansas, took a ride on a tractor through the wheat fields, and talked to farmers about agricultural policy. For a Representative whose usual background consists of high-tech companies around Boston, jewelery manufacturing plants in the Attleboro area, and apparel firms in Fall River, my trip to Kansas was indeed instructive.

I remember Keith Sebelius in his role on the Agriculture Committee, respected by his colleagues. I remember Keith Sebelius in the wheatfields of Kansas, loved by his constituents. Whether in Washington of Kansas, he served this country ably. He will be missed by all those whose lives he touched.●

● Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, it is never a pleasant task to note the passing of a friend. However, the memory of this friend is a pleasant one. Keith Sebelius was also a very pleasant person. We came to this House together in the 91st Congress in 1968. We served together on the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee. While Keith earned a reputation as Mr. Wheat and Mr. Agriculture, this Nation can be grateful that he was also Mr. National Park. As the ranking Republican on the National Parks and Insular Affairs Subcommittee, the omnibus parks bill, the most comprehensive national parks bill ever passed by the Congress, had the firm imprint of Keith Sebelius. He prided himself in maintaining an intimate knowledge of the operations of each of our national parks. This knowledge helped to preserve and protect much of the pristine beauty within our borders.

Keith's retirement in 1980 left a big vacancy in the Congress and on the Interior and Agriculture Committees. But he also left a legacy for each of us. He was a hard working and dedicated Member of this House. He was a kind man, a thoughtful man, a pleasant man. The State of Kansas and this Nation are well aware that Keith Sebelius served them. I am one of many that are saddened that his advice and experience are no longer available to us. But I am heartened that his example is strongly in front of each of us.●

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, it was with great sadness that I learned of the death of our former colleague, Keith Sebelius, who represented his big First District of Kansas with great ability for 12 years. It was my privilege to be his friend and colleague for 8 years.

Keith Sebelius always gave us a sense of having that solid, practical approach to issues that characterizes the great American heartland. He believed in hard work and living within our means, and he had a strong sense of honor.

As a city councilman, mayor, and State legislator before he came to Congress, our friend had a keen knowledge of State and local government and used that knowledge to good advantage in the Congress. He was a veteran of both World War II and the Korean war and was devoted to our country with a strong sense of duty and patriotism.

Keith Sebelius and I shared similar interests in many issues, and I always enjoyed working with this fine man. Those of us who knew him were enriched by the experience, and I know the House joins me in expressing condolences to his family.●

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound remorse and a deep sense of loss that I learned of the recent death of a former colleague and good friend, Keith Sebelius.

Keith was a man of his word, a hard worker and a much respected individual—as is evidenced by his long and impressive record as a public servant. Before being elected to Congress in 1968, Keith faithfully served his Nation as a U.S. Air Force Lieutenant in both World War II and the Korean conflict. He then served his home State of Kansas in various elected positions including city councilman, mayor and State senator.

While serving his State and Nation as Congressman from the "Big First District" of Kansas, Keith distinguished himself as a champion of agricultural and conservation interests in America. Keith believed that the maintained health and survival of the American agricultural industry was critical to the continued vitality of the country and fought courageously for our country's farmers. With equal vision and courage, Keith fought for the preservation and protection of our Nation's resources and was instrumental in making our National Parks System superior to that of any of the world.

Although the rolling hills of Massachusetts are not the same as the ranging wheat fields one finds in Kansas, and although the problems faced by that State are not identical to those faced by the other 49, Keith always took an interest in the resolution of all pressing concerns. I am personally thankful for his tireless efforts in behalf of small business as well as those aimed at reducing waste in Federal spending.

We will miss you Keith, but we are thankful for the time you spent with us and honored to have been associated with such a fine man.●

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is with much sadness in my heart that I rise today to salute the memory of my good friend Keith Sebelius.

Two years ago I had the honor of serving as the vice chairman of the National Alcohol Fuels Commission. Keith Sebelius was also a member of that commission. Together, we traveled the United States examining our potential for developing alcohol fuels as a prime energy source for this Nation.

Let me tell you this; there was not another member of that commission who devoted more time to its objectives of making our Nation energy independent.

No matter where the commission held its meetings, be it Florida or New Jersey, Keith Sebelius was there ready to work. He had a great way of dealing with people which made them feel at ease. For he truly loved, as Lyndon Johnson used to say "to press the flesh."

I am proud to say that during the time we served together on the Alcohol Fuels Commission, Keith and I became very close friends. Though we came from different parts of the Nation and represented different political parties in Congress, we both shared the same goals for a better America.

His retirement from Congress left a great void here, but his untimely death is indeed a great tragedy to the people of Kansas and all those who were fortunate enough to know him.●

● Mr. SUNIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in paying tribute and honor to the late Honorable Keith Sebelius.

American Samoa did not have a seat in Congress during Mr. Sebelius' last term in Congress. We did have a government office downtown whose major function was to lobby on the Hill. During the last 2 years of the existence of that office, we did have occasion to call on Mr. Sebelius for assistance and as has been his practice he extended a helping hand to our concerns. It is hard to forget one who can give so unselfishly of his time. This is only one of the areas that he spent his time with.

On behalf of the people of American Samoa, I am here to pay respects to one of America's great men, a true giant of dedication, integrity, and service to his fellow men, the late Honorable Keith Sebelius. May God's choicest blessings rest upon his family and loved ones at this time of loss. Thank you.●

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, it was with deep sadness that I learned of the recent death of Keith Sebelius, a former Representative from Kansas who served his district and State with honor and distinction in the 12 years he was a Member of the House prior to his retirement in 1980.

I had the privilege of working with Keith when I served at the Department of the Interior from 1971-75. He was a fine gentleman, a man of integrity, a concerned and conscientious Member of Congress.

As the ranking member of the National Parks and Insular Affairs Subcommittee, Keith was a champion of the national park system. He personally visited as many park units as he could all across the country to see firsthand our unique natural resources. He was dedicated to preserving this land for future generations in our national park system and he wanted to make our park system the best that the American people could possibly have.

He also was a friend of agriculture and a champion of the farmer, a leader in the effort to make Government more responsive to the needs of rural America.

Keith Sebelius based his career in public service on fairness, honesty, compassion and understanding and earned his place as truly one of the outstanding Members ever to serve in Congress.

I join my colleagues in honoring the memory of Keith Sebelius and express my deepest sympathy to his family and friends in Kansas.●

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to pay tribute to our former friend and colleague, Keith Sebelius.

Keith had already completed a decade of dedicated service in the House of Representatives when I was first sworn in in 1979. I was rapidly convinced of his legislative wisdom and leadership ability simply through my daily contact with him in routine House proceedings. However, as we moved further into the congressional session, Keith Sebelius was to become a sound adviser, a master of congressional strategy, and a reliable friend and ally to me concerning an issue of paramount importance to my district. Keith served as ranking minority member of what was then named the House Interior Subcommittee on National Parks and Insular Affairs. Thanks to Keith's interest, involvement, and representational abilities, an effort to prevent full utilization of a $340 million dam constructed in my congressional district was averted. Keith helped make possible hearings on the issue, and he also went out of his way to make sure that the cross-country journey of some 25 concerned Californians was not made in vain. His assistance helped make the testimony of those individuals possible, and overcame seemingly insurmountable odds.

Keith Sebelius remained a good friend and sound adviser throughout our mutual tenure in the House. I have missed his presence here since he left the Congress, and I will miss him even more now. However, he has left strong and positive memories with all those who were privileged to know and work with him.

I extend my deepest sympathies to Keith Sebelius' family, as well as every best personal regard.●

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply saddened at the loss of my good friend, former colleague, and former Longworth Building neighbor, Hon. Keith Sebelius of Kansas.

I knew Keith well as a result of our being next-door neighbors in the Longworth Building for 4 years. Through the years as we served together in Congress, my admiration and esteem for Keith continually increased.

Many times, as we walked to and from the House floor together, we talked about legislative affairs, but we also talked about things in general. In either case, Keith was a gracious, thoughtful, and insightful companion.

As a Congressman, he rendered true service to the State of Kansas and to his constituency. Keith was an asset to the House and was deeply respected by all.

I express my sympathy to his family. Keith will be missed by all.●

● Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, the sad occasion of the passing of former Congressman Keith Sebelius is, understandably, difficult for family, friends, and colleagues to accept. But, we can all be comforted in knowing his presence will continue to be felt as we call to mind his accomplishments here in the House of Representatives.

I was fortunate enough to serve in the 96th Congress with Keith. As a Representative from an agricultural State myself, I frequently looked to Keith for guidance on farming issues during my freshman term in office. Keith Sebelius had a remarkable understanding and appreciation of the American farmer which he so aptly demonstrated in his committee assignment and on the House floor. When Keith retired following the 96th Congress, the "Big First" district of Kansas, as well as all rural Americans, lost a great spokesman and friend in Washington. Through Keith's leadership, though, our unsurpassed agricultural productivity and the improved standard of living of our farmers will be a constant reminder of Keith's 12 years of service in Congress.

The integrity of Keith Sebelius benefited this institution. For this we are all grateful and will sorely miss Keith.●

● Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, Keith Sebelius was a devoted son of western and central Kansas and a man of the people from whom he came, and to whom he dedicated an adult lifetime of devoted public service: councilman, mayor, city attorney, county attorney, State senator, and legislative councilman capped by more than a decade of faithful, diligent service in the Congress.

Born during World War I, Keith Sebelius was of a unique American generation which, having been assured by their elders that, in that great war, the world had been made safe for democracy and, therefore, there would be no more wars, moved, uncomplainingly, from devastating economic depression to military service in a second, more devastating, global war. And, like a few of that generation, Keith Sebelius served again, a decade later, in the Korean conflict.

Even as he knew the worst and the best of American times, he knew military responsibility which began as a private and concluded as a major. Even as he knew Congress as a freshman, he knew Congress as a senior Member, distinguished and respected by those he served and by those with whom he served.

As he served, so faithfully, the people of the First District of Kansas, he served, at once, the Kansas farmer and, as an intelligent and powerful advocate of the farmer's needs and problems, he served the Nation in peace as effectively as he had twice served in war.

Keith Sebelius was missed in retirement, and now he is mourned in death; yet, the legacy of patriotism, service, and leadership which he has left remains an inspiration, a guiding light, for all of us who were privileged to serve here with him and to enjoy him as a good friend and an able colleague.

I send my condolences to his wife, his children, his grandchildren—and to the people of the First District of Kansas—who loved him dearly.●

● Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the thoughtfulness of my colleague. Mr. PAT ROBERTS, in providing time this afternoon to pay tribute to our former colleague, Keith Sebelius. I first met Keith when he came to Congress in 1968. He was a true friend and a hard-working Member of the House. His staunch defense of the principles which he held dear was based upon a genuine concern to preserve the freedoms upon which our Nation was built.

Keith was also a friend of the Nation's farmers, rural Americans and senior citizens. Each and every one of us who served with Keith during those 12 years knew of his great concern for the future of American agriculture. Not only was Keith a well respected Member of the House Agriculture Committee, but he also served with the highest abilities on the House Interior Committee.

Keith believed in America. He was a man of high principle, and he was never reluctant to speak out on issues that were important to him. I am proud that I had the opportunity to share his friendship and I would like to extend my deepest sympathies and condolences to his family. Their loss is shared by all of us who knew this fine American.●

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that my esteemed colleagues share my sense of loss with the death of our good friend, Keith Sebelius. He was a dedicated, patriotic, and compassionate man.

Although Keith's district was rural and mine, urban, I always felt that Keith shared a camaraderie with every Member of the House, regardless of his or her interests or constituency. He was an exemplary Representative of his district, yet he had national vision. He saw beyond his native wheat fields and helped shoulder the problems of struggling laborers, be them farmers or autoworkers in Detroit. More importantly, he looked beyond labels and saw what concerns the farmer and city dweller shared.

Keith Sebelius championed the interests of the elderly, small businesses, and conservation in rural and urban areas. In another sense, by insuring the well-being of his district, our Nation's breadbasket, he insured that people both in America and abroad would be well nourished and free from the torment of hunger.

Keith drew strength from his difficult childhood and realized that, with effort, the world could be made better. This Chamber was graced with his fortitude, charm, and vision. I hope that we will retain his spirit and values in our work.●

● Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, today I must, with great personal sadness, speak about a former colleague, a friend, a leader, and a good man; Keith G. Sebelius.

Keith spent 12 years in the House of Representatives and for 10 years was a member of the Interior Committee and finally was the ranking member of the Subcommittee on National Parks and Insular Affairs where I had the opportunity and the pleasure to work with him on national parks legislation. He was dedicated to achieving the best national park system in the world and spent endless hours seeking to craft such truly outstanding law as that which established the Redwoods National Park expansion, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness, the Lake Tahoe Preservation Act, the Pine Barrens Area, and numerous national trails, wild and scenic rivers as well as many other national park units.

He was born and raised in the State of Kansas and perhaps because of growing up in the open spaces of the heartland of America, always seemed to have a vision of the greatness of the Nation's land, its mountains, its rivers, its coasts, and all of the values that were inherent in our land. He wanted to be sure that future generations of Americans would be able to see some of these things, to know what the land had been like, free from development and destruction. I can think of no greater tribute to Keith Sebelius than to honor his vision and dedication to preserving some of this land as a part of the national park system so that we all might gain something of value.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that Keith is gone and offer my deepest condolences to his lovely wife, Bette, to his children and his many friends who, as I will, shall miss his calm reason and his great wisdom.●

● Mr. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply saddened over the death of a very close friend and colleague, Hon. Keith Sebelius.

Keith was an extremely warm, friendly, and outgoing man. He represented his constitutents in the State of Kansas very ably, and he was always available to anyone who wanted to see him.

I had the pleasure of serving with Keith for many years on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. We worked on many pieces of legislation together, and he was always a most helpful and accommodating individual in working out some tough problems.

The greatest amount of Keith's interest in Interior Committee matters was devoted to national park issues. He served with distinction for 4 years as the ranking minority member on the Subcommittee on National Parks and Insular Affairs. During that period he helped guide a major volume of legislation which has perfected and expanded our national park system. Keith was particularly helpful to me personally during that period in trying to work out an acceptable solution to the Redwood National Park expansion legislation, as the park is located in my congressional district.

Keith had a very deep feeling for the importance of our national park system, and he initiated a number of items that have resulted in some very important changes in the expansion and protection of the system.

Ever since his recent retirement from the Congress and his absence from the committee, his absence has been most apparent. We shall miss him all the more now that we will not be able to call on him for continued counsel.

Keith was a good and trusted friend, and I shall miss him a great deal. To his wife, Bette, and his two sons Gary and Doug, we, the Clausen family, extend our deepest sympathy. You have much to be proud of as history looks back on the extraordinary record of congressional service. Keith Sebelius provided for his district in Kansas and the people he loved so much.

Like the tall redwood trees in my California congressional district, Keith Sebelius will stand as a giant in the forest of great men who have provided leadership for our country.

We shall remain eternally grateful to the family for sharing this kind, congenial, brilliant, and dedicated human being, Keith Sebelius of Kansas.●

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in tribute to Hon. Keith G. Sebelius, former Member of Congress from the First Congressional District of the State of Kansas, who died on September 5, 1982. Congressman Sebelius' death is a tremendous loss to the people of Kansas and of this Nation, whom he served with distinction.

Keith Sebelius, a veteran of World War II and the Korean war, began his career in public service as a city councilman, and also served as a city attorney, county attorney, mayor of the city of Almena, and State senator. Representing western and central Kansas for six terms in the House of Representatives until his retirement in 1980, Congressman Sebelius served as the second ranking Republican on the House Agriculture Committee, where he earned the reputation as one of the most knowledgeable Members of Congress on agricultural issues. He also was the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on National Parks and Insular Affairs of the House Interior Committee.

Mr. Speaker, Keith G. Sebelius' dedication to high standards was an inspiration to his friends and fellow citizens, and his devotion to public service will long be remembered by those of us who had the privilege of working with him.

Mrs. Annunzio and I extend our deepest sympathy to his wife, Bette, and his two sons Gary and Doug.●

● Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened this past week to learn of the passing of our former colleague and my dear friend Keith Sebelius. Keith and I were "classmates," coming here as freshman Members of the 91st Congress in January 1969. I will always remember this great Kansan, whose heart was as big as his stature. He embodies the finest virtues of mid-America, his strength seeming to come from the rich soil of the State where he was born.

Keith loved America and his native State. He represented both with untiring dedication and extraordinary ability. He was surely a friend of the American farmer, and on more than one occasion I was moved to vote for an amendment or a bill because of his persuasion.

Never pretentious, always open and approachable, Keith was a friend to everyone. I never heard him speak an unkind world about a colleague. By believing in the best in everyone else, he made all of us want to stand taller to earn his respect.

I regretted his retirement from Congress, and I mourn his death along with all of his friends both here in Washington and back in the State he loved and served so well.●

● Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, it was with much sadness that I learned of the death of our former colleague and my good friend, Keith Sebelius.

Keith and I had a unique relationship for a good many years in the Congress. He was one of the strongest supporters of the agriculture community and fought for them at every opportunity. On a number of occasions, Keith had me speak to some of his constituents so that they could hear what I viewed to be the other side of the coin.

While we were on opposite sides of many issues, we never let this interfere with our friendship. I was sorry when Keith left the Congress and am deeply sorry now to learn of his death.●

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to have this opportunity to say a few good words about a former colleague, Keith Sebelius. I was deeply saddened by his untimely death and I want to express my sincere condolences to his fine family.

I had the privilege of entering the House of Representatives with Keith Sebelius in 1969. For the next 12 years, until his retirement, Keith represented the First District of Kansas with integrity, courage, and tremendous effectiveness. He always gave freely of his time, talent, and energy to make life richer and more rewarding for his constituents and the American people.

Keith Sebelius represented the largest wheat-producing congressional district in the United States and he was a recognized expert on farm issues. Many Members, including myself, frequently turned to Keith for counsel and advice on agricultural matters. His judgment was sound and recommendations trusted.

I am grateful for the opportunity to have served with Keith Sebelius during his tenure in this body. He was a decent, dedicated, capable, and respected legislator, who always tried to do what was best for his country. His passing is a sorrowful occasion for all of us who served with him.●

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of loss that I join my colleagues today in paying tribute to our late friend, Hon. Keith G. Sebelius. He was one of this body's most distinguished former Members and I was shocked to learn of his death on September 5.

When I began my congressional service on the 91st Congress in January 1969, Keith Sebelius was one of my freshman classmates. We had a small class that year which gave us newly elected members an opportunity to form close working relationships and friendships with our fellow freshmen Congressmen. In the years following 1969, I was impressed continuously by Keith's intelligence, commitment, and sincerity. It was a privilege to work with him and to be able to call Keith a friend.

Diligently serving the First Congressional District of Kansas for 12 years, Keith repeatedly sought to give rural America a strong voice in Congress by advocating legislative programs that dealt with agriculture. His success in formulating these programs was far-reaching, and Keith appropriately became heralded as the champion of the farmer and rural interests.

Recognizing the multifaceted needs of our Nation, however, Keith also sought to foster conservation programs through his work in committees and worked tirelessly to insure that our national parks were preserved and enhanced. Keith, moreover, was a strong advocate for small business and senior citizens.

The death of any individual with whom we have been privileged to share a friendship is a deep and long-term personal loss. Even though Keith had retired from the Congress, it is hard to believe that we can no longer benefit from his intelligence and compassion. I will miss him sorely and extend my heartfelt condolences to his wife, Bette, and to his sons and their families.●

● Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of personal loss that I take part in this final tribute to my long-time friend and our former colleague, Keith Sebelius of Kansas. No person who has graced the halls of this great body addressed himself in behalf of his constituents with greater conviction than Keith Sebelius of Kansas' First Congressional District. Yet, in articulating his strong and reflective views—frequently on issues related to American agriculture—Keith Sebelius maintained a calm and reserved composure which gave added weight to his words and views.

A most competent lawyer, Keith Sebelius made contributions in various fields of activity before his election to the Congress in 1968. Keith had a distinguished record in the military service as a veteran of both World War II and the Korean conflict. He served his city of Norton, Kans., as a member of the city council and as its mayor. He was both city attorney and county attorney of Norton County. His 6 years as State senator in the Kansas legislature helped equip him for the distinguished service which he rendered in behalf of his congressional district and of the Nation during the time that we knew him.

Mr. Speaker, in mourning the loss of Congressman Sebelius let me also express on my own behalf as well as in behalf of my wife Doris our respect, affection, and deep sympathy to his wife Bette and to all members of his family.●

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to hear of the death of my good friend and former colleague, Keith Sebelius. He came to the House of Representatives in 1969, 2 years after I first came to serve in the 90th Congress.

I had the privilege to become good friends with Keith and our interests were the same in a number of areas. I still have several of Keith's key rings that he always enjoyed giving to his friends.

He was thoughtful and nice to everyone and I never saw him become agitated or lose his temper. He was always a gentleman.

Keith Sebelius will be remembered as a warm, kind man, and as an effective and respected leader in the House of Representatives.

Before coming to Washington, Keith distinguished himself in a number of positions in service to the people of Kansas. He was a Kansas State senator for 6 years in addition to holding positions of county attorney, city councilman, city attorney and mayor of his hometown of Almena.

He represented the people of the First District of Kansas well during his six terms here in Washington. I am honored to have had the opportunity to serve with this fine American.●

Mr. ROBERTS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the memory of Keith Sebelius has indeed been well served by the comments by my colleagues.

I yield back the balance of my time.

THE LATE HONORABLE ADAM BENJAMIN, JR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JACOBS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and include extraneous matter, on the life, character, and public service of the late Honorable ADAM BENJAMIN, JR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

□ 2030

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, Edwin Markham wrote, on the death of Abraham Lincoln:

And when he fell in whirlwind, he went down
As when a lordly cedar, green with boughs,
Goes down with a great shout upon the hills,
And leaves a lonesome place against the sky.

ADAM BENJAMIN has passed from the sounds of our voices, and he has left a lonesome place in this Chamber that will last for a long, long time. Those who loved ADAM here—and I think without exception that describes every Member of the House of Representatives who ever served with ADAM and the others who toil with us in the Nation's Capital—will feel the lonesome place tomorrow and tomorrow again.

Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks I am including editorials from two Indianapolis newspapers, and proceedings from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 8, 1982:

[From the Indianapolis News, Sept. 8, 1982]

ADAM BENJAMIN, JR.

For anyone who follows Indiana politics, news of the untimely death of 1st District Congressman Adam Benjamin Jr. comes as shocking and sad news.

During his tenure with both the Indiana General Assembly and the U.S. House of Representatives, the 47th-year-old Lake County Democrat was regarded as a legislator's legislator by colleagues on both sides of the political aisle.

A West Point graduate proud of his Assyrian heritage, Benjamin was elected to the Indiana House of Representatives in 1966, where he was named outstanding freshman Democratic representative at the conclusion of his first term. He was re-election to the Indiana Senate, where he served until 1976.

Benjamin is regarded as one of the most conscientious legislators of the Legislature. He not only was the only state legislator since former Sen. Russell Bontrager, R-Elkhart, to read every bill crossing his desk, Benjamin scrutinized the legislation with a lawyer's eye and was quick to spot a loophole, an error or a legislative wolf in sheep's clothing.

His crowning piece of legislation was undoubtedly the 1975 Medical Malpractice Act. Working around the clock, Benjamin achieved what many thought impossible by creating a consensus among lawyers, doctors and insurance carriers on how to avert soaring malpractice insurance premiums while still protecting legitimate claims by medical consumers. That legislation still stands as a model for other states.

In 1976 Benjamin successfully challenged incumbent Congressman Ray Madden for the 1st District seat in the Democratic primary. When he went to Congress, Benjamin was quickly recognized as one of the brightest of the crop of "Watergate class" freshment and was named chairman of the Legislative Branch Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee.

He won landslide re-elections in 1978 and 1980. Political observers here and in Washington predicted that as his seniority increased so would his rise to top leadership positions.

In an age of media politicians, Benjamin was a rarity. Prematurely balding, wearing wing-tipped shoes too large for his height, Benjamin advanced not on charisma but on intelligence, hard work, perserverance and genuine warmth. Those shoes will be hard to fill.

[From the Indianapolis Star, Sept. 9, 1982]

ADAM BENJAMIN

The quick mind, cheerful industry and warm humanity of Rep. Adam Benjamin were taken too early from the Indiana scene. The promise of greater accomplishment was strong.

Those who knew this extraordinary man will give thanks even while they mourn his death at 47. His delight in working at what he saw as the public interest was unquenchable and often contagious.

The Star joins thousands of others in extending sympathy to the family of the congressman. It is easy and true to say that he worked too hard; yet that characteristic was a product of vision, an enormous curiosity that led to conviction about what needed to be done—and what realistically could be achieved.

In the Indiana General Assembly his service in both House and Senate was marked by unsurpassed mastery of the content of bills before members. Many a proposal which got a searching second glance from him ended with an important amendment, or went down to defeat, because of the power of his clear and compelling debate. "The great amender," they called him, a term that echoed both affection and respect from both sides of the aisle.

Truly he was driven by a desire for accomplishing good, and surely many millions benefited. In Congress he worked with passion to advance the interests of his district, including the steel industry, and he brought benefits to rail transportation in Indiana.

When a newspaper asked his platform in his successful 1976 run for Congress, Benjamin answered, in part, with this statement: "Reduction of the size and improvement of the effectiveness in all levels of government; making all government officials accountable for their expenditure of public funds."

Nominated by the Democrats over incumbent union friend Ray Madden, he was denied endorsement that fall by the state AFL-CIO, a serious thing in Lake County. It was the first time that had happened to a Democrat for Congress in the merged group's history—perhaps because he had been lawyer for a steelworker in a suit against his union. But three steelworker locals backed him.

Benjamin's nearly unsleeping eye for detail in budgets and flaws in bills promised much further good on the Washington scene.

Adam Benjamin came from one of the smallest of the minorities that make up the bewildering ethnic patchwork of the Calumet, the Assyrians. West Point graduate, Marine, Army paratrooper, attorney and friend of thousands, he was a comet of the still broad, still inviting American sky of opportunity for those who will strive.

[From the Congressional Record, Sept. 8, 1982]

THE LATE ADAM BENJAMIN, JR.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, with deepest regret I inform the Members of this House of the death of our colleague, Adam Benjamin. I extend my most heartfelt condolences to his wife, Patricia, and his children, Adam, Alison, and Arianne.

All of us who knew him are grateful for his life and the contributions he made to his friends, community, State, and Nation. His life, from West Point to Congress, was in the highest, finest tradition of public service.

Adam was an extremely effective legislator. I know of no one who was so quick to master the procedures of the House and use them for the benefit of his constituents. He set a record by becoming the chairman of an appropriations subcommittee in his second term. There used to be a saying at the Indiana Statehouse that Adam Benjamin was the only member of the general assembly who read all the bills. That gives some indication of the respect his fellow legislators had for Adam's legislative skill. Adam's drive for self-improvement enabled him to study for a master of law degree to teach academic courses while carrying on his duties as a Member of Congress.

Adam believed in, and lived for, representative government. He came from his constituents; he was a part of them; and he worked hard for them. Their problems and hopes, troubles and ambitions were his as well. Their welfare was his primary concern. He thought constantly of how he might serve them better. Adam had pride in his work as a politician and legislator. He believed it was the politician's job to make the country work, to provide stability, to accommodate different points of view, to develop a consensus, and to meet the needs of people.

He believed that a politician's work is the chief means of achieving justice for all persons.

His death cut short a brilliant career in the House of Representatives. We will miss him as a friend, politician, and legislator. All of us who knew him will be able to hold our heads a little higher because he contributed, as few are able to do, to making this House, as well as representative government, work better. His loss will be deeply felt by all of us who knew and worked with him.

The funeral for Adam will be at 10 a.m. Friday, September 10. It will be held at the Sts. Constantine and Helen Greek Orthodox Cathedral, 8000 Madison Street, Merrillville, Ind. Visitation hours will be Thursday, September 9, from 12 noon to 10 p.m., at the funeral home of Stilinovich, Palmer, Wiatrolik, 4201 Broadway, Gary, Ind. A delegation will depart from the House steps at approximately 7:30 a.m. on Friday, September 10, for Gary, Ind., returning immediately upon conclusion of services in Indiana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, we all were shocked and saddened with the news yesterday morning of the loss of our dear friend, Adam Benjamin. We all learned to know him, some more recently than some of the rest of us from Indiana. Adam was one of the hardest working Members of Congress, as he had been a hard working State legislator. With his passing, he will be missed here in this House. We offer our condolences and our prayers to Pat and his children. The loss will be to our Nation to lose a very valuable, caring, and nice person that Adam was.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the dean of our delegation for his contribution. Sadness and the understanding of death lie very heavily across this Chamber on this Wednesday. We had a colleague amongst us who was quick, alive, warm, friendly, and smiling just a few days ago. We are reminded that no person is an island. Particularly in this Chamber, we are a part of one another, and how childish our selfish tragedies seem at a time like this. Death ends a life, but it does not end a relationship, which will continue on in our hearts and in our minds. It does not make any difference whether it is a chamber of commerce person or a labor person in Indiana who speaks of Adam Benjamin. The regard is high and is immense for his scholarship, for his fairness and for his just plain friendliness.

There is an old advertisement that says, "Nobody doesn't like Sarah Lee." And, as you shall soon see by the remarks that are to follow, nobody didn't like Adam Benjamin.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILLIS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it was with great shock and with great sadness that I learned of this tragic event, the passing of our colleague. I had first gotten to know Adam when we went to the Indiana general assembly together in 1967 and served in the house where we sponsored a good number of bills together. As I got to know Adam and worked with him we became quite good friends. He typified, as the gentleman said, everything that is good about politics and good about government. He was a symbol there. We used to call him Mr. Clean because of what he stood for and how he conducted himself. I would say in public service I have known many fine people and many great people. Adam is of that category, probably the most ethical man in politics that I have ever known.

Mr. HAMILTON. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SHARP. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in recognizing our distinguished Hoosier colleague, who was a model, I think, for many of us as legislators. He certainly was an exceptional public servant who did honor to our people and honor to this Institution.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I want to join in mourning the passing of Adam Benjamin. There was no more dedicated or hardworking Member of this House.

He served as the chairman of the Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, of which I am the ranking minority member. We sat shoulder to shoulder through countless hours of hearings, mark-ups and conferences with the other body.

Adam sought solutions, not contention. He sought results, not showmanship. He was a champion of his people in his district. He was a giant of a man, a block of granite.

The people of Indiana have lost a great Congressman; the Congress has lost a fine subcommittee chairman, and I have lost a friend.

Mr. HAMILTON. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FITHIAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege and the pleasure to share in the representation of Adam's home county, Lake County. I think the best way to describe Adam Benjamin is to say that he was a legislator's legislator. And the best phrase I know of to describe Adam's life's work is that "he got things done," a tremendously effective person who knew no hours limitations on himself. His long hours contributed to democracy and and to this House. We shall all miss him in Indiana, and we shall miss him in this House. The nation has lost a great legislator. I extend my heartfelt condolences to the family of our late and great colleague, Adam Benjamin, Jr.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, was deeply shocked and saddened by Adam's passing. As first-term Congressman from the other party, quite often you do not know what kind of relationships that you will be able to develop over time. But having the opportunity to fly with Adam many, many times to and from Chicago I got to know Adam as a friend and as a fellow Congressman. I think in those trips to and from Washington I learned a great deal not only about his dedication to his family, whether it was the last time I talked to him and he was the next day going to a baseball game with his children, or whether it was on Sunday afternoons or Sunday evenings hurrying to catch a plane, when we had been at the same parade, or at the same function, so that he could be here first thing Monday morning to get the job done here. Indiana will certainly miss Adam Benjamin. The northwest Indiana sector had a fine Representative. and whoever follows him will have very large shoes to fill. I, as a new Member of Congress, will miss Adam as well.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I express my gratitude to him for taking this time to relate to one of the great friends I have had in the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, as was pointed out earlier, I, too, flew from Washington to Chicago, and I developed a truly wonderful friendship with Adam. I never thought that it would so suddenly end.

As a man, Adam was tough, he was generous and he was loving. As a Congressman, his achievements were as stunning as they were profound. Adam was shrewd, he was honest, and he was effective. The effectiveness of the man was that he defeated one of the most powerful Members of Congress for that seat in Indiana. His rise on the Appropriations Committee was nothing less than miraculous. Adam was a man certainly of national stature. Yet his dedication to his constituents ran very deep. Adam Benjamin won many, many battles for Gary, and I am just happy to say that in winning those battles some of the victory spilled over into Chicago. He was a de facto member of the South Side of the city of Chicago because what was good for Gary and Indiana and Illinois was also good for my city. He also expected and received support from the Illinois delegation. I am proud of that. Adam was a West Pointer and a marine. He was intensely proud of his family. He was a great storyteller and a magnificent person to share a martini with at week's end. Only in his death do we sadly recognize the national achievement and the personal wealth that were in one person, Adam Benjamin. I express to his family my deepest sympathy.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COATS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I think our colleagues are witnessing today the deep respect and admiration that both sides of the aisle have had for Adam Benjamin. His loss is tragic. My first reaction was that Adam is as close to irreplaceable in Congress as any person that I have known here. Even though I am a freshman from the party opposite of Adam's, that was no barrier to his taking me under his wing, putting his hand on my shoulder, helping me to understand the legislative process, and working with me together for the good of Indiana and for the good of this Nation. I will miss him greatly. My deep sympathies are extended to his family. Adam's loss is a loss to all of us.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, as a Congressman who has served on the Appropriations Committee and in the Steel Caucus and as one who was born in Indiana, I hope my colleagues will let me share their pride in Adam and their sorrow over his death. He had a penetrating, no-nonsense mind. In the words of the E.F. Hutton ads, when Adam spoke, people listened. We shall miss him very, very much.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I came to know Adam Benjamin because my son, who was a political consultant, was involved in his first campaign in which he was elected to the Congress. When I had my office over in the Cannon Office Building, it would not matter whether I went home at 7 or 11 o'clock at night; I went by Adam's office, and every time I went by his office, no matter how late it was, Adam was in there working. I never experienced anyone who spent the hours at night working that Adam did, for his constituents and for this House of Representatives. We will certainly miss him very much.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MICHEL. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

May I pick up on the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa, because I have known Adam Benjamin over the relatively short period of time that he served in this body. I can tell you that he lived to work. When I have been driving home in the immediate neighborhood, there was Adam at 8:30, 9 o'clock, just walking slowly back to his apartment. When I came back to work the next morning at 7:30, quarter to 8, there was Adam Benjamin walking more briskly back to his office again.

Having served with him on the Subcommittee on Appropriations, I can certainly attest to the industrious manner with which he approached any subject. If it was the Capitol Grounds around here that needed repair, he wanted to see it firsthand, to make absolutely sure that the expenditure of a few thousand dollars was justified. I did not know about the fact that he came from a legislature with the kind of a reputation for having read every bill that came before the legislature, but I can fully understand that, having served the brief period of time that I served with him.

I guess at this time there really is no center aisle because those of us on our side appreciate just as much as those of you on the majority side what a contribution Adam Benjamin has made to this House of Representatives. Seeing him operate, an "in-house" man at times, but also so well versed in the legislative ways, he brought credit to this House of Representatives. Each of us could take just a leaf from his book in how to conduct our lives on the floor of this House, on and off the floor. We are certainly going to miss Adam. I consider him one of those new-found friends, now lost, that I got to know in the House of Representatives, and I guess that is what makes this such a great place to have the opportunity to serve with people about whom we feel so strongly, and I certainly want to extend my unbounded sympathy to his wife and children in their hour of bereavement.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman from Indiana has effectively summarized the characteristics of Adam Benjamin that made him so beloved to all of us who had the opportunity to work with him. I was particularly privileged to have served with Adam on the Budget Committee. Some of the traits that have been discussed already were the ones that stand out in my mind about Adam, particularly the hard worker attitude that he had.

When I first came to this institution, one of the oldtimers told me that around this place knowledge is power, which means that if you do your homework fairly and effectively, people will come to you to seek information. If you are honest with them, you gain a stature of power that is not measured by title or by office. Clearly Adam Benjamin was one of the most powerful people in this body because he was a prodigious worker who did his homework very effectively. And when you talked to him about an issue, he did not color the facts; he gave it to you straight. He was honest, he was independent. That made him a powerful and beloved individual. Another characteristic of Adam was his independence, the fact that he was a strong Democrat, and yet he crossed the aisle many times and voted for Republican amendments when he thought that was in the best interest of the country.

Obviously, he had strong support from labor, organized labor, and working people, and yet a few months ago when I was in Gary at his request to speak to the chamber of commerce group there, it was obvious that he had very strong support and respect among management and the business community.

It is this honesty and independence and hard work that made him stand out as a most effective legislator and a most effective national leader.

I will miss him very deeply as a friend. The Budget Committee and the whole process of the budget will miss him very deeply, because he did do his homework and he was effective.

I extend my very deepest sympathies to his family and friends.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, with a profound sense of shock and sorrow, I join my colleagues in paying a last tribute to Adam Benjamin. As a human being, and as a Member of this House, Adam embodied everything that was decent and good.

He was a caring person, with a deep sense of fairness and justice, and he was a warm personal friend of many Members of this House.

He was an exceptional legislator and public servant, who served with high distinction in the Indiana Legislature, and who in only three terms came to be recognized as one of the most respected and effective Members of the House. He was, in a word, a legislator's legislator, noted for his diligence, his knowledge of the procedures and the business of the House, and his skill in using the art of the possible to make good things happen.

In the House, there is no higher distinction than to be an effective chairman of an appropriations subcommittee. Adam earned that distinction on two appropriations subcommittees during his three terms on the committee.

It was my privilege to serve with Adam during his chairmanship of the Transportation Subcommittee. I served on that subcommittee for many years. I have a strong personal commitment to many of those programs, and I have had many deep and rewarding associations with members of that subcommittee.

Adam mastered the programs and the personalities of that subcommittee, and became one of the most effective members and chairmen in its history. I am deeply grateful for the opportunity I had to serve with him, and to share his high abilities as a legislator, and his warmth and depth as a human being.

His ability and his depth and his warmth will be missed by this House and each of its Members. His public service will be missed by this country. I send my heartfelt condolences to Mrs. Benjamin and his family.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

I certainly want to join the gentleman from Indiana in extending my sympathy to Adam's beautiful family. He was a wonderful father and husband and spoke of them very, very often.

Adam was a friend and classmate. I remember when we came in together to this fine body, he gave our class many innovative, creative ideas.

I think Adam was one of those public servants who very seldom would make headlines, but he was one of the most quietly effective and decent people for whom this country could hope.

In addition to that, he not only served Gary, Ind., so effectively and beautifully, and unselfishly, he also was very generous with his time for other constituencies. I know that the people of the city of Cleveland, Ohio, our mayor and Congressman STOKES, myself, and others, are especially grateful for the hard work that he performed on our behalf in terms of the supplemental bill that we will be taking up shortly.

So all of us will miss Adam tremendously, but we will remember him. I believe for me, anyway, he will always be a prototype and a model of what a public official should be.

Mr. FARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

[Mr. FARY addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I learned about Adam Benjamin before he got here. He had the reputation in Indiana and in the Indiana Legislature for being the classic inside man. He was a real pleasure to work with. I had the privilege of working with him from the very beginning and it was fascinating to watch him move in ways that most people do not, to get to the core of the House.

I doubt very much whether most people understand how potent he was in the first few months that he was here. He knew his way around in a way that was almost unbelievable in 6 months and he was a force and an influence in a year. His power and influence for good and for his State grew monthly. He was one of the most extraordinary Members I have ever seen in this institution and I doubt that even his close friends fully understand how much influence he had.

The country is going to miss Adam Benjamin. The institution is going to miss Adam Benjamin. The district and the State that he represented are going to miss him and I have nothing but the deepest sympathy for his family, because I know they will miss him, too.

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Adam occupied the same corridor as I do in the Cannon Building, two offices down. No matter what time I left that office, 7 o'clock, 8 o'clock, 9 o'clock, 10 o'clock, Adam's light was still on; no one in his office, just Adam sitting at his desk poring over legislation, working on issues long after every other Member of Congress had gone home. He worked very, very hard. He worked too hard. He worked harder than any man I have ever met in any field of endeavor.

I am very sorry to see him pass, because he was one of the most honest, tough, ethical people that I have ever met. He was somebody who if he had worked a little less hard could have been with us another 20 years or 25 years serving this institution and would have left a record that would have been unparalleled because of his ability to understand how this place worked and how to make it work for the issues and the beliefs that he held very dearly.

I will miss him very much, because he was a good friend of mine, and I believe the Congress and the people of this country will miss him just as much.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I subscribe to the many wonderful statements that have been made on the untimely passing of our friend, Adam Benjamin.

On the Appropriations Committee, I do not know of anyone who applied himself more closely, who was more effective and who did it with as little fanfare as did Adam Benjamin. Notwithstanding all the work that he did in so many fields, if ever there was a need for a volunteer, Adam was willing to take that on, too.

So I say again that I subscribe to the many things said here and I add to it that his untimely passing leaves a void that is going to be difficult to fill and nobody will ever take his place, actually, but it will take two or three to take up the load that he carried.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his family. He leaves a monument and a mark here that all of us might well try to emulate.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in paying tribute to Adam Benjamin.

Our colleague, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, summarized it well when he said that Adam Benjamin did things with little fanfare. He was not a meteor out there. He was not doing things because it might make television tomorrow. He was a solid, substantial legislator, who contributed in a very meaningful way to what goes on in this body.

Our colleague, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. Bolling) was correct when he said this institution, this House, is going to miss him.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana, and my other friends and colleagues in expressing sympathy to the family of Adam Benjamin.

We came to Congress together. He was a good friend, which of course was strengthened by the fact that he was educated in my district during his younger life.

He worked hard and he was what we call a real work horse, as opposed to a show horse. This institution is all the finer because of it. This country is all the better off because of Adam Benjamin.

I know that his memory will linger with us for many, many years.

Mr. GINN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GINN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for taking this time to give those of us who knew and loved Adam Benjamin the opportunity to express our deepest and sincerest sympathy to his family.

Late yesterday afternoon, having lost the governorship in my State, I boarded a plane in Atlanta to return to Washington to complete my career in the Congress. I picked up a paper and opened it up and first learned of Adam's death.

It suddenly dawned on me that all I have lost was an election, but that Adam's wife has lost a husband. His children has lost a great father. His district and his State have lost a tremendous Representative and this Congress and this country have lost, I think, one of the finest men who ever served in this body.

I was a fellow Appropriations Subcommittee chairman with Adam. No Member, to my knowledge, did his work more effectively, as has been pointed out, with less fanfare, but with more dignity and effectiveness than did Adam Benjamin.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his family and to his district and to his State.

I think the highest compliment I can pay Adam Benjamin is to say that he will truly be missed. I am a better person in having known my friend, Adam Benjamin.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentelman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

I would like to express my deepest sympathies to the family of Adam Benjamin.

I was fortunate to get to know Adam Benjamin as a member of the executive committee of the Steel Caucus and I watched him as a leader of that caucus. I listened and learned as he handled a wide variety of issues of critical importance to this Nation's steel industry. I grew to respect his ability and to admire him greatly.

It has been said that he operated without fanfare, that he was concerned with substance—that is so true. He was the kind of Congressman that we would hope for on both sides of the aisle—for the benefit of the body and for the benefit of the American people.

Adam Benjamin was also a kind and affectionate human being. He did not seem to have, and if he had them, I never saw them—any partisan bones in his body. He would work with Members of this side of the aisle just as well as he would work with Members of his own party. Respect and friendship were in surplus from his fellow Members.

He will certainly be missed by his colleagues on the Steel Caucus and throughout this House. I heard some people talking the other day about what a Congressman has to do to achieve national recognition. You would think that national recognition would come to a Congressman who worked and achieved the way Adam Benjamin did. That is not exactly the way things work out, but when people ask Members of Congress who they admire and who they respect and who they would like to emulate, certainly the name of Adam Benjamin would stand tall before all of us as a name to remember.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I join my colleagues in expressing my condolences to the family of my dear departed friend, Adam Benjamin, with whom I had the privilege of serving on the Appropriations Committee.

Like others who have expressed their admiration for Adam today, I respected Adam for his quiet courage and the dedicated manner in which he went about his work in service to his Nation.

I was taught as a child at my mother's knee that loyalty was the greatest virtue, and I believe that Adam demonstrated loyalty to the people that he worked for, to the Nation that he served, and to the family that he loved. He will be dearly missed in Congress. While his lights in the office in the Cannon Building will be darkened, the light that Adam Benjamin shone here in Washington will long be remembered.

Mr. MCDADE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MCDADE. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I was shocked, as all of us were, to read of the untimely passing of our dear friend Adam Benjamin. I want to join my colleagues on both sides of the aisle in paying tribute to a distinguished and dedicated Member of this body. Adam's life will always stand as a great symbol for all of us to strive for in achieving excellence, in attempting to achieve excellence as we go about our legislative duties.

I do not know of a finer man than Adam. Adam was a marvelous man to deal with. He knew all of the intricate details of every piece of legislation that he handled, and others.

Mr. Speaker, I used to enjoy talking with him about Hoosier hysteria and Hoosier mania and how all the teams were doing which represented that great part of this Nation, which he so ably represented. He was a fine gentleman.

I was doubly saddened to read that he had come back to town to put his son into school; to have it happen in such a way as that is the height of pain, I am sure, for he and his family.

The Nation is poorer for his loss. This House is poorer for his loss.

I want to extend my deepest condolences to his survivors and I thank the gentleman for taking the time to permit us to pause to pay tribute to a truly great American, the late Adam Benjamin.

Mr. MCCLORY. Mr. Speaker, joining in this final tribute to our colleague, Congressman Adam Benjamin, Jr., of the First District of Indiana, I must first indicate the deep shock which accompanied the report of his unexpected and abrupt passing.

Mr. Speaker, my association with Congressman Benjamin was far more intimate than that which I have experienced with most of my colleagues in this body. As a Representative in Congress from the great steel-producing area of Gary, Ind., Adam Benjamin and I worked closely together as members of the Steel Caucus. Adam's consideration of the views and interests of others and his ability to organize and apply the joint efforts of those of us who were having similar economic problems were among his special talents.

Mr. Speaker, Adam Benjamin has been one of the harder working Members of the Congress who earned the respect and enjoyed the friendship of those on both sides of the political aisle. In recalling his service and his useful life in our Nation, I take this occasion also to express my respect and deep sympathy to his widow, Patricia, and to all members of his family.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my deep sorrow at the passing of our distinguished and well-loved colleague, Adam Benjamin. His sudden death is a great personal loss for me and a great loss as well for the Congress and the Nation it serves.

Adam was a legislator in every good sense of the word. His ability to move complex legislation through the House—building coalitions, crafting compromises, and giving all affected parties a fair say in the final product—exemplified the best in our democratic traditions and in our legislature process.

As we worked together closely on legislation, Adam and I developed a friendship that has ended too soon. My heart goes out to Adam's family and to the people of Indiana in this time of sorrow. I know that we in the House will not soon forget the contributions Adam Benjamin has made to our institution and to the American people.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, like so many of my colleagues, I was stunned yesterday at the tragic news of the untimely death of my distinguished colleague and good friend from Indiana, Adam Benjamin.

During the last 6 years he served in the Congress, representing the First District of Indiana, I had the opportunity to work with him, to get to know him, and I became one of his great admirers.

He was a loyal, staunch, and dedicated Member of the House of Representatives. He reflected credit on the House, for he was a tireless worker in behalf of his constituents, his State, and his beloved America.

As chairman of the Congressional Steel Caucus, as a member of the House Budget and Transportation Committees, as a member of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee and the Democratic Caucus Committee on Party Effectiveness, and later, as a member of the Appropriations Committee and chairman of the Subcommittee on Transportation of the Appropriations Committee, he give inspired leadership to this body which will be remembered for years to come.

He was a 1958 graduate of the U.S. Military Academy, earned his law degree from Valparaiso University in 1968, and before coming to Congress, he served as a State senator in the Indiana Legislature from 1971 to 1977, and prior to that, he served as a State representative from 1967 to 1971.

Those of us who had the privilege of knowing Adam Benjamin as a friend and colleague deeply mourn his passing, and our hearts go out to his bereaved family. Mrs. Annunzio joins me in extending our heartfelt sympathy to Adam's devoted wife, Patricia, and his three children, Adam III, Alison, and Arianne, on their great loss.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I knew Adam because we represented adjoining districts, we served together on the Steel Caucus, and we served together on the Appropriations Committee.

He was a model of what a Congressman should be.

No issue was too complex, nor constituent case too small, to escape his study. Everything that affected the lives of his constituents affected his life. He was totally dedicated to their service.

This was illustrated by his mastery of the problems of the steel industry. Adam had a knowledge of the workers, the management, the plants, and the equipment that would have made a Wall Street analyst envious.

Why did he know these things? Because in Adam's district the steel industry is the economic mainstay. And, to his great personal anguish, hundreds upon hundreds of steel workers are out of work.

Adam made their concern his own. He could have paid lip service to their plight, and probably have been seen as doing enough. But that was not Adam. He had to learn the industry—top to bottom, inside and out—so that he would truly act in the best interest of those unemployed workers.

This is just one example of the kind of Congressman he was. There are many more.

What we have gained by his working among us is inestimable. What we have lost by his passing is clear: He was a voice of reason and conciliation, of compassion and responsibility.

I valued his counsel greatly. I will miss him every day.

Mr. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the late Adam Benjamin, Jr., our colleague from Indiana. I know that many of the Members gathered here share my sadness at his sudden and untimely death.

Adam Benjamin will long be remembered by his colleagues in the House, Indiana State legislators and local elected officials, and by more than anyone else his constituents for his tireless efforts on their behalf. The words dedication and self-sacrifice come to the minds of his friends and associates when his name is mentioned. I was privileged to serve with Adam on the Congressional Steel Caucus, of which he was chairman—his leadership there will be sorely missed. Known for his mastery of detail and his in-depth knowledge of the problems facing steel and other heavy industries, he was an effective spokesman for the interests of the industrial Midwest.

Adam Benjamin earned an engineering degree from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, and his law degree from Valparaiso University of Indiana. As well, he lectured on the social sciences and budget studies at Georgetown University, from which he was to have been awarded a master's degree in comparative and international law. He was first elected to the House of Representatives in 1976, and has served on the House Appropriations and Budget Committees, holding the chairmanship of the Subcommittee on Transportation of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great honor and respect that we mark the passing of Adam Benjamin, Jr. No words can fully express the emptiness we all feel and the void which he has left. Our prayers go out to his family, for we know what a loss they have suffered, and pray that God will give them strength.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Members for their several contributions.

Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 579) on the death of the Honorable Adam Benjamin, Jr.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

"H. RES. 579

"Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable Adam Benjamin, Jr., a Representative from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That a committee of such Members of the House as the Speaker may designate, together with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

"Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

"Resolved, That when the House adjourns today, it adjourn as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased."

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. DECKARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to our colleague (Mr. DECKARD) from the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana.

Mr. DECKARD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the sorrow that all of us have felt over the passing of ADAM BENJAMIN weighs heavily still today.

ADAM was a man who, to a degree rare in public life, earned the deep respect of all who knew him. It was my honor and pleasure to have had his friendship since 1967, when he and I were first elected to the Indiana Legislature. Since that time, more than any other person I have known, he exemplified the ideals of public service.

The grief of his family is, of course, beyond measure, but only those who knew of ADAM's work can know how profound is the Nation's loss as well.

In all matters ADAM BENJAMIN was a man of honor and humanity. He was my friend and I will miss him greatly.

Mr. JACOBS. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the gentlewoman from New York.

Ms. FERRARO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, sometimes, when I think about the composition of this House, and the divergent backgrounds and interests of the Members, I am amazed at how much is accomplished. What makes it possible for us to get things done is the willingness of Members to make the effort necessary to understand the problems facing Americans from areas which differ from their own. That kind of cooperation is the essence of governing in a Nation as large and diverse as ours.

The death of ADAM BENJAMIN deprives this House of a man who exemplified the best of this spirit of cooperation and the willingness to understand other people's problems. On several occasions, I had the opportunity to discuss with this gentleman from Indiana transportation issues of special concern to New York City. I was consistently gratified at the effort he made to understand the problem and craft an effective solution. It was just obvious that he really cared, that he was really dedicated to helping people and making things work.

It may sound corny, but there is no other way to say it—ADAM BENJAMIN was a truly nice man. I will miss him, and this House will miss him.

Mr. JACOBS. I thank the gentlewoman for her contribution.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I thank my distinguished colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in paying tribute to a great American whom we in the House had the honor and privilege of serving with. ADAM BENJAMIN was a dedicated Member of Congress in the few short years that he was here. It may even seem inappropriate that I might mention the fact that, to many who criticize, to many who make light of the efforts of the Members of Congress, I think ADAM BENJAMIN would probably exemplify the fact that the dedicated Members, the 99.9 percent of the Members of the House who serve and serve well, work with such diligence and such ardor that, for some of them, as I think it was for ADAM BENJAMIN, eventually it caused his death—the long hours and the work and the frustration many times that we have as we serve.

He was not only dedicated to his constituency. I am very happy to recall the many times that he, in his very important position as chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations, was helpful to many of his colleagues, not only in passing legislation, not only in assisting with their problems, but with counsel and advice in areas of interest to the individual Member. He was one who would never say "no" to time request, to request for counsel or request for advice. Having served his country in the armed service, as well, he again offered his service to his country in the legislative field.

I know that the people of Indiana and the people in his constituency will miss him because of his dedication and his effort in their behalf.

I would like to mention a personal note concerning a young man in his constituency who was killed in Vietnam, a young man who, by accident, happens to share the same name of de la Garza. ADAM BENJAMIN visited me about that and became so interested in the fact that here was this young man, in the prime of his life, who had served and who had lost his life in Vietnam. His interest in looking into the events that led to the young man's untimely death eventually resulted in the posthumous awarding of the Congressional Medal of Honor to Emilio de la Garza of East Chicago, Ind., and it was, I am convinced, through the efforts of ADAM BENJAMIN, feeling that this young man had performed above and beyond the call of duty, and this was, of course, verified by the respective chains of command that that type of award has to go through. He was very proud and happy that he had done this. But he was that kind of a man who would work with a Member on one of his problems, but yet the lowliest of his constituents were as important to him in his efforts as he legislated and as he counseled and as he served their needs as far as the Government is concerned.

So I join with my colleagues, in that we will miss ADAM BENJAMIN, but this House and this country will be the better for his having served here. Of course, we extend to his family and to his friends and to his constituency our heartfelt condolences. But we are satisfied that his service will make this a better country and make this a better House of Representatives.

Mr. JACOBS. The Indiana delegation expresses its gratitude to the chairman.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RAHALL. I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana, for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank our colleagues in the Indiana congressional delegation for providing the Members this opportunity to pay tribute to a fine man, and a wonderful Member of this body, ADAM BENJAMIN, who passed away last week.

It was not only an honor to come to Congress at the same time as ADAM, but it was a pleasure to have him as a next-door neighbor on the fourth floor of the Cannon House Office Building.

The point has been made on a number of times already, but I would like to stress again, that a night did not go by—or for that matter many weekends—that ADAM BENJAMIN was not in his office well into the evening and early mornings. A show horse he was not—but most definitely a workhorse he was.

Perhaps his physical stature did not match his personality, of a warm and decent man who saw concerns and needs of people that had to be met and he worked tirelessly to improve their situations.

He served on the Appropriations Committee with great distinction, and led its Subcommittee on Transportation with great skill. But even more importantly I believe, he was the driving force behind the Congresssional Steel Caucus.

It was due to ADAM's able leadership of the Steel Caucus that it became a power and positive force for an industry that has long been a foundation of America's economy. Not only did his district, which centered around the steel city of Gary, benefit from his efforts in this area, but the entire Nation benefited as well. As a Representative from one of the Nation's largest coal producing regions—coal that is used to produce steel—I was well aware of ADAM's positive impact in this area.

Men like ADAM BENJAMIN come along once in a great while. When they are gone, they are deeply missed. I know that I can safely say that ADAM BENJAMIN will be deeply missed by his family, his friends, and his colleagues here in the House of Representatives.

□ 2040

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the gentlewoman from Connecticut.

Mrs. KENNELLY. I thank my colleague from Indiana for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I was stunned to learn last week of the tragic and untimely death of our colleague, Representative ADAM BENJAMIN, JR.

While I have only been a Member of Congress a short time, I have been here long enough to realize that ADAM BENJAMIN was a remarkable man. He was remarkable not only because he was extremely hard working and intelligent, but because he combined his obvious talents with a warm and gracious personality and a genuine concern for helping others.

I became acquainted with ADAM soon after I was elected to Congress. I had requested a meeting with him to discuss an important transportation problem in my district. Although I was the newest Member of the House, I could not have been accorded greater courtesy or respect than if I had been the Speaker himself. In all of my dealings with ADAM, he was straightforward and modest, low key and persuasive.

I will miss ADAM very much and wish to extend to his family my deepest sympathies.

Mr. JACOBS. I thank the gentlewoman for her contribution.

Mr. EVANS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will be gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. EVANS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this special order for ADAM BENJAMIN this evening, and it is true, as so many people both on the floor of the House and really throughout this Nation, particularly in his home State of Indiana, have stated so often in the last week that ADAM had a tremendous impact on this Nation, on his district, and that he had and was living already a very bright future here in Congress.

Those statements are true; but even more, ADAM was really the leading force in northwestern Indiana in trying to revitalize that area of our State economically, in terms of jobs for the citizens of ADAM's own district and those of several surrounding congressional districts.

It is seldom that we see Members of the House, I think, take that kind of a leading role in terms of increasing the economic strength of their own congressional districts to the extent that ADAM did.

Often I would be working in my office until 11 or 12 at night and, as has already been stated again many times, ADAM would be working in his office until the wee hours of the morning; but sometimes we would take a break and walk up the street to perhaps get a sandwich.

I know when I walked to my apartment only a block away from ADAM's last Wednesday night, and then when I walked back to my office on Thursday morning, I walked past ADAM's apartment knowing that I was not going to see him again, to be able to share that walk back to the office nor to walk back and forth from the Cannon Building's fourth floor with ADAM to the floor of the House or back to our offices after we had an opportunity to vote.

I think ADAM was certainly one of the most open and most friendly of Members of the U.S. Congress that I have ever had the privilege of knowing here in my 8 years. He would do anything that he possibly could to help a colleague. I know he did so repeatedly for me and for many others.

Just this afternoon I stopped by his congressional office and in closing up that particular office suite on the fourth floor of the Cannon Building, his staff was still hard at work for constituents back home. I know he had that kind of a dedicated staff not only in his Washington office but in his district office and also among his subcommittee staff of the Transportation Subcommittee.

ADAM's loss certainly is a loss in my opinion that will never be replaced in terms of magnitude or quality here on the floor of the House again. I know that his family, his friends, his colleagues, his district, his State, his Nation have suffered a tremendous loss, and as I and my wife, Darlene, were driving to ADAM's funeral last Friday morning from Indianapolis, I heard a song being sung on the car radio and simply its title was "Thank you for Being a Friend." That is what I would like to say at this time, ADAM. Thank you for being a friend.

Mr. JACOBS. I thank the gentleman for his excellent contribution.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, as closely as I worked with our late colleague ADAM BENJAMIN on the Steel Caucus, and as much as I respected him, there is much about him I did not know because his talk was of work and not of himself.

For example, he was relentless in his search for useful knowledge and he had an unquenchable curiosity about the way things work.

But I do not know if he read philosophy.

However, I do know his approach to public life matched to the letter a maxim of a 19th century French philosopher, who said, "You can only govern men by serving them. The rule is without exception."

Around Gary and northwest Indiana they were well governed when ADAM BENJAMIN had a hand in it. And the same is true for the Executive Committee of the Congressional Steel Caucus, of which he was chairman.

I do not know if ADAM BENJAMIN was a religious man.

But I do know his personal style matched word for word the admonition from Ecclesiastes in the Old Testament:

Whatsoever thy findest to to, do it with thy might . . .

ADAM BENJAMIN's time in the House of Representatives was marked by considerable service given with his might, which was substantial.

As a founder of the Steel Caucus, and a sustaining force, ADAM had an unspoken rule—never retreat, always advance. I do not know if he learned the rule in the Marines as an enlisted man or at West Point or as a young officer in the 101st Airborne; but he learned it well and he applied it with diligence as he moved from local government to State government to National Government and up in the National Government, always serving.

No meeting was too early for ADAM BENJAMIN and no crisis happened too late. He just was always there. It was never inconvenient for ADAM to drop what he was doing—and you never found him doing nothing—to go to the White House or the Department of Commerce or the International Trade Commission to work on a problem.

Unfailing is the only word to describe him.

One of his last official acts was to straighten out a punitive and discriminatory application to the steel industry of last month's tax bill.

He did it between 6 p.m. and 10 p.m., 1 hectic day before adjournment.

ADAM was never at a loss for long, and here he met and exceeded an ancient measure set down by the Roman historian Tacitus for judging the quality of a man:

Reason and calm judgement are the qualities especially belonging to a leader.

ADAM BENJAMIN was a leader.

When you work day in and day out with a man, month in and month out, year in and year out, you come to understand his strength and his shortcomings.

ADAM BENJAMIN had very few flaws and they all were minor.

He had much strength, and as the Book of Proverbs says:

Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friends.

The sharp edge of the Steel Caucus will be different because ADAM is not with us to apply his particular honing; so will that of the House; so will that of the Congress.

The highest tribute we can give him is to see that the edge is only different and not less sharp.

And most important in my mind is this: We must always advance, never retreat.

□ 2050

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his eloquent remarks as well.

I shall do nothing out of malice. What I deal in is too vast for malice.

The words are those of Abraham Lincoln. They might have been descriptive words of our colleague, ADAM BENJAMIN, as well.

ADAM was a workaholic, who strangely and maybe miraculously never seemed to be in a hurry. He always had time. He always had time to be stopped on the street, to be stopped in the Chamber. He always seemed to have a relaxed gait.

Another quotation from Lincoln is, "I have not willingly planted a thorn in any man's bosom." That is an adequate description of the kindliness of our dear departed colleague.

It has been said that ADAM served in the U.S. Marine Corps as an enlisted man. Later he accepted an appointment to West Point and did his State and his country honor as a student there and still later served in the U.S. Army as an officer in the 101st with great distinction.

He came home to Indiana; back home again in Indiana he got through law school, practiced law for a while, sniffed out the political fever and went down to Indianapolis from Gary to represent his community in the State legislature. There is something sort of Lincolnesque about this.

ADAM very quickly as a freshman representative developed a reputation about which much has been said in the past week or so for reading every bill. Now, most of us will tell you that is physically impossible, it is; so another miracle by ADAM BENJAMIN.

He helped other legislators by pointing out errors in their legislation, but always in a kindly way, so that I do not know of anybody who knows of anybody else who ever took offense at his suggestions for improvement.

Later he became a State senator in Indiana and served with the same distinction. It did not make any difference whether it was the Indiana State Chamber of Commerce as a representative or whether as a representative of the AFL-CIO or the Auto Workers, the acclaim was always the same: "He is decent. He is informed. He is industrious. He is a good guy." Nobody did not like ADAM BENJAMIN.

We went to the funeral the other day near Gary, Ind., on Friday and we saw a beautiful ceremony. Our colleague, Mr. HAMILTON from Indiana, gave a sterling tribute, which will appear in the RECORD, I believe. Others spoke as well. The ceremony was beautiful, reassuring, comforting.

The 45 or so House Members who formed the delegation, including Members who are in the Chamber now, that attended the ceremony went there with a special kind of pain that comes with the unanticipated loss of a dear friend.

We can almost see ADAM walking on to this floor from that corner of the Chamber even now, always with a grin or a smile.

We went there, and the ceremony, I think, did a lot of good for a lot of people who attended it. At the graveside there, there were the two little girls, ADAM's daughters, and the young man, Adam Benjamin III, who had come here so recently to Washington, D.C., to be enrolled over at Georgetown Prep, no doubt looking forward to this marvelous time through those difficult teenage years with his father to guide him. That will not be possible at all now. Others will help him, I am sure; but there was the widow, Patricia, a study in dignity and strength. As she sat by the graveside, the young man, Adam Benjamin III, stood there and somehow the two of them reminded us of nothing so much as the sad occasion of the death of John F. Kennedy, when the widow showed such dignity and such leadership, really, in sorrow for the Nation and when little John-John stood at attention and saluted his father's casket as it passed by. There was Adam Benjamin III. He never sat down at the graveside. He stood erect, the son of a soldier, next to his mother, lending strength to her. He will go on where his father leaves off, without a doubt.

Then, as our colleague from Indiana has pointed out, the staff from the congressional office which ADAM had so nobly and well led was there, and as our colleague, Mr. EVANS, has pointed out, that staff continues to do the work of the district. And they were hurt. They were hurt very hard.

I believe that the ceremony and the strength of Mrs. Benjamin, ADAM'S widow, gave them strength to carry on as they are quite nobly.

Now, for anyone who may read this RECORD 1 year from now or 10 or 100 years from now and suspect that this is dutiful rhetoric by colleagues who are expected to do that, let me give you a quote from Will Rogers who was ill once. He emerged from the hospital to say,

> People couldn't have been any nicer to me if I had died.

We expect grand and wonderful things to be said even of us when we pass on by our friends and by our colleagues, and that usually happens. I do not mean those words are empty. I just mean to say that the same words that you will read in cold print 100 years from now or however long, whichever scholar we are addressing henceforth in this RECORD, and before it all is chiseled in stone and becomes cold, unquick and unlifelike and unwarm, know this: That the same things that you will read in this RECORD now were on the record every day that ADAM was here, on the record from his friends to one another, to him. His appreciation did not begin with his untimely death. It was there and very much a part of him and very much a part of us throughout his career and throughout the time that we were privileged to know and be inspired by him.

● Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I subscribe to the many wonderful statements that have been made on the untimely passing of our friend, ADAM BENJAMIN.

On the Appropriations Committee, I do not know of anyone who applied himself more closely, who was more effective and who did it with as little fanfare as did ADAM BENJAMIN. Notwithstanding all the work that he did in so many fields, if ever there was a need for a volunteer, ADAM was willing to take that on, too.

An indication of the legislative skills which ADAM developed in the Indiana Legislature is the fact that he was elected to the Appropriations Committee on 1977 within weeks of his election to Congress. He selected assignments on the Legislative, Transportation, and District of Columbia Subcommittees.

ADAM was a tireless worker who soon earned the respect of his colleagues. In the 96th Congress, he was elected chairman of the Legislative Branch Subcommittee. He also served on the Transportation Subcommittee. ADAM became chairman of the Transportation Subcommittee at the beginning of the 97th Congress. Other assignments included the Energy and Water Development and Legislative Subcommittees.

So I say again that I subscribe to the many things said here and I add to it that his untimely passing leaves a void that is going to be difficult to fill. Nobody will ever take his place, actually, but it will take two or three to take up the load that he carried.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his family. Although ADAM served only a relatively short time in the House of Representatives, he leaves a monument and mark here that all of us might well try to emulate.●

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I join with my colleagues here today to honor a friend and fellow Member of the House of Representatives, ADAM BENJAMIN.

For almost 6 years, Congressman BENJAMIN was a talented, able, and effective legislator whose accomplishments will be long remembered by the people of northwest Indiana, and by us who had the privilege to serve with him. Without a doubt, he was respected and admired by his colleagues in the House, regardless of their party affiliation or political inclination.

I had the opportunity to serve with ADAM BENJAMIN on the Congressional Steel Caucus, which he founded. I was able to witness and appreciate his many unique legislative skills. He was truly one of the driving forces behind legislative initiatives to resolve the problems facing America's steel industry, and he worked indefatigably to resuscitate this critical sector of our economy.

I am shocked and deeply saddened by the loss of this great man. ADAM BENJAMIN'S tenure will continue to be an example to me and to others, of what dedicated public service really means. It goes without saying that he will be greatly missed by all of us in this body.●

● Mr. FARY. Mr. Speaker, as Congress reconvened from the district work period, we learned of the death of our colleague, ADAM BENJAMIN. He was a dear friend to all those whose lives he touched, and he will be sorely missed.

ADAM and I became close friends shortly after his arrival to Congress in 1976, traveling together frequently on Midway Airlines from Chicago's Southside. I think the fact that we had many things in common enabled us to develop a quick and lasting friendship. We were both Democrats who represented a Midwestern district, and had a long record of public service in our respective State legislatures. We were both keenly interested in transportation issues, he as chairman of the Transportation Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee and I, as a member of the House Public Works and Transportation Committee. ADAM, along with Congressman GLENN ANDERSON, then chairman of the Aviation Subcommittee, was instrumental in helping restore airline service to Midway Airport located in my congressional district in Chicago.

The true testament to ADAM though, is that aside from any common interests, he could befriend anyone. ADAM was an approachable, sensitive, warm person who genuinely liked people, regardless of their ideology or party affiliation. I am sure that is exactly how he became such a successful and respected leader in his community.

Coupled with his personal charm, ADAM was also one of the most tireless, dedicated workers of this body. The stories of his late night and weekend work hours have almost become legend in his relatively short tenure here. The industry and commitment which he brought to his job will be hard to match for many years by those of us remaining. As if the role of a Congressman were not demanding enough, ADAM still found the time and energy to better himself by attending Georgetown for a masters of law degree. I trust that our House leaders and fellow Members recognized immediately this inherent perserverence and dependability, when ADAM was awarded a seat on the powerful Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Speaker, this body is composed of a variety of Members who span a broad range of stature. I am sure, with time, it will become evident that ADAM BENJAMIN made his mark as a giant amongst us. I offer my heartfelt condolences to his entire family.●

● Mr. ROBERTS of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, ADAM BENJAMIN'S passing brings to mind my service in South Dakota's Senate and the few months I have been privileged to serve in this House. Regardless of partisanship, Americans are looking earnestly for elected representatives who will work with diligence and integrity. ADAM BENJAMIN typified those qualities. His career and the potential he had in Congress spoke eloquently of the honor and duty he felt serving here.

In his freshman term, ADAM BENJAMIN was entrusted with the unenviable task of chairing the Legislative Appropriations Subcommittee. In a body that will give itself a backdoor pay increase at the drop of a hat, Mr. BENJAMIN consistently showed an interest for sensible projects and care for the public purse. Throughout his career, his friendliness and generosity matched his ethical quality.

It will be impossible to replace ADAM BENJAMIN with a House Member of equal intelligence, dedication, and ethics. This body will miss him in the extreme, and our country is at a serious loss.

I am sure you would join me, as my colleagues, in hoping that other men like ADAM BENJAMIN continue to come our way.●

● Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, I know we all share a sense of great loss with the sudden and untimely passing of our colleague, ADAM BENJAMIN. There was no one in the Congress more devoted to serving the people of this country and doing the very best job that he could than ADAM. He was a good friend and will be deeply missed by all of us.●

● Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult to accept the death of a friend, particularly when that death is sudden and without warning. When I first heard that my friend ADAM BENJAMIN had died, I felt a great sense of personal loss. In the last week and a half, since his passing, I have thought a lot about ADAM and realize that my loss is more than just a personal one. As a legislative body the House of Representatives has lost a great legislator and leader.

ADAM BENJAMIN was a legislator's legislator. A Congressman's Congressman. He exemplified what we should all like to believe a Congressman to be. He served his constituency and protected their interests with great vigor. Perhaps his work in forming the Steel Caucus best illustrated his efforts to work for the interests of his constituents.

For those of who were lucky enough to know ADAM BENJAMIN before he was elected to the Congress, his record of excellence here came as no surprise. I first met ADAM when we served in the Indiana House of Representatives together. When ADAM became chairman of an Appropriations Committee subcommittee in just his second term in the House, it came as no surprise. When he formed the Steel Caucus to work toward solving the problems of the steel industry which is so important to his district, it came as no surprise.

Whenever you talk about ADAM BENJAMIN the one word most often used to discribe him is honest. He was that and much more. He was generous with his time and friendship. He cared deeply about his fellowman and used his influence in the Congress to better their lives. ADAM was an effective Member. His energy was endless in working for passage of bills he felt important to his constituents. But regardless of how busy he was or how full his schedule, ADAM would always find time to talk to you if you needed advice, or if you needed help, or just a friend to pass a few minutes with.

No Member of Congress is absolutely irreplacable. However, the passing of ADAM BENJAMIN creates a great void in the House. It will be a long time before we will again be blessed with someone with the unique qualities of ADAM BENJAMIN.

I extend my heartfelt condolences to his wife Patricia, and his children, Adam, Alison, and Arianne. My prayers are with them at this difficult time.●

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my shock and great dismay at the untimely death of our colleague, the Honorable ADAM BENJAMIN of Indiana. When anyone dies at age 47, it is a distinct waste and is particularly sad because of the years that are lost. In the case of ADAM, the loss is not only a personal one for family and friends who knew and loved him, there is a distinct and tragic loss to the Nation. ADAM BENJAMIN was the sort of man who would have been returned to serve in this House for another two or three decades. The benefits to our Nation will never be recovered, no matter how well a successor may serve.

It is no surprise to anyone who knew him that ADAM did so well during his time in the House. His West Point training stood him in good stead for his was a logical and comprehensive mind, able to grasp concepts quickly and to devise solutions where others saw no hope. He was a straightforward, sincere man whose word was indeed his bond, and who knew when to charge and when to stand firm. And we who were his colleagues on the House Appropriations Committee saw his intense determination to master subjects and to put his imprint on legislation.

Very few Members become subcommittee chairmen in their second term in the House. ADAM was one of those. He assumed the chairmanship of the Legislative Appropriations Subcommittee and he quickly became the most knowledgeable member of the committee in that area. We were seeing the same thing with transportation appropriations at the time of his death. Another year or so and there would have been few people in this country who would have known as much about the country's transportation system as he would have.

ADAM had one quality that always stood him in good measure—he was fair. If he had a problem with something you wanted, he said so, and if it were possible to persuade him differently, you would always have the opportunity to try. We in New York City had some squabbles with ADAM in recent months about subway cars but there was never a time during that long battle when he did not provide either the New York delegation or the city's representatives opportunities to present their side of the matter.

I could say a number of things about ADAM because I worked closely with him during the years he served here, and he was a personable companion as well as a good friend. But if I had to summarize in just a few words about how I felt about him, I would tell anyone who wanted to know that this country needs more Adam Benjamins. So does this Congress.

I know that the sadness that we feel in this house is nothing compared to the sense of loss felt in his house by his wife Pat, his son Adam III, and daughters Alison and Arianne. My sympathies to all of them and to all of his many friends and supporters of Gary, Ind.●

● Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues today in paying tribute to Congressman ADAM BENJAMIN, whose untimely death over the Labor Day weekend was a shock to us all.

Although ADAM served in the House only three terms, his achievements during this short time were notable. His efforts on the Appropriations and Budget Committees were well known and highly respected.

The people of the first district, too, benefited immeasurably from his tireless efforts on their behalf.

The distinction with which ADAM BENJAMIN served in the U.S. Congress, was a natural continuation of his lifetime of dedicated public service. A graduate of the U.S. Military Academy, a veteran of the U.S. Marine Corps and the Army, a member of the Indiana House of Representatives and the Indiana Senate, were significant chapters in his life, providing him with the challenges and commitments he sought.

All those who had the opportunity to know ADAM and to work with him, have to be saddened by the shortness of his life, but impressed with its richness.

He will be missed by his colleagues, his constituents, his family and his friends.

Mrs. Rhodes joins me in extending sincere sympathy to Mrs. Benjamin and his son, Adam, and daughters, Alison and Arianne.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened by the death of my colleague and close friend, ADAM BENJAMIN, JR. His untimely death is an immense loss to the Congress, to Indiana and to the country.

I had the pleasure of working with ADAM on numerous occasions, particularly in our struggle to reverse the erosion of the American steel industry. In only his third term, ADAM had moved to the forefront of this important issue. His dedication to the elimination of the burdens on unemployed workers in the United States was unsurpassed.

ADAM'S hard work and integrity gained him the respect of Members on both sides of the aisle. Through his knowledge and determination, he quickly rose to the chairmanship of the Subcommittee on Transportation of the Appropriations Committee. ADAM'S political career seemed limitless, and I am proud to have had the opportunity to serve with him. I wish to extend my sincerest sympathies to his family and let them know that my thoughts and prayers are with them.●

● Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult to imagine a more sad and tragic event than the untimely passing of our dear friend ADAM BENJAMIN. He was one of the most devoted, hard-working people you would ever hope to meet, and it is the greatest possible honor for me to be able to say that he was my friend. More important, he was a friend of every working man and woman in this country.

Our colleague, JOE GAYDOS, summed it up best in his eulogizing statement when he said of ADAM BENJAMIN: "Unfailing is the only word for him."

ADAM was a fighter. He could roll up his sleeves and take charge as well as any person imaginable. He loved this country, and he believed fervently that people ought to have jobs, good jobs, and productive jobs.

When America's steel industry fell on difficult times, ADAM BENJAMIN jumped into the fray. He was instrumental in setting up the Steel Caucus, and the American steel industry will forever be in his debt.

Several weeks ago the terrible plight of our domestic steel industry hit my congressional district like a bombshell when Lone Star Steel was forced to lay off some 4,000 of the hardest working people to be found anywhere on the globe. I knew then that as long as friends and colleagues like ADAM BENJAMIN existed we would fight this thing together; that we would push for any and all measures to rescue America's steel from unfair, outrageous foreign competition. His loss hurts our cause, but what he started is sufficient incentive to press on.

To his family I can only say that ADAM made this a better Congress. He had a positive influence on all of us, and we ask to share in your grief.●

● Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Indiana for reserving this time to pay tribute to our colleague ADAM BENJAMIN. With his untimely death the first District of Indiana and the country lost a dedicated and effective representative, his wife and children have lost a devoted family man, this body has lost one of its most able and hardworking legislators and I have lost a very good friend.

I had the honor and privilege to serve with ADAM on the Executive Committee of the Budget and Appropriations Committees. Whether we were tackling the macroeconomic problems of formulating a budget resolution, or grappling with how best to handle the problem of subsidized steel imports, ADAM always knew the issue and could offer constructive suggestions, if not always the solution.

ADAM achieved his success and derived the respect of his colleagues in large part because of his sense of fairness and his ability to compromise, He embodied Edmund Burke's philosophy of good government and that was that "All government—indeed every benefit and enjoyment, every virtue and every prudent act—is founded on compromise and barter."

ADAM'S reputation as a tireless worker was well known among all of his colleagues, Few could compare with him for the sheer energy and intensity he brought to his job. He was one of the most knowlegeable legislators, both on the procedures of the House and the substance of the issues debated.

We who know and worked with ADAM have learned from his example. We can all be proud of the image and example set by our late colleague.

ADAM exemplified the best of politics and politicians. He believed strongly in this institution and in our system of representative government.

He had already made a distinguished name and career for himself and had a bright future before him which was tragically cut short.

Thinking of ADAM, I am reminded of FDR's views on politicians and I quote:

The future lies with those wise political leaders who realize that the great public is interested more in Government than in politics.

For the great public and ADAM'S memory we should all try to follow the fine example of politician, legislator, leader, and human being that ADAM BENJAMIN left in the memories of those who were fortunate enough to know him. Those of us whose lives he touched are all richer for the experience and ADAM will be sorely missed by us all.●

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply, deeply saddened by the death of our friend and colleague from Indiana, ADAM BENJAMIN.

Not only in the House of Representatives but also as a representative and senator in the Indiana State Legislature, and in the U.S. Marine Corps and the U.S. Army, ADAM BENJAMIN gave of himself generously. ADAM was a hard worker, an extremely diligent and conscientious man who devoted his life to public service.

ADAM always had a ready smile and a warm hello. His perseverance and industriousness were never harsh; rather, he displayed an easygoing attitude, and went out of his way to accommodate his colleagues. His work for Hoosiers and for national concerns was carried out with insight and care.

A concerned and effective legislator, ADAM BENJAMIN had a truly remarkable career. To his wife, Patricia, and his children, Adam, Alison, and Arianne, I offer my deepest condolences. As an earnest, industrious lawmaker and a true friend, he will be sadly missed.●

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I join in mourning the death of our colleague and friend, ADAM BENJAMIN. This House and this country are richer for ADAM'S years of service, and we are substantially poorer for his untimely passing.

I had the privilege of sitting next to ADAM for the last 2 years on the Budget Committee, and I was awed by his capacity for long hours of hard work and his mastery of detail. He brought the same tireless dedication to every task he undertook.

ADAM enjoyed his work in the House. He was a skillful legislator who took as his reward an intense personal satisfaction from doing his job well for the benefit of his district and his country. He was content to work quietly, without generating headlines or attracting the television cameras. He was not the kind of Congressman whose name is a household word outside his district, but he was precisely the kind of Congressman more people should have known about. His diligence and integrity and ability brought credit to this historic institution.

ADAM BENJAMIN earned my unqualified respect as a Congressman, I am fortunate to be able to say he was also a dear friend. I join ADAM'S friends and colleagues in expressing my condolences to his family.●

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of loss that I join my colleagues in paying a final tribute to a higly respected and greatly admired colleague and friend, ADAM BENJAMIN. Through his diligent work and highly respected ideals he earned the admiration and respect that only those possessed with such a strong sense of commitment and dedication obtain. It is with a great sense of pride that I recall that ADAM visited my district in California several years ago, for which I am grateful. For me his death has left not only the professional loss felt for a distinguished colleague, but also a great loss for those people in his district in Indiana he so well represented, as well as personal grief for a cherished and esteemed friend. With these thoughts in mind, I wish to extend my deepest and most sincere sympathies to his wife and family.●

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of sadness that I join today in paying tribute to a good friend and colleague, the Honorable ADAM BENJAMIN. ADAM'S untimely death last week will be deeply felt by all of us who knew him well and called him our friend.

We were both first elected to the Congress in 1976 and as Members of the 95th Congress New Members Caucus became good friends. ADAM was a conscientious and hard-working Member who faithfully represented the interests of his constituents and his Nation. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Transportation of the Committee on Appropriations, ADAM was deeply interested in the problem of mass transit and the need for long and careful planning tailored to meet the needs of a growing nation.

ADAM always showed great interest and concern about Puerto Rico and was very helpful to me on numerous occasions. He will be sorely missed and we all have lost a good and faithful friend.

My wife Beatriz joins me in expressing our deep sympathy to Patricia Benjamin and to their three children. My prayers are with them for the eternal rest of a proud native of Indiana, Congressman ADAM BENJAMIN.●

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I join today in expressing deep sadness in the untimely passing of our colleague from Indiana, ADAM BENJAMIN.[1]

Because our offices were near, I got to know ADAM well over the past 20 months. We would often walk together to come to the House Chamber to vote. From our conversations during those times together, I gained a respect for ADAM BENJAMIN as a dedicated, conscientious Member of Congress who worked hard and long hours for the people he represented.

ADAM BENJAMIN also was a good friend of the people of the Washington metropolitan area. As the chairman of the House Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, he was sensitive to such local issues as National Airport and the Metro system. He understood our concerns and he was always willing to listen and work with us to serve the best interests of the area's citizens.

We will miss him. I would like to extend my deepest sympathies to his family and many friends in the First District of Indiana.●

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my sadness and deep regret at the loss of our friend and colleague, ADAM BENJAMIN. ADAM was a thoughtful, fair, and wise legislator, whose advice and support I valued inestimably.

His hard work and excellent counsel will be sorely missed by the Appropriations and Budget Committees on which he served. The Congress, the citizens of Indiana, and the Nation have benefited greatly from his compassionate and courageous leadership.

ADAM will be remembered by all of us in the House as a good friend, public servant, and fine human being.●

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I was profoundly shocked and saddened by the news of the death of ADAM BENJAMIN.

There is no minimizing the extent of this tragedy. His wife and children have lost a loving husband and father, the people of the First Congressional District of Indiana have lost a dedicated and effective spokesman, and we have lost a distinguished colleague and friend.

I had the pleasure and privilege of serving with ADAM on the Appropriations Committee. No member of that committee worked harder, was more able, or more interested in the quality of the committee's work than he. Although ADAM had only chaired an Appropriations subcommittee for a short time, he was extremely effective in that role, and was recognized as one of the most effective subcommittee chairmen. The diligence, dependability, and great capacity for productive effort that earned him the approval of his constituents also earned him the respect of not only the members of the Appropriations Committee, but all of those Members of Congress who were familiar with his work.

Mr. Speaker, we will sorely miss ADAM BENJAMIN'S ability and wise counsel in the days ahead. I want to extend my sincere sympathy to his wife, Patricia, and to their children, Adam III, Alison, and Arianne. I hope they can take some small comfort in the fact that ADAM BENJAMIN will not be forgotten by the Congress in which he served, nor the people of Indiana for whom he served.●

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, it is at this time that I would like to join my colleagues in expressing deep personal sympathy over the sudden death of our fellow Congressman from the great State of Indiana, ADAM BENJAMIN.

During his brief tenure here in the House which began in 1976, ADAM distinguished himself as a knowledgeable and respected leader. I had both the honor and the privilege of serving closely with him on the Appropriations Committee. As chairman of the Transportation Subcommittee, ADAM quickly familiarized himself with its policies and goals. Moreover, his courteous, friendly personality allowed him to work in close cooperation with the other subcommittee members.

In short, ADAM typified everything that a good House Member should be—hard working, diligent, and always willing to accommodate or assist other Members in their efforts. As we all know, such traits are vital in leadership roles and, unfortunately, are too often the exception rather than the rule.

These may sound like incredible achievements for a relative newcomer to Congress; but examining ADAM'S record of service to his Nation and home State prior to 1976, one could have easily anticipated such shining results. It seems only fitting, therefore, that I should mention ADAM'S service both in the U.S. Marine Corps and the U.S. Army. Equally, ADAM distinguished himself as a willing and capable doer in the Indiana House of Representatives and the Indiana Senate.

It has been said that all great man are simple and good. ADAM was just that. Integrity, dedication, and warmth of personality are rare qualities, but even rarer when combined in any one individual. ADAM was able to combine these traits and thus rise accordingly in the congressional ranks. It is for this reason that I feel personally honored and privileged to have worked with ADAM. It is for this reason that the people of his district, his State, and his country will miss him dearly.

I would also like to take this opportunity to extend my deepest condolences to ADAM'S wife and family.●

● Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, all of us were shocked and deeply saddened by the unexpected death of our friend and colleague, ADAM BANJAMIN, Jr., of the First District of Indiana.

I considered it a personal honor to serve with ADAM on the Appropriations Committee, and to have him as a member of the Energy and Water Development Subcommittee. I was extremely impressed with his thorough preparation, his hard work and his undestanding of the complexities of the appropriations and budgetary process of the country.

I also held ADAM in the highest regard for the tremendous leadership he provided for the Congressional Steel Caucus. His perseverance and his dedication to the people of America's steel industry helped to form a strong congressional group which has actively sought to improve the conditions for steel, one of the pillars of America's economy.

His death is a personal tragedy for his loving family and it is also a tragedy for the entire Nation, because ADAM BENJAMIN was a Congressman who had a great deal to offer to all the people. His brief, yet beneficial career in the Congress of the United States set an example of excellence for all of us to follow. ADAM BENJAMIN will be missed by this body.●

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, We were all shocked to learn last week of the untimely death of our friend and colleague ADAM BENJAMIN.

ADAM and I served together on the Appropriations Committee for 6 years, and during that time worked together on many transportation issues, including providing adequate funding for our Nation's highways and the Coast Guard. Few jobs are more difficult than allocating limited resources to a rapidly expanding transportation system which includes highways, waterways, and airports, however through long hours of work and with a thorough understanding of each of our Nation's transportation needs, ADAM carried out this task.

Although his chairmanship of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation involved ADAM in matters of national importance, he still found the time to serve the people of Indiana's First Congressional District. Even before he was elected to this body in 1976, ADAM dedicated himself to improving his hometown of Gary, Ind., and its surrounding communities. He served the area in many capacities, including schoolteacher, zoning administrator, executive secretary to the mayor, and State representative and senator.

We share the loss of ADAM with his wife Patricia and their children Adam III, Alison, and Arianne. Their loss of a husband and a father will be shared by all the American people, who have lost a great leader.●

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to join my colleagues in paying tribute to ADAM BENJAMIN. It is very difficult to explain the tremendous loss I felt, and I am sure that the same can be said about my colleagues from both sides of the aisle, when I learned of ADAM's untimely death.

I was fortunate enough to be able to work closely with ADAM on transportation issues and soon realized the drive and commitment he had for the job. I do not think this Chamber has witnessed a Representative, who in such a short period of time, achieved the enormous respect of his colleagues. ADAM obtained this level of respect through hard work and dedication.

My deepest sympathies are extended to ADAM's wife, Patricia, three children, Adam, Alison, and Arianne, and his mother, Margaret. They deserve a special tribute because they gave up so much of him, so the rest of us could have the honor of working with this fine gentleman.

This Chamber will certainly miss ADAM BENJAMIN, but his presence will be felt for a long time to come. If anybody needed to look for a role model for the "perfect legislator," you would be hard pressed to find one better than ADAM BENJAMIN.●

● Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, the sudden, untimely death of ADAM BENJAMIN was a great loss: Not alone to the family which he loved so dearly, but to Indiana and the Nation which, as Marine, soldier, and legislator, he served with enormous intelligence, energy, and dedication.

Even as, in 1967, ADAM BENJAMIN'S reputation as a most unusual and able public servant preceded his arrival in the Indiana State Legislature, that reputation, greatly enhanced by 4 years of service in both the State house and senate, preceded his arrival in the Congress in 1977.

In my work with the Surface Transportation Subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, I was privileged to work closely with ADAM in his role as a strong, but fairminded, chairman of the Transportation Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations.

He was a powerfully effective advocate of the people of the Second District of Indiana whom he served so diligently; yet he had the great capacity to appreciate the needs and problems of others about the Nation and, certainly, he was an enlightened and effective supporter of the Nation's highway and mass transportation needs and systems.

Many have served longer in the Congress than ADAM BENJAMIN; but few have worked harder, nor longer, nor have accomplished more per day of service. Many have gained greater renown; but few have earned, in so short a time, the enormous measure of professional respect and personal affection: a respect, an affection, which transcended the partisan political lines which, as the unexpected swift demise of ADAM BENJAMIN reminds us, must pale in the recognition of how truly fragile, how tenuous, the thread and span of mortal life can really be.

It is a recognition which, at once, inspires a greater balance of values, and a greater level of humility than, perhaps, is sometimes demonstrated. If, as we do, we find cause to mourn our sudden loss in this body, we know that it can be as nothing in consideration of that of his widow and children to whom I offer heartfelt condolences.●

● Mr. WHITLEY. Mr. Speaker, ADAM BENJAMIN and I were elected to Congress together in 1976 and became Members of the "95th class."

Although ADAM, as the Representative of a midwestern industrial area and I as Congressman from a very rural southern district might have appeared on the surface to have had little in common, we became fast friends.

His good nature and keen sense of humor were always prevalent, and he took my jokes and ribbing in the spirit they were intended.

But there were no jokes between us where the vital interests of our districts and our areas were concerned. On several occasions, he spoke to me about issues very important to him and in every instance I felt that I could, I supported him on these issues. I will never forget the critical (to my district) vote on preserving the tobacco price support and production control program last year when ADAM, knowing it would be a difficult vote for his constituents to understand, supported me in a matter of the utmost concern to the economic lifeblood of my district.

With his office just down the hall from mine, we often walked to the floor together when the bell rang for a vote or quorum call. It is hard for me to realize and accept that no longer when the bell rings will I be pausing to wait for him to catch up so that we can share a few pleasant moments together as a break from the heavy responsibilities of a long day.

I did not know ADAM's wife or family, but to them, I convey my sincerest sympathy. Although you did not know me, I knew ADAM and will miss him more than most.

May God's grace and serenity sustain you as you adjust yourselves, as I adjust myself, to an existence that no longer involves the company and companionship of this good and able man.●

● Mr. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of loss that I join today in this special order for ADAM BENJAMIN.

His untimely passing has left a void in this Chamber and on the Appropriations Committee, where I had the honor of working with him for the last year and a half.

As member, subcommittee chairman, and spokesman for the people of Indiana's First District, ADAM BENJAMIN epitomized the type of representative to which we all aspire. He advanced the interests of not only his constituents, but our entire Nation as well in many key areas, most notably transportation, through his able leadership as chairman of that subcommittee.

His swift rise to the chairmanship of that important subcommittee is indicative of his skill as a legislator and the deep respect with which he was held by his colleagues.

ADAM BENJAMIN set a fine example of solid and effective leadership for his peers. He will be sorely missed to be sure, but we have been fortunate to have a man of his caliber in our midst.●

● Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about my colleague, ADAM BENJAMIN, who suddenly died last week. His death was a stunning blow to all of us, particularly those who had the pleasure of working with him on the Congressional Steel Caucus.

ADAM was a man of tireless commitment. As chairman of the executive committee of the Congressional Steel Caucus, he was dedicated to improving the conditions of the Nation's ailing steel industry as well as insuring that its workers did not join the growing ranks of the unemployed.

ADAM was a man of integrity and his word was his honor—no higher praise can be given. He was respected by his colleagues for his intelligence, qualities of leadership, lack of pretense, and his attention to detail. He was a polite and softspoken man whose ability to interact effectively with his colleagues was a talent admired by all.

ADAM BENJAMIN had genuine concern for all he served. His presence will be missed, but he will not be forgotten.●

● Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, there are too few real leaders in the United States today, and that is why the death of our colleague, ADAM BENJAMIN, is such an especially tragic loss.

ADAM's leadership qualities were well known to all his colleagues who worked with him. First, he was an extraordinarily hard worker. He simply outlearned and outprepared almost all other Members. Second, he had a gifted intellect that enabled him to understand the complicated issues that he worked with, and to make judgments that will be proven correct in history.

ADAM was also honest, fair, and reliable to a degree that is truly exceptional today. Everyone who knew ADAM BENJAMIN grew to expect much of him; no one was ever let down.

But what impressed me most about him, and what we will miss most in his absence from this body, was his strong heart. In the generation taught to be go-getters ADAM was a go-giver. He was so generous with his time and his help, and he spent his substantial power and influence so graciously and for such good, that few standing in this Chamber did not directly benefit from his friendship. He lived to serve others, never needing to worry about serving himself.

Mr. Speaker, America had lost a great leader, Congress has lost a great worker, Indiana has lost a great servant, and I have lost a great friend.

Carol and I join the thousands of the Benjamin family friends in extending our deep-felt sympathy and our prayers to his wife, Pat, the children, and ADAM's mother.●

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the untimely passing of ADAM BENJAMIN has cost the House of Representatives one of our most effective Members. Since ADAM's district in Indiana bordered my district in Illinois, many problems called for cooperation between us. I can personally attest to the unusual effectiveness and influence he had.

I developed a great admiration for ADAM. He was a West Point graduate, he excelled in his service to his constituents, and he was a leader in the Indiana Legislature before coming to Washington. In his brief congressional career, he made his mark more rapidly than most and he will be sorely missed by his constituents, his colleagues, and his country.

ADAM was a warm, genuine, and friendly man; the kind of friend you could sit and enjoy pleasant moments with, as well as turn to when you needed advice in troublesome periods. He leaves a young family; and my wife, Pat, joins me in expressing our sincerest regrets to them. I want ADAM's wife, Patricia, and his children to know that he has left memories with all of us they can be proud of and, despite his premature passing, he will be remembered in only the most positive fashion.●

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, each Member of this body has been touched by the untimely death of Congressman ADAM BENJAMIN. Today, in profound sadness, and with the deepest respect and admiration, we honor the memory and service of a great statesman and an outstanding American.

ADAM BENJAMIN was a man of high intelligence and dedication to principle. He loved America and believed in the workings of Congress. Congressman BENJAMIN served his constituents with devotion. Capable of honest advocacy, ADAM BENJAMIN represented the people, trusted their wisdom and venerated the principles of democracy. He was devoted to humanity and always giving a part of himself to the betterment of his fellowman. It was my privilege to have served in the House with Congressman BENJAMIN, he was a leader of unquestioned integrity and a model public figure.

I extend my thoughts and prayers and deepest sympathy to Congressman BENJAMIN's widow and children. May they find strength and peace in the days ahead.●

● Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult to describe my dismay at the news of ADAM BENJAMIN's sudden death, but I know that it is not necessary. All who knew him share my shock at this tragedy.

ADAM BENJAMIN, JR., was an exceptional man. Strong yet compassionate, effective and always fair, ADAM gave all of himself to his family, to his constituents, to this House, and to the Nation. His generosity and his commitment were reflected in his hard work, and I believe it is accurate to say that he gave his life for his country, just as surely as if he had died under arms.

This is a time when our country needs leaders of ADAM's caliber, with ADAM's special qualities. A leader we cannot spare has fallen.

The Congress has lost one of its best, and I have lost a true friend. We will all miss ADAM; we owe it to him to continue working to fulfill his goals and to maintain his ideals.●

● Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Speaker, ADAM BENJAMIN was a trusted friend and colleague to us all. His death is a tragic loss to his family, to this body, and to the constitutents he represented so well.

Many of my colleagues here today knew ADAM when he ws just learning the ropes. I did not really get to know him until more recently, over the last few years, when his accomplishments were many. I was privileged to serve on the transportation appropriations subcommittee which ADAM chaired, and I grew to respect his knowledge, ability, and perhaps most of all his fairness.

He was an outstanding representative, tireless in his efforts, absolutely committed to serving our great country. He was, in the best sense of the word, a public servant.

In his inaugural address, President Kennedy spoke of the demands of public office. He said:

> And when at some future date the high court of history sits in judgment on each of us, recording whether in our brief span of service we fulfilled our responsibilities to the state, our success or failure, in whatever office we hold, will be measured by the answers to four questions: First, were we truly men of courage * * * Second, were we truly men of judgment * * * Third, were we truly men of integrity * * * Finally were we truly men of dedication?

ADAM BENJAMIN was all of these things.

In a job where it is all too easy to get caught up in our own issues and our own personal projects, ADAM always had time to help his colleagues. A few months ago when I had to spend some time in the hospital for my own health, ADAM was there—offering to do whatever he could to help me out.

Few of us could have carried the load ADAM did. A seat on the Budget or Appropriations Committee is demanding. He did both and was in his office long after most of us had gone home.

ADAM worked hard, too hard. We will all miss him. I extend my deepest sympathies to his wife and family.●

● Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound shock and sorrow that my wife Dorothy and I learned of the sudden and unexpected death of ADAM BENJAMIN, JR. It is always so tragic when death takes from us one of our friends and colleagues.

ADAM was a quiet but effective legislator. He was trustworthy and reliable. He worked long hours and diligently for his people. These are all traits which we all admire and seek to emulate. Most of all, ADAM BENJAMIN was a friend and loyal colleague.

It was in this last capacity that I came to know ADAM best. When another Member of Congress was unable at the last minute to come to my district for a special event, it was ADAM to whom I turned. Not only did he come on short notice and with little preparation, but he also turned out to be a big hit with my constituents.

ADAM was just that type of guy. You could always count on him in a pinch and you knew his word was good as gold. He did everything thoroughly and you knew that when ADAM BENJAMIN spoke, he knew what he was talking about.

It is particularly painful to lose ADAM at this time because he was definitely one of the promising Members of Congress who was sure to fulfill his potential as a leader in Congress. In just three terms, the vast majority of Members came to know and respect ADAM's wisdom, analytical mind, and ability to get a job done and have it done well.

As a member of the Appropriations Committee, ADAM clearly understood the importance of building and maintaining America's roads, highways, bridges, ports, and mass transit systems. He had the vision that is needed to be a leader in making this country's transportation system work for everyone.

We shall miss ADAM BENJAMIN and all that he stood for in our minds. It is not often that we have the opportunity to work with people of ADAM's ability. While he may have left us physically, his example will be with us for many years, as will his accomplishments.

Dorothy and I extend to his family our heartfelt sympathies.●

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened to learn of the passing of our friend and colleague, ADAM BENJAMIN, and I appreciate having this opportunity to pay tribute to his memory today.

While our membership in this 435-Member organization produces a mutual camaraderie to some degree, I am always pleased to encounter a colleague with a genuinely warm and friendly attitude. Such was the case with ADAM BENJAMIN. He was the most cogenial of men, and the most open of Members, encouraging friendship and ever ready to offer a listening ear. He was, to me personally, a kind and thoughtful individual, one with whom I wish there had been more time in which to become better acquainted.

Thus, I shall miss ADAM BENJAMIN now that he is no longer with us, and I shall certainly preserve the fine memories which he left behind. I extend my most heartfelt condolences to his wife and children, and to all those who have been saddened by his loss.●

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. JACOBS for taking this special order so that we can pay tribute to our deceased colleague and friend, ADAM BENJAMIN, JR. Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a sad occasion for me and Members on both sides of the aisle. Today, we formally join with the people of Indiana in mourning the death of our friend and a true friend of the American people.

His death leaves a tremendous void in this legislative body. Mr. Speaker, Congressman ADAM BENJAMIN gave every ounce of his energy, intelligence, and ability every waking moment for the well-being of the people of this great Nation. He was, in the truest sense of the word, a master statesman whose leadership was revered by Members of both political parties.

ADAM BENJAMIN was elected to represent Indiana's First Congressional District in 1976. I think that we can candidly say that he served the best interest of the people of that district.

Mr. Speaker, on a more personal note, I had the distinct pleasure of serving with Congressman BENJAMIN on the House Appropriations Committee. I was impressed by his actions on that committee. I found his skill in manuvering through the often tedious appropriations process to be extraordinary. He was so skilled and committed to his task on that committee, that he developed a reputation as being one of the most hard-working members of the House Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Speaker, just as important, every member of that committee regarded ADAM BENJAMIN as being a fair-minded and cooperative individual. Recently, through his role as the chairman of the House Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, ADAM BENJAMIN supported the efforts of Congresswoman MARY ROSE OAKAR and myself to secure needed funds for the terminal tower project in Cleveland. Probably more than any other person, he provided the impetus for the inclusion of funding for the terminal tower project in the fiscal year 1982 supplemental appropriations bill. My major regret is that he did not live to see this House override the President's veto of that bill in which he helped to provide funds for this project in Cleveland.

Mr. Speaker, this is just one of many acts of kindness that ADAM BENJAMIN did for his colleagues. It was his ability as a legislator and acts like this that endeared him to Members on both sides of the aisle. We shall miss his leadership especially at a time when the skill he displayed in the appropriations process is so greatly needed in this Nation.

Again, I express my condolences to ADAM's wife, his family, and the residents of the First Congressional District of Indiana. I know that the spirit and magnitude of the Character of ADAM BENJAMIN will live on in our hearts and minds.●

● Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, we have all suffered a great loss and are saddened by the death of our colleague ADAM BENJAMIN. He was a tireless worker and an unselfish person who represented his constituents, State, and Nation well. All of my colleagues have mentioned the long hours and dedication that ADAM put into his work. We can all use him and his record as a way to measure our own accomplishments. I am struck by the thought that we know our days are limited on this Earth, and ADAM realized that there was so much to do that he carried on with his work as if there were no tomorrows.

I was fortunate to have gotten to know ADAM when he was first elected to the Congress in 1976. We were friends and I am a better person for having known him. ADAM was always willing to talk and share with me some of his ideas and thoughts. As chairman of the Appropriations' Subcommittee on Transportation, he was an integral part of my efforts to continue passenger rail service to my district. My district directly benefited from his leadership.

We will miss ADAM BENJAMIN in this Chamber. But more importantly this Nation will miss his leadership and sense of fairness during the coming years. Perhaps Kahlil Gibran said it best when he wrote in "The Prophet:"

When you part from your friend, you grieve not; For that which you love most in him may be clearer in his absence, as a mountain to the climber is clearer from the plain.

ADAM BENJAMIN will not be forgotten.●

● Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I rise to pay tribute to ADAM BENJAMIN, my late colleague from Indiana.

ADAM BANJAMIN was a dear friend, and a gentleman who was respected for his honesty, energy, and outstanding integrity. He was a warm, generous man with a deep concern for the public welfare. He rapidly gained a reputation as a strong, uncompromising figure in his pursuit of fair and effective representation and he emerged, in only three short terms, as a leader in Congress.

A true public servant in the fullest sense of the term, ADAM gave not only of his time, but of himself. ADAM BENJAMIN was a dedicated and effective legislator who had strong ideas on what was right and reasonable in Government, and he pursued those goals without pause or compromise. His years here were full of achievement and distinction, as he commenced his congressional career with an appointment to the prestigious Appropriations Committee and, only 2 years later, was asked to chair the Legislative Subcommittee of Appropriations.

ADAM BENJAMIN will be sorely missed by all who were privileged to know him—his family, his friends, and the people he represented. What he might have yet achieved, had his time not been cut so sadly short, can only be imagined. What he was, what he accomplished, and what he meant to each of us, will not be soon forgotten.●

● Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, the following is a tribute to our fallen colleague ADAM BENJAMIN. A tribute was issued from the Indiana Washington office and written by the Governor's representative in Washington, Mr. Don M. Newman. Mr. Newman enriches the RECORD by his beautiful words about ADAM.

ADAM BENJAMIN

All who knew him grieve at his untimely death. There is a deep sense of loss, both personally, for we lost a good friend; and politically, for the First District, Indiana, and our country lost a great patriot.

Adam was the epitome of the hardworking Hoosier Congressman. His long hours of dedicated toil in behalf of his District, his State, and his country is common knowledge.

His monumental devotion to duty encompassed not only attempted resolution of his District's problems, but also attempted resolution of any meritorious State problem which was brought to his attention. It did not matter to Adam if the beneficiaries of his efforts were in parts of Indiana far removed from the First District—if he could help, he did help.

He treated people with deep respect and genuine affection; and it was easily reciprocated. He was unpretentious, honest, unassuming and democratic. It was part of his style to close his staff meetings by polling his young industrious, and intelligent staff on their opinions. It assured them in a very direct way that he sincerely valued their significant contributions. His quick expression of appreciation was part of his nature.

A few days ago, Governor Orr received a letter from Adam thanking him for an appointment he had made upon Adam's recommendation. The letter was dated Saturday, September 4. One of the Congressman's last acts was to extend his appreciation to his Governor for a small favor. It was typical.

Adam Benjamin did touch our lives in a special way. It is fitting that we remember and appreciate him for his fine works. But also, perhaps we could pay him the higher compliment of stretching to enhance our own character and contribution with more of his strong attributes: an Adam Benjamin industriousness, an Adam Benjamin integrity and an Adam Benjamin devotion to duty.●

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, when Congressman ADAM BENJAMIN died recently, the House of Representatives lost one of its finest Members, and I lost one of my closest friends.

ADAM was a man who served the House in its finest tradition. He cared about the people he represented and worked hard for them. He was a man of his word. He understood the congressional system, and worked within it for the benefit of the people. He brought to Government a deep concern, a caring that what we did was not only possible within the limits of Congress, but beneficial to the people it would affect.

I worked most closely with ADAM on the Steel Caucus. We would not have been able to adopt the "trigger pricing" system without his help. We would not have been able to obtain the "safe harbor leasing" tax provision for the steel industry without ADAM's leadership. We would never have established the communication among Congress, union steel leaders, and the steel industry had it not been for the work and diligence of ADAM.

In addition, I worked with him on the Appropriations Committee, where he provided leadership on the Legislative Subcommittee and most recently the Transportation Subcommittee. ADAM had a keen eye for appropriation detail, and fought for budgets that were fair and equitable. In working with him on a transportation project in my own area, I found him to be a quick study, and, as always, he grasped the heart of the project and was able to help move it forward.

Personally, ADAM was a source of strength to all of us. He made us more compassionate, he made sure we worked for and remembered the public good, and when the situation called for it, his sense of humor would not only relax us, but also show us the perspective of the issue we were considering.

It can truly be said that ADAM will be sincerely missed by the House in the months and years ahead. Personally, I already miss him.●

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, like all of my colleagues, I was deeply saddened to learn of the death of Indiana Congressman ADAM BENJAMIN. Representative BENJAMIN was a conscientious and respected Member of the House, who served his constituents and his country with great distinction.

With Representative BENJAMIN'S death, the residents of the Washington, D.C. area have lost a true friend, for he was a strong supporter of our Metro subway in his capacity as chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation. His support for Metro was certainly reflected in the bills reported out of committee during his tenure as chairman, and those who ride the subway today are the beneficiaries of Mr. BENJAMIN'S efforts.

I would like to share with my colleagues an article from the September newsletter of the National Association of Railroad Passengers, which underscores Congressman BENJAMIN'S contributions to progress in mass transit and in the transportation field generally:

ADAM BENJAMIN, JR.

Congress lost one of its most dedicated and respected members over the Labor Day weekend, with the death of Indiana Democratic Rep. Adam Benjamin, Jr., 47. We who seek a balanced transportation system for the United States lost a valued friend.

Rep. Benjamin was a hard-working, conscientious, and personable man who spent many evenings and weekends working in his congressional office. Those who phoned his office after 6 or 7 PM were often startled to find the congressman himself at the other end of the line. Said Republican Indiana Lt. Gov. John Mutz, "No one worked as many hours for his constituents." Such praise from the GOP side comes as no surprise, for his devotion to his work won him respect from all quarters. Upon learning of Benjamin's death, Sen. Richard Lugar (R-IN) said, "Adam Benjamin was a distinguished Hoosier legislator whose mastery of detail and faithfulness to duty produced solid achievement. . . . I will miss him deeply as a strong legislative ally and as a gracious friend."

Benjamin had a genuine interest in seeing Amtrak and mass transit succeed. As a member, and later as chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation, he provided invaluable help to public transportation.

Primarily because of Adam Benjamin, Amtrak stations exist today in Hammond and Michigan City; major capital improvements have been completed for Amtrak's Chicago-Valparaiso commuter service (which is attracting ever-increasing passenger loads); and America's last interurban rail transit line, the 88-mile Chicago, South Shore & South Bend, is now receiving desperately needed new equipment. A founder of the U.S.-Japan Rail Congress, Benjamin was a strong proponent of Amtrak's Emerging Corridors, and his particular interest in the Chicago-Indianapolis-Cincinnati corridor may yet rescue Conrail's Shelbyville line for future passenger service. Benjamin shared NARP's belief in the "Cardinal," and played an important role in the train's restoration. The congressman elevated the importance of Amtrak's recent labor agreements by personally attending, along with Rep. Norman Lent (R-NY), the signing of the new contracts. Benjamin worked for rail improvements not only in Indiana, but across the land, and largely because of his work earlier this year, Amtrak is off to a good start in the FY '83 appropriations process.

Congressman Benjamin suffered from high blood pressure and apparently died of heart failure. Many who knew him well concur with East Chicago, IN, Mayor Robert Pastrick (D), who lamented that Benjamin "worked himself to death."

Like his constituents and congressional colleagues, we feel a tremendous loss and sadness.●

THE PLIGHT OF EDITA GABERMAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. EMERSON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to tell my colleagues of the plight of a certain Soviet Jewish family.

In 1972, Edita Gaberman, an elderly widow, applied to emigrate to Israel with three of her children. They were refused on the grounds that one son, Mendel, had served in the Soviet Army. Today, they continue to be refused, even though Mendel, who served in a construction unit along the Vladivostok-Moscow Road, completed his military service in 1971.

Mrs. Gaberman has one daughter, three grandchildren, and a sister who already live in Israel. This family longs for reunification, but they cannot see each other, because all that they have received from the Soviet Government is an unconscionable obstruction of their dreams.

I have written to Mr. Anatoly Dobrynin, the Soviet Ambassador to the United States, advising him that I support the Gabermans and requesting that he aid and assist them in obtaining emigration visas.

Mr. Speaker, there are very few Soviet citizens who do not want exit visas, but there are no other people on Earth who have suffered the repression of a tyrannical government as have Soviet Jews. It is government policy to persecute members of the Jewish faith and to encourage their ostracism. American citizens often take for granted the religious freedom we enjoy in our great Nation. However, we need only to ponder the plight of Soviet Jews to make us realize just how lucky we all are. The courage and fortitude that has been shown by Soviet Jews is an inspiration to free men and women throughout the world. I urge my colleagues to work and pray for the right of Soviet Jews, like the Gaberman family, to emigrate and free themselves from the anti-Semitic policies of the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.●

WISCONSIN VOTERS SUPPORT NUCLEAR WEAPONS FREEZE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, September 14, Wisconsin citizens had the opportunity to vote on the following referendum:

Shall the Secretary of State of Wisconsin inform the President and the Congress of the United States that it is the desire of the people of Wisconsin to have the Government of the United States work vigorously to negotiate a mutual nuclear weapons moratorium and reduction, with appropriate verification with the Soviet Union and other nations?

With almost complete returns in, Wisconsin citizens assumed the leadership of the nationwide grassroots movement which is aimed at ending the nuclear arms race by approving the referendum by a decisive margin of 378,717 to 119,971.

The President, who is opposed to the campaign to obtain a mutual freeze and verifiable nuclear arms reduction between the United States and the Soviet Union, should pay attention to the powerful message cast by the people of Wisconsin. That message is that the American people are repudiating the nuclear arms race and are demanding the achievement of a real nuclear weapons disarmament between the United States and the Soviet Union.

I believe the Wisconsin vote moves us closer to the day when the threat of a nuclear holocaust will no longer exist and when we can devote our vast resources to the means of enriching, not destroying, human life.●

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND COMMERCE TO SEEK RULE LIMITING GERMANE AMENDMENTS TO H.R. 6995

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the rules for the Democratic Caucus, notice is hereby given that the Committee on Emergy and Commerce is seeking a rule which would limit germane amendments to the bill H.R. 6995 which was reported from the committee on September 15, 1982:

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND COMMERCE,
Washington, D.C., September 13, 1982.

Hon. RICHARD BOLLING,
Chairman, Committee on Rules, House of Representatives, H-312, The Capitol, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The following bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Energy and Commerce:

H.R. 6995—To authorize appropriations for the Federal Trade Commission for fiscal years 1983 thru 1985, and for other purposes.

A copy of the bill is enclosed. The report on this bill is expected to be filed tomorrow.

It would be greatly appreciated if you would schedule a hearing before the Rules Committee on this bill as soon as possible. It is requested that a one-hour modified open rule be granted, making in order the following three amendments:

1. An amendment which would conform to the text of H.R. 3722 as introduced on May 28, 1981 by Mr. Luken and Mr. Lee;

2. An amendment in the nature of a substitute for #1 above to be offered by Mr. Florio and Mr. Broyhill; and

3. An amendment to be offered by Mr. Madigan regarding the establishment of information disclosure and certification requirements applicable to the sale of used motor vehicles.

Because it was not possible to report the bill until after May 15, I also request a waiver of Section 402(a) of the Budget Act.

This request only represents the views of the Committee on Energy and Commerce. The bill has been jointly referred to the Committee on Rules which has some concerns that it may wish to address. We fully expect that any rule granted will reflect those concerns.

With kind regards.

Sincerely,

JOHN D. DINGELL,
Chairman.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DERRICK) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained and was unable to vote on S. 923, the conference report on the Pretrial Services Act. Had I been available I would have voted "yea."●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I was necessarily absent during the session of September 8, 1982. Had I been present I would have voted "nay" on the Gramm and Dannemeyer amendments to H.R. 6307, rollcall votes 308 and 310 and "yea" on approving the Journal and final passage of H.R. 6307, the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act of 1983, rollcall votes 306 and 311.●

FACTFINDER REPORTS ON GPO SALARY CONTROVERSY

(Mr. GAYDOS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, over the past several months, many Members of Congress have expressed their sincere concern about the level of compensation for employees of the Government Printing Office. The Public Printer, Mr. Danford L. Sawyer, Jr., has engaged in a very active media campaign to convince Members of Congress and the general public that GPO craft employees are paid 22 percent more than allegedly similar craftsmen in the private sector and Federal agency printing operations. A true and serious controversy has arisen with too much uncritical and face value acceptance of Mr. Sawyer's position.

However, current law, the Kiess Act of 1924 (44 U.S.C. 305), provides for a means to subject Mr. Sawyer's position to rigorous analysis. Under the Kiess Act, when the Public Printer and the GPO labor unions fail to reach an agreement concerning wages, salaries, and compensation, an appeal may be made by either party to the Joint Committee on Printing whose decision on this matter is final. Both parties having failed to reach any agreement appealed their cases to the Joint Committee on Printing. To assist the committee in discharging its responsibilities under the Kiess Act, the Joint Committee on Printing appointed an independent factfinder, acceptable to both management and labor at GPO. The independent factffinder, Mr. Frederick U. Reel, an expert in collective bargaining matters whose name was provided by the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, conducted extensive hearings and accepted briefs from both parties. For example, in his preliminary statement the factfinder states:

The ensuing hearings consumed seven days, including three night sessions, yielding a transcript of 2,140 pages, and over 150 exhibits, many of them consisting of multi-pages of charts and financial data, largely relating to wage rates, cost-of-living increases, and job descriptions. Opening briefs, exclusive of voluminous appendices, totaled 173 pages, and reply memoranda, filed by each party, exceeded 40 pages, exclusive of further extensive appendices. All parties were represented by counsel of long experience and unusual ability in labor relations matters. They were able to agree on one point: that the instant proceeding was, in their experience, uniquely complex.

On September 9, the factfinder forwarded his written findings of fact and nonbinding recommendations to the joint committee. On September 23, the joint committee will meet to make its final decision.

At this time, I am submitting the factfinder's "Opinion and Recommendations" into the RECORD in order to make it available for all my colleagues to closely examine. As a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, I have not made my final decision on the matter. However, I strongly urge my colleagues to study the opinion of a seasoned professional with lengthy experience in labor-management relations who conducted arbitration-style proceedings which were fair to all parties. It was only in this forum, and through this process, that Mr. Sawyer's position on GPO craft wages has been subjected to challenge and critical analysis. Accordingly, this document is submitted for the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING

FACT FINDING HEARING IN RE: JOINT BARGAINING COMMITTEE OF UNIONS, GPO, AND THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS FRANKLIN LODGE 2135 AND THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

Hearings held July 12, 14, 15, August 4-7, 1982, before Frederick U. Reel, Fact Finder.

APPEARANCES

For the Joint Council: George B. Driesen, Esq.

For the IAM: Winn Newman, Esq.

For the GPO: Garrett Brown, Esq., General Counsel; Lawrence W. Kennelly, Esq., and Neal Fine, Esq.

OPINION AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Preliminary statement

This proceeding arises as a result of an impasse between the Government Printing Office and those of its employees represented by the Joint Bargaining Committee of GPO Unions or by the International Association of Machinists.

44 U.S.C., Section 305, known as the "Kiess Act," provides among other things, that wage rates in the Government Printing Office shall be determined through collective bargaining by a committee selected by the affected trade and the Public Printer, and that the mutually agreed upon wage level shall become effective "upon approval by the Joint Committee on Printing." Section 305(a) further states, in relevant part:

"When the Public Printer and the committee representing the trade fail to agree as to wages, salaries, and compensation, either party may appeal to the Joint Committee on Printing, and the decision of the Joint Committee is final. . . ."

The immediate preceding Agreement between the present parties expired June 18, 1982, and in anticipation thereof the parties met some weeks prior thereto to present their respective positions relative to a new agreement. An impasse quickly developed, and each party appealed to the Joint Committee on Printing, which in turn referred the matter to the undersigned Fact Finder, selected by agreement of the parties. The ensuing hearings consumed seven days, including three night sessions, yielding a transcript of 2,140 pages, and over 150 exhibits, many of them consisting of multi-pages of charts and financial data, largely relating to wage rates, cost-of-living increases, and job descriptions. Opening briefs, exclusive of voluminous appendices, totaled 173 pages, and reply memoranda, filed by each party, exceeded 40 pages, exclusive of further extensive appendices. All parties were represented by counsel of long experience and unusual ability in labor relations matters. They were able to agree on only one point: that the instant proceeding was, in their experience, uniquely complex.

This complexity has its genesis in two main sources: the hybrid character of the GPO itself which is in part a publisher of a daily paper and in part a publisher of other books, pamphlets, and documents. It is, in short, both a newspaper plant and a job printing plant. Its employees are also hybrids, resembling in part government employees with respect to such matters as retirement, leave, and length of workweek, but resembling private employees with respect to bargaining over many other matters, including wage rates. The anomalous character of the GPO employees is further heightened by the presence in some other government agencies of employees performing ostensibly similar tasks with respect to the printing operations of these agencies. These employees are "regular" federal employees subject to federal wage scales, but in many respects their tasks and skills bear only superficial resemblance to those required of GPO employees.

Although past bargaining negotiations under the Kiess Act have found the parties in disagreement over the nature and extent of wage increases (for example, in 1979 before Fact Finder Bloch, GPO recommended a 5.5-percent increase, and the Joint Council recommended a 9-percent increase; Block recommended an increase of 6.8 percent), the "bargaining" this year found the parties pursuing hopelessly divergent positions. From the outset, GPO took the position that the wage rates should be sharply reduced to bring them into conformity with the federal wage scale for jobs bearing similar titles at other agencies. In general terms, this would have amounted to reducing wage rates at GPO by over 20 percent. During the course of discussions, GPO modified its proposal only to the extent of phasing in the reductions over a three year period. At the outset of the hearing before the Fact Finder, GPO further modified its proposal by offering to accept whatever adjustment in federal wage rates is to be made in October 1982 as a result of an OPM study of wage rates in the printing and lithographic industry in the Washington, D.C., area. In essence, however, GPO has continued to insist that its wage rates be brought into complete conformity with the federal wage system. To the unions such insistence on a substantial wage cut is tantamount to not "bargaining" at all. Their proposals, advanced in concrete terms only after negotiations had virtually collapsed in the light of GPO's position, are essentially for a 12 percent increase (Machinists—one year contract) and for two annual increases of 8.2 percent and 5 percent, respectively (Joint Bargaining Committee—two year contract), together with cost-of-living increases.

The essential issue before the Fact Finder, therefore, is whether the wage rates at GPO should be increased or decreased, and to what extent. Also at issue is the duration of the new Agreement, whether one, two, or three years. In addition, the Joint Bargaining Committee proposed a number of changes in fringe benefits, none of which were the subject of extensive testimony, and the GPO urged a change in the present arrangement for shift premiums. These matters will be discussed separately at the end of this Opinion.

I. The GPO proposal

The basic thrust of the GPO proposal is that the wages of its employees should be brought into exact conformity with the wages of employees whom GPO terms the "counterparts" of its employees in other federal agencies. The wages of these other employees are set under the "federal wage system" and in essence are set by the OPM acting on, and normally accepting, reports and recommendations by the Federal Prevailing Rate Advisory Committee. The extent to which GPO advocates complete comformity of rates is demonstrated by its expressed readiness to accept whatever rates the Committee prescribes for the printing and lithographic industry in the Washington, D.C., area, even though the rates themselves will not be promulgated until October 1982.

In the Fact Finder's view, this proposal is fatally defective as a matter of law, and also rests on a factual premise—that GPO work is basically comparable to that done at other federal agencies, or to that done in the private industry which formed the basis for the proposed federal system rates—which is completely erroneous.

The effect of the GPO proposal is to substitute the federal wage system rates for wage rates arrived at by collective bargaining at the GPO. Acceptance of this proposal would mean that in the future both GPO and the employees and their unions would accept the wage rates determined for them by another body. Undoubtedly, the Congress could provide by legislation that this be done. But up to now Congress has not seen fit to do so. Instead it has provided for nearly 60 years in the Kiess Act that the GPO wage rates be set by negotiation, subject to review in the event of impasse by the Joint Committee on Printing. The record indicates that the present head of GPO has expressed the view that that Act should be repealed, and legislation to accomplish that result has recently been suggested on the Senate floor. Such repeal, however, cannot be accomplished by the Fact Finder, or by the GPO in the guise of this proceeding. Indeed, it may well be that even if the unions and the GPO mutually agreed to such a proposal, that agreement would be invalid as contrary to the express policy of existing legislation. Be that as it may, certainly the effort of GPO to accomplish such a result in the face of firm opposition by the unions cannot be countenanced under the statute. In another context, such an effort by an employer to insist to the point of impasse in "bargaining negotiations" on the surrender of statutory rights would be viewed as a violation of the most elementary principles of the nation's basic labor relations legislation.

Having already stated that imposition of the wage structure here sought by GPO rests within the power of Congress, the Fact Finder would not presume in this Opinion to express any view as to the wisdom of such legislation. However, insofar as the record in this proceeding sets forth conflicting views as to the factual premises on which the GPO proposal rests, the Fact Finder deems it appropriate, and indeed incumbent upon him, to make factual findings resolving the conflicts of testimony and of approach revealed by this record.

The GPO relies on the fact that a number of other government agencies operate their own printing facilities and employ craftsmen whose titles and job descriptions resemble those at the GPO. Most of the other facilities are within the Department of Defense, although some other agencies, such as the National Labor Relations Board, also operate a printing facility. Comparison between GPO and these other facilities, however, reveals substantial, indeed overwhelming, differences of both degree and kind. For example, GPO has approximately 2,700 production employees, the average number in the other federal printing plants is from 25 to 35. GPO receives 1,000 requisitions per day and runs in excess of 4 billion production units per year. The next largest plant is the defense printing service, with about one-tenth that volume, and it in turn is not typical of the others. The time constraints at GPO, with the pressure of the daily Congressional Record and the daily Federal Register, have no parallel at the other federal agencies. No other federal printing facility maintains its own engineering staff, and none has such complicated machinery or requires such immediate repair service as does GPO. It is, of course, quite true that in some instances the quality of work required at other highly specialized printing facilities is even higher than that required at GPO, such as, for example, the printing of five color nautical and aeronautical charts, or the printing of four-color illustrations for medical textbooks produced at Walter Reed. These highly specialized jobs, of course, are not turned out under the pressures and volume which are a regular part of the work at GPO. The plant doing the pathology work, for example, has 15 employees, and so far as the record shows operates under no time constraints. The great bulk of the work of other federal printing facilities is what is known in the trade as "quick and dirty," meaning that they exist primarily to satisfy the needs of the agency for quick reproduction and distribution of internal material so that "If you can read it, run it."

The impact on employees of this difference between the work at GPO and the work at other federal printing facilities is enormous. It may perhaps best be illustrated by the vast difference in hiring standards. When GPO hires a printer or other craftsman in the printing industry it resorts to the roster maintained by OPM. To obtain a place on that roster a prospective employee must have completed an apprenticeship (normally, four years) and have had at least one year of journeyman experience. The employees doing printing work at Bolling Air Force Base, the Pentagon, and the Department of Health and Human Services were not journeymen, had served no apprenticeship, and were trained on the job. Similarly at the Defense Mapping Agency, the only prerequisite to the hiring of a pressman is that he have a high school education, as distinguished from the apprenticeship and journeyman experience required at GPO.

The record also establishes the greater demands on GPO employees as contrasted with those at other federal printing facilities in terms of familiarity with and ability to operate many different types of machinery and equipment. GPO has approximately 75 presses, including 19 different varieties and ten different makes. At Defense Mapping Agency, for example, there are eight presses and two different makes. This difference perhaps helps explain why Defense Mapping can train "on the job" while GPO must start with experienced employees who have knowledge as to each of the presses he may be called upon to operate. Also, at Defense Mapping typesetting is done line by line to be stripped in for maps and charts whereas GPO typesets an entire job. Similarly, Defense Mapping has a production requirement of 5,100 to 6,000 keystrokes per hour as contrasted with GPO's standard of 14,000. Finally, because of time pressures at GPO the journeyman operator must assume responsibility for actions requiring judgment which in the other facilities could be referred to higher supervision for deliberation.

The time pressure factor is of peculiar significance because the record establishes that it is totally ignored by the classification experts responsible for the wage rates under the federal wage system. To them, the setting of a page of the Congressional Record and the setting of a page in an NLRB decision involve similar tasks and skills and call theoretically for the same compensation. The fact that the Record may not go to press till 3 a.m. and must be available the same morning whereas an NLRB decision may be delayed a day, a week, or a month with no concern or inconvenience to anyone is not a factor to be weighed in job description. This, the Fact Finder believes, is more revealing as to the thought processes of classification experts than it is helpful in determining proper wage rates at the GPO.

The long and short of it is that the GPO is not remotely comparable to any other federal printing facility. As long as GPO has as its primary task, perhaps its raison d'etre, the printing and publishing of the daily Congressional Record, the Federal Register, and such other rush printing as it must undertake for the Congress, any attempt to equate its operations or its wage structure with that of other existing federal printing facilities must be viewed as either ill-informed or unconcerned with the quality of GPO work and with its capacity to continue to furnish the service Congress has heretofore required of it.

II. The appropriate wage level

Rejection of the GPO wage proposal as legally and factually unsound does not, of course, dictate acceptance of the wage proposals advanced by the unions. The Fact Finder is directed to recommend appropriate wage rates in light of the following factors:

(a) What is in the interest of the Government and just to the persons employed;

(b) The wage and fringe benefits available in the public and private sectors to employees possessing similar skills and training;

(c) The Washington area average Consumer Price Index for goods and services since the last contract; and

(d) Any other factors which in his professional judgment are normally or traditionally taken into consideration in the determination of wages and other benefits in the collective bargaining process.

Unfortunately, only the third of those factors is capable of objective determination. The others involve highly subjective judgments, for even the determination of the value of wage and fringe benefits in the public and private sectors is a subject upon which divergent philosophies and approaches produce divergent results. The normal difficulties in determining appropriate wage adjustments as between contesting parties are accentuated by certain factors peculiar to the GPO.

To begin with, the GPO occupies a unique position in the Government in that it is intended to be at least a self-sustaining if not profitable operation. It charges its customers, including the Congress, for its services. The GPO also occupies a unique position in the printing and publishing industry. It publishes not only the equivalent of a daily newspaper, or indeed two if one includes the Federal Register, but also numerous other pamphlets, documents, and books, which it offers for sale. Although as a newspaper publisher it does not compete with others in the field, it does have competition in the other areas in which job printing shops are able to publish similar books and pamphlets. The GPO reports that it has been losing business to such competing establishments, some of which are able to sell certain services to the Government at rates lower than those charged by GPO. This results in part from GPO's wage scale, but the wage scale is necessarily affected by GPO's function as a "newspaper publisher," a factor not affecting the wage rates of its job printing competitors. Determination of "what is in the interest of the Government and just to the persons employed" in this particular context is manifestly difficult to say the least.

Somewhat similar problems arise in any attempt to equate GPO wages and fringe benefits with those in the private sector. The Congress is, of course, well acquainted with the thorny path leading to "comparability." Efforts to balance the advantages of social security on the one hand and the Government's retirement program on the other have led to endless disagreement, duly reflected in the present record. The somewhat more secure tenure which, at least until very recently, has attached to federal as distinguished from private employment must be accorded some weight in the scale. But to these routine, if difficult, problems of equating the two areas of employment must be added others peculiar to the GPO on the one hand and the printing and publishing business on the other. Reference has already been made to the fact that GPO employees are in part analogous to newspaper employees and in part analogous to employees in job printing establishments. Comparison with either set of private employees is therefore not wholly just or equitable.

In addition, the Joint Bargaining Committee emphasizes that most of the wage rates in the private sector of this industry are based on a 35 hour week, and GPO employees work a 40 hour week. This is true. But the argument that to achieve a true comparison one must augment the private scale by five overtime hours at time and one-half (or in some cases three hours at double time) is overstated. It leads, of course, to increasing the private weekly wage by over 20 percent above that stated in the private agreements But not all these agreements provide for time and one-half over 35 hours, and, more important, they do not in fact normally work a 40 hour week or much in excess of 35 hours, and the wage rates are set with that fact in mind. Thus, while some allowance should be made for the longer workweek at GPO, the allowance should not be as great as that urged by the unions.

As was the case in the similar hearing conducted by Fact Finder Bloch in 1979, each party put in evidence tending to support its position as to whether the GPO employees are receiving more or less compensation than their counterparts in the private sector. The GPO insists that such "counterparts" do not embrace newspaper employees, stating that in the past ten years the GPO and the Joint Bargaining Committee have never utilized rates paid by newspapers as a means of establishing GPO rates. The Joint Bargaining Committee refers to newspaper rates as "most clearly comparable to GPO" and "the closest analog to GPO in the private sector." Moreover, an exhibit offered by GPO tends to establish a close relationship between the rate for compositors at GPO and that paid at the Washington Post, the GPO rate was 4 cents lower in 1980 but 3 cents higher in 1981. Assuming, however, that the "counterparts" are to be found in the job printing industry, either in the Washington area or in other large cities, each side presented, as it did to Fact Finder Bloch, charts "proving" that GPO wages were either too high or too low, depending on the result desired by the advocate. As the previous Fact Finder observed, the exhibits, properly analyzed and discounted for variations inherent in the rates (such as the 35 hour workweek referred to above) lead to the conclusion that GPO employees are neither significantly ahead nor do they lag behind their private sector counterparts; they are "in a generally equivalent position."

One highly significant factor which requires the Fact Finder to discount both the GPO figures showing its wage rates to be higher than those in the private sector and the union figures showing the reverse is the differing approach which each side takes to the value of the federal retirement program. GPO figures the total valuation of that program to be 36.46 percent of salary, of which employees contribute seven percent. The remaining 29.46 percent of the cost is, according to GPO, a part of the real compensation of employees, to be figured in, along with other nonwage items such as the value of vacations. The Joint Bargaining Committee, on the other hand, points out that the GPO figures for the private sector do not include the value of the social security system which is inapplicable to GPO employees. The Fact Finder must necessarily agree that the GPO figures are skewed to that extent. But the Fact Finder cannot take the next step with the Joint Bargaining Committee and discount entirely the value of the federal retirement program. Plainly that program is of more value to an employee than mere coverage by social security, and indeed many (but by no means all) labor agreements in the private sector in the printing industry provide for supplemental pensions precisely because social security does not serve the same purpose as a full retirement program. The Fact Finder must therefore reject the figures on this issue from both sides. The percent divergence between federal retirement and social security also existed in 1979 when Fact Finder Bloch found the GPO and private sector employees to be in a relatively equivalent position.

Finally, both sides cite scripture—in this case, the Consumer Price Index—to their purpose. GPO introduced figures tending to show that its wage rates have kept pace with the CPI since 1967, the base year. The unions respond that most of the wage gains were in the early and mid-1970s, and that for the past several years the wage increases have not matched the increased cost of living. This point was conceded by a Management Analyst called as a GPO witness; he testified on cross-examination that since 1976 wage rates at GPO "have increased less rapidly than the cost of living has increased."

Although the Fact Finder in this proceeding is not bound to approve the result reached by the Joint Committee on Printing in 1979, when it accepted Fact Finder Bloch's recommendations, or by the rates set in the 1980 agreement, the Fact Finder is persuaded after a review of this extensive record that the wage rates in both cases were reasonable and just. Certainly, if grave injustices had been perpetrated in those agreements, this proceeding could have served as the vehicle to correct those errors for the future. However, recognizing that each side could adduce statistics tending to show that the wage rates heretofore in effect have been too low or too high, the Fact Finder is satisfied that the rates, last changed in December 1981, were fair and equitable at that time. The question remains as to what, if any, future adjustments should be made.

The national economic picture, although still fraught with great uncertainty, has changed significantly since Fact Finder Bloch's 1979 report. A sharp increase in unemployment has been matched with a marked decline in the rate of inflation. Although predictions vary as to future changes in the cost of living, there appears to be general agreement that the CPI-W will continue to increase at a rate well below the "double digit inflation" which existed in the late 1970s. The considerations which led Fact Finder Bloch to reject a cost of living allowance and which led the parties in 1980 to place a low "cap" on such allowances, have largely ceased to exist.

The last increase at the GPO occurred in mid-December 1981, and was responsive to the CPI-W for September 1981 (the CPI-W appears for every odd-numbered month, but is necessarily not issued until several weeks after the end of the last covered month). The CPI-W for the Washington area rose from 275.7 in September 1981 to 283.8 in March 1982, an increase of approximately three percent. Continuation of the wage policy followed for the past two years, which in the Fact Finder's view has achieved and maintained a proper level for GPO rates, calls for a three percent increase effective with the pay period immediately preceding June 18, 1982, and the Fact Finder so recommends. Between March 1982 and July 1982, the CPI-W for Washington rose from 283.8 to 286.3, an increase of slightly less than one percent. In all probability, the increase in CPI-W between March and September 1982 will be between one and two percent. The Fact Finder recommends that as of the pay period immediately preceding December 18, 1982, the GPO rates should be readjusted to reflect the percentage increase in the CPI-W for Washington between March and September 1982.

In the Fact Finder's view all predictions as to the future rate of inflation warrant a continuation of the same formula for semiannual adjustments for the pay period immediately preceding June 8, 1983, and for December 18, 1983, based on the CPI-W for the Washington area in March and September 1983. The Fact Finder sees no reason to impose a "cap" on these increases; if the cost of living should take an unexpected but substantial rise to the degree it reached in the 1970s, corresponding wage increases would seem to be appropriate.

The Fact Finder is well aware of the criticisms, advanced particularly by the Machinists Union, of using past increases in the cost of living as a measure of future wages. There is some merit to the suggestion that the wage increase lags behind the increased cost of living. The device here proposed is, however, to be found in many labor agreements. Efforts to anticipate increases, or to provide for increases coupled with "takeaways" if the increases do not materialize are either speculative or too disruptive. The Fact Finder therefore recommends a two year agreement (not one year, as proposed by the Machinists, which is too short a period and would require resumption of negotiations in a scant six months, nor three years as proposed by GPO which is too long to predict trends in these uncertain times), with cost of living increases based on the CPI-W for March 1982, September 1982, March 1983, and September 1983, to be effective as stated above in the June and December following the index month.

III. Additional contentions of the GPO

The GPO urges that the existing shift differentials (15 percent above the base rate payable on both the second and third shifts) be replaced by the more conventional government differential of seven and one-half percent for the second shift and ten percent for the third shift. The record shows that the present differential has existed for over 20 years. It is a deeply ingrained way of life at the GPO. It may have its genesis in the peculiarly heavy burden imposed on the second and third shifts by the printing of the Congressional Record. In the other government agencies the somewhat lower premiums for those shifts reflect the inconvenience of the hours, not the particularly burdensome work. In the Fact Finder's view, the GPO has shown insufficient basis for changing this long established differential. Any such dislocation as GPO recommends might well cost more in terms of disrupting morale or in necessitating other upward adjustment of rates than it would achieve in slight superficial economies.

GPO also challenges the existing "linkage" between the wage rates of its maintenance force and the rates of its production employees. It contends that the special technical considerations advanced for differentiating between production employees at GPO and those at other government facilities do not apply to the maintenance forms. To a substantial degree, the Fact Finder must reject this contention as contrary to facts established on the record. Particularly with respect to the Machinists, and to related crafts such as Welders, the complex machinery at GPO has no counterpart in the other federal agencies. Indeed, GPO Machinists have been required to repair the equipment of other government printing facilities, including that of the Department of Defense, because the agency Machinists lacked the ability to perform the work. There is also some evidence that the work of the Electricians at GPO demands skills beyond those required at other agencies, and that the Painters likewise are called upon for tasks not performed by their alleged counterparts elsewhere in the Government. As to other crafts, the record is not fully developed. Apparently most private printing plants contract out their maintenance work, so no comparison can readily be made between such plants and the GPO in terms of maintenance rates. The GPO presented its Exhibit 85 dealing with craft rates in the Washington area only moments before the close of the hearing. Manifestly, the primary thrust of GPO's position and of the Unions' response to that position went to the general substitution of the federal wage system for the collective bargaining provided by the Kiess Act. With the record as to "linkage" of certain crafts (other than Machinists, Electricians, and Painters) basically undeveloped, and in view of the comparatively few employees outside those stated crafts who would be affected, the Fact Finder will not at this time recommend any change in the long accepted principle which links craft rates at GPO to the compositor rate. This is not to state, however, that the Fact Finder accepts the argument of the Joint Bargaining Committee that the rates for these crafts at GPO are below the average for such crafts in Washington or in other cities. That argument rests on the fundamental error of the Joint Bargaining Committee in totally rejecting the costs (and the advantages to the employees) of the federal retirement program. It also gives insufficient weight to the regularity of federal employment, as compared with the sporadic nature of employment in construction work. The Fact Finder suggests that the entire issue of rates for this small segment of employees could well be explored in depth in some future negotiations. Apparently this has never been done; Fact Finder Bloch's report shows some separate consideration of GPO Machinists (who as indicated above, as well as in Bloch's report, are clearly entitled to maintain whatever wage advantage they may enjoy over their alleged "counterparts" elsewhere in the Government), but as to other crafts the "linkage" has apparently not heretofore been challenged. The fact that the parties on this occasion concentrated on other more far-reaching and fundamental issues leaves the Fact Finder with an insufficient record on which to recommend any departure from the long-established practice.

GPO's objection to certain post-hearing evidence appearing in the guise of appendices to the briefs is well-taken. Appendices C and D to the brief of the Joint Bargaining Committee, Appendix F to the brief of the Machinists, and Appendices 1 and 2 to the brief of the GPO have been disregarded. The Fact Finder has not carefully examined the various labor agreements submitted by the Machinists as an Appendix, but in the absence of challenge to their authenticity would not exclude them.

IV. Additional proposals of the Joint Bargaining Committee

Although the parties at the hearing concentrated on the basic wage dispute, the proposal of the Joint Bargaining Committee included a number of fringe benefits which the GPO opposed. The proposal for premium pay for Saturdays and Sundays as such should be rejected. Of course, if work on these days extends an employee's workweek beyond 40 hours, the employee will be paid overtime. If, however, those are regularly scheduled and not overtime days, the Fact Finder recommends against any change in the present pattern of paying straight time rates for those days.

The Fact Finder also recommends rejection of the proposal that Dr. Martin Luther King's birthday be declared an "administrative leave day off" for GPO employees. No reason is shown for giving GPO employees leave days not enjoyed by other federal employees. The decision whether to honor Dr. King's memory and his contribution to American life by declaring the anniversary of his birthday to be a federal holiday is one to be made by appropriate authority for all federal employees, not by a single government agency. Speaking for himself, the Fact Finder would only add that he regards January 15 as a singularly poor date for an additional holiday, and he would favor honoring Dr. King's contribution to, and vision of, American life by an annual observance of the date of Dr. King's "I have a dream" speech as "Martin Luther King Day."

The proposal that hazardous weather or emergency situation days be paid at overtime rates should be rejected. GPO employees are not entitled to special consideration above that given other federal employees in these respects. To the extent that their obligation to work on such occasions may exceed that of other federal employees, it should be noted that their compensation already takes into account some differences between their responsibilities and those of others in federal employ. The Joint Bargaining Committee itself describes these occasions as "rare."

No evidence was presented supporting the proposal that "all job related education . . . be compensated for by the GPO." The Fact Finder, not having been apprised of the scope of the proposal or of the necessity for it, recommends its rejection.

The Joint Bargaining Committee advanced two proposals relating to health benefits, namely (1) securing by GPO and the Joint Bargaining Committee of a supplemental insurance policy for each employee designed to restore recent benefits cuts, with the cost to be borne by the employees in the form of deductions from wages; (2) the obtaining for each employee of the Blue Cross Prescription, Eye, and Dental Plan, with the cost of $21.75 per month to be borne by the GPO. These proposals surfaced on May 18, 1982, a date which represents the termination of any real negotiations between these parties. The first of these proposals would appear to be unobjectionable, although there is some suggestion in the record that OPM has no present regulations permitting allotments from pay for private insurance. The matter was insufficiently explored, either before or at the hearing, to permit the Fact Finder to make a firm recommendation. The parties may explore the matter further if either so desires, and may be able to reach a supplemental agreement thereon. The evidence fails to support the proposal that GPO assume the cost of an additional insurance program.

The Joint Bargaining Committee proposed that "Employees in the Carpentry, Pipe/Sheet Metal, Electrical/Power and Masonry sections" receive a hazardous duty premium of 25 percent when engaged in any of the following activities:

a. Erecting and working off scaffolding.

b. Working when life lines or safety belts are required.

c. Working where there is unstable footing.

d. Working at extreme height.

e. Dealing with high tension voltage.

A comparable provision with respect to Painters was recommended by Fact Finder Bloch and approved by the Joint Committee in 1979. Apparently the matter was the subject of evidence in the 1979 proceeding: no evidence was introduced before the present Fact Finder on the appropriate differential or on what constitutes hazardous work. The GPO, however, expressed a readiness to pay whatever differential is provided under the U.S. Code and the Code of Federal Regulations for hazardous work by these employees. This offer, of course, was a part of GPO's general effort to place these employees under the federal wage system for all purposes. In the light of these facts, and primarily to place these crafts on the same level as that achieved by the Painters in 1979, the Fact Finder recommends that they be awarded hazardous pay to the degree and in the situations in which other federal employees in related occupations receive such a differential.

The Joint Bargaining Committee proposed that employees detailed to a higher graded position for more than two days be paid at the higher rate. Such provisions are common in the private but not in the public sector. In all matters except basic wage rates, GPO employees have the advantages (and occasional disadvantages) of other federal employees, conforming in such basic matters as leave and retirement. Under the circumstances the Fact Finder will not recommend that the provisions governing details should be altered to conform to the practice in the private sector.

The proposal to increase the basic level of Bindery Workers pay from 65 to 70 percent of the journeyman Bookbinder pay is insufficiently supported in the evidence to warrant its recommendation. The generalized proposal to continue all terms previously agreed to appears to be both vague and unnecessary and is not recommended.

V. Conclusions and recommendations

1. The proposal of the GPO to conform GPO wage rates to those in the federal wage system should be rejected as contrary to existing policy, and as resting on the fallacious premise that the GPO is comparable to other government printing facilities.

2. The proposals of the unions for substantial general wage increases should likewise be rejected. If reasonable allowance be made for the cost and value of the federal retirement program, the wage rates provided in the 1979 and 1980 settlements were not out of line with wage rates in the printing and publishing industries.

3. A two year agreement, effective June 18, 1982, should be entered into with provision for cost-of-living wage adjustments effective on the pay periods commencing closest to June 18, 1982, December 18, 1982, June 18, 1983, and December 18, 1983. The adjustment effective in June 1982 shall be a three percent wage increase. Subsequent adjustments should reflect the percentage increase in the CPI-W for the Washington area for the appropriate six month period between the preceding March and September (for the December adjustments) and September and March (for the June 1983 adjustment).

4. Existing fringe benefits, such as shift premiums, which have been the subject of varying proposals by the parties shall remain unchanged, except that

(a) Hazardous pay, to the extent appropriate under federal legislation and federal regulations covering employees in the executive branch of the Government, shall be paid GPO employees in the Carpentry, Pipe/Sheet Metal, Electrical/Power, and Masonry sections of the GPO.

(b) The parties may wish to negotiate during the life of the Agreement here recommended with respect to the securing of supplemental insurance coverage to restore recent cuts in benefits, it being understood that the cost of any such insurance will be borne by the employees.

"(2) permissible tasks or duties which may be performed by professionals.

"(b) In any case in which the use of authority under section 5 or section 18 by the Commission to prohibit unfair acts or practices engaged in by professionals in a particular State may result in the invalidation of any State law of such State specified in subsection (a), the Commission may use such authority regardless of whether such use of authority would result in such invalidation if the Commission——

"(1) finds that such State law (A) authorizes or prescribes any commercial or business act or practice; and (B) adversely affects or is likely to adversely affect competition; and

"(2) in determining whether such act or practice is an unfair act or practice under section 5(a)(1), takes into account (in weighing countervailing benefits to consumers or to competition under section 5(a)(1)(B)(ii)) benefits to the public health, safety, and welfare which result from any State law under which such act or practice is authorized or prescribed.

such invalidation. For purposes of the preceding sentence, the term 'State attorney general' means the chief legal officer of a State, and includes the Corporation Counsel of the District of Columbia."; and

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

ON A VISIT TO LOS ANGELES COUNTY BY: HIS EXCELLENCY, YOSHIO OKAWARA, AMBASSADOR OF JAPAN TO THE UNITED STATES

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to report to the House concerning a very unique event that took place in the County of Los Angeles on August 13, 1982 relative to this great Nation's relationship with the Government of Japan.

On August 13, 1982 the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors hosted a luncheon and community reception for His Excellency, Yoshio Okawara, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Japan to the United States.

The five members of the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors: chairman, Peter Schabarum; Kenneth Hahn; Edmund Edelman; Dean Dana; and Michael Antonovitch, each expressed their personal greetings to His Excellency in recognition of the importance of leading Government officials to publicly recognize the value of good relations between the United States and Japan. Further, in greeting His Excellency, the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors emphasized how a continuous and recipricol friendship between the United States and Japan through the County of Los Angeles, can greatly enhance the world economy through a process of cultural communication and understanding.

Throughout the day, by a motion of the board of supervisors, the colors of Japan were proudly flown side-by-side with Old Glory, over the Hall of Administration, representing the second time in the county's history that the Japanese flag was flown, the first time being during the visit of His Majesty, Emperor Hirohito of Japan in 1974.

That evening, during the Sayonara Banquet of the Japanese American Citizens League's 27th Biennial National Convention, at which His Excellency was the keynote speaker, Los Angeles County Supervisor Kenneth Hahn presented Ambassador Okawara with a resolution signed by each supervisor acknowledging Ambassador Okawara's contributions to strengthen United States-Japan relations. It was at this time that His Excellency, Yoshio Okawara, delivered the following message, before the delegates and guests of the JACL.

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY YOSHIO OKAWARA AMBASSADOR OF JAPAN

My wife and I cherish this opportunity to be with you. As you know, I travel frequently and widely around this vast country, meeting with a great variety of Americans who, in one way or another, have an interest in Japanese-American relations, and are part of the complex fabric of mutual understanding and cooperation, on which our partnership rests. These are very educational and rewarding experiences for me. I was extremely impressed and delighted to find so many of our friends and relatives as respected citizens of the United States and active members of local communities in various corners of this country—in mid-West, Sun Belt, Eastern Heartland and so on.

There is no group of Americans, I am sure, with a deeper interest than yours in the success of this partnership. Nor is there any group of Americans that has done more than you to build this partnership on solid foundations.

The Issei who came to these shores one, two or three generations ago—your parents or grandparents—brought with them something of Japan that they grafted onto the American experience. Their way was seldom easy, and their hardships were severe. Yet they persisted, confident that they had a contribution to make in return for the rewards that life in America could offer them, and their children. Nothing is more descriptive and revealing about them than the stories in the now classical book "Nisei", written by Mr. Bill Hosokawa.

Professor Reischauer wrote in his foreword to Mr. Hosokawa's book, "No immigrant group encountered higher walls of prejudice and discrimination than did the Japanese * * *. None retained greater faith in the basic ideals of America or showed stronger determination to establish their rights to full equality and justice * * *. None showed greater loyalty to the United States * * *."

Indeed, many of those trans-Pacific pioneers made unique and lasting contributions to America in the fields of agriculture, business, professions and arts. Not the least of their contributions was that they gave to America a second generation, native born, and advantaged by growing up in American communities and in the American education system. But the Nisei also faced hardships of grudging acceptance and, when our two nations were at war, the most poignant hardship of having their loyalty as American citizens questioned.

It is a tribute to the fortitude of Issei, Nisei, and Sansei alike—and to the basic sense of justice and fair play of the American nation—that those darkest days are now far behind us, and that the scars are at last healing. You have earned positions of leadership in all areas of American life, providing a governor of a great state, five members of Congress, distinguished scholars, musicians and artists, journalists, fine teachers and other public servants, and above all, a model of good and loyal citizenship.

You have much to be proud of, and the country your ancestors came from is proud of your accomplishments.

It is in this spirit that I want to report to you this evening on the present state of Japanese-American relations. You are entitled to my candid appraisal.

It would be dishonest to pretend that there are no problems or differences whatsoever between our two countries, or that the problems that do exist are insignificant. The problems are real, and they are important. At the other extreme, it would be quite irresponsible to suggest that our current differences—whether in the economic field or over defense budgeting—are so serious that they threaten the stability of the Japanese-American partnership. This is simply not so, nor does any responsible public official in either government believe it is so.

These days we hear much about the "family disputes" in the U.S.-European relations. In the Japanese-American alliance, a "divorce" or even a separation is unthinkable.

The trade problem—specifically, how to deal with the chronic U.S. deficit in our bilateral trade—is a serious question because, in the first place, it concerns the basic structure and performance of our two giant and closely intertwined economies. In the second place, how we resolve our current trade frictions is bound to have wide repercussions throughout the world economy, because of the leading roles the United States and Japan play in world trade, investment and technology development.

Moreover, the present sluggish state of the world economy, causing high unemployment, continuing inflationary pressures, and the high cost of capital makes it extremely difficult to grapple with these complex issues. In each major trading nation, policy makers are under powerful political pressure to cushion the domestic economy against external forces that are viewed as threats to domestic jobs.

The most dangerous temptation is to try to insulate domestic jobs from foreign trade competition. This is the protectionist route the world followed in the early 1930s, and it led straight to the disaster of the Great Depression, as shrinking world trade smothered economic growth around the world. The rebirth of protectionist pressures, especially in Western Europe and also in the United States, is the clearest warning that we must find sensible, free-market solutions to Japanese-American trade problems if we are to restore dynamic growth to our own economies, and to preserve an open and expanding world economy.

As recently as 30 years ago, Japan's economy was less than 5 percent of the then giant American economy. Today the American giant is more than five times larger than it was in 1950, but the Japanese economy has grown even faster, making Japan's GNP nearly half that of the United States. Japan now generates 10 percent of world GNP and accounts for 10 percent of world trade. The United States and Japan together provide nearly one-third of world product and world trade.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Throughout these three decades, our two countries have been each other's principal overseas trading partners, in a two-way exchange that is now valued at $60 billion a year. To a great extent this trade has been complementary. Japan, which must import half the calories it consumes, has consistently been the American farmer's best overseas customer buying $7 billion in 1981. Resource-poor Japan has also been a ranking importer of American coal, minerals, forestry products and other basic materials. Japan has also been a major market for American exports of manufactured goods, which now constitute over 40 percent of Japan's total imports from the United States.

In return, the United States has long been the largest market in the world for the goods Japan is capable of exporting, manufactured products.

As both our economies prospered, and our two-way trade doubled in value each five years, the areas where our manufactured exports are in competition with each other have also grown. Once it was textiles, and now it is products of high technology industry. The competition between industrial economies has traditionally been a powerful stimulant for invention, innovation, greater manufacturing efficiency, lower prices to the consumer, and rising standards of living. This has unquestionably been true of the Japanese-American economic relationship, which is both complementary and competitive.

For the last decade and a half, however, our two-way trade has been imbalanced in Japan's favor. As our trade has grown, so has the U.S. deficit in this trade, and this situation has created periodic frictions between us. In purely economic terms, the imbalance should be no cause for alarm, as long as a deficit with one partner can be offset by a surplus with another. A realistic measure of a nation's trade performance is its overall trade balance with all its trading partners.

An even more realistic measure would take account, not only of merchandise trade, but also of trade in "invisibles"—the international flow of capital which results from investment, repatriated profits on foreign investment, royalties and license fees, tourist expenditures, and so on. By this measure, the United States usually outperforms Japan. Last year the U.S. had a healthy surplus in its invisible trade with Japan, and the combined U.S. current account balance was in surplus with the world.

However, in a time of worldwide recession, underutilized manufacturing capacity, and high unemployment, politics carries more weight than economic principles. The only way to fend off political pressure for trade protectionism is to find other ways of reducing the trade gap. We have, in fact, been working hard on different approaches.

First, the Japanese Government has taken extraordinary steps to cut tariffs and reduce other import barriers in order to make the Japanese market one of the most open and accessible markets in the entire industrialized world. Japan's trade-weighted average tariffs are lower than those in the United States, and much lower than in Western Europe. We have also eliminated a number of sensitive tariffs and import quotas. And we have simplified import procedures, streamlined testing requirements and established an Office of Trade Ombudsman to deal promptly with any complaints of discrimination against imports. We are determined to internationalize the domestic market.

Second, we are making strenuous efforts to promote expanded U.S. exports to Japan. We are providing advice and marketing assistance to U.S. manufacturers interested in selling to Japan. In a different context, Japanese industries are providing technical assistance to help modernize U.S. steel, automobile, machine tool and other industries. Japanese investment in U.S. plants, now in excess of $10 billion, is creating American jobs and adding to the U.S. GNP. A growing number of Japanese plants in the United States are also now exporting U.S.-made goods to Japan and the world. And the seven largest Japanese trading companies operating in the United States now account for about 10 percent of U.S. exports to the world.

All these measures together are strengthening Japanese-American economic interdependence by helping to strengthen the competitiveness of American products, at home and in world trade.

There is another point I want to refer you to. Japan and our mutual trading partners in Western Europe have been concerned with the excessively high U.S. interest rates. These interest rates, which have artificially overvalued the U.S. dollar, are one of the contributing factors to current U.S. trade deficits with Japan. An overvalued dollar means overpriced U.S. goods, and therefore a loss of price competitiveness for American exports.

High U.S. interest rates have also complicated the tasks of Japan and other American trading partners in efforts to restore vitality and growth to our respective domestic economies. The capital we need to maintain and expand our domestic plant has been fleeing to U.S. money markets for speculative purposes that contribute little to world economic health. We hope that recent cuts in the U.S. official discount rate are the beginning of a healthier trend, and that they will continue.

I have given you perhaps a more technical explanation of our current economic concerns than you bargained for. However, I believe it is very important to put these questions into perspective.

It is not just our economic relations that are involved in the Japanese-American partnership. Our two nations are also political allies, sharing the same commitments to democracy and the peaceful preservation of an open world society. As you are well aware, Japan has been the most faithful member of the U.S. allies in supporting the U.S. in Iranian hostages, Afghanistan and Poland. The closest friendly relations with the U.S. being the pivotal importance for Japan, the Japanese Government is committed to play a role conducive to the status which Japan has attained. Not only do we cooperate as partners, exchange goods, influence each other artistically, and join each other in common adventures of science, scholarship and the frontiers of the human mind and spirit. We also share values which give meaning to our lives. We need each other because we have so much to offer each other.

Last month, when Japan's Grand Kabuki was on its very successful tour of New York, Knoxville and Washington, I was deeply gratified by the enthusiastic response—indeed, the standing ovations—that American audiences gave this unique Japanese art form. The stories were unfamiliar, the gestures and their meanings were exotic, as was the music, yet tens of thousands of Americans were enraptured. They recognized the universal values that unite the human race and are at the core of both Japanese and American culture.

The stimulating articles on Japanese culture by the recent New York Times were captioned "Culture of Japan blossoming in America" and "Things Japanese Excite Americans' Imagination," It reports "the reason given for why Japanese culture has captured the American imagination range from Japanese economic might to the success of James Clabell's "Shogun."

The tremendous success of Grand Kabuki can be seen against this background.

The first generation of Japanese Americans, your ancestors, would have been pleased and proud of those hours of deep sharing.

Now that the relationship between our two nations has attained the level of maturity and can properly be viewed in the global perspective, the bonds of friendship across the Pacific will be further strengthened with the intertwining of political, economical and cultural threads.

May I conclude my address by once again expressing my appreciation of your contributions over the past decades to the ever closer U.S.-Japan friendship and extending my very best wishes for your continued success.●

MARITIME SAFETY ACT, H.R. 7038

HON. WALTER B. JONES

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, shortly before the district work period, I introduced legislation, H.R. 7038, to promote maritime safety on the high seas and navigable waters of the United States. This legislation is the result of extensive hearings and investigations conducted by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries during the 97th Congress.

Two major marine casualties, the disappearance of the SS Poet in October 1980 and the sinking of the semisubmersible drilling vessel the Ocean Ranger in February 1982 have prompted the introduction of this measure. It is my hope that we can receive substantive input from the administration and the marine industry on the concepts put forth, and refine them for enactment during the next Congress.

The first part of the bill is a result of our hearing on the Ocean Ranger. When this vessel sank on February 14, killing 85 men, it was operating without the legally required certificate of inspection issued by the Coast Guard. Although the company was aware the certificate of inspection had expired, the Ocean Ranger continued to drill off the coast of Newfoundland for almost 2 months. The only penalty under present law for operating without a certificate of inspection is a $500 fine—hardly a financial burden on a vessel leased for approximately $100,000 per day.

The second part of H.R. 7038 stems from our hearings on the SS Poet. The SS Poet was a 522-foot cargo vessel, which was carrying 13,500 tons of corn and a crew of 34 men when it departed Philadelphia, Pa. on October 24, 1980. At some unknown time after departure, on its way to Port Said, Egypt, the SS Poet disappeared without a trace. The owner of the SS Poet did not notify the U.S. Coast Guard of his concern for the safety of his vessel and crew until he had not heard from the vessel for a full 10 days. With such a delayed notice there was scarce opportunity for the Coast Guard to assist the vessel if it had been in danger. Earlier notice by the owner to the Coast Guard may have alerted the Coast Guard in time to locate and assist the vessel.

Subsequent to the hearings on these two tragic incidents, the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee staff studied present laws and procedures in order to determine whether changes or additions to the present laws might improve maritime safety and help to prevent similar tragic accidents from occurring in the future. H.R. 7038 is a product of these studies.

H.R. 7038 is basically comprised of three sections. The first section imposes stricter requirements and penalties on shipowners, agents, or operators who operate a vessel without a valid certificate of inspection. The second section imposes a notification requirement on a shipowner, agent, or operator to report to the U.S. Coast Guard if more than 48 hours have elapsed since the owner, agent, or operator has heard from the vessel. The master is also required to report to the owner every 48 hours. Only those required to report to the U.S.-flag merchant vessel location filing system (USMER) are covered by this section. However, any vessel owner who has reason to believe his vessel is imperiled is required to notify the Coast Guard. The third section of H.R. 7038 allows the Coast Guard to investigate and act upon acts of incompetency committed by any licensed officers on vessels of the United States.

Throughout the proposed bill, civil penalties for violations of the certificate of inspection requirements are increased to match more appropriately the penalty costs with the value of today's dollar. Communication requirements between the vessel owner, master, and the U.S. Coast Guard are also proposed on the basis of new present day communications capabilities. H.R. 7038, therefore, updates some of the marine safety laws to meet today's marine environment.

The intent of H.R. 7038 is to improve the marine safety environment without imposing onerous burdens upon the industry. The law is written in a manner which will require proper oversight of a vessel's well-being and which will include adequate enforceable civil penalty provisions. However, the notice and reporting requirements are not complicated or time consuming and the penalty sections are flexible.

As chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I look forward to waorking with the administration, industry representatives, and other interested maritime groups on this bill, and I expect that progress will be made toward the betterment of marine safety throughout the world.●

REGULATORY REFORM ACT

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, with the controversies caused by issues which lend themselves to partisan rhetoric, we certainly must not overlook the long-range significance of regulatory reform.

Basically, this subject is above partisanship. Most Americans would subscribe to the principle that the less cumbersome the bureaucracy, the better.

Therefore, I call the attention of the Members to an article by Senator PAUL LAXALT on the need to enact legislation called for in the Regulatory Reform Act.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Aug. 24, 1982]

DON'T DELAY BIPARTISAN REGULATORY REFORM

(By Paul Laxalt)

During all the activity on tax and budget bills, an important bipartisan legislative effort in our campaign against inflation and against increasing consumer prices has been quietly moving forward. Unfortunately, enactment of this legislation, known as the Regulatory Reform Act, may be threatened by delay in House action on this bill as this session of Congress nears its end. Such a delay is not in the best interests of this country, and everyone should urge his congressional representative to help move this bill now.

Under the sponsorship of Senators Patrick Leahy, William Roth, Thomas Eagleton, myself, and 77 other senators, the Senate in March unanimously (94-0) passed the Regulatory Reform Act. This measure enhances our efforts to secure cleaner air and water, safe workplaces, and the like, while reducing the economic excesses of federal regulation which fuel inflation. The act achieves this by modifying the regulatory process to produce more effective regulation—regulation that will be more certain to accomplish important public goals without unnecessary economic burdens.

Since the American people strongly support regulatory reform, every sensible politician must support it. Yet legislation to achieve such reform involves complicated and highly technical issues of law and statutory drafting.

Senators Leahy, Roth, Eagleton, and I hold the relevant leadership positions on the committees responsible for regulatory reform legislation. Together, we grappled with the important details of regulatory reform. After fourteen months of drafting, revision, and compromise, we came up with a balanced package of procedural changes which we, and as it turned out the rest of our Senate colleagues, concluded was a common-sense approach to regulatory reform.

We wrote provisions in the Regulatory Reform Act that will require agencies to publicly evaluate their regulatory proposals in terms of what their likely good and bad effects will be. This not only involves the public in rule-making, but ensures that regulations will be publicly justified by what they can realistically be expected to achieve. To make agencies more accountable, we provided a limited presidential and judicial oversight of the process, circumscribed by the need to avoid endless delays and to preserve congressionally mandated policies. Finally, the full Senate added a provision to allow Congress to review agency rules.

After the Senate passed the measure, House Speaker O'Neill said he had every intention of bringing the House regulatory reform bill (HR 746) to the House floor. I applaud the Speaker's commitment to continue this bipartisan effort. Yet time is running short in this Congress to make good on this commitment. Only a few short weeks remain after the August recess before Congress adjourns for the elections. Acknowledgment of his support of this bill to Congress is now essential.

Enactment of this legislation will require that the House preserve the balanced approach of the consensus Senate bill. True bipartisan regulatory reform will die if the Speaker merely gives the House members the opportunity to vote for a watered-down regulatory reform bill just before the elections, and then presents the Senate with a weak House bill on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

From my perspective, rank-and-file House members of both parties want to be a part of the outstanding effort represented by the Senate bill, a bill carefully developed over the past four years by two administrations and bipartisan work in both houses of Congress. They recognize that, with the costs of regulation now estimated at over $100 billion a year—inflating already high consumer prices—the American public cannot afford further congressional delay.

[Paul Laxalt, Republican Senator from Nevada, is chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Regulatory Reform.]●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. LAWRENCE R. BENTLEY

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, on September 30, 1982, the Chino Valley Chamber of Commerce and the Dairy Committee of California are honoring Mr. Lawrence R. Bentley as "Special Dairy Award Winner" of the year. We would like to take this opportunity to join with the chamber and the dairy committee in honoring Mr. Bentley and commend him to the House of Representatives for his devoted community leadership and service.

Larry Bentley began his 54-year career in the dairy industry in 1928. He worked for Adohr on a home delivery route with a horse and wagon in Beverly Hills, Calif., for an excellent salary of $135 per month. Work began at 2:45 a.m. when Mr. Bentley would load the milk onto his wagon. Since the horse knew the milk route as well as Mr. Bentley did, he could often doze from the Adohr Creamery until his horse stopped in front of the first customer's house. The animal was very well behaved and did not really need to be driven. When the horse felt Mr. Bentley leave the wagon with a milk carrier full of milk, it would stop until he returned. If Larry served three or four houses in a row on foot, the horse would follow by Mr. Bentley's voice commands.

In 1932, Mr. Bentley was transferred to Westwood where part of the University of California had just been built. There Mr. Bentley delivered milk in a 1930 Model A Ford truck because houses were too far apart for the conventional use of horse and wagon.

Mr. Bentley and another Adohr driver were the first LA milkmen from a major milk company to deliver milk in the daylight hours.

In 1935 Mr. Bentley became a member of the Creamery Yellow Dog Society whch is a play group for the dairy industry. he organized the first "Dairy Fieldman" group in the Los Angeles area, which consisted of field representatives from each LA area creamery. Mr. Bentley was the first dairy chairman for the March of Dimes from 1956 to 1961 and 1 year, with the Secretary of Agriculture, Ezra Benson, as a guest, raised approximately $9,000 for that charity.

From 1949 to 1976 he was in charge of the dairy industry milking parlor at the Los Angeles County Fair and often put on cow milking, butter churning, and milk drinking contests there and at other county fairs.

Mr. Bentley was the southern director of the California Dairy Industry Association and twice served as master of ceremonies for the southern section dairy princess contest. On many occasions Mr. Bentley was the chairman of the dairy roadside appearance program and for the dairy milk flavor clinic.

From retail milk sales, Mr. Bentley went on to be a foreman, then promoted to supervisor, and finally went into production and quality control. On January 2, 1973, Mr. Bentley went to work for Alta-Dena Dairy on their quality control and has been there ever since.

In the 54 years that Mr. Bentley has been in the dairy industry, he has never missed a payday.

Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to recognize Mr. Lawrence R. Bentley today and commend him to the House of Representatives for his countless contributions to our society and the dairy industry. He is a truly fine individual who has in countless ways enhanced his community through his hours of selfless civic service.●

POLITICS AND THE PIPELINE

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, our President is correct in his stand against the Soviet gas pipeline to Europe, and our European friends are wrong in their opposition. Helping the Soviets with this pipeline does not make any sense economically or from a security point of view. The Soviets can, and will, shut off this gas supply for political reasons as they have used trade as a political weapon on previous occasions. Loaning money to the Soviets to complete this pipeline is just throwing good money after bad, to say nothing of Western participation in a project being built partially by slave labor, which includes political dissidents and those imprisoned for religious beliefs. Mr. John O'Sullivian recently summed up all these reasons in a "personal view" column in the London Daily Telegraph of August 23, 1982. I commend it to the attention of my colleagues who may still feel the President is wrong on this issue.

[From the Daily Telegraph, Aug. 23, 1982]

POLITICS AND THE PIPELINE

Curiouser and curiouser grows the dispute over the Siberian natural gas pipeline. All the politicians and commentators in Western Europe are for it, all the arguments against it. It is as if the Continent had become one vast Flat Earth Society.

To recap: First, the project is justified on the grounds of creating employment. But if we think it sensible to subsidise job creation, why not subsidise ourselves directly instead of going through the Soviet middleman? As things stand many of the jobs created will be in Siberia rather than Sunderland. And the Russians rather than ourselves will have the finished product.

Secondly, Western Europe is increasing its energy dependence on and thus its political vulnerability towards the Soviet Union far more than I suggested in an earlier column. When the pipeline is completed, the share of Europe's total energy needs (gas, coal and oil) supplied by the Soviet bloc will amount to something like one-third. I also stated last month that the Soviet Union had cut off key energy supplies for political reasons on three occasions since 1945. A correspondent corrects me. He points out that, if threats to cut off supplies are also taken into account, the accurate figure is eight times.

Those occasions were: in 1948 against Yugoslavia, in 1961 against Albania, in 1956 against Israel and Hungary, in 1962 against China, in 1968 against Czechoslovakia, in 1980 when the U.S.S.R. threatened Europe and Japan with the loss of Soviet fuel supplies if they supported United States sanctions over Afghanistan (which, significantly, they failed to do) and, finally, last year when the Politburo threatened to cut off Poland's oil supply unless Solidarity were crushed.

Thirdly, the pipeline is a vast foreign aid project whereby a consortium of European banks and companies will provide a well-armed and hostile power with government-guaranteed low-interest loans. This makes no sense at all. This is also worth bearing in mind when you next hear one of the European heads of government criticise the Reagan Administration for policies that keep interest rates high. Nothing is better designed to push up interest rates than borrowing $15 billion at 15 per cent, from the capital markets in order to lend it at a mere 8 per cent, to the Soviets. Yet that is what the French and West German Governments are doing.

Finally, the project's advocates overlook various alternatives which lack the political drawbacks of the Siberian pipeline, such as: Norway's natural gas reserves, American coal reserves (which could supply at least one third of West Europe's energy needs). And even the Nigerian pipeline which could absorb capital and engineering skills at least equal to those required by the Siberian pipeline.

What arguments are there on the other side? Only the petulant complaint that, if President Reagan is opposed to the pipeline, what right has he to sell the Russians grain. With the substance of this criticism I agree. But the European governments support the grain sales in public. If Mr. Reagan is inconsistent and only half-right, they are splendidly consistent and wholly wrong. And anyway, to slit one's wrists because Mr. Reagan has shot himself in the foot is hardly repartee.

In short, the West Europeans have risen above politics, economics, strategy and simple prudence in their decision to go ahead with the pipeline. What inspires them? Is it perhaps an idealistic vision that commerce will lead to peace and international understanding?

Their idealism, if so, will have to be armour-plated in view of the growing evidence that slave labour, including political prisoners, and Vietnamese indentured labour are being used in the pipeline's construction.

The International Association for Human Rights, based in West Germany, announced in June that they had received reports from contacts in the Soviet Union that more and more prisoners sentenced to hard labour were being used to construct the Siberian gas pipeline.

"A number of well-known political prisoners," the statement went on, "have likewise been forced into labouring on (it)." Among them were a psychiatrist, a Ukrainian writer, two Civil Rights activists and two Baptist ministers.

Hard labour camps have been set up along the route of the pipeline, prisoners are housed in wagons which offer little protection from the elements in areas where winter temperatures reach lows of −30 to −40 degrees centigrade, they are transported daily to and from the construction sites under the watch of guard dogs.

How do we know that such reports are true? It is, of course, impossible to be absolutely certain when dealing with a totalitarian society which attempts to enforce complete control of news and information. But there are certain common sense guidelines.

To begin with, the use of slave labour in major construction projects is quite standard in the Soviet Union. In the construction of the White Sea Canal in the 1930s, over a quarter of a million slave workers perished. And as late as the 1970s, concentration camp labour was employed to build the Baikal Amur railway along the Chinese border.

Even so, the Soviet Union is still short of labour for such projects. Last year, Mr. Brezhnev delivered a speech in which he stated that the U.S.S.R. needed 400,000 additional workers to develop new oil and gas fields in Western Siberia.

This perhaps explains the import of Vietnamese labour into the Soviet Union. The Soviets naturally argue that importing Vietnamese labour is a foreign aid programme of technical training, that the workers are well-paid, and that they live in pleasant climates where "melons and watermelons grow" (ISVESTIA).

Reports by refugees and some letters from concentration camps, where former South Vietnamese army officers are "re-educated," tell a different story. These suggest that such prisoners are being, in effect, transported to Siberia for hard labour.

Again, are such stories from such sources believable? An argument on what point is now raging within the American State Department. But it is worth remembering that similar reports by Cambodian refugees about the genocide in their country in 1975, widely disregarded at the time, turned out to be the plain truth.

Of course, there are civilian Vietnamese going to the U.S.S.R. as well. Is their departure voluntary? Some Western diplomats believe so, arguing that Siberia is actually quite attractive compared to the spartan conditions of Vietnam now that the American oppressors have been driven out.

But what are the conditions to which they are going? They are separated from their families for two periods of three years, and they receive only 40 per cent, of an already low wage, the remainder going to the Soviet Government in payment of the Vietnamese war-debt of $1.6 billion.

I am certainly prepared to believe in the hideousness of Communist Vietnam. But if its citizens prefer Siberia, separation from their families and very low wages to remaining at home, conditions there must be, quite literally, unbelievably bad. You may prefer, as I do, to believe that the Vietnamese who go to the U.S.S.R. do not do so of their own free will.●

THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF SOUTH PLAINFIELD VOLUNTEER FIRE DEPARTMENT

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the honor of participating in Labor Day festivities in the borough of South Plainfield, N.J., commemorating the 75th anniversary of the founding of the South Plainfield Volunteer Fire Department.

The borough is most proud of this dedicated force and rightly so. Beginning with just a hose cart that had to be pulled by hand for several years, the company established a tradition of outstanding community service that has been maintained throughout its 75-year history.

Today, the volunteer company houses eight engines, including an aerial ladder truck, two power wagons, and several pumpers.

Most important, however, are the individuals who volunteer their time, their skills, and their courage to protect the security and safety of their fellow residents.

The members of the South Plainfield Volunteer Fire Department—past and present—symbolize the best in community service and commitment. We owe a huge debt of gratitude to these individuals and the members of the volunteer fire companies across the Nation who do so much to enhance our quality of life.

On the occasion of their 75th anniversary, and on behalf of our congressional district, I would like to offer the members of the South Plainfield Volunteer Fire Department our humble and profound thanks for a job well done.●

REPORTER CLOSING A BLOW TO OUR COMMUNITY

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, On August 25, 1982, the Los Angeles Reporter, a weekly newspaper in my district for nearly a half century, published its last issue. The death of a community institution such as the Reporter is an event of major importance to the people whose lives it touches. The following statement, which reflects my personal feelings, was printed on the front page of the final Reporter.

Though I have never had any financial interest or managerial role in the Waxman Reporter Publications, these papers have played a role in my life since earliest childhood.

As a youngster, I took tremendous pride in what my late Uncle, Al S. Waxman, and my Aunt Ruth had accomplished for our community. Many of my own feelings about the Democratic Party and progressive government came directly either from the paper or from my aunt and uncle.

The Reporter Publications began in Boyle Heights as the "Eastside Journal." In those days the Los Angeles Times was not the first-rate, balanced, nationally recognized paper it is today. Years ago, the Times was a narrow, partisan, reactionary publication whose news columns were often as blatantly slanted as its editorials. Most of the other papers were no better. My uncle stood up against the Times and every other right-wing force—no matter how big.

The Waxman Publications were resolute in support of the Democratic Party, the trade union movement (in a town which was known as ferociously anti-labor), ethnic minorities—Blacks, Jews, and Latinos—who were the victims of an openly prejudiced power elite. My aunt, Ruth Waxman Faierman, worked on the paper for an incredible 48 years. At one time or another, she personally handled every task required to publish the paper.

After my uncle's untimely passing, many were skeptical about the future of the Reporter Publications. Their doubts were unjustified. As long as was humanly possible, Ruth Waxman Faierman saw to it that the paper came out every week. She maintained the high standards she and my uncle had held to all through the years. The news columns were open to every charity, every political group, and every candidate with a legitimate message for the community. Elected officials like myself were given free space each week to report to our constituents.

Over the years many voters came to count on the Reporter Publications for election advice. Everyone knew that candidates endorsed by my uncle or aunt, or ballot propositions approved by them, reflected their values of integrity, compassion and commitment to human rights.

The demise of the Reporter Publications creates a vacuum which will probably never be filled. Without the Reporter it will be almost impossible for local officeholders, churches, temples, and neighborhood merchants to communicate with people in a limited geographical area. The metropolitan dailies will not print the schedule of bingo games for the City of Hope, nor will they announce the opening of a new store on Fairfax Avenue. Certainly, they will pay no attention to such neighborhood problems as an unsafe intersection or homeowners who feel a business establishment is violating their rights to peace and privacy.

I salute Ruth Faierman for all she has done for our community over a half century. I wish her and her husband, Neach Faierman, good health. I very much hope that my aunt will continue to be actively involved in community affairs. We all stand to benefit enormously from her sincerity, integrity, intelligence and talent.●

NFL PLAYERS ASSOCIATION STRIKE

HON. PHILLIP BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, as we are all aware there is a very real possibility that the football season might be interrupted by a strike this year. I think we can all agree that this would be most unfortunate. It is my great hope that the NFL and the NFL Players Association will be successful in arriving at a satisfactory collective bargaining agreement.

Bills currently pending before Congress dealing with an antitrust exemption for the NFL has already involved us in some of the issues facing professional football today. I am confident that we will not act hastily in this area especially when the league and the union are involved in intense negotiations.

I am including in the RECORD today a recent article concerning the problems faced by the players and the league.

The article written by Dave Kindred appeared in the Washington Post on August 20, 1982:

PLANTATION MENTALITY NOT HELPING NFL OWNERS

If the pro football players go on strike, it is the owners' fault. The owners have botched this. Call them arrogant, call them imperious, call them fools.

The 28 owners have a money machine cranking out millions of dollars, even billions. Yet these totalitarians who would take urine samples of players, who would fine players for shaking hands, who would deny players the right to work where they want to—these owners would throw sand into the gears of their money machine before they would do the right thing for the players who make the machine turn so smoothly.

The right thing is to treat the players as valued employes with legitimate complaints. As baseball owners learned in a senseless half-summer of a strike, there is nothing to be gained any more by treating professional athletes as indentured servants who ought to be grateful for any scraps from the massah's table. The courts have ruled for players, and against leagues, in virtually every freedom-issue case over the last decade. The tide is running against the plantation owners, and they'll be in over their heads soon if they don't do the right thing.

The right thing at this moment is to get back to the negotiating table with the players union representatives. Out of obstructionism, the owners' negotiators refuse to meet the union people at a training camp site. If they have to meet at midfield during a Redskins scrimmage in Carlisle, the owners' men should do it. By the petty fining of last week, by the refusal even to negotiate, the football owners are repeating the baseball mistake of welding the players' union into a clenched fist.

Once upon a time, the football players may have been divided about a strike. Two months ago, they may not have been sold on Ed Garvey's percentage-of-gross concept. But the owners offered the players no alternative plan. And now the sense—at this typewriter, anyway—is that the players are willing to strike in support of Garvey's plan if for no other reason than it is the only one anybody has proposed.

The players properly perceive management's refusal to offer a realistic plan as evidence the owners believe the union will crumble on its own. Such perception has made the union stronger. By doing nothing, the owners did a lot—for the union.

It is a fact, of course, that the owners have submitted a counterproposal to Garvey's idea that the players should get 55 percent of all money taken in. But because the owners consider Garvey's plan an insult, they replied in kind. The owners' proposal is a microscopically improved version of the current compensation system that has shackled players to their teams and kept salaries below the levels to which they would rise in a free market.

The owners should come to the bargaining table with a new proposal. Somewhere between Garvey's percentage-of-gross idea and the chaos of total freedom (even we romantics acknowledge the need for some restraints in sports), there ought to be a middle ground.

On a shelf in Garvey's office, there is a foot-square block of stone.

Etched into the stone is a percentage sign.

Chances are, although Garvey is too stubborn to admit it, he would be happy to hear a proposal from the owners that would enable him to turn that stone around and carve a dollar sign in the other side. And chances are the owners, who have acknowledged that the players are underpaid, would go a long way with any proposal that raised salaries without tying the raises to a fixed percentage of gross.

So why doesn't someone suggest something?

At the moment, the National Football League doesn't suggest anything because it has a leadership crisis. Every time it goes into court, it comes out a loser. It lost every round in federal court to Al Davis and then, in a demonstration of unmitigated gall, went to the Congress of the United States asking for legislation to reverse that court's decision.

Earlier, the foundering lords of football missed their opportunity to divide the players' union by not giving dissident players an alternative proposal before the union's March convention. Lately, the league commissioner, Pete Rozelle, has come to Congress with an antitrust exemption bill that, if passed would be followed, he said, by expansion of the league.

Rozelle has admitted that such expansion teams were "dangling" before the eyes of influential senators. This is the sort of dangling that politicians interpret as a payoff. You give me my new law, we give you a football team. Rozelle smoothly denied any such connection.

The commissioner was not so smooth Monday on Capitol Hill. Under fire from Strom Thurmond, the crustly old South Carolina Republican whose state neither has nor lusts for pro football, Rozelle said the league needed legislation because it would be impossible to draw up guidelines on when a team could leave a city.

You couldn't pin it on how they have done financially, Rozelle began.

"They would . . . That can be juggled. A team can arrange its figures in a way to show losses for several straight years."

Had Garvey stuck bamboo shoots under Rozelle's shining nails, he could not have elicited a more helpful quotation. It long has been Garvey's contention that owners aren't telling the whole truth about money, and now comes Rozelle saying figures "can be juggled."

With leadership so bewildered it gives this kind of comfort to its adversary, the NFL is headed for a strike that doesn't have to happen. It is time for the owners to make a conciliatory gesture to the players, to offer a plan that is more than a sarcastic reply to an insult from Garvey.

They offer free agency to all players after three seasons. Garvey says free agency won't work because teams will not bid on players, there being (in his estimation) no economic incentive to win under the lazy comforts of the NFL's share-the-wealth socialism. To guarantee that free agency works, Garvey should demand binding arbitration contract disputes; if a player asks for $500,000 a year and the team offers $200,000, a neutral arbitrator should decide the issue.

There should be no compensation rules at all. The right of first refusal, under which the NBA and NHL work, is safeguard enough if a team wants to keep its quality players.

All this may not increase the salaries of undistinguished right guards as much as Garvey's 55 percent plan would. But with free agency, right of first refusal and binding arbitration, football players soon enough would be paid what they're worth.●

HONORING MR. FRED TROOST, DAIRYMAN OF THE YEAR

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize one of the truly fine men in my congressional district who is a shining example of the American success story, Mr. Fred Troost.

A native of Iowa, Mr. Troost moved to Artesia, Calif., where he began his dairy business with 120 milking cows. Through hard work and perseverance, his business grew to 800 cows on 130 acres in Mira Loma, Calif., where it has become a family enterprise.

A community leader, Mr. Troost has been a member of various local civic organizations. He served as president of the board of education of Bellflower Christian Schools for 2 years and served an additional 6 years as a member of the board. Mr. Troost served 9 years on the board of education of Ontario Christian School, 3 as president. He devoted many hours in helping the elderly through his service on the Board of Inland Home for the Aged where he was chairman for 2 years. He was a member of the city council of Dairy Valley, now known as Cerritos, for 6 years, and served 1 year as mayor. One of the highlights of his public service career was working as mayor of Artesia for 1 year. In addition, Mr. Troost was on the city council of Artesia for 6 years.

His leadership in dairy-related organizations has greatly benefited the dairy industry. Mr. Troost was a member of the board and past chairman of the Milk Producers Council in Artesia and Ontario for the past 15 years. On the State level, he served as a member of the board of the League of California Milk Producers for 8 years, 2 years as vice chairman. Under the Gonsalves Milk Pooling Act, Mr. Troost administered the law as chairman and member of the California Producer Review Board. He was State representative for the Animal Health Committee and representative to the Milk Advisory Board dealing with animal health research.

Mr. Troost and his lovely wife, Anne, are the parents of 6 children and the grandparents of 15.

Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to recognize Mr. Fred Troost today and commend him to the House of Representatives for his countless contributions to all segments of our society. He is living proof that the American dream is alive and well in our country today.●

ALL THE UMP TRIED TO DO WAS CALL A PERFECT GAME

HON. TOM BEVILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents from the Fourth District of Alabama, Mr. G. V. Timmons, of Carrollton, Ala., recently sent me an article from the Birmingham Post-Herald, which I would like to share with my colleagues.

It deals with Little League Baseball, but also has an important lesson for all of us in how to live life.

ALL THE UMP TRIED TO DO WAS CALL A PERFECT GAME

(By Dave Johnson)

EVANSVILLE, IND.— During a Little League game in Evansville recently, fans and umpires got into a shouting match over some questionable calls during a game between two teams of 9- to 12-year-olds.

"It was pretty ugly," one witness said. "The kids heard some pretty filthy language."

What happened to Donald Jensen 10 years ago this baseball season still serves as a reminder of what can happen when winning becomes more important than anything else.

Jensen was struck in the head by a thrown bat while umpiring a boy's Little League game in Terre Haute.

He continued to work the game, but afterward a doctor order him into the hospital for observation. While there, Jensen wrote the following letter.

"Dear parent of a Little Leaguer:

"I am an umpire. I don't do it for a living, but only on Saturdays and Sundays for fun.

". . . I've played the game, coached it and watched it. But, somehow, nothing takes the place of umpiring. Maybe it's because I feel deep down that I'm providing a fair chance for all the kids to play the game without disagreements and arguments.

"With all the fun I've had, there still is something that bothers me about my job. Some of you folks don't understand why I'm there. Some of you feel I'm there to exert authority over your son. For that reason, you often yell at me when I make a mistake, or encourage your son to say things that hurt my feelings.

"How many of you really understand that I try to be perfect? I try not to make mistakes. I don't want your son to feel he got a bad deal from an umpire.

"Yet, no matter how hard I try, I can't be perfect.

"I've counted the number of calls I made in a six-inning game today. The total number of decisions, whether on bases and balls or safes and outs, was 146.

"I tried my best to get them all right, but I'm sure I missed some. When I figured my percentage on paper, I could have missed eight calls and still got about 95 percent of the calls right. In most occupations, that percentage would be considered excellent. If I were in school, I would receive an 'A' for sure. But your demands are higher than that.

"Let me tell you more about my game today.

". . . There was one real close call that ended the game. A runner for the home team was trying to steal home to a passed ball. The catcher chased the ball down and threw to the pitcher covering the plate. The pitcher made the tag and I called the runner out.

"As I was taking off my equipment and getting ready to leave, I overheard one of the parents comment: 'It's to bad the kids have to lose games because of rotten umpires. That was one of lousiest calls I've ever seen.'

"Later, at the concession stand, a couple of the kids were telling their friends, 'Boy, the umpires were lousy today. They lost the game for us.'

". . . The purpose of Little League is to teach baseball skills to young men. Obviously, a team which does not play well in a given game, yet is given the opportunity to blame that loss on an umpire for one call or two, is being given the chance to take all responsibility for the loss from its shoulders.

"A parent or adult leader who permits the young player to blame his failures on an umpire, regardless of the quality of the umpire, is doing the worst kind of injustice to that youngster. Rather than learning responsibility, such an attitude is fostering an improper outlook toward the ideals of the game itself. This irresponsibility is bound to carry over to future years.

"As I sit here writing this letter, I am no longer as upset as I was this afternoon. This afternoon, I wanted to quit umpiring. But, fortunately, my wife reminded me of another situation that occurred last week.

"I was umpiring behind the plate for a pitcher who pantomimed his displeasure at any call on a borderline pitch that was not in his team's favor. One could sense he wanted the crowd to realize he was a fine, talented player who was doing his best to get along, but that I was a black-hearted villain who was working against him.

"This kid continued for two innings, while at the same time yelling at his own players who dared to make a mistake. For two innings, the manager watched this. When the kid returned to the dugout to bat in the top of the third, the manager called him aside.

"In a loud enough voice that I was able to overhear, the lecture went like this: 'Listen, son, it is time you make a decision. You can be an umpire, an actor, or a pitcher. But you can only be one at a time when you are playing for me. Right now, it is your job to pitch. And you are basically doing a lousy job.

"Leave the acting to the actors, the umpiring to the umpires, or you won't do any pitching here. Now, what is it going to be?"

"The kid chose the pitching route and went on to win the game. When the game was over, the kid followed me to my car. Fighting his hardest to keep back the tears, he apologized for his actions and thanked me for umpiring his game. He said he had learned a lesson that he would never forget.

"I can't help but wonder how many more fine young men are missing their chance to develop into outstanding ballplayers because their parents encourage them to spend time umpiring, rather than working harder to play the game as it should be played."

The following morning, Donald Jensen died of a brain concussion.●

VALERY LERNER

HON. JAMES L. NELLIGAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. NELLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to point out to my colleagues the plight of Valery Lerner, a Soviet Jew who has been repressed by the totalitarian regime in the U.S.S.R.

Lerner's parents and brother emigrated to Israel in 1971. At that time, Lerner and his wife and son also decided to leave the U.S.S.R. for Israel in order to keep the Lerner family together. During this time, Lerner was employed as an engineer and economist in the finance and planning department of a tool factory. He resigned from this position when he and his wife applied for an exit visa to Israel in order to avoid a rejection based on the confidential nature of the position.

In 1976, after waiting the required 5 years from his resignation date at the factory job, Lerner and his wife applied for a permit to go to Israel. They were denied the permit.

Eleven years have passed since Lerner and his wife began attempts to emigrate to Israel. Lerner's numerous appeals to various Soviet authorities have been in vain, and he and his wife have since been dismissed from their jobs.

The situation for Soviet Jewry is desperate. Along with 46 of my colleagues, I have joined the 97th Congressional Class for Soviet Jewry, which aims to recognize the plight of Prisoners of Conscience who are seeking to emigrate from the Soviet Union. Despite the fact that the Soviets are a signatory to the Helsinki accords, they have been flagrant in their violation of human rights. I believe it is important to bring this tragic case to the attention of my colleagues.●

HON. ANTHONY TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, my friend and colleague MERV DYMALLY is today introducing legislation essential to the future development of American technology. I am honored to be joining Representative DYMALLY, and my Connecticut colleague in the Senate, CHRIS DODD, in this effort to increase science and mathematics literacy in our Nation.

The National Science and Mathematics Teachers Development Act is designed to promote such literacy through providing continuing education opportunities for secondary school science and math teachers who need to improve current skills and qualifications in those areas. I have heard from scores of school administrators in Connecticut on the desperate need for qualified science and math teachers in our State's secondary schools. It is reported that some 50 percent of the Nation's newly hired secondary school science and math teachers are not qualified to teach in these areas. Without such qualified teachers, how can science and math literacy be conveyed to our children—our hope for a future of increased national productivity and economic security?

The time to prepare for the future is now. Reports of the growing science gap in the United States are legion and we must begin to reverse this ominous downward trend now. The link between an educated populace and a healthy economy is clear. Ironically, the administration is cutting back on support for public education and research, exacerbating our future ability to compete in the world technological market.

When I testified before the Postsecondary Education Subcommittee this spring on the administration's proposed education cuts, I noted the warnings sounded by two eminent members of the science and education communities. I think it is worth repeating their remarks today, for they have a very significant bearing on the need to promote technological literacy in our secondary schools and institutions of higher education. Columbia University President Michael I. Sovern stated, in the New York Times Magazine (February 7, 1982):

> Our foreign trade pattern resembles that of an underdeveloped country: we export raw materials in abundance and import more manufactured goods than we sell abroad. All this cannot be isolated from the fact that over the past 15 years, Japan and West Germany have doubled their output of scientists and engineers.
> Tolerance of this erosion of our ability to compete in the world runs counter both to the Reagan agenda and to a long and wise tradition. Since World War II, the Government has pursued a bipartisan policy rooted in the recognition that the nation's well-being depends on a national commitment to the quality of its universities. Federal support produced the rapid growth of graduate schools and the consequent surge to international pre-eminence of American university research. The federal government has recognized that scientific and technological competitions with other nations are won or lost on American campuses.

D. Allen Bromley, a nuclear physicist and president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science put the issue this way, in the Hartford Courant (January 27, 1982):

> We have the urgent problem of developing scientific literacy on the part of our citizenry. Over 80 percent of our citizens receive their last exposure, if any, to mathematics and science during their high schools years. In a society, such as ours, of growing technological sophistication where the questions of consequence increasingly have scientific and technological aspects, if our public cannot at least appreciate the nature of these issues, quite apart from contributing to their resolution, they inevitably will tend to become alienated from the society.

It is clear to me that the pressing need in the Nation for skilled workers requires a solution at the high school level; we must staff our schools with teachers qualified in the science and mathematics areas. By providing teachers with full-time summer workshops and part-time weekend yearly programs to improve educational skills in science and math, as today's legislation does, we will help insure a continuum of technological advancement in the U.S.

The health of our economy demands this response. The Dymally-Dodd legislation represent a wise investment in our future, one which will aid not only industrial productivity but our national security. The cost of this legislation is modest—an authorization level of $30 million in fiscal year 1984. Considering its potential, however, this investment could reap vast cost-savings in future years. The Defense Science Board Task Force has concluded that a continuing shortage of skilled labor is a major factor in the spiraling costs and increased leadtime required to complete defense contracts.

So let us move now to secure technological literacy among our citizenry in the years to come. The National Science and Mathematics Teachers Development Act is essential to this goal.●

THE WAR AGAINST DRUNK DRIVERS

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, in the September 13 issue of Newsweek magazine, there appeared an in-depth article on drunk driving which is must reading for every concerned American. According to the reporters, 52,600 Americans have died at the hands of drunk drivers during the past 2 years—more than were killed in Vietnam in combat over 11 years. Over the past decade, a staggering one-quarter of 1 million Americans have perished on the Nation's highways as a result of drunk driving. On the average, about 3 Americans are killed and 80 injured by drunk drivers every hour of every day. Alcohol-related crashes are by far the single biggest killer of Americans between the ages of 16 and 24. The steps currently being undertaken in the several States and nationwide to combat this senseless slaughter on our highways is the subject of this excellent article which I should at this time like to submit for the RECORD.

THE WAR AGAINST DRUNK DRIVERS

The horror of those seconds will forever haunt Cindy Ferguson. She was driving her three sons—the identical twins Tommy and Tony and her baby, Lee—to a party, when suddenly her Vega was smashed from behind. A tremendous explosion hurled her, Tony and Lee onto the street. Cindy raced back to the car and pulled Tommy's burning body from the wreck, throwing herself on him to smother the flames. A friend, Steve Willoughby, remained trapped inside, screaming, a halo of fire encircling his face. As Cindy lay there on top of her son, the other driver approached her. But when she pleaded for help, he staggered away.

Willoughby, 20, and Lee Ferguson, two, died on that Memphis street. Tommy, five, was in critical condition for six months with burns over 65 percent of his body. He has lost almost all use of his kidneys and most of his hearing. He has had 100 operations already and faces 14 years of reconstructive surgery.

The other driver suffered a broken nose. Despite at least seven drunk-driving arrests in four years, he had never spent a day in jail. His 5- to 10-year sentence for second-degree murder provided little solace for Mrs. Ferguson. But her nightmare was primarily responsible for Tennessee passing one of the toughest drunk-driving laws in the nation—despite concerns that it would overcrowd the courts and prisons. "I was more concerned," said state Sen. Curtis Person, its sponsor, "about the overcrowding of hospitals, morgues and cemeteries."

Drunk driving is a national epidemic, what one reformer calls America's "socially accepted form of murder" (chart, page 37). More Americans have died at the hands of drunk drivers during the past two years than were killed in Vietnam; on average, about three Americans are killed and 80 are injured by drunk drivers every hour of every day. The drunken slaughter over the past decade is a staggering one-quarter of a million Americans—the entire population of Rochester, N.Y. Safety experts say that one out of two Americans will be victimized by a drunk driver in his lifetime, hardly surprising when the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) contends that up to 10 percent of all drivers on weekend nights are legally intoxicated.

But finally, outraged Americans are trying to put an end to the carnage. In a major break with past public policy, which concentrated on highway-safety conditions and protective devices such as air bags, a coast-to-coast crusade aims at getting drunk drivers themselves off the roads. A recent Gallup poll indicated that fully 77 percent of all Americans support mandatory prison sentences even for first-time offenders. President Reagan has declared the campaign a national priority, and Congress is considering bills that would award money to states that crack down.

FAILED EXPERIMENT

Already 27 state legislatures this year have passed their own versions of the toughest drunk-driving bill in the nation, and more legislation is pending in others. Twenty states have boosted the legal drinking age, reversing a Vietnam-era trend toward lower drinking ages that made alcohol-related crashes by far the single biggest killer of Americans between the ages of 16 and 24. In New Jersey the average number of persons killed annually by 18- to 20-year-old drivers climbed by 176 percent after the state lowered its drinking age to 18. "Statistics have shown us that kids can't handle alcohol," says New Jersey state Sen. C. Louis Bassano, sponsor of a bill to raise the drinking age to 21. "It's an experiment that has failed."

Liquor is so integrated into the nation's social and economic fabric that until recently, drinking and driving was an almost untouchable political issue. But the drunk driver who kills isn't usually the social drinker who has had one beer too many (box, page 36). The NHTSA reports that the average blood alcohol concentration of a drinking driver killed in a crash is .20—twice the rate for legal intoxication in most states. Still, judges, juries, prosecutors and legislators, most of whom drink socially, have tended to view the drunk driver with "there but for the grace of God, go I" sympathy (page 38). The result: loopholed laws that have been cumbersome to enforce, wholesale plea bargaining (California charged only 5,000 people with reckless driving in 1978, but permitted 80,000 drivers to plead guilty to it) and judgments of the lecture-and-slap-on-the-wrist variety (Idaho arrested 1,800 persons for drunk driving last year, convicted one-third of them and jailed just two). Explains NHTSA administrator Raymond Peck, "The well-scrubbed father of four standing before the judge doesn't look anything like the falling-down drunk that was pulled out of the wreck."

TIME BOMBS

America's tacit acceptance of drinking and driving has the effect of loosing time bombs on the nation's highways. An example was a Georgia man who, after his 13th conviction for driving while drunk, was sentenced to just one year in prison. Thus, he was drunk and on the road again 20 months later when he crashed and killed himself. Or consider the case of William Rowan. Rowan was once sentenced to 45 days in jail, a mild penance for a California driving record that carried six convictions for drunk or reckless driving, two for hit and run. Last March, after leaving a downtown Santa Ana bar, Rowan drove onto a sidewalk, killing four-year-old David Gunderman, who was waiting for the ice-cream man. After hitting the child, Rowan slumped in his seat and lit a cigar. Police measured his blood alcohol content at .27.

Campaigns against drunk driving have always had sobering truths on their side; what they lacked was a real constituency. All that may have changed one spring afternoon in 1980, when 13-year-old Cari Lightner of Fair Oaks, Calif., was struck from behind and killed by a hit-and-run driver as she walked to a church carnival. Cari's mother was stunned to learn that the driver, a 47-year-old man who had two previous drunk-driving convictions and was out on bail on a third arrest, had spent only two days in jail previously and was unlikely to wind up there for killing Cari. Candy Lightner quit her real-estate job and launched Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD), giving the public outcry against drunk driving the constituency it has always needed—the victims.

In the past, says Edward Kunec, a NASA official who joined MADD in Virginia after his 20-year-old son was killed by a drunk driver last summer, "people who had these tragedies closeted themselves and said it was fate or the will of the Lord. Now people are coming out of the closet—and they are angry." In just two years, MADD has grown to 83 chapters in 29 states. Remove Intoxicated Drivers-USA (RID), founded in New York under similarly tragic circumstances, went national last year and now boasts 55 chapters in 29 states. The anger that is the movement's glue has made these organizations aggressively self-righteous and militant. "You can't be too strident," explains RID national coordinator Doris Aiken. "I don't know how you can tell someone nicely that they are incompetent to drive." Aiken warns those who view this campaign as a fad that will soon fade: "The pendulum will not swing back. There is an endless supply of victims."

The legal system often transforms the victims' grief into outrage. Paul Lawler, 15, died five days after a van barreled off a Massachusetts highway and into a restaurant entrance, pinning him against the restaurant wall. The drunk at the wheel was on probation for his third drunk-driving conviction. He was sentenced to four and a half years in prison—including the then maximum of two and half years for vehicular homicide—and is eligible for parole next July, just two years after the accident. "I was under the impression anyone arrested for this kind of thing would have the book thrown at him," says Paul's mother, Carol

Lasler, who now heads the Greater Boston chapter of MADD. "I didn't know vehicular homicide was a misdemeanor."

Mark and Bonnie Schuett turned the death of their four-year-old daughter, Kelly, who was killed as she walked near her home in quiet Ixonia, Wis., into a statewide cause cèlèbre. The driver, a 29-year-old man with a prior drunk-driving arrest, pleaded no contest to driving while intoxicated and was given a suspended five-day jail sentence and fined $284. His license was revoked for a year—but was actually restored after 90 days because he took treatment at an alcohol-abuse center. "This man got away with hitting and killing my child," says Mrs. Schuett. "Her life means more than a $284 fine." As a result of the Schuett's lobbying effort, a new Wisconsin law went into effect last May that permits the state to suspend the license of anyone arrested for an alcohol-related driving offense—even before a trial. "Maybe we've saved somebody else's life," says Mrs. Schuett. "But I'm still angry."

GUILT

If anger fuels the movement, guilt is its motor oil. Thomas and Dorothy Sexton recall going to court to witness the trial of the man whose blood alcohol content was .26 when he killed the Sextons' 15-year-old son, Tom. They saw a car thief sentenced to two years in jail, while their son's killer—who pleaded guilty to homicide by a motor vehicle—was sentenced to two years' probation and fined $200. "We painfully relate our experience and say, 'If you don't want that to happen to you, let's do something'," says Sexton, a U.S. Department of Agriculture scientist who is now active in Maryland's MADD chapter. "I'm convinced if I had been involved in something like this five years ago, Tom would be alive today."

The movement's approach to the drunk-driving problem is essentially punitive. While legislation varies from state to state, it usually makes driving with .10 blood alcohol content (three beers or glasses of wine or shots of whisky consumed by a 150-pound man in two hours) a crime. In addition, many of the new laws makes prison mandatory, if not for the first offense, certainly for the second. They often increase penalties for drivers who refuse the blood alcohol test and require that all convictions—regardless of the court disposition—be listed on a driver's record.

Many states are delighted by the preliminary results of the new laws. In Maryland, drunk-driving arrests by state police have gone up 45 percent and highway fatalities down almost 20 percent since its law went into effect. Maine, which last year began mandatory jail sentences for first-time offenders, has experienced a 47 percent reduction in alcohol-related fatalities. Oregon has had the most experience—its crackdown began in 1971—and the most success. During the '70s, highway fatalities dropped 6 percent and Oregon's fatality rate declined 35 percent despite the presence of 46 percent more drivers and 62 percent more vehicles on the road.

Success may be due to more than tough laws. Oregon has coupled its legal effort with a media campaign that urges Oregonians to report drunk drivers to a special telephone hot line. One hot-line spokesman is Donny Durrant, a former logger who had lost his license four times for drunk driving before he drove off the road at 85 mph and broke his neck. Durrant, now a quadriplegic, says in a TV message: "I wish someone had gotten me off the road before I had the accident which drastically changed my life."

Other states are backing their legislation with a variety of programs. South Dakota places highway signs reading, "X marks the spot . . . think!" at the almost 600 locations where drivers have lost their lives since 1979. Some states have considered efforts to stigmatize the drunk driver publicly. One Pennsylvania legislator proposed a special red license plate for all drivers convicted of driving while intoxicated—a modern-day scarlet letter. Local police in both Maryland and Massachusetts have gone so far as to use roadblocks, called "sobriety checkpoints," to deter and detect drunk drivers, though the Massachusetts effort has been ruled unconstitutional by a state court. Many states, however, complain that the new laws overtax their increasingly limited resources. Maine was the only state to include in its crackdown legislative package a new tax on liquor, which is expected to produce $2 million to $3 million annually that will be earmarked for treatment and prevention of alcohol problems.

COURT WATCH

The anti-drunk-driving campaigners are pressuring the courts as well as the legislators. One such group keeps constant watch in North Carolina's Forsyth County District Traffic Court. "People walk up to us and tell us things have changed," says Sandra Nicastro, one of the group's court fixtures. "Lawyers have told their clients, 'I don't think I can get you off this time because that lady's sitting there listening'." Some judges need little encouragement to get tough. Maine judges have meted out an average jail sentence of eight days to drunk drivers under the state's new laws—four time the permitted minimum. And a Mecklenburg County, N.C., judge may have set a new standard when he sentenced a drunk driver, who had eight prior arrests but had caused no injuries, to three years in jail.

Many safety experts insist crusaders should be focusing on automobiles and highways, not on drivers. H. Laurence Ross, a sociology professor at State University of New York at Buffalo, who has studied crackdowns on drunk driving, says deterrence only works for the short term when the problem is treated as a moral one rather than a safety question. In a new book, he writes: "A vehicle and highway that are safe for an alcohol-influenced driver are also safe for a driver who has a heart attack, who dozes off, who drops a lighted cigarette on his lap, who fails to see a stop sign. . . ."

Others are convinced that the lock-'em-up approach is meaningless unless it's combined with therapy. "I don't think the tougher laws will stop the hard-core alcoholics," says Col. Tom Anderson, director of the state police in Alaska, which has had a mandatory prison law since 1978. "It's a mess," agrees Arthur Snowden II, director of the state's court system. "We're just putting people in high-priced jails . . . just taking them off the street is not going to solve the problem." But Maryland district court Judge David Bates thinks he knows the solution. Bates gives drunk drivers the maximum permissible sentence, then waives it if they are willing to enter an appropriate education or treatment program. While it is hard to measure the success of Bates' approach because probationary sentences weren't included on drivers' records until last year, Bates says only 149 of the 5,697 drivers referred to the program dropped out or had their probation revoked.

But putting drunks behind bars does take them off the road in a way revoking their licenses never did. Many of those convicted in the past simply drove without a license. Others easily obtained licenses in other states: a Federal Highway Administration study reported that Ohio in 1977 had issued 1.3 million more licenses than there were driving-age Ohioans. Clarence Busch, who inadvertently launched MADD when he killed Cari Lightner, moved to Wisconsin last fall and obtained a license within a few days. The National Driver Register, a computerized roster of drivers whose licenses have been suspended, revoked or denied, was established in 1960 to remedy such problems. But states can communicate with it only by mail, and with 84,000 inquiries coming in daily, the system is cumbersome and slow.

NO QUESTIONS ASKED

Still, there are signs of reform that just a few years ago would have been unimaginable. One is Students Against Drunk Drivers (SADD), which began as a high-school project in suburban Wayland, Mass., and has been replicated already by students in 150 other schools. In Wayland, 900 students signed SADD contracts with their parents, promising to call home at any hour when a sober ride home is not available. In return, parents pledge "to come and get you at any hour, any place, no questions asked and no argument at that time . . ." Montgomery County, Md., had a surprise for students heading to senior year-end festivities. The boys found a note tucked in their rented tuxedos counseling, "Friends don't let friends drive drunk," and providing a hot-line number that provided free rides home. And in rural Truman, Minn., the high school spent $79 for a breath-testing device for its prom after rowdy drunks disrupted last year's festivities. The machine is now kept in the school vault for use during school hours.

Anti-drunk-driving crusaders hope that breath-testing devices will become as much a fixture on the social scene as the shaker and stirrer, and a number of bars and restaurants have installed them. Anthony Ravosa, a defense attorney who has defended many clients against drunk-driving charges, offers a breath test to customers in his South Hadley, Mass., Riverboat Restaurant and provides courtesy rides home to those who flunk it.

Ravosa's gesture may ultimately prove to be more than simply humanitarian. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court says an establishment can be liable for serving too much booze to a customer, and earlier this year it upheld a $50,000 verdict against a Milford tavern that served "six or more" white russians to a customer who was "obviously intoxicated." That customer later drove off the road killing nine-year-old John Cimino.

HOW DRUNKS GET OFF

Defense attorney Randy Taylor parades around the courtroom, his arms pinned behind him by handcuffs. After several minutes of histrionic discomfort he compels the cop on the witness stand to remove the cuffs and place them on the defendant, a man charged with driving while intoxicated (DWI). Then Taylor seizes his client and bullies him about. Wasn't that how the police acted when they arrested him? he asks the witness. Finally, the Dallas lawyer shoves his client into a chair and barrels up to the cop: "Isn't it true you said, 'Shut up, you s.o.b.!' and kicked him in the leg?" And Taylor wins an acquittal.

"That's the way you get your client off," Taylor says. "The single most important factor in the typical DWI case is trying to make the jury put themselves in the place of the defendant." Taylor knows few restraints. On one occasion, after pleading his woman client guilty of DWI, he implored the jury, "The government wolves are really howling for blood tonight, waiting to put this poor little girl in jail for 30 days, taking her away from her husband." Then he put the cuffs on her, and she broke down and wept, attesting to the humiliation she had suffered. Despite a prior DWI conviction just 30 days before this arrest, she was sentenced to only three days in jail. Another time Taylor concluded his summation by stage-whispering to his client's four children, "Kids, I've done everything I can for your daddy." Pointing to the jury, he said, "Now it's up to these folks here." The defendant, who Taylor admits was probably guilty, was acquitted in 15 minutes.

The concept of "there but for the grace of God go I" has been the cornerstone of DWI legal defense ever since drunks started stepping on the gas. While the appeal is emotional, its foundation is solidly statistical: a recent Gallop poll reveals that four out of 10 Americans admit to having driven after drinking. But the extraordinary public campaign against drunk driving is having its impact even on jurors who may understand—from personal experience—the drunk driver's plight. The Texas Criminal Defense Lawyers Project recently has sponsored two special programs on DWI defense. Its program notes read: "The public has come to view DWI as a pernicious force in their communities and are demanding stiffer penalties . . . this institute is designed to teach you how to effectively represent your client . . ." Among the tactics garnered from the program and talks with top defense attorneys:

Challenge the evidence. Breath-analysis tests should not be accepted as gospel. Force the prosecution to prove that the testing machine was in good working order, that its chemicals had been tested and that its operator had proper qualifications. The tests aren't foolproof. Some people such as diabetics, who have certain chemicals in their breath, or denture wearers, who trap alcohol fumes along their gums, trigger false positive readings. If a blood sample was taken, make sure to request it; if it no longer exists, claim that it was purposely destroyed.

Track down witnesses. Find people who were with the defendant before he got behind the wheel and get them to testify about how sober he was. Attorney F. Lee Bailey's acquittal on DWI charges in California stemmed partly from testimony about his sober behavior on the evening of his arrest by people who were at the restaurant where Bailey dined.

Get the insurance company involved. Insurers tend to see cases as business problems, not moral issues, and are often anxious to settle damage matters expeditiously. Don't assume that the victim's families want vengeance; often they just want the case to go away too.

Visit the scene of the arrest. Since it can take up to six months between the arrest and the trial, the arresting officers can often be tripped up on details about the location. "If they [make mistakes]," says Taylor, "I can argue, 'Well, if you can't remember this, why can you remember anything else better?'"

Try to talk with the police—and hope you fail. When the police won't cooperate, argue that the witness is hostile, biased and has an ax to grind.

Carefully consider the choice between judge and jury. Taylor opts for a jury 95 percent of the time. He says, "I can manipulate the jury's minds more than I can a trial judge who's been on the bench 15 years and seen all my tricks." But cases that revolve around complex points of law may best be left to a judge.

The courtrooms are the ultimate battleground in the war on drunk driving. And to win the war, reformers must find ways to force jurors and judges to sympathize with the victims of drunk drivers, instead of the defendants.

DRIVING WHILE INTOXICATED

There was something absurd about drinking on an abandoned Schenectady airport runway while surrounded by police, but I wanted to find out how alcohol affected my driving skills. So I drank my gin and tonic next to an unmarked trooper car. As my bartender, Sgt. Henry Michelin, put it: "Just like the neighborhood bar—someplace to lean and drink."

An average male guinea pig—5 feet 10, 170—I had arranged to take on a difficult state-police driving course both sober and drunk. I supplied the gin and tonic, the state police provided a car. The course requires precise maneuvering around hard rubber cones—forward and backward. Scoring combines the time taken to complete the course with a five-second penalty for each mistake—such as flattening a cone. And a passing tally for troopers is 2 minutes 17 seconds. My blood alcohol level was measured by a preliminary-breath-test (PBT) device the size of a cigarette pack.

After eight practice runs through the course, I had whittled my time down from 3 minutes 10 seconds to a passing score, and it was time to begin drinking. My first gin and tonic—containing three ounces of 80-proof booze—placed my blood alcohol level 45 minutes later at .07 (70 milligrams of alcohol per decaliter of blood), high enough in New York to be charged with driving while impaired by alcohol. At this point I was slightly lightheaded, but I did't feel uncoordinated. My driving score told a different story. Not only did I add 1 minute 12 seconds to my previous, sober record, but my score was 19 seconds over my very first attempt.

WRETCHED

During my first post-drink attempt, I unconsciously tried to compensate for my condition through caution—a tactic that experts say is common among drunk drivers. In my case it didn't work: it took me longer and I made many more mistakes. This drop-off in performance was intensified by two more drinks, each containing one ounce of gin, which put my blood alcohol level at .11, or enough to be charged with driving while intoxicated or driving with a blood alcohol level of .10 or more. Now I could easily tell that I was uncoordinated. I stumbled slightly when I walked and I flunked the touch-your-nose-with-your-finger test. My driving ability plummeted from poor to wretched. My score—4 minutes 26 seconds—was almost double my final sober result. "You have no business being in an automobile out on the road," said Sergeant Michelin.

While impairment due to alcohol varies from person to person and even, depending on circumstances, for the same individual, experts say that driving skills are significantly diminished at a blood alcohol level of .10. That's why many states have adopted .10 as the limit for determining when someone has been driving while intoxicated. However, Robert Pandina, acting director of the Center of Alcohol Studies at New Jersey's Rutgers University, argues that there is impairment at lower levels as well. Pandina explains that the .10 standard is "a kind of compromise that recognizes that this is a drinking society."

WIDE AWAKE

Contrary to old wives and drinking buddies, nothing will temper the effects of alcohol except the passage of time—about two hours for every ounce consumed. Food slows the release of alcohol into the bloodstream without blunting its effect, and exercise and coffee will only produce a "wide-awake drunk"—someone alert enough to spot trouble but unable to do anything about it. That was clear enough to me as I rode with Sergeant Michelin back to town; my slow-motion brain couldn't keep up with the rush-hour traffic on the highway. I couldn't help remembering the times when I had been this drunk and driven, and the thought scared the hell out of me.●

LEGISLATION INTRODUCED TO AMEND THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954 TO PROVIDE ASSISTANCE AND WORK INCENTIVES FOR THE DISABLED AND HANDICAPPED

HON. DON BAILEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the Internal Revenue Code has become one of the Nation's most pervasive vehicles of social policy. The Congress has drafted and redrafted its sections to reflect society's rewards to those who are productive, to give individuals relief because of some specified financial burdens, and to provide revenue with which to finance our common concerns. But the Congress has generally failed to use the code to recognize the contributions and needs of the vast majority of disabled citizens in our country.

Much of the Congress failure to provide tax relief for disabled persons and incentives to aid in their gainful employment is of historical origins. However, two recent societal changes, or trends, necessitate that Congress modernize the code to recognize disabled individuals. The first is the unprecedented numbers of disabled persons who are living independent of institutions, at a considerable cost savings to the Government and society. This phenomenon enhances the quality of life for the individual, though it also adds to his personal stresses, largely in the form of greater personal expenses. I believe that the provisions of the Tax Code need to be amended to assist such individuals without burdening the Public Treasury in the manner and degree as did previously emphasized institutionalization.

A second change has led to greater opportunities for disabled persons, once considered unemployable, to now make economic contributions to society. Several factors have led to this much desired end. Better medical care and improved rehabilitation services that have greatly extended the life expectancy of disabled persons and have expanded their ability to participate in society is one. Another is that industrial production has become increasingly automated, thereby requiring less physical labor and providing a larger number of employment opportunities for those with physical disabilities. In sum, improved adaptation to disabilities and modernized employment opportunities make many persons with disabilities employable, whereas they were less likely to be gainfully employed only a decade or more ago.

Combined with these major societal changes are efforts to reduce personal reliance on public assistance. While this is a commendable goal, it's unrealistic for us to disregard several facts as we consider budget-cutting legislation. First, disabled persons most often reenter the work force through new types of jobs at low-paying entry levels. Second, they face greater personal work-related expenses. And, third, they face formidable architectural barriers. When eliminating or curtailing the availability of essential services, we must recognize the need for personal financial relief so that the disabled individual can more nearly become self-reliant. I've introduced several bills this session that amend the Internal Revenue Code to help disabled persons become self-reliant. These measures are based on many years of observation and study by me and the Paralyzed Veterans of America.

These measures will not suffice as the sole economic support needed by many disabled persons. But we know that amendments to the Internal Revenue Code could be used to provide disabled individuals with significant relief from their disability-related expenses. In fact, one of my bills allows disabled persons to offset their extraordinary work-related expenses. In addition, we must enact greater incentives for seriously disabled persons to return as productive members of the work force. This can be accomplished, in part, by removing architectural barriers, so that the disabled can have access to places of employment and commerce. Persons who have total and permanent disabilities can, with proper and adequate incentives and assistance, return to the work force and thereby reduce the Government's income maintenance programs. But, first, places of employment must be accessible. This is the goal of H.R. 6460, which I would like to describe in detail.

The most fundamental aspect of any approach to increasing employment opportunities for disabled persons is removing architectural barriers that impede their movement. H.R. 6460 helps achieve that goal by amending section 190 of the Internal Revenue Code.

H.R. 6460

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to increase the amount allowed to be deducted each taxable year for expenses incurred in connection with the elimination of architectural and transportation barriers for the handicapped and elderly from $25,000 to $100,000, and to make permanent the allowance of such deduction

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subsection (c) of section 190 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to expenditures to remove architectural and transportation barriers to the handicapped and elderly) is amended by striking out "$25,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$100,000".

(b) Subsection (c) of section 2122 of the Tax Reform Act of 1976 (90 Stat. 1915) is amended by striking out ", and before January 1, 1983".

(c) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1981.

As many of my colleagues know, section 190 of the Internal Revenue Code currently provides a tax deduction for expenses incurred in making publicly used, but privately owned, facilities accessible to elderly and disabled persons. The maximum allowable deduction under current law is $25,000, but that expires on December 31, 1982. H.R. 6460 increases the allowable maximum deduction to $100,000 and makes it available permanently. By doing so, the bill provides two incentives to businessmen to make necessary site alterations. By increasing the amount of the deduction, the bill gives an important incentive to individuals or corporations with several sites or extensive alterations. And by making the deductions permanent, it allows businessmen time for long-term planning.

Senator BOB DOLE, an outstanding spokesman for the handicapped and disabled, has introduced identical legislation in the Senate and I am very proud to be the House sponsor of his bill. Both he and I recognize the growing number of elderly and disabled citizens who would participate as customers and employees if only architectural barriers could be overcome. Both our bills provide a mechanism for achieving that goal.

The second measure I have introduced, H.R. 7074, is modeled on the double personal tax exemption that offsets an individual's expenses due to blindness or advancing age. Where these persons are gainfully employed, they experience greater expenses because of extraordinary transportation costs and the necessary equipment or supplies without which they would remain unemployed. My bill extends the double personal tax exemption to the disabled.

An itemization of average disability-related expenditures is helpful in understanding the need for the double personal income tax exemption. In 1980, the Paralyzed Veterans of America conducted a survey of some catastrophically disabled persons, all of whom were permanently and totally disabled because of spinal cord injuries or dysfunctions. They reported the following average expenses that generally are not incurred by able-bodied persons. Or, if they are, they are much lower:

Adaption of residence—$5,947 (one-time).
Attendant services—$3,548 (annual).
Health care—$2,164 (annual).
Homemaker services—$1,962 (annual).
Prosthetic devices—$1,129 (annual).
Extra employment-related expenses—$912 (annual).
Therapy/counseling—$893 (annual for initial years of disability).

Each disabled person surveyed had not incurred all of the expenses listed above, and it should be noted that adaption of a residence is not an annual expense. However, let me stress that many disabled persons hire someone to perform commonplace home and personal maintenance activities for them throughout the remainder of their lives. Other studies complement the findings of PVA's survey, including one financed by the Federal Government to determine the price society pays for disabilities.

That study, "Statistical Information Pertaining to Some of the Most Commonly Asked Questions About Spinal Cord Injury," clearly showed that disability is financially devastating to the individual and to society. The study showed that the average spinal cord injured person is young and lives 25 years after the onset of the disability. At least $250,000 in productivity, as measured in personal earnings, is taken from society each time a person becomes paralyzed and does not return to gainful employment. As such, every effort should be made to encourage and assist in returning these individuals to the workplace.

In fact, my bill to provide for a double personal income tax exemption would partly achieve this goal. It would, as I mentioned, help offset the large personal expenses incurred by disabled persons. A double exemption, like that already granted to blind and aged individuals, would clearly help those who are paralyzed or have other permanent disabilities meet their extraordinary work-related expenses. The double exemption, like improved accessibility, would provide an added stimulus for reemployment.

H.R. 7074

A bill to amend section 151 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide an additional exemption for disabled individuals who need assistance in the form of attendant care services or medical devices in order to be employed or whose disabilities are so severe that such assistance would not enable such individuals to be employed

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. ADDITIONAL PERSONAL EXEMPTION FOR DISABLED TAXPAYER OR SPOUSE

(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION FOR DISABILITY OF TAXPAYER OR SPOUSE. Subsection (d) of section 151 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to deductions for personal exemptions) is amended by inserting "or disabled" after "blind" each place it occurs in paragraphs (1) and (2) of such subsection.

(b) DEFINITION OF DISABLED.—Subsection (d) of section 151 of such Code (relating to deductions for personal exemptions) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) DISABILITY DEFINED.—

"(A) For purposes of this subsection, an individual is disabled only if such individual has any physical or mental impairment (other than blindness but including a hearing impairment) which—

"(i) has lasted or can be expected to last for a continuous period of not less than 12 months or can be expected to result in death, and

"(ii) constitutes or results in a functional limitation to the empoyment of such individual.

"(B) For purposes of this paragraph—

"(i) the term 'functional limitation to employment' means a limitation sufficiently severe so as—

"(I) to require assistance (in the form of attendant care services, medical devices, equipment, or prostheses, or similar items or services as determined by the Secretary in regulations) for an individual in order for such individual to engage in employment, or

"(II) to prevent an individual from engaging in any substantial gainful activity even though such individual is receiving assistance described in subclause (I); and

"(ii) the term 'physical or mental impairment' means an impairment which results from an anatomical, physiological, or psychological abnormality which is demonstrable by medically acceptable clinical or laboratory techniques."

(c) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Subsection (d) of section 151 of such Code (relating to deductions for personal exemptions) is amended by inserting in the heading of such subsection "OR OTHER DISABILITY" after "BLINDNESS".

(2) Paragraph (1)(C) of section 3402(f) of such Code (relating to withholding exemptions) is amended by striking out "(relating to the blind)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(relating to blindness or other disability)".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATES.—

(1) The amendments made by subsections (a), (b), and (c)(1) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982.

(2) The amendment made by subsection (c)(2) shall apply to payments of wages made after December 31, 1982.

The third bill I have introduced, H.R. 7075, would provide severely disabled individuals tax relief similar to that now granted to older Americans. That is, H.R. 7075 provides an $125,000 exclusion from capital gains taxes of the sale of a home or principal residence when a person is forced to sell his home as the result of his disability or the disability of a member of his family. Congress has seen the need for extending such an exemption to Americans who have reached age 55, and only recently reaffirmed its support for this provision by increasing the amount of the exclusion from $100,000 to $125,000.

Newly disabled persons are often forced to sell their homes for two reasons: First, the medical expenses arising from a disability can be devastating. This situation is compounded by the loss of the individual's savings and his ability to continue earning a pay check. At such times, disabled persons are often forced to sell their homes in order to pay medical expenses and/or to reduce the expenses associated with maintaining their homes. Regrettably, under existing law, a large portion of their sales gain is taken through taxation, even though they have a clear and urgent need for these funds.

Second, disabled persons often find that their existing residences are of limited use because of their need for accessible housing. These persons do not want to part with their homes, but the practical need for accessibility requires the purchases of a new residence. Again, disabled persons must bear a tax burden to which they would not be subjected if it were not for their disabilities. Many must rent apartments, where routine maintenance chores are taken care of by the apartment owner. Others seek accessible homes, though delays in locating a new home often preclude reinvestment. In both instances, disabled persons are subject to capital gains tax on the income realized from the sale of the original residence.

H.R. 7075 amends section 121 of the Internal Revenue Code to allow a homeowner to exclude from capital gains taxation the first $125,000 realized from the sale of his principal residence whenever the sale is prompted by the owner's disability or the disability of a family member. In the case of the owner's disability, this amendment would be an acceleration of the existing one-time exclusion which would be realized when the owner reached age 55. Further, the bill clearly states the conditions by which the sale of a residence is considered to be the result of the homeowner's disability or the disability of a family member.

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a one-time exclusion of gain from the sale of a principal residence by a taxpayer who engages in such sale because he or a member of his family has become disabled, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 121 TO PERMIT ONE-TIME EXCLUSION OF GAIN FROM SALE OF PRINCIPAL RESIDENCE BY DISABLED INDIVIDUAL

(a) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 121 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to one-time exclusion of gain from sale of principal residence by individual who has attained age 55) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) the taxpayer—

"(A) has attained age 55 before the date of such sale or exchange, or

"(B) has engaged in such sale or exchange because he (or a member of his family) has become disabled; and".

(b) SPECIAL RULES.—Subsection (d) of section 121 of such code (relating to special rules) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(9) SALE OR EXCHANGE BECAUSE OF DISABILITY OF TAXPAYER.—A taxpayer shall be treated as having met the conditions of subparagraph (B) of subsection (a)(1) if the sale or exchange referred to in such subparagraph is completed within the 2-year period beginning on the date the disability of the taxpayer (or the member of the taxpayer's family) was first determined by a physician (as such term is defined in the first sentence of paragraph (2) of section 8101 of title 5, United States Code), or reasonably should have been determined, to exist, unless it appears to the Secretary that such sale or exchange was entered into by the taxpayer for a reason which is unrelated to such disability.

"(10) MEMBER OF FAMILY DEFINED.—

"(A) The term 'member of the taxpayer's family' means the spouse or a child of the taxpayer if such spouse or child has as his principal place of abode the home of the taxpayer and is a member of the taxpayer's household.

"(B) The term 'child' has the meaning given it in section 151(e)(3).

"(11) DISABILITY DEFINED.—

"(A) For purposes of this section, an individual is disabled only if such individual has any physical or mental impairment (including blindness or a hearing impairment) which—

"(i) has lasted or can be expected to last for a continuous period of not less than 12 months or can be expected to result in death, and

"(ii) except in the case of a child of the taxpayer, constitutes or results in a functional limitation to the employment of such individual.

"(B) For purposes of this paragraph—

"(i) the term 'functional limitation to employment' means a limitation sufficiently severe so as—

"(I) to require assistance (in the form of attendant care services, medical devices, equipment, or prostheses, or similar items or services as determined by the Secretary in regulations) for an individual in order for such individual to engage in employment, or

"(II) to prevent an individual from engaging in any substantial gainful activity even though such individual is receiving assistance described in subclause (I); and

"(ii) the term 'physical or mental impairment' means an impairment that results from an anatomical, physiological, or psychological abnormality which is demonstrable by medically acceptable clinical or laboratory techniques."

(c) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Paragraph (1)(C) of section 121(d) of such Code (relating to special rules) is amended by striking out "the age, holding and use requirements" and inserting in lieu thereof "the age or disability and the holding and use requirements".

(2) The heading of section 121 of such Code is amended by inserting "or become disabled" after "age 55".

(3) The item relating to section 121 in the table of sections for part III of subchapter B of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by inserting "or become disabled" after "age 55".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982.

The fourth bill, which I will soon be introducing, will amend the Internal Revenue Code to provide that reasonable expenses incurred in making a principal residence accessible be treated as a deduction from income during the year in which the expense is incurred. As many of my colleagues know, when a family member or income earner becomes disabled, the existing primary residence can be made accessible. In fact, in many cases, the family prefers to modify the home rather than purchase a new one. But, under existing law, the improvements necessary for accessibility are not tax deductible until the sale of the home, at which time there is a capital gains exclusion. The bill I will be introducing will change this section of the code and provide a family with income tax relief at the time when it is most needed.

The four bills I have described will provide both assistance and incentives to the disabled in their effort to return to work. As I mentioned, the societal costs of disability have received great attention during the past few years. The 96th Congress, in passing such legislation as the Social Security Disability Amendments of 1980, emphasized society's need for returning persons with disabilities to gainful employment. But, as the Congress considers future legislation reducing or eliminating programs assisting the disabled, I think it is important that we do not reverse our past efforts by creating disincentives to returning the disabled to the workplace. We must continue to help these individuals become self-reliant. My bills recognize the special needs of employable disabled persons. They amend the Internal Revenue Code to reflect more accurately the societal changes that have occurred and to make self-reliance a reality for the disabled. I urge my colleagues to join me in enacting the measures.●

STAND BY YOUR GUNS!

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, much of the media attention on the Reagan administration decision to block sale of U.S. technology for the Soviet natural gas pipeline has focused on the harm that decision has reportedly had for American business and for our Western European allies. However, the following commentary by Marvin Stone from the September 13 edition of U.S. News and World Report offers the opinion that the President has a strong case for his action.

I urge my colleagues to give serious consideration to the merits of this argument.

[From U.S. News & World Report, Sept. 13, 1982]

STAND BY YOUR GUNS!

(By Marvin Stone)

Rarely in his 19 months in office has President Reagan been under such criticism as that brought on by his decision to get tough with American and Western European firms that are supplying vital components to the Soviets for a natural-gas pipeline.

Major U.S. newspapers have joined European critics in charging that the President made a decision harmful not only to American business interests but also to allied unity.

Is this another case of Reagan's being stubborn? Or is he being steadfast in following a course that he and many others consider to be in the interests of both Europe and the U.S.?

We think the President has a strong case for his action. The deals Reagan is trying to stop not only are supplying the Soviets with the equipment needed to build the pipeline but are doing so on easy credit terms. And when the pipeline is finished, Moscow stands to reap some 8 billion dollars a year in hard currency by supplying a Western Europe that will have become dependent on gas from Siberia. No wonder the Kremlin is gloating.

The President's position is that it doesn't make sense for Western European countries—which spend billions of dollars on NATO defenses against Russia—to hand over Western technology to Russia at cut-rate prices.

A little background: Reagan first spoke out against the pipeline at an economic summit meeting in Ottawa in July, 1981. At that time, he offered to arrange alternate supplies of energy to Western Europe if it would back off the pipeline deal. He ran into a brick wall of opposition by heads of state anxious to preserve contracts worth billions to concerns in their countries.

Last December, after the Soviets encouraged the Communist regime's harsh crackdown in Poland, the President put into effect a mild form of sanctions against Moscow. He banned American companies from selling equipment for the pipeline until the Soviets used their influence to lift martial law in Poland. The repression in Poland still goes on.

Then, at Versailles in June, Reagan thought he had made a deal with the same leaders: If they would cut back on the easy credits being given Communist countries and set up firm guidelines for sales of high-technology products to the Soviet Union, he would reconsider his attempt to block the pipeline.

But both West Germany and France soon made it clear they wouldn't go along with such a deal. It was little wonder that Reagan was both grieved and angered. His next move: He extended the ban on pipeline sales to include American subsidiaries abroad and foreign companies manufacturing under American licenses.

Then, in August, came the showdown. A French-based subsidiary of a U.S. firm—acting under orders from the French government—defied the ban and shipped pipeline equipment to Russia. Reagan promptly forbade any American company to do any business with that subsidiary or with a French firm also involved in the deal. On September 1, the sanctions were eased somewhat, but the impasse continues—with everyone looking for a way out.

What should Reagan do now? Back down, his critics say. But we agree with Senator Dan Quayle (R-Ind.) who says: "The President should not consider lifting the sanctions until the Europeans agree to a binding, long-term accord" on deals with the Communist bloc.

"First," says Quayle, "there must be no subsidization of financial credits on any future sales to the East. Second, there must be strict adherence and enforcement of the restrictions placed on the exportation of high-technology goods to the East. . . .

"Such a consensus could rejuvenate the Western Alliance, unravel the confusion about U.S. foreign-trade policy with the Soviets and quell the increasing calls from both sides of the Atlantic for protectionist measures."

President Reagan has generated a much needed debate on East-West relations that is long overdue. Some good can come of it if the President will stand by his guns.●

CHESTER COUNTY, PA., ALL-STARS

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to bring to the attention of my colleagues an 11-girl team of the Big League Division of Girls Little League Softball, who recently worked their way to the Pennsylvania State championships.

These young women became the State champs the hard way—with zeal, team work, and the moral support of their families and communities. With each win, they found it necessary to travel to other parts of the State, but their financial resources for these trips were practically nonexistent. Whenever it seems that money problems would stand in the way of their next competition and their hopes were flagging, they managed to put together sufficient funds to go one more round, and their perseverance ultimately paid off. Congratulations to the Chester County District 23 All-Stars for winning against the odds, and for demonstrating that there really is no better formula for success than good, old-fashioned hard work and dedication. We are proud of the accomplishments of: Joan Duffy, Malvern; Michelle Edens, Malvern; Terry Edwards, Malvern; Anne Galloway, Elverson; Mary Louise Gibney, Berwyn; Linda Lear, Paoli; Cynthia Lowry, Malvern; Jodi Moulder, Malvern; Renee Rexrode, Pottstown; Sherry Werner, Spring City; Kris Zimmerman, West Chester; Team Manager John Werner; Team Coach Don Mittica.●

EFFECT OF NEW FEDERALISM ON THE CHILDREN OF CONNECTICUT

HON. ANTHONY TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, September 8, I coordinated a forum at St. Joseph College in West Hartford, Conn., on the effect of the New Federalism on the children of my State. This event was hosted by St. Joseph College and the University of Connecticut Graduate School of Social Work Student Organization. Both schools offer distinguished curricula in the fields of child development and welfare; the willingness of St. Joseph College and the UCONN School of Social Work to present the child welfare forum reflects a spirit and commitment to Connecticut children and their families of which I am very proud. It was truly an honor to be a part of that event.

I must say that I have rarely had the opportunity to hear such eloquent and timely testimony as was presented by the forum's panel of witnesses. They represent service providers in a wide range of child and family services, from day care to public education to juvenile justice and handicapped services. Although the witnesses provide a host of different services, they all voiced a common belief: The Federal role in meeting the needs of children must be maintained in order to preserve and continue the gains made by State, local, public, and private sources of aid. The partnership is essential. As one witness stated:

It becomes clearer and clearer as one confronts the myriad of problems that families face today, that no single agency or even coalition of public and private agencies within the State, can provide all of the supports necessary to assure the health and welfare of our children.

I was joined in receiving testimony at the forum by two of my House colleagues who have demonstrated a deep and abiding commitment to the welfare of children, Representatives BARBARA KENNELLY and GEORGE MILLER. I know it is not necessary to recount to this body how very important these two Members are to the promotion of quality child care in the United States. The forum was equally as meaningful and informative to Representatives KENNELLY and MILLER, I know, as it was to me; Congressman MILLER will be going before the Rules Committee tomorrow, hearing the messages he received from the forum witnesses, in support of his proposal to establish a Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families in the House of Representatives.

Over the next several days, I will be submitting to the RECORD the testimony presented before the forum on the effect of the New Federalism on the children of Connecticut, in the order it was received. The scope, the depth, and the clarity of the testimony demands our fullest attention—and must prompt us to take immediate action to protect the welfare of our Nation's most vulnerable population, our children.

Following are the opening statements to the forum by Congresswoman KENNELLY and myself. Congressman MILLER's statements will follow in tomorrow's RECORD. On the following consecutive days, the distinguished witness' testimony will be printed.

Statements of Hon. BARBARA KENNELLY and Hon. TOBY MOFFETT attached:

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSWOMAN BARBARA B. KENNELLY

This forum is a welcome opportunity for Congressman George Miller, Toby Moffett, and myself to discuss the impact of the new federalism on Connecticut children with individuals who are closely involved with both private sector and government programs serving children here in our state. I am very grateful to the staff of St. Joseph College and the members of the University of Connecticut Graduate School of Social Work Student Organization for co-hosting this forum, and for their sustained efforts on behalf of child and family welfare.

The Reagan Administration has many commendable goals—the development of a strong partnership between Washington and State and local governments, the encouragement of volunteer efforts to help solve America's social problems, and the preservation of a reliable "safety net" to protect those in need. I don't think any of us have any quarrel with those goals, but we are deeply concerned about the way in which the Administration proposes to achieve them.

Despite the Administration's goals, there has been a systemmatic effort to reduce or eliminate those programs which constitute an important investment in our children and their future. The Administration claims to be working to root out waste and fraud, but it has consistently targeted programs which are cost-effective, well-managed, and successful. The Administration claims to be interested in improving the relationship between federal and state and local governments, but it has proposed legislation and regulations that are more administratively onerous than what was previously in effect.

I am afraid this Administration has assumed that official indifference can serve as official policy. I am worried about the impact this seeming indifference will have on our children, and on the future we leave them. We cannot hope to maintain this country's prominence in the changing world economy without continuing our strong commitment to developing the potential of our nation's children to the fullest. The irony is that this Administration would have our children pay twice: in lost opportunities today, in higher social costs tomorrow.

It is currently difficult in the Congress to assess the impact of the Administration's budget cuts on families and to enunciate an alternative policy. The overlapping jurisdictions of the congressional committee system do not lend themselves to a comprehensive overview. Congressman George Miller, with whom it is a honor and a pleasure to be here today, is working to establish a select committee on children, youth and families to fill this need. It is an effort which I am strongly supporting.

At present, the public and the Congress must be vigilant in defending the progress we have made in reducing the infant mortality rate, in assuring equal education opportunity to handicapped children, and in providing community-based solutions to problems of the juvenile justice system. As you all know, one of the most articulate defenders of this progress has been Congressman Toby Moffett, someone who needs no introduction to those who truly care about the needs of our children.

STATEMENT OF HON. TOBY MOFFETT

I am pleased to be here at today's forum. The very setting of this event is significant to the future of child and family services in Connecticut. St. Joseph College, now celebrating its 50 year anniversary, has been a leading force in the development of comprehensive child and family services. I want to offer my sincere thanks to the staff of St. Joseph College and the University of Connecticut Graduate School of Social Work Student Organization for hosting today's forum. By providing us with this opportunity to weigh the impact of the New Federalism on Connecticut's children, St. Joseph and the UCONN School of Social Work once again display their commitment to ensuring child and family welfare.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt once said, "We have always known that heedless self-interest was bad morals. We know now that it is bad economics. I think that this statement is appropriate to the supply-side fallacy embraced by President Reagan. It has been one year since the President's economic policy became the law of the land, a policy which rewards the wealthy of our nation at the expense of the poor and the vulnerable. Children didn't vote for this game plan. They didn't have any say at all. Yet, $10 billion in children's services were sacrificed last year so that the Reagan Administration could keep the world "safe for hypocrisy." What else can one label the policy of a President who purports to be pro-family? The glue that helps keep so many families together is being destroyed—compensatory education for the disadvantaged, juvenile justice and delinquency prevention, day care services, child nutrition, health, and other programs vital to the development of the nation's children.

Who are the victims of the New Federalism? They are children. Children comprise the majority of Americans suffering from poverty, living and partly living, in the words of T. S. Eliot. Who are the welfare "cheats" the President claims to be ridding from the system? 70 percent of them are children, the poorest of the poor.

It seems extraordinary that in this day and age American children could be wanting, but the sad reality is that it is true. One in seven children has no regular source of health care; two out of five is not fully immunized; one out of three has never been to a dentist. Our infant mortality rate is not even among the ten lowest rates in the world. 90 out of 10,000 Japanese children die before their first birthday, but 130 out of 10,000 American children do. Twice as many nonwhite American infants die during their first year of life as white infants.

Clearly, there is a genuine and huge need for comprehensive children services in this nation. But the Administration has determined that the federal government should end its partnership with state and private sources in providing these services, services with proven records of effectiveness. In many cases, the federal support is modest and may appear on paper to be an insignificant amount. But to the local service provider, those modest funds are essential. The partnership is essential. The responsibility is shared.

And what are these programs facing budget cuts or extinction? They are, by and large, exemplary, effective, and cost effective initiatives which should be expanded rather than curtailed. The supplemental food program known as WIC for nutritionally at-risk pregnant women and their children works—WIX mothers have one-third the low-birth weight babies as do similar non-WIC mothers. The Title I education program for disadvantaged children works—Title I children progress faster in their classes than do similar non-Title I pupils. Head Start for preschoolers works—Head Start children are less likely to drop out of school than their low-income counterparts, need less special educational services, and demonstrate gains in achievement scores that persist over time.

Where is the waste, fraud, and abuse in these programs? There is none. These are lean programs that save taxpayer dollars. These are wise social investments. But despite their demonstrated effectiveness, children services are now being dismantled, suddenly and drastically. How are the children of Connecticut faring under the New Federalism? That's what we have joined together today to find out.

Connecticut may be one of the highest per-capita income states in the nation. But recent Census data indicates that, since 1970, the number of children living in poverty has jumped by over 27 percent. Who will speak for these children? Today's panel of witnesses represents some of the most active defenders of child and family services in our state. I am glad to welcome the panel and am eager to hear from them on how our children are faring under the New Federalism. But first, it is my distinct pleasure and privilege to introduce my friend and colleague from California who will be chairing this forum, Congressman George Miller.

George Miller, I know, is no stranger to this assemblage. George is recognized nationwide as an outspoken advocate and leading spokesman in Congress on issues affecting child and family services. He is one of the ranking Members of the powerful House Education and Labor Committee; this 97th Congress, he was elected Chairman of the Labor Standards Subcommittee where he recently fought and won the battle against weakening our Child Labor Laws. His legislative accomplishments on behalf of the nation's children include the extension of the WIC program; the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act; the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act; major progressive amendments to the school lunch and rehabilitation acts; and much more. Congressman Miller is currently working on establishing in the House of Representatives a Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, an effort which I am actively supporting. Members of the audience, Congressman George Miller.●

THE STATE OF THE ECONOMY

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, as we approach the end of the 97th Congress, it is appropriate that we review the state of the economy in our 26th Congressional District during this period. We entered the year 1981 in the middle of a long term economic downturn. Nationally, the inflation rate stood at 12.3 percent and the prime interest rate stood at 21.5 percent. Savings were down sharply from levels earlier in the Carter administration. Taxes were up sharply, as was Government spending. Our economic problems were the result of long term factors in our economy: The problems of decreasing productivity, erratic monetary policy, insufficient incentives for savings and investments, high taxes, and a bloated public sector.

When the Reagan administration came into office in the beginning of 1981, it offered a bold new plan for economic recovery; but the program was designed for the long term, and there was recognition that it could not work overnight even if it was enacted speedily, which it was not. In evaluating the progress of this new policy, we must understand that it cannot be judged on the basis of its performance in bringing about an early reversal or the Carter recession—that was not promised. What that economic recover program serves to do is to try to promote a long term, stable recovery. The administration's economic recovery program featured tax and spending cuts, regulatory relief, and monetary restraint. It was designed to bring down inflation and to provide long term growth in the economy.

The factors which brought on our present recession, which we are now recovering from, were not transient factors but deep-rooted problems. Encouraging individual initiative and the private sector, as a whole, to become the engine of a strong economy, which is the main thrust of the Reagan program, is a long-term process.

What is the impact of the first year and one-third of the Reagan program. First, inflation is down sharply. This is the most beneficial aspect of the program for those on fixed incomes and for the elderly in general because they can protect themselves least from its effects. The benefits of cutting the inflation tax on the bank accounts of seniors far outweighs by nearly unimaginable proportions any reductions in Government-affected benefits that may have touched seniors. In general, for the population as a whole, after-tax income is headed sharply upward—a combination of higher real wages and lower taxes, and let us not forget the tax cut. Interest rates are headed downward and personal savings are moving upward. Peoples investments are headed out of the money markets into more directly productive investments.

Unemployment, the last of the ill effects of the recession, is still unacceptably high; nevertheless, in our own region, unemployment is down and total employment is up compared to a year ago. Add that to the very good news on inflation, interest rates, and especially taxes, I think that it is fair to conclude that a good beginning is being made. We should resist the temptation to label the residual effects of the 1980 Carter recession as a fault of the Reagan economic program.

Restoring a healthy economic climate is a complicated and long-term process and must be accomplished in the fairest, most painless way possible. Too many are suffering and struggling to make ends meet in our Nation today, and that is why I opposed those portions of the President's economic plan, which I thought were incompatible with the best interests of the people in our area of New York. This included my vote against the recently adopted tax bill to raise revenues of $98 billion over 3 years and against cuts in programs crucial to the well-being of low- to middle-income Americans.

It is important we recognize that a lot more needs to be done to bring about a full recovery. In that regard, we should thoroughly examine each new idea in this direction to improve the programs carefully and sympathetically, but we should not retreat. We are on the right road. Let us remind ourselves, when someone suggests a return to the old high taxing, high spending policies of yesterday, is not that how we got into this mess to begin with?●

HAROLD "RIC" RICHTERMAN

HON. GREGORY W. CARMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. CARMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I salute Harold "Ric" Richterman, of Syosset, N.Y., winner of this year's prestigious Ambrose M. Shotwell Award.

The award, presented each year since 1939 by the American Association of Workers for the Blind, honors individuals who have devoted themselves to helping blind people become independent through rehabilitation services.

Ric is currently director of the rehabilitation services division of National Industries for the Blind (NIB), where he assists sheltered workshops in developing vocational evaluation and prevocational training programs. He also assists them in grant writing, placement and in developing and presenting board-orientation programs. He joined NIB in 1969 following a 21-year affiliation with the Industrial Home for the Blind in Brooklyn, N.Y.

During the more than 30 years involvement in the field of blindness, Ric has served as technical consultant to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and has held memberships and committee posts with AAWB, the American Foundation for the Blind, the Helen Keller National Center for Deaf/Blind Youths and Adults, and the National Rehabilitation Association.

In 1971, he received AAWB's John H. McAulay Award, presented to the individual most instrumental in the placement of blind people, and later received the association's Leadership and Service in Work for the Blind Award. The National Accreditation Council gave him its Outstanding Service Award, and he also received the New York State Association of Workers for the Blind Award in recognition of distinguished service in the rehabilitation of blind people.

A graduate of the Savage School for Physical Education and Iowa State Teachers College with a B.A. in education, Ric earned his M.A. in vocational counseling from New York University.

I am sure that all of my colleagues will join with me in congratulating Harold "Ric" Richterman on this latest milestone in his long and distinguished career devoted to serving the disabled of our country.●

NATIONAL CAPITAL BUDGET

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee on Economic Development, of the House Committee on Public Works, began an important series of hearings on the question of developing a National Capital Budget. Chaired by Congressman JIM OBERSTAR, the subcommittee heard from Pat Choate, senior policy analyst for economics, TRW, Inc. Congressman BILL CLINGER and I coauthored H.R. 6591 to established a National Capital Budget. Mr. Choate's statement which follows should be helpful to all Members of the House in carefully considering this important issue. The statement follows:

TESTIMONY OF PAT CHOATE, SENIOR POLICY ANALYST FOR ECONOMICS, TRW INC., BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS AND TRANSPORTATION, THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, THE NINETY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, WASHINGTON, D.C., SEPT. 14, 1982

Mr. Chairman and Members, it is a privilege to testify before the Subcommittee on Economic Development on a topic of vital importance to our nation—the rebuilding of America's public works.

Between last fall when I last appeared here and today, the issue of deteriorating public works has moved to the forefront of national attention. There is a growing awareness that the economic renewal of our nation is heavily dependent on rebuilding the basic public facilities that underpin the economy. There is also a growing awareness that the quality of life of all citizens is now threatened because of public works decline.

In significant measure, this expanded public awareness is due to the work of this Subcommittee under the leadership of Mr. Oberstar, the Wednesday Group's work under the leadership of Mr. Clinger, and the Northeast-Midwest Congressional Coalition's work under the leadership of Mr. Edgar.

I am particularly pleased to testify today on an important piece of legislation: namely, the Federal Capital Investment Budget Act of 1982 (H.R. 6591) which would create a national capital budget and an assessment of the nation's public facilities. This legislation is critically important because it would create the basic planning and management tools America lacks, but needs, to rebuild its deteriorating public facilities.

INADEQUATE PLANNING AND MANAGEMENT TOOLS

As hearings of this Subcommittee have documented, the problem of decaying public facilities is extensive. It is also national in scope: deteriorating facilities are found in all parts of America—North, South, East, West, rural, urban, and suburban.

While there is growing awareness, perhaps even a national consensus, that America's basic public facilities are wearing out and that new actions will be required, the federal government lacks the basic planning and management tools needed to confront the challenge.

Specifically, annual federal public works expenditures are made in the absence of even the most basic information and policies—the United States has no inventory of its public facilities; there is no assessment of the condition of existing facilities; there are few standards for the services to be provided by public facilities; there are no investment strategies or investment priorities; there is no uniform estimate of future investment requisites; there is no basic agreement between the federal, state and local governments on the allocation of public works authorities and responsibilities for the financing, construction and operation of specific types of projects; and there is virtually no federal oversight over those federal public works expenditures that are made.

These management weaknesses are important because the federal government is the dominant force in America's public facilities: half of all public works expenditures originate with the federal government, and federal regulations and matching requirements largely define the use of the other fifty percent financed by state and local governments.

The principal capital budgeting tool the federal government uses is "Special Analysis D of the Budget of the United States Government." Yet, the General Accounting Office in its report to the Congress, "Federal Capital Budgeting: A Collection of Haphazard Practices," concludes that this tool is ineffective for overall capital analysis. It presents outlays and is compiled after agency officials make their budget decisions. As such, it is not designed or used as a management tool or resource from which policymakers can infer or analyze federal capital investment policies or practices. The GAO notes that "Special Analysis D" is deficient in five basic ways:

Off-budget activities are excluded—such as the U.S. Postal Service;

It does not accurately portray the magnitude of capital investment activity since outlays from one category are netted against receipts from the same category. Gross figures are not presented.

Not all capital stock is represented since the analysis covers only three fiscal years. GAO notes that three years is far too short a time span to accurately account for additions to capital assets or their depreciation and disposal.

There is no consistent definition of physical capital; thus, individual federal agencies define physical capital they choose. GAO reports that in one agency the same item may be considered as capital and in another as a current item. For example, GAO reported that the General Services Administration considers capital investment as all new construction, alterations, and major repairs except for one-to-one replacements and equipment. Yet, the Corps of Engineers defines capital as basically the construction of water projects—new construction.

Finally, the GAO reports that Special Analysis D has a very unfocused and misleading categorization system. Specifically, outlays are classified as being that type of activity (capital or current outlay) in which the majority of funds in an overall program is used. Thus, if 51 percent of a discretionary program, such as the Community Development Block Grant program of HUD, is used for operating expenses, then the entire program is classified as a current expenditure even though several billion dollars of the program go for capital items. Clearly such classification practices seriously distort what is and is not being expended on capital items.

The limitations of Special Analysis D are important and significant because as the GAO notes, "except for this special analysis, the federal government does not practice capital budgeting in a comprehensive way."

Because of the inadequacy of present federal public works practices, important and unwanted policy and administrative side-effects are created.

First, no overall view is taken of the nation's public works needs, the role of the respective levels of government in meeting these needs, or how individual federal investments relate to each other or to any long term strategy.

Second, in the absence of clearly documented needs and well articulated priorities, mis-priorities are created in the nation's public works expenditures.

Third, the short term is favored over the long term. However, many of the nation's most important public works challenges, such as rebuilding the Interstate Highway System and assuring adequate supplies of clean water will take a decade or more to finance and complete.

Fourth, in the absence of a coherent national public works investment strategy, which identifies investment needs and how to meet them, aggregate public infrastructure investment requisites cannot be systematically and thoughtfully considered against aggregate social and defense investment requirements—two areas which do have consolidated budgets and long term investment estimates. Moreover, as public facility investments were ignored and deferred in the 1960s and the 1970s in order that the limited public funds could be used to finance a growing menu of social expenditures, similarly public works investments will likely be ignored and deferred in the 1980s because of rising defense expenditures—particularly if these public facility needs are not clearly and systematically specified.

Finally, disordered federal public works practices create major obstacles to effective management of state and local public works activities. Since the federal financing dominates state and local public works activities, the federal government's short term focus, start and stop financing, and bias to new construction over rehabilitation, operation and maintenance expenditures makes coherent state and local policymaking and program administration almost impossible.

NEW PLANNING AND MANAGEMENT TOOLS

Difficult and important choices on public works must be made. These choices will profoundly influence the national economy, local economies and the quality of life of virtually all Americans. The principal barrier to making such choices in a considered manner is: (a) the absence of reliable information; and (b) the absence of a framework for the legislative and administrative decisions that must be made.

The creation of a systematic capital budgeting process—by creation of a comprehensive Special Analysis of Federal Capital Expenditures and a formal National Capital Budget—can provide such a framework. Such a framework is needed to permit the explicit and systematic consideration of:

1. The aggregate requirements for domestic non-defense public works investments in comparison to other claims such as social programs.

2. The relationship of public works investments to social, economic development and national defense objectives.

3. The impacts of government regulatory actions on public works investments and operations.

4. The consequences of allocations of the limited public works funds as between new construction, rehabilitation of existing facilities and operation and maintenance.

5. The social and equity issues associated with the distribution of public works funds among and between the various regions.

6. The consequences of varying allocations of public works responsibilities between the federal, state and local governments.

7. The sources, consequences and alternative financing sources for public works projects and their operation.

8. The use of annual public works expenditures as a countercyclical device of economic policy.

A special analysis of capital expenditures

The first step in fostering an improved capital budgeting process is the creation of a comprehensive special capital analysis in the annual Budget of the United States Government. This special analysis would provide the basic information for public works decisions by both the Executive and Legislative Branches.

Accordingly, to be most useful this special analysis would ideally chronicle the following:

(a) An estimate of aggregate capital investments (construction and rehabilitation) required to provide specific levels of specific public works services over several discrete periods of time such as one, five and ten years.

(b) An estimate of aggregate operation and maintenance investment requirements.

(c) The identification of sources of financing.

(d) Identify Federal public works investment priorities.

(f) Identify how the proposed annual capital expenditures contained in the proposed budget would relate to the nation's longer term needs and the federal government's longer term public works investment strategies.

Initially, the special analysis might include only domestic civil works and exclude defense facilities and equipment. (Attachment 1).

If a Special Analysis is to be created, better information is required including:

(a) A uniform national set of standards of service to measure the specific level of service provided by specific types of public works facilities, such as roads, sewer systems and water treatment systems;

(b) An inventory of the nation's public facilities;

(c) An assessment of the physical condition of these public facilities;

(d) An assessment of the levels of service being produced by these facilities;

(e) An estimate of the costs, over discrete periods of time, to continue specific present, higher and lower levels of service;

(f) A public works evaluation system that can be used for oversight of federal public works activities by the Executive and Congressional Branches;

The Federal Capital Investment Budget Act of 1982 would meet virtually all of these needs. Equally important, this Act appropriately places responsibility for the preparation of this information in the premier data and information agency of the Federal Government: the Department of Commerce.

A capital budget

While there can be many interpretations of what a capital budget is, ultimately it is merely the resultant of the capital budgeting process—documenting proposed actions of final decisions.

The capital budget can be created in a variety of ways. The most direct and most efficient way would be for the Office of Management and Budget, as the central budget office, to distinguish in the Annual Budget of the United States by functional category, agency and program between capital and operational authorities, outlays, deficits, surpluses, and revenues. This will permit the President and the Congress to view federal capital expenditures in terms of:

(a) Aggregate capital investments;

(b) Aggregate investments in specific types of public works projects such as bridges or highways or sewer treatment systems;

(c) Aggregate investments in specific types of public works activities such as new construction, rehabilitation, repair, maintenance and operations; and

(d) Agency investments by types of public works projects and by related activities—new construction, rehabilitation, repair, maintenance and operation.

At the same time, it would be useful for the Executive Branch to, where possible, identify sources of financing—general funds, trust funds, or other means.

A federal capital budget can be created within the context of the unified budget, much as the credit budget operates within the context of the unified budget. To move beyond the short-term, annual focus of present practices, long term projections, such as up to 10 years, ideally would be prepared on anticipated capital and related operational expenditures.

The capital budget can be displayed in a variety of means, including as a part of the existing budget or, as several states such as Pennsylvania do, as a distinct document.

A national capital budget can be built on the existing budget process without a more sweeping reform and improvement in federal budgeting processes. Most important, federal capital investments can be better planned and managed without making any structural changes or consolidations in existing Federal agencies or Congressional Committees.

The Federal Capital Investment Budget Act of 1982 offers a pragmatic route to creating these badly needed new planning and management tools for the federal government's public works investments.

CONCLUSION

A primary cause of the decline of America's public facilities is the disordered public works policies, institutions and programs of the federal government. This disorder must be corrected. The most fundamental step in bringing long term direction and coherence to the nation's public works activities is to create a new Special Capital Analysis in the Annual Budget of the Federal Government and a National Capital Budget.

The creation of this special analysis will facilitate the preparation of better information, and provide a framework for the consideration of the many difficult financial and federalist choices that must be made. The capital budget will be the resultant of the larger process of making these choices.

Both the special analysis and the capital budget can be created without a reassignment of authorities in either the Executive or Legislative Branches and without a major reform of existing budgeting processes. The Federal Capital Investment Budget Act of 1982 (H.R. 6591) would create both these pragmatic planning and management tools. These tools are badly needed if America is to rebuild its basic public works.

Thank you for the opportunity to testify before this Committee.

DISSOLUTION OF THE MOSCOW HELSINKI GROUP

HON. MILLICENT FENWICK

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Speaker, at a news conference on September 8 in Moscow, the dissolution of the Moscow Helsinki Group was announced by Elena Bonner, wife of banished Nobel Prize winner Andrei Sakharov. This is a dismaying development. As one of the original Commissioners of the U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the government body charged with monitoring compliance with the human rights provisions of the 1975 Helsinki Final Act. I have followed closely the work of the courageous Moscow Helsinki monitors since the group was formed in May 1976. That the group found it necessary to disband "under pressure from the authorities" is a matter of profound regret and one which bodes ill for the future of security and cooperation in Europe.

The Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group, along with several other Soviet Helsinki Groups that were subsequently formed, established the goal of monitoring compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act in the Soviet Union. Their right to undertake such actions is endorsed in Principle VII, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief, where the participating states "confirm the right of the individual to know and act upon his rights in this field." As most of my colleagues are aware, only a brief time after the formation of the group, the Helsinki Monitors were themselves made the victims of the repressions that they had begun to highlight and oppose.

One of those victims is Tatiana Osipova, a computer specialist. This 29-year-old mother was sentenced on April 2, 1981, to 5 years in a general regimen camp and 5 years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda."

Osipova became a member of the Moscow Group in November 1977. In 1977 and 1978, she co-authored two "samizdat" articles on political repression in the U.S.S.R. with fellow group member, Viktor Nekipelov. Her husband, Ivan Kovalev, is a member of the Moscow Group as well. She has been the subject of KGB harassment and searches during her years as a human rights activist. In March 1979, she was forced to leave her position as a computer programer at the Moscow Oblast Pedagogical Institute.

Mr. Speaker, although the formal work of the Moscow Helsinki Group has been suspended, I am convinced that the long, difficult struggle for basic human rights will continue. Most of its members, nearly all of whom are now imprisoned or exiled, were aware when they committed themselves to their task that they faced an uphill battle involving much pain and suffering.

It is imperative that we, in this Congress, make clear to the authorities of the Soviet Union that the free world will not soon forget the sacrifices of the Helsinki Monitors—whose only offense was a commitment to Helsinki ideals.●

NATIONAL STRATEGIC MATERIALS AND MINERALS ASSESSMENT PROGRAM

HON. RAY KOGOVSEK

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. KOGOVSEK. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have introduced on September 9, 1982, H.R. 7084, legislation to establish a national strategic materials and minerals assessmant program for the United States. This legislation has been greatly needed by our country for some time, and the demand for this type of program is growing on a daily basis. Article after article has appeared in the press in regard to the country's concern about the availability of strategic materials and minerals resources. Yet, the Federal Government continues to operate under a system of "reacting to crisis," rather than "advanced planning" in order to avoid such crisis.

Several pieces of legislation have been introduced during the 96th and 97th Congress, which raise concern about the continued availability of our natural resources for national security, industrial base, and economic security purposes of the United States. The legislation I am referring to, in most cases, removes certain areas of the country from mineral exploration and development. This, in and of itself, is not bad, because we must take measures which will protect our resources. However, although such legislation states that, "resource assessments shall continue," there is no mechanism in the law that will allow such work to be done. In fact, not only has this country relaxed its efforts to locate and classify its essential resources, in many instances, such efforts have been obstructed by the same hands that have called for its initiative.

Yet, in all the legislation that is being passed in Congress, very few proposals call for the expansion of knowledge and research to determine exactly what this country has for natural resources. We know our resources are vast. We also know that the United States holds strategic and essential resources. However, we have little idea about where it is, or how much we have. This traditionally has been left to the hands of private entities, and is often restricted as proprietary information. However, even this will no longer be available in many instances. Thus, when Congress acts in the future, we will be acting as an uninformed body. Furthermore, when a crisis comes about, and our national security, industrial base, or economic well-being is in jeopardy, Congress reaction, as an uninformed body, will have the propensity to adversely impact those measures we have enacted over the past 10 years to protect our natural resources. To make my point clear, imagine Congress reaction to a situation in which the United States was in battle, we have a critical shortfall of a strategic mineral, and it was known only that the resource might be somewhere within a 100-mile radius of Rocky Mountain National Park. I am sure you can imagine what would happen to the park.

Mr. Speaker, this type of situation does not have to occur, and Congress should no longer have to make uninformed decisions. We have only to use the tools and mechanisms that are already in existence. One of those tools is the Department of Energy facility at Grand Junction, Colo. The mechanism is the legislation I have introduced.

My bill proposes to transfer the uranium resource assessment program, including the Grand Junction facility and personnel, from the Department of Energy to the Department of the Interior. Furthermore, it would expand the URA program to also include essential materials and minerals as determined by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Additionally, it will direct the Secretary of the Interior to:

First, develop an indepth evaluation of domestic and international strategic minerals and materials resources supply and demand.

Second, implement a specific program to coordinate ongoing efforts of minerals and materials assessment for this country.

Third, establish a managerial framework for continued assessments of strategic materials and minerals supply.

Fourth, establish an early warning system to notify the President and Congress of potential strategic materials and minerals shortfalls.

Fifth, provide recommendations to the President and Congress, including stockpiling and conservation, to offset potential shortfalls.

Protections are provided in the legislation to insure that laws such as the Wilderness Act, the Forest Management Act, and the Federal Land Policy and Management Act are not conflicted by this proposal. Furthermore, my bill is not a mechanism to start opening up withdrawn areas to development. It only provides a mechanism to determine what resources we have on the public lands and where they are.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in enacting this very important piece of legislation, and establish a program to decrease the vulnerability of our national security, economic well-being, and industrial base in America.

The bill follows:

H.R. 7084

A bill to provide for the establishment of a National Strategic Materials and Minerals Coordination Program, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) this Act may be cited as the "National Strategic Materials and Minerals Assessment Act of 1982".

(b) The Congress finds that the United States lacks known domestic resources from which to produce, in necessary quantities, certain materials and minerals essential to its national security, industrial base, and economic well being. The Congress therefore declares that it is in the National interest to:

(1) Develop an in-depth evaluation of domestic and international strategic materials and minerals resources supply and demand.

(2) Implement a specific program to coordinate ongoing efforts of strategic materials and minerals assessment for this country.

(3) Establish a managerial framework for continued assessments of strategic materials and minerals supply.

(4) Take positive action that will promote our national security, help ensure a healthy and vigorous economy, create American jobs, decrease the Nation's strategic minerals and materials vulnerability, and protect our natural resources and environment.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior; and

(2) "strategic materials and minerals" means those natural resources essential to the security, industrial base, and economic well-being of the United States, as determined by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION

SEC. 3. All programs, functions, responsibilities and personnel of the Uranium Resource Assessment Program, as established under the authority of the Department of Energy, shall be transferred to the Department of the Interior. Such transfer shall include the Grand Junction Facility, Grand Junction, Colorado, and all operating funds remaining in the Uranium Resource Assessment Program on the date of enactment of this Act.

MINERALS AND MATERIALS ASSESSMENT

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary shall establish a National Strategic Minerals and Materials Assessment Program within the Department of the Interior, for purposes of carrying out the provisions and goals of this Act. Such program shall utilize the management framework and personnel of the Uranium Resource Assessment Program.

(b) The duties and functions of the Secretary under this Act shall include, but not be limited to, activities which—

(1) monitor, evaluate, and coordinate on a continuing basis the programs and activities of the Federal Government so as to carry out the provisions of this Act;

(2) identify and classify the Nation's areas of potential strategic material and mineral deposits on the public lands;

(3) identify policy conflicts with respect to resource management and strategic materials and minerals supply;

(4) establish periodic reviews of strategic materials and minerals issues including resource assessment, supply and demand, stockpiling, and conservation; and

(5) establish an Early Warning System which will monitor the conditions of supplies and demands for strategic materials and minerals. Such Early Warning System shall be designed to notify the President and the Congress of strategic material and mineral shortfalls in a timely manner, and to provide recommendations to alleviate such shortfalls.

PUBLIC LANDS

SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary shall conduct continuing strategic materials and minerals assessments of the public lands in such a manner that will not be injurious to fish and wildlife, water sheds, cultural resources, habitat, or other resources of the public lands.

(b) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to amend, repeal, or modify any provision of the Wilderness Act (16 U.S.C. 1131 et seq.) or the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act (16 U.S.C. 1271 et seq.), except as provided in this subsection:

(1) The Secretary may initiate strategic materials and minerals assessments on public lands withdrawn from mineral entry to the extent that such assessments can be accomplished with minimal surface disturbance.

(2) Any materials and minerals assessment on the public lands shall occur with the consultation and cooperation of the agency having management jurisdiction over such lands and resources.●

VOTE "NO" ON THE EXTRADITION ACT, H.R. 6046

HON. ANTHONY TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, I am very disturbed that H.R. 6046, the Extradition Act of 1982, may soon be coming up for a vote on the House floor.

This legislation is intended to improve our ability to crack down on international terrorism. This is certainly a laudable goal, and one which I strongly support. However, H.R. 6046 has not received the careful consideration and analysis which should be demanded of such a wide-ranging proposal. As a result, the bill contains serious flaws which would undermine both the rights of Americans and our efforts to promote democracy and human rights abroad.

This legislation would eliminate the "political crimes defense" in extradition cases, if the defendant is charged with a crime of violence or conspiracy to commit violence. Thus, a contrived charge by a foreign government could secure extradition of a political refugee residing in this country. The legislation grants the State Department sole authority to deny an extradition request, if it determines that the request is politically motivated.

These proposed changes could lead to the imprisonment, torture and murder of many Filipinos, Salvadorans, and others who have fled repressive regimes and sought refuge in the United States. For example, Benigno Aquino, a leading opponent of the Marcos regime in the Philippines and an associate at Harvard University's School of International Affairs, is one of over a dozen political refugees which the Marcos regime wants extradited. He has been charged with planning bombings in the Philippines, although the evidence against him is far from convincing. By stripping the courts of their power to prevent the extradition of political refugees, Aquino and others could become geopolitical pawns of the State Department.

Given the administration's record of certifying human rights progress in El Salvador, when exactly the opposite is true, and lauding democracy in the repressive regimes of the Philippines and Chile, the State Department simply cannot be trusted to make objective determinations on extradition cases. Narrow and sometimes questionable political considerations could take precedence over the lives of men and women who have fled persecution.

I am equally concerned that H.R. 6046 may violate our country's constitutional principles. By placing a legal matter which belongs in an impartial judicial system into the highly politicized executive branch, this bill violates our system of checks and balances. Further, the bill allows the detention of both foreign residents and U.S. citizens without charges, at the request of a foreign government.

We need to step up our efforts to fight terrorism. But it is not necessary for us to take police-state measures. Nor is it necessary for us to aid foreign dictatorships in persecuting those who seek to promote democracy and human rights in their native lands. H.R. 6046 could yield both of these results.

The changes sought by H.R. 6046 need a great deal more study. Further, we must receive assurances that civil liberties and human rights will not be sacrificed in the name of fighting international terrorism. I intend to oppose H.R. 6046 in its present form, and I strongly urge my colleagues to do the same.●

PROBLEM PARENTS AND PROBLEM ABORTIONISTS

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, one of my favorite columnists, John Lofton, has written a typically interesting column in the August 30, 1982, Washington Times.

He discusses, with insight and candor, the anomaly of Planned Parenthood's claim to involve parents with adolescents who consult them and their legal efforts to bar parents from prior information about abortions for minors. I urge my colleagues to carefully read the following column:

THIS KIND OF SILENCE IS FAR FROM GOLDEN

(By John Lofton)

On Wednesday, the day after tomorrow, in Indiana, a state law was to go into effect which would have required that parents be notified at least 24 hours before an abortion is performed on their minor daughter. But, Planned Parenthood is seeking a preliminary injunction to stop this law from being enforced because it "unduly burdens the right of minors to freely make and effectuate a decision to terminate pregnancy—a fundamental right of privacy."

Now, the first thing this legal action does is make a liar out of this organization's chief lawyer. On the CBS television program "Up To The Minute" several months ago, Harriet Pilpel, general counsel of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, declared flatly: "Every Planned Parenthood affiliate I know makes every effort to involve the parents with any adolescent who consults them."

But, in fact, this is obviously not true. What the Planned Parenthood people in Indiana are attempting to do is deny parents any legal right to know if their minor child is about to get an abortion.

The second thing the lawsuit in question does is to allude to a right that simply does not exist: the absolute right of a minor to privacy. When I asked Ann McFarren, executive director of Planned Parenthood Associates of Northwest Indiana where such an absolute right comes from, she replied:

"It's our interpretation that this is the statement of the Supreme Court and it is one of the things we're seeking to get clarification on that still hasn't been clearly delineated."

Me: But your suit clearly implies that an absolute right of privacy already exists for minors. When has the Supreme Court ever so ruled?

McFarren: "Well, it hasn't excluded this either. And this is one of the things our suit will help clarify."

This is, of course, double-talk. What the Indiana Planned Parenthood groups are trying to do is not clarify any absolute right of privacy for minors, but create such a right.

Noting that their suit makes no distinction among minors, I ask: Are you really serious when you say that parents have no legal right to know, in advance, if their 10-, 11-, or 12-year-old daughter is about to get an abortion?

McFarren: (Pause) "I guess I'm feeling you're pushing for absolutes and if I had to go absolute one way or the other I suppose I would be pushed into that position yes."

McFarren says that the difference between us is that I seem to be able to "very easily" distinguish what ought to be absolute whereas she views the world as "a little more complex than that." She adds that while parental involvement is preferable in "most situations," there are times when such involvement is "detrimental" to both parents and "the patient" (this is what Planned Parenthood people call 10-, 11- or 12-year-old girls).

But, McFarren is an absolutist. When it comes to the legal right of parents to know if their minor daughter is about to get an abortion, she is absolutely against any such right for any parents. Period.

Now, I don't doubt for a minute that if some parents did know, in advance that their minor daughter was about to get an abortion this would complicate the situation. But even so, in my judgment, all parents of all minors should still have this right. After all, what is at stake here is simply prior notification, not parental permission.

The fascinating thing is that the Ann McFarrens of the world can see the possibility of problem parents, but they never seem to consider the possibility of problem abortionists. And they do exist. A series of articles in the Chicago Sun-Times in 1978, titled "The Abortion Profiteers," revealed the following about Windy City clinics:

Dozens of abortion procedures were performed on women who were not pregnant;

An alarming number of women suffered such severe internal damage that all their reproductive organs had to be removed;

Some doctors performed abortions in only two minutes not even waiting for the anesthetic to take effect;

Some counselors were paid not to counsel but to sell abortions with sophisticated pitches and deceptive promises; and

Some referral services, for a fee, sent women to a disreputable Detroit abortionist whose dog, to one couple's horror, accompanied a nurse into the operating room and lapped blood from the floor.

It is into this potentially monstrous maelstrom that the Planned Parenthood crew would hurl our minor daughters without even letting us know.

What the Planned Parenthood mindset represents is a throwback to the Dark and Middle Age concept of children as "miniature adults"—a dangerously naive notion written about in horrifying detail in a new book "The Disappearance of Childhood" (Delacorte Press) by Neil Postman, professor of media ecology at New York University. Says Postman:

"The liberal tradition (or as the Moral Majority contemptuously calls it, secular humanism) has had pitifully little to offer in this matter. For example, in opposing economic boycotts of TV sponsors, civil libertarians have taken the curious position that it is better to have Procter & Gamble's moral standards control television's content than Queen Victoria's. In any case to the extent that a political philosophy can influence cultural change, the liberal tradition has tended to encourage the decline of childhood by its generous acceptance of all that is modern and a corresponding hostility to anything that tries to 'turn back the clock.' But in some respects the clock is wrong, and the Moral Majority may serve as a reminder of a world that was once hospitable to children and felt deeply responsible for what they might become."

To those of you who might say you don't care what Planned Parenthood is trying to do I would say: you ought to because you are paying for their unceasing efforts to destroy the American family. During the past five years, the Planned Parenthood Federation, at the international level, has had its snouth thrust deeply into the public trough to the tune of $49.9 million worth of your hard-earned federal tax dollars and mine. To finance its 188 U.S. affiliates, Planned Parenthood has gotten $248.3 million in federal tax dollars.

You'd think that with this kind of support from so many parents the folks at Planned Parenthood would allow parents to plan something.●

WORLD PRAISES PRESIDENT'S FOREIGN POLICY INITIATIVES

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan's recent initiatives in the Middle East and elsewhere have captured headlines around the world and won new respect for American foreign policy among our allies and adversaries.

A recent article by the Christian Science Monitor's distinguished correspondent Joseph C. Harsch praised the efforts of the President and his new Secretary of State George Shultz as "rational, coherent, orthodox—and professional."

Headlined, "From Peking to Palestine, Reagan's Policies Gain Applause," Mr. Harsch singles out the Middle East peace initiative as the centerpiece of the administration's new foreign policy efforts. He said:

It was the smooth professionalism of the new Middle East initiative that most impressed, and surprised, the diplomatic world.

Clearly something new has been added to the foreign policy operation in Washington—that something, presumably, being the quiet, common-sense approach of the new Secretary of State, George Shultz.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the following full text of this excellent assessment of U.S. diplomacy to anyone concerned about the course of U.S. foreign policy.

FROM PEKING TO PALESTINE, REAGAN'S POLICIES GAIN APPLAUSE

(By Joseph C. Harsch)

President Ronald Reagan of the United States is doing well with his "new start" toward peace in the Middle East.

It was denounced in Moscow as being "pro-Israel" and by Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin in Tel Aviv as being "anti-Israel." It was welcomed by the opposition Labor Party in Israel and has been given a mixed but generally favorable reception by the Jewish community in the US.

It was treated as an interesting basis for fresh thinking among the moderate Arab countries—particularly by Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt. And even the more radical Arab leaders at the summit in Fez, Morocco, carefully refrained from rejecting it.

In the allied capitals of Western Europe, diplomats and politicians looked up in startled approval—and not only at the "new start" for the Middle East, which they recognized as being a well-tailored, well-balanced, and professionally launched operation.

They also noted with equal approval that President Reagan was backing away from his efforts to block the Siberian gas pipeline, and had also succeeded in getting his relations with mainland China back on the road opened up by Richard Nixon and traveled by Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter.

It almost seemed over the past week that Washington foreign policy had suddenly become rational, coherent, orthodox—and professional.

It was the smooth professionalism of the new Middle East initiative that most impressed, and surprised, the diplomatic world. Clearly something new has been added to the foreign policy operation in Washington—that something presumably being the quiet, common-sense approach of the new secretary of state, George Shultz.

The story of how it was done began to surface during the past week. Here are some of the things that came out.

The details of the American position which the President set forth in his speech of September 1 had been worked out after consultations with Arab leaders in the Middle East, with opposition party leaders in Israel, with leaders of the American Jewish community at home, and with the chief foreign policy experts of previous administrations. These included Henry Kissinger from Nixon-Ford days, and Zbigniew Brzezinski and Mr. Carter himself from the Carter era.

One result was that when the President spoke, a great deal of support had already been arranged, and came into view. Mr. Carter was in print the following day approving what the President proposed and contradicting the Begin contention that the "new start" was a departure from Camp David. On the contrary, said Mr. Carter, who was there, it accorded in every detail with the letter and intent of Camp David.

The disapproval of Moscow was, of course, not prearranged in Washington. But it was a welcome though unintentional assist. To have Moscow call the President's program "pro-Israel" helped to neutralize the Begin contention that it was unfriendly to Israel.

The planning included a surprise for Mr. Begin. A letter, giving details, went to him on August 31. He was reported to be furious at not having had previous warning and not having been "consulted." The reproach fell on deaf ears at the White House, which remembers painfully that Mr. Begin invaded deep into Lebanon without consulting Washington and continued the bombing of west Beirut well after the President had said publicly that he wanted the bombing stopped and that he had "lost patience."

Besides, said White House officials, if Mr. Begin is told of such moves in advance, he is liable to "leak" the facts and launch his own counter-propaganda operation before Washington gets moving. Mr. Begin in this case was surprised. There was the expected "leak" from his offices. His spokesman claimed that Camp David had been betrayed.

But the White House moved the Reagan speech up by one day. The President's proposals got the top headlines. Mr. Begin's objections came second. And, ever since, news of support for or interest in the President's plan has been keeping pace with Mr. Begin's attack on it. The Reagan White House is learning how to play the public relations game against Mr. Begin, a past master in this department.

What prospects for progress along the lines the President has now proposed?

Mr. Begin obviously has not the slightest intention of giving up his own plan, which calls for Israel in effect annexing all of the "occupied territories."

The Arabs under Mr. Begin's plan would end up in a condition much like that of the blacks in South Africa when squeezed into "tribal homelands." The Arabs would have local control over their own fragmented communities but no true "self-determination."

This is the exact opposite of the intention of Camp David and of the new Reagan proposals.

Which concept will prevail?

Mr. Begin has the armed forces to hold control over the area. So long as he is prime minister, he will presumably keep a tight grip on all the occupied territories. And the White House has specifically renounced the idea of putting "pressure" on him by withholding weapons and aid.

But does that literally mean no pressure?

Once before Washington wanted a military withdrawal by Isreal. That was at the end of the 1956 Suez "crisis." Israeli troops occupied the entire Sinai Peninsula. President Eisenhower wanted them back behind their prewar lines.

Mr. Eisenhower did not apply overt "pressure." He did not cancel existing deliveries. He just refused to talk to any Israeli government official about such things as oil—until they pulled their troops back out of Sinai. They did.

In this case, Mr. Begin faces an immediate challenge in the Knesset. The cost of his invasion of Lebanon has been heavy. Israel will be wanting replacements for lost equipment and funds to keep its economy going. Mr. Reagan can afford to let time work inside the political fabric of Israel.

He is offering Israel a new chance to get peace with its Arab neighbors in exchange for territory. The urge for peace may grow inside Israel and among Israel's American supporters to the point where Mr. Begin will either give in or be replaced by a new leadership in Israel. Polls within Israel suggest this is already happening.

Meanwhile, Mr. Reagan has walked back from his hard-line stand on the pipeline affair. And the presence of Richard Nixon in Peking this past week testifies to the fact that U.S.-China relations are back on track after the Taiwan detour of last year.●

SOCIETY OF PLASTICS ENGINEERS ANNIVERSARY; FRANK S. MARRA HONORED

HON. JIM DUNN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Society of Plastics Engineers, a group founded in Michigan and about to celebrate its 40th anniversary on September 21. I would also like to recognize and congratulate Frank S. Marra of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., who will be honored as the SPE Detroit chapter's 1982 outstanding member during the anniversary celebration.

Now headquartered in Brookfield Center, Conn., the SPE was founded in 1942 by the late Fred O. Conley during a meeting at Tam-O-Shanter Country Club in Orchard Lake, Mich. What started as an organization of 132 members has grown through the past 40 years into a worldwide association with 84 chapters and close to 25,000 members.

The SPE represents the engineering side of the plastics industry, with "plastics" being one of the most important and growing industries in the United States. The SPE and its members have worked closely with the automotive industry in weight reduction programs to aid the energy conservation programs of the U.S. Government. Robert D. Forger, the executive director of SPE, and Thomas W. Haas, SPE's 1982–83 president, will both discuss the history and future of the SPE at its 40th anniversary celebration, to be held at Tam-O-Shanter Country Club, the site of its original founding.

In addition, the Detroit section will honor Frank S. Marra, president of the D-M-E Co., as its 1982 outstanding member. A listing of Mr. Marra's accomplishments during the past 35 years shows that he is truly deserving of this honor.

Mr. Marra worked as a co-op toolmaker while in vocational high school and was in the U.S. Naval Reserves from 1945–46. He received a degree in mechanical engineering from Lawrence Institute of Technology in 1949 and served in the U.S. Navy in 1950 during the Korean war.

He joined D-M-E as a sales manager in 1949 and later became advertising and marketing manager and executive vice president at the company. In 1968, he was named president and general manager and 2 years later became a senior vice president and director for the plastics group of the VSI Corp., which had purchased D-M-E in 1961. Mr. Marra became an executive vice president of VSI Corp. on October 1, 1981, and it was recently announced that he will become president and chief operating officer of VSI, effective October 1 of this year.

His contributions to the SPE began in 1950 and have continued to the present. In 1958 he was a Detroit section vice president and from 1959 to 1964 served on the Detroit section board of directors. He has been a cochairman and member of the National SPE Credentials Committee since 1961. In 1978, Mr. Marra became a charter member of the board of directors SPE Moldmakers and Mold Design Division and the I. T. Quarnstrom Foundation. Since 1977, he has also been a member of the SPE Moldmakers' Division Policy Board. He has spoken at conferences thoughout the United States and Canada and has received several awards, including the national certificate of merit in 1974 and a distinguished member award in 1979. Mr. Marra and his wife, Phyllis, have three children and live in Bloomfield Hills, Mich.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for letting me have this time to recognize an outstanding organization and one of its finest individuals. I offer my sincere congratulations and admiration for their past accomplishments and want to extend my best wishes for a prosperous future.●

HISPANIC AEROSPACE WORKERS CONSORTIUM HONORS FIRST HISPANIC ASTRONAUT

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, when America's first astronauts ventured into space nearly a quarter century ago, the hearts and minds of people around the world went with them. The same is true today and we are all delight in the successes of the Space Shuttle missions.

It is only fitting, then, that as we celebrate National Hispanic Heritage Week, we pay tribute to the first astronaut of Hispanic descent. I am speaking of Dr. Franklin R. Chang, who is currently a member of the NASA team.

Dr. Chang is being honored this coming Sunday, September 19, by the Hispanic Aerospace Workers Consortium, an organization of employees at Rockwell International in Los Angeles. The consortium was established to provide a communication link among Hispanic employees regarding job opportunities, resources, and general information relevant to Rockwell Hispanic employees. They also work with students in helping them to prepare for the type of background that high technology companies such as Rockwell are looking for.

The Hispanic Aerospace Workers Consortium has a number of other objectives, as well, establishing liaison and lines of communication with other minority communities, legislative representatives, and the community in general.

When Dr. Chang makes his first flight on the Space Shuttle in the near future, he will carry with him the hopes and aspirations of 20 million Hispanic people. Dr. Chang was selected as an astronaut candidate by NASA in 1980. Since then, he has completed the 1-year training and evaluation period making him eligible for assignment as a mission specialist on future Space Shuttle flight crews.

Dr. Chang has a remarkable background. Born in 1950 in San Jose, Costa Rica, he was graduated from the University of Connecticut in 1973 with a bachelor's degree in mechanical engineering. In 1977, he received a doctorate in applied physics from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. At MIT, Dr. Chang became involved in the U.S.-controlled fusion program and did extensive research in the design and operation of fusion reactors.

After finishing at MIT, Dr. Chang joined the technical staff of the Charles Stark Draper Laboratory. His work there was geared strongly toward the design and integration of control systems for fusion reactor concepts and experimental devices. In 1979, Dr. Chang developed a novel concept to guide and target fuel pellets in an inertial fusion reactor chamber and, more recently, has been engaged in the design of novel magnetic systems for energy recovery and impurity control in fusion powerplants. He has presented numerous papers at technical conferences and in scientific journals.

In addition to his scientific work, Dr. Chang has worked as a house manager in an experimental community residence for deinstitutionalizing chronic mental patients. More recently, he became involved as an adviser with a rehabilitation program for Hispanic drug users.

Today, I am sure you will join me in saluting Dr. Chang and the Hispanic Aerospace Workers Consortium, and wishing them continued success.●

COLUMBIA: NO GEM IN OHIO

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, all of us are aware that the price of natural gas to our consumers is increasing at alarming rates. We are reminded of this in every day's mail. Our constituents may not realize it, but the bizarre and Byzantine natural gas law passed in 1978 by this Congress at the request of President Carter is to blame. How else could prices go up 40 percent when demand for gas is down by a dramatic amount? After all, we have seen the demand for oil fall over the last 2 years and the price has fallen accordingly. This is understandable. Sellers of oil keep lowering the price in order to induce reluctant consumers to buy. Oil prices were down by 9.7 percent in June 1982 from their January 1981 level.

Natural gas prices still go up, completely oblivious to the reality that the demand for natural gas is decreasing with every price increase. Instead of leveling off, prices go up still further because the pipelines which buy the natural gas from producers can pass through the ever-escalating price of gas to their consumers automatically without being subject to the natural resistance of the market or regulation. How is this possible? Why, it is the gift of Congress—the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 which provides incentives for a pipeline to buy gas at a price higher than the real world of the market can support. The NGPA has many fundamental flaws—flaws which led me in 1978 to plead for its rejection by this House.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I would like to include an article from a newspaper in my State of Ohio, the Licking Countian, on my efforts to bring some sense to the Columbia Gas Transmission Corp., the pipeline company which delivers gas to Ohio. Ms. June Martin, its author, does a very good job of telling a complicated story in an understandable and very readable manner. As a newspaper editor myself, I compliment her journalistic skills.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

COLUMBIA: CADILLAC PRICES

(By June Martin)

Columbia Transmission Corporation, the pipeline supplier of Columbia Gas of Ohio, is stopping production of over 9000 gas wells in Ohio due to surplus on the market. The kicker is that Columbia is buying high priced gas from Louisiana and Oklahoma. Storming the walls of this utility kingpin is Representative Clarence "Bud" Brown, candidate for governor on the Republican ticket.

Filing a "friend of the court" brief with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, Brown complained that Columbia has been one of the highest purchasers of expensive deregulated gas, both by volume and by price and plans on passing the cost to the consumer. He also charged that while buying from "deep gas" producers of the Southeastern United States, Columbia has forced Ohio gas wells to be shut in. Following a 44-day shut-in in 1981, Columbia required producers to shut their wells for 90 days this summer or reduce production by half for a period of 180 days. This Ohio gas would be substantially cheaper than the prices Columbia has been paying to Louisiana or Oklahoma producers.

Columbia meanwhile contends that in order to get secure and sufficient supplies of natural gas, it must engage in the bidding war with other pipelines for unregulated gas and pay amounts in excess of $10 per MCF (million cubic feet). However, for six months, ending February 28, 1982, just over 9 percent of Columbia's gas supply purchases from producers were of section 107 uncontrolled gas at an average cost of $8.39 per MCF. During the same period 35 percent of Columbia's purchases from gas producers were of section 104 "old" controlled gas at an average cost of $1.53 per MCF.

Also, Columbia has its own deregulated gas production, and it would be interesting to know how much Columbia is buying its own "deep gas" at Cadillac prices, rolling those costs through to consumers and dumping that Cadillac gas to off-system purchasers at Chevy prices.

Brown claims that unlike Transcontinental and Michigan-Wisconsin pipelines, Columbia has done nothing to ease the burdens its has placed on the consumers it serves. Since May 1, Transco has cut the costs of its 107 gas purchases in half by refusing to take any more $6–$10 gas. It has done this by exercising all the market-out clauses which it has in its gas purchase contracts. Michigan-Wisconsin has also exercised market-out clauses and has reduced its 107 gas costs by roughly $3 per MCF.

Strangely, Columbia cannot follow Transco's lead because Columbia did not negotiate with producers for any market-out rights prior to June 1, 1985. Since Columbia refuses to make its 107 contracts public, it is not known to what extent Columbia could reduce its "deep gas" purchase costs. This failure to use contractual safeguards which would have alleviated the damage caused by Columbia's own misjudgement in the amount of gas the corporation would need, makes it the responsibility of the corporation, and not that of the Ohio consumers, contends Brown.

If Columbia would do what Transco had done, Ohio gas consumers would receive less of an increase in cost and Ohio gas producers would sell gas instead of shutting it in, because a good deal of Ohio gas is competitive at $5 MCF.

Back in March, Brown testified before the Columbia Gas hearing of FERC in Columbus. At that time he pointed out our country's strange dual market of regulated and deregulated gas prices, which has caused serious market ordering problems.

President Carter's Natural Gas Policy Act (NGPA), guarantees pipelines the right to pass through to customers the costs incurred in purchasing, as long as those prices are not the result of fraud or abuse. The mechanism for this pass through is the "purchased gas adjustment." The issue in the Columbia case is whether they should be permitted to pass to consumers the cost of purchasing high priced gas when there appears to be little or no economic justification for Columbia to incur this cost. The corporation itself projects a surplus of supply through 1985.

Marketing problems have been created by the NGPA's part regulated and part deregulated pricing structure. For example, currently regulated well-head gas prices are far below the prices that gas would bring in a free market. Depending upon how much of this federally priced regulated cheap gas a pipeline has, it can afford to bid up the price of unregulated gas supplies because the price consumers pay is the average cost of all of a pipeline's gas over a given time. Thus prices for gas in the narrow deregulated categories are far above prices that would prevail in a free market where all producers of gas had to compete against each other for sales and all pipelines competed freely with each other for the least expensive sources of natural gas.

For example, the average well-head price of gas was $1.91 per MCF in Sept. 1981 (equivalent to $11 per barrel of crude oil). Much regulated gas is being sold at prices below this; however, because it is selling at prices put under contract years ago when gas was less costly to find. Uncontrolled gas is frequently selling for more than $9 per MCF (equivalent to crude oil cost $50 barrel). The only apparent constraint on prices pipelines seem willng to pay for gas in unregulate categories is the pipeline's ability to sell gas at its average price. If that average price gets too high, industrial and residential consumers might choose to switch to oil.

The net effect of this strange dual market is that the benefit of price controlled gas is not going to customers, but to producers of unregulated gas who are receiving prices that are higher than market prices would be without this patchwork of regulations—a benefit not enjoyed by the shut-in Ohio producers.

As the ranking Republican on the House Energy and Power Subcommittee, Brown strongly opposed the NGPA when it was approved in 1978, arguing that "if there ever was a legislative proposal that embraced all the flaws, it is this bill."●

THE WORSENING PLIGHT OF SOVIET JEWRY

HON. ANTHONY TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, the past several months have brought intensified Soviet persecution of Jews, particularly those wishing to emigrate.

This year, Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union has averaged less than 250 people per month. This is the lowest level in over 10 years. Harassment of Jews and attacks on Jewish study and cultural groups have increased dramatically. Only a few days ago, Soviet officials arrested Feliks Kochubievski, a Jew who has been waiting for an exit visa for over 4 years. Charged with distributing anti-Soviet articles, Mr. Kochubievski joins dozens of other Jewish prisoners of conscience in the Soviet Union who have been imprisoned for their determination to practice their faith and to make Israel their home.

Like many of the tens of thousands of Jewish refuseniks, Mr. Kochubievski has been denied the right to family reunification guaranteed by the Helsinki accords, which the Soviet Union has signed. He has two sons in Israel. Like many of his fellow refuseniks, he was dismissed from his job for his desire to emigrate. And like many other refuseniks, he may serve a prison sentence, possibly in a hard labor camp, for speaking out on behalf of his cultural and civil rights.

Against this backdrop of deepening despair, it is heartening that the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Human Rights today approved House Concurrent Resolution 336, legislation which I introduced earlier this year to urge the Soviets to adopt a more humane emigration policy. The Human Rights Subcommittee staff and the National Conference on Soviet Jewry deserve special thanks for their diligent efforts to get this resolution passed. This resolution, which also calls upon the President to discuss Soviet Jewry at upcoming summit talks, grain and trade negotiations, and other appropriate opportunities, is a modest step toward reversing the dismal plight of Soviet Jews. I hope that the full Foreign Affairs Committee and the House will now act quickly to approve this resolution.

It is hard for those of us who take our freedom for granted to understand the ruthless repression which Jewish refuseniks must bear. They are systematically denied academic and career opportunities, and enjoy no freedom of religion, emigration, or cultural expression. We in Congress must continue to speak out on behalf of these brave people, who cling to their cultural heritage in spite of the consequences. And we must continue to press the Soviets to pursue a more humane and civilized emigration policy.●

SUBCOMMITTEE ON OVERSIGHT AND INVESTIGATIONS, HOUSE VETERANS' AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

HON. RONALD M. MOTTL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, a hearing on agent orange was held this morning by the House Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations. I would like to submit for the RECORD my colleague TOM DASCHLE'S opening statement.

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE TOM DASCHLE

Mr. Chairman I appreciate your willingness to hold these hearings today and allow me to be a participant.

In my four years in the Congress I have not faced an issue as frustrating and perplexing as Agent Orange. Nonetheless, a major step forward was achieved last year with the passage of legislation (Public Law 97-72) approving priority health care and medical treatment for Vietnam Veterans suffering from the effects of Agent Orange. The House of Representatives and Senate unanimously agreed that this was a necessary and reasonable step to assure Vietnam Veterans of our commitment to their concerns until the various scientific studies shed more light on the complexities of this issue.

From the beginning I have had doubts about the Veterans' Administration's ability and commitment to fulfill the mandate in Public Law 96-151, which ordered the VA to conduct an epidemiological study into the effects of Agent Orange on Vietnam Veterans. Unfortunately, my worst fears have come true and I believe that certain parties in the VA are deliberately trying to delay the Agent Orange study. Mr. Chairman, this study was ordered nearly three years ago and it hasn't even begun. I believe the reason the VA is delaying the inception of this study is that they do not want to face the ultimate decision of compensating Vietnam Veterans and their families. This is evidenced by the fact that the VA has still not developed a statutory framework for the resolution of veterans claims, despite the fact that a number of scientific studies outside the VA will be completed within the next several months. To add insult to injury, the VA has admitted that it will be 1988 or 1989 until this study is completed. This is unacceptable and I am outraged.

This past March, two scientific review panels, the Office of Technology Assessment (OTA) and the White House Agent Orange Work Group Science Panel approved a protocol design for the VA study as well as an exposure index developed by the Army Agent Orange Task Force. The exposure index will be used in selecting study cohorts of veterans who were or were not exposed to the herbicide during their service in Vietnam. Virtually every relevant agency in the Federal government is represented on the Science Panel or the Work Group, including the Departments of Defense, Labor, Health and Human Services, Agriculture, EPA, OMB, National Cancer Institute, Center for Disease Control. National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH), National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences (NIEHS), OTA, the VA and others.

Despite the approval of all these agencies, the VA decided in May, four months after submitting the second protocol design to the Science Panel and OTA, that yet another scientific review was necessary. This additional review, conducted by the National Academy of Sciences is still underway.

Then, in July, the VA announced to the Science Panel that the exposure index previously agreed to needed further refinement. Today, six months after the initial agreement on the index had been reached, and two months after announcing their dissatisfaction to the Science Panel, the VA has still not finalized and sent to the DOD the changes they now seek to make so the Army Agent Orange Task Force can continue their process of cohort selection.

The VA has had innumerable problems since this effort first began including the rejection of the initial protocol design. I believe these problems have been the direct result of a lack of in-house expertise in this area. At this very moment the VA still does not have an epidemiologist on board and I believe that many of their problems are directly related to this lack of in-house expertise. A full time epidemiologist should be hired immediately so that crucial decisions relative to the study are made by an expert in the field.

Mr. Chairman, the delays in this study are an unconscionable affront to the dignity of Vietnam Veterans and their families. Vietnam Veterans will not stand for it, the American people will not stand for it and the U.S. Congress most certainly will not stand for it. Unless the VA decides on final exposure criteria as well as whether to include a third cohort of veterans who didn't serve in Vietnam within 7 days of this hearing and begin a planned pilot study within 30 days, I believe that this committee should take action to relieve the VA of all responsibilities relative to this long delayed study. I am having legislation drafted at this moment to achieve this end.

Finally, it is time to take action with respect to compensating Vietnam Veterans with soft tissue cancers. Three Swedish epidemiological studies have documented increased soft tissue cancer rates in Swedes exposed to herbicides containing dioxin. In addition, a National Institute of Safety and Health (NIOSH) dioxin registry has revealed significantly higher rates of soft tissue cancers in U.S. industrial workers exposed to dioxin. Considering this plethora of scientific data and the fact that soft tissue cancers are exceedingly rare in young age groups, compensation is not out of order.

Mr. Chairman, Vietnam Veterans deserve better than to wait until 1988 or 1989 for the VA to provide answers. Every other government body now conducting research on Agent Orange, including the Air Force and Center for Disease Control, will be providing clues to the specific hazards of Agent Orange no later than the end of next year. Even the Australian government, which sanctioned their own studies long after Congress was forced to order a study, expect to complete all their efforts next year.

As Franklin Delano Roosevelt once said, "The only limits on the realization of tomorrow are our doubts today." Mr. Chairman, there already exist too many doubts about this study to allow these delays to go on.●

WHAT THE THREE SISTERS PREDICT FOR THE CLINCH RIVER REACTOR

HON. SID MORRISON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of the nuclear age, the United States has been the world leader in the peaceful uses of the atom. Today, all the industrialized countries of the world have strong nuclear power programs in place. In addition, they are committed to the development and commercialization of advanced nuclear breeder technology.

Although the United States took an early lead in breeder development, France, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union have been operating demonstration plants since the 1970's. West Germany is now building an intermediate-sized demonstration plant, and Japan will soon begin construction of its own loop-type plant. A consortium of European partners, led by France, will operate the 1,200-megawatt Superphenix by 1984 and the Soviets are designing a 1,600-megawatt plant.

Despite the broad base of foreign actual breeder operating experience, technologically the United States still leads all other countries, due partially to the experience gained from the fast-flux test facility in my district. In designing the first U.S. demonstration plant, the Clinch River breeder reactor, American scientists have incorporated features and innovations no other country can claim. In fact, Europe and Japan have shown interest in incorporating some of our technology in their breeder plants. And yet, there are those, under the guise of being fiscally conservative, who would have us abandon this leadership and continue to rely on foreign entities to supply our energy needs.

I believe it is especially appropriate that today, while the Clinch River foes rally around to defeat this important project, Members on both sides of the issue take time to read Llewellyn King's editorial from the August 26 Energy Daily. It provides background and insight that I believe will be helpful.

WHAT THE THREE SISTERS PREDICT FOR THE CLINCH RIVER REACTOR

(By Llewellyn King)

Access to Washington from Virginia, where much of its working population lives, is made more difficult because of a shortage of bridges across the Potomac. As man's works go, bridges are among the most benign, fitting into the landscape and enhancing rather than detracting from the environment. The world would be poorer without the Golden Gate, Sydney Harbor, the Bridge of Sighs, the Chesapeake Bay Bridge, or even, yes, the Brooklyn Bridge. Therefore, for a long time it was planned to build a sixth bridge into Washington from northern Virginia to be called the Three Sisters Bridge. But it was not to be. Even after some of the pilings were sunk in the late 1960s, a coalition of assorted activists under the banners of environmentalism, civic action and consumerism, waged a bitter fight that resulted in abandonment of the facility.

The arguments covered now familiar landscape: it would be too expensive, it would destroy community life in Washington, it would damage the river, Washington would become another Los Angeles, and many more. The activists won and there is no bridge.

The result is that northern Virginia commuters sit in long lines, particularly on the George Washington Parkway which would have been most relieved by the bridge. They burn gasoline and pollute the air. Additionally, two ugly satellite communities have grown up on the western bank of the Potomac, Rosslyn and Crystal City. Now a candidate for mayor of Washington is actually proposing busing city workers to jobs that have been forced out into the surburban communities.

The architects of this urban error are not to be found; gone on, no doubt, to defend the people's interest elsewhere.

The saga of the Three Sisters Bridge is brought to mind by the fate of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor which may be sealed next month on the floor of the House of Representatives. Rep. Claudine Schneider (R-R.I.), a freshman congresswomen, is leading a fight to delete funding for the breeder and so terminate a project that has been a central part of the nation's nuclear strategy for a decade and half. The matter at issue is not so much the merits or otherwise of Clinch River, but a case of how a determined bunch of activists can take it upon themselves to force a contrived conclusion to a national project.

The Clinch River Breeder Reactor has had a troubled history and I have been among its critics for many years. The project was conceived as a partnership between the utility industry and the government by the former Atomic Energy Commission. At its inception, Clinch River, in the cost estimates of the day, would have been a financially shared project. As it stands today, the demonstration breeder is a project nearly totally financed by the Treasury with a utility contribution of only $270 million. The world has changed around Clinch River in every respect: the cost of money the need for power, projections of uranium resources, the future of the nuclear option itself and the ability of the utility industry as presently constituted to purchase breeders in their second generation. It is not hard to make a case for re-examining the project and particularly for re-examining its financing. But its detractors, who are led by a coalition of environmentalists of a neo-Luddite persuasion, are not concerned with giving it a trial before its execution. Schneider says she is 95 percent certain that she has the votes to do the dastardly deed while the Congress is considering a continuing resolution to finance the government. If Schneider is right, Clinch River will be put away in an offhand way by congressman acting not on the considered evidence for the continuation of the project in the new realities of 1982, but reacting to the cumulative lobbying power of those who are ideologically opposed to nuclear power and who have made Clinch River the target of their vengeance since the inception of the project.

An article in The Congress Watcher, a publication of the Ralph Nader organization, explains how it was done. The publication says: "One of the primary causes for alarm among congressional backers of the project is the grassroots organizing campaign instituted by Congress Watch in concert with the National Taxpayers Coalition Against Clinch River. The campaign targeted twenty-five 'key' incumbents in the northeast and midwest who voted for Clinch last year for intensive local lobbying. Grassroots activity is also being encouraged in 200 other districts around the country.

"The purpose of the campaign was to generate enough constituent and media/editorial pressure to convince the Representatives to withdraw their support for CRBR. To do this, the coalition assigned an organizer to each of the target districts. There, organizers brought together coalitions of labor, peace, and environmental groups in opposition to the reactor, encouraged local opposition candidates to take public stands against Clinch and challenge the incumbent on his pro-Clinch voting record, and generated local letter-writing campaigns, telephone and telegram trees and constituent meetings with the Representatives.

"To fuel the fight, the coalition provided the districts with background information; buttons, bumper stickers, and brochures were sent to those indicating an interest in working locally against the Breeder. Often, one or two district residents acted as local coordinators, handling the details of press conferences, setting up preliminary meetings between local groups and organizers, and working with local media."

The preceding is eloquent testimony to how a bunch of ideologues dedicated to a single purpose can manipulate the Congress to a course of action that its instigators will later claim reflects the will of the people.

It is no way to bring great projects to fruition. It is a way to litter the landscape with the ruins of many beginnings and no conclusions, and it is an appalling way of preparing for the future. It is also an egregious waste of the talent and money already spent.

I've argued in the past that a demonstration breeder reactor should have been built expeditiously on a government site and examined for its licensability retrospectively but not licensed in the conventional way. That way a considerable amount of money would already have been saved, the reactor would be operating and the technical experience would be part of the world's sum of knowledge. But despite the protestations to the contrary of its critics, the nuclear community, going back to its earliest days when weapons manufacture was wrested from the Pentagon, has had a recalcitrant strain of egalitarianism.

It was the hated Joint Committee on Atomic Energy that conceived the radical concept of public participation in licensing. For example, there is no public participation in the issuance of an airworthiness certificate for a jetliner, and jetliners have a more palpable bearing on the health and safety of the public than do remotely-located reactors.

Likewise, it was the Atomic Energy Commission, painted by its critics as the embodiment of public insensitivity, which insisted that the first demonstration breeder reactor should be licensed and should be designed to demonstrate that breeder reactors can be licensed according to the prevailing licensing regime, a many-splendored thing.

It is in large measure because of these publicly-minded criteria that the road for CRBR has been so bumpy.

The project, insofar as it exists, does so in a series of warehouses around Knoxville for want of regulatory approval of site preparation. Considering its difficulties, it has shown stunning endurance. President Carter tried to stop it and the Congress funded it. Even among nuclear supporters it has had its telling critics including, in and out of office, James Schlesinger. It is not universally loved in industry and because, for the Carter years, it had to be financed against the will of the Administration, it has not been honestly evaluated for some time. In the nearest thing to such an evaluation—a General Accounting Office report in July—it received a surprising bill of health. In short, GAO said finish it.

The Administration and the Congress need to take a new look at Clinch River; at its future in view of the unravelling of the nuclear power program, and the expectations for uranium supply. It also needs to be assessed for its technological contribution. But most of all, it needs to be looked at in terms of how it can be financed (should the decision to proceed be in the affirmative) off the budget in order to protect it from the wrath of the white-wine-and-quiche crusaders who, if they lose this year, will be back next year and the year after.

The figures do not look all that bad; in fact, they are quite encouraging. While its critics have pointed to the massive (and there's no denying that) escalation in price, they fitfully ignore the corresponding increase in the price of electricity which makes the project close to economically viable.

Schneider says that the project will cost $7.5 billion and Westinghouse, the prime contractor, is talking in the region of $3.2 billion. Estimates of the value of the electricity which will be produced and sold to the Tennessee Valley Authority extend over the life of the plant from $3 billion to $8 billion. For a demonstration plant, that does not sound like a turkey. If these figures can be substantiated, a case can be made for continuing the project and for financing it with a loan guarantee, or possibly even a bond sale, or some mixture of these devices.

But no case for or against CRBR can be made without some consideration for its international impact. Europe and Japan stand to gain marginally useful technological data from Clinch River. Because of its flexible design it allows for relatively easy interchange of heat exchangers. This could help other nations with less flexible designs, which have suffered major heat exchanger problems. Similarly, the denser U.S. breeder fuel will prove of interest to reprocessors who do not know what the characteristics of the fuel would be.

But that is by the by. The central issue to our allies is one of dependability in partnership. There are already discussions between Japan, Germany, the United Kingdom and other interested governments on future breeder cooperation. The big machines to come cry out for multinational development, but the United States has been establishing itself as an unreliable partner, a maverick ally, a skittish bedfellow. While political machinations among governments are routine—who could forget General de Gaulle?—disbelief in the contract-worthiness of the U.S. is growing.

Confidence, which was eroded by the Carter Administration when it reversed two decades of breeder and reprocessing policy, has taken a new hammering in the matter of the Soviet gas pipeline. If Congress contrives to extinguish the CRBR, it is reasonable for our allies to conclude that you cannot trust us in the long haul; that America has no longevity.

For a host of reasons, more deliberation needs to go into the future of CRBR than for it to be throttled in a quick amendment to a money bill by a Congress which is scrambling to go home to deal with its own longevity problem.●

MODERNIZATION OF THE NATIONAL DEFENSE INDUSTRIAL BASE

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, from Maj. Gen. J. Milnor Roberts, AUS (retired), executive director of the Reserve Officers Association, I have received the following resolution which I am pleased to insert in the RECORD at this point:

MODERNIZATION OF THE NATIONAL DEFENSE INDUSTRIAL BASE

Whereas there is more to national defense than having well-trained personnel equipped with superior weapon systems; and

Whereas our industrial base is an integral part of our national security posture and a strong industrial base is an important deterrent to conflict; and

Whereas without a responsive industrial base, both our weapon systems' capabilities and our flexibility to respond to national security interests and sustain a desired level of activity are severely impaired; and

Whereas the U.S. defense industry is hard-pressed to meet even the current, relatively modest, procurement goals of the military services; and

Whereas over the past decade thousands of subcontractors have deserted the defense business while major defense producers have failed to invest adequately in new technology; and

Whereas studies have shown that many problems exist in the ability of our industries to reach swiftly to the need for increased defense production, thus highlighting a weakness in our combat sustainability: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Reserve Officers Association of the United States urges the Congress to pass legislation to encourage and assist in the modernization of the Nation's industrial base to strengthen our defense capabilities and ensure national security.●

AIR POLLUTION: IT HURTS MORE THAN PEOPLE

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity to comment on the continuing concern about air pollution. There has been an enormous amount of time and effort spent in the debate on where the line is drawn between public need versus public desire when setting air quality standards.

It has often been suggested that the cost of reducing the concentration of air pollutants far exceeds the cost of that pollution to the community. While a finite dollars and cents figure could not be placed on the benefits of clean air, we do not need to rely on the esthetic aspects of clean air as justification for air quality controls.

In the past year especially, several reports have brought to our attention the monetary importance of clean air, and the economic damage induced by dirty air. Earlier this year, the Office of Technology Assessment (OTA), in a preliminary study of the effect of ozone pollution on a number of popular crops, reports startling figures of economic loss. In California alone, the damage to crops due to ozone and other airborne pollutants has been estimated at close to the $1 billion mark. Also to be considered in the costs of allowing this pollution to continue are the secondary costs to society produced due to the death of species in restricted areas, the reduction in the growth of forests and the damage done to our lakes and streams—and consequently aquatic life—due to acid rain.

Because of the documentation of the importance of these ecological factors, George M. Woodwell, in an article in the Christian Science Monitor, suggests that ecological damage should be considered in setting air quality standards. I would like to urge my colleagues to review and consider Mr. Woodwell's perspective outlined in the following article, and keep it in mind during the coming debates and action on the Clean Air Act. Perhaps this might help us all sort out the forest from the trees when defining our priorities for air quality regulation.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Sept. 9, 1982]

NEEDED: A CLEAN AIR ACT STRONG ENOUGH TO PROTECT PLANTS

(By George M. Woodwell)

How clean must we keep the air?

The answer has been made complicated; it need not be. It is determined by the requirements for life—by the physical, chemical, and biotic conditions that are required to support living systems. These include not only man himself but those other organisms upon which man depends. It is not determined by partial cost-benefit analyses, or by compromise among competing polluters.

Standards for air quality are derived from two sources: (1) effects on man and (2) effects on other living systems. Criteria based on effects on man are less stringent than those based on effects on plants. This is because plants are more sensitive than people to low-level air pollution. This relationship is true in virtually every circumstance except for ionizing radiation, where standards for protection of man are adequate to protect all other organisms.

It is not surprising that those who may profit from pollution call for relaxed standards on the grounds that hazards to human health are small. Such arguments are largely irrelevant. The most important and demanding criteria are those derived from populations of plants and the factors that affect them. If plants are protected, people will be free of both direct and indirect effects of air pollution.

The costs to industry may be high, but the costs of failure to protect people and plants are far higher. The most immediate issue is the strengthening of the Clean Air Act, now up for renewal in the US Congress, and the governmental apparatus required to carry it.

Consider the Northeastern United States. There has been an increase over the last three decades in both the acidity of rain over North America and the area affected by the acidification. Effects are concentrated in the Northeast. All the acidity is not deposited in rain. A substantial fraction—one-third to one-half—apparently arrives as sulfur dioxide on small particles. It is removed from the air on to surfaces, including leaves, where it is converted to acid.

Other changes include increases in exposure of plants to a variety of contaminants such as ozone and heavy metals. All are produced as a result of the heavy use of fossil fuels in industrialized areas to the west and south. New England bears the brunt of the effects because the storm tracts commonly pass through it.

Effects of this atmospheric chemistry are sufficiently complicated and difficult to measure to provide ample basis for discussion among scientists and equivocation by others. The most clearly definced effect of acid rain is the acidification of lakes and streams in areas where the bedrock contains little limestone. Such areas have granitic rocks, their metamorphic equivalents or sedimentary rocks that have a low alkalinity and therefore little capacity for neutralizing acids.

Most of New England falls in this category. Its lakes, streams, and ground water are turning acid. The effect is the loss of freshwater fisheries in lakes and streams, the virtual sterilization of the water bodies. High acidity in wells mobilizes aluminum and other metals containing lead from minerals in the ground and in pipes. Aluminum is toxic to plants and certain animals, including fish. Lead and other heavy metals are toxic to people as well.

In certain instances, the additions of the nitrogen and sulfur associated with the acidification have caused increases in growth of trees. There is, however, substantially no basis for assuming that the acid-leaching of forests or agricultural crops by the more acid rains will produce any effect in the longer term apart from imporverishment in essential nutrients, reduction in rates of growth, reductions in agricultural yields, and the loss of species and yields from forests. These effects are in part directly due to the acidification and in part due to increased incidence of diseases favored by any generalized stress.

The effects of ozone and other components of photochemical smog compound the problem. The national standard for ozone was set in 1971 as 0.08 p.p.m. The EPA reported that, in 1977, all but one of the 34 monitoring stations in New England reported violations of the standard. The standard was increased in 1979 to 0.12 p.p.m. The probability was 95 percent or more that ozone concentrations exceed the new standards in 1977 and 1980 over extensive areas in the United States, including the Eastern US from south of Washington to Portland, Maine. Many plant species are sensitive to photoxidant damage at concentrations below the current standard.

Evidence for the effects of air pollution on forests is accumulating rapidly. Damage has been shown in stands of white pine along the Blue Ridge Parkway in western Virginia. An average reduction in growth of 40 percent was measured for the period 1955-77. A similar reduction in the growth of pitch pine has been reported in New Jersey over approximately the same period. Other trees showing severe declines in vigor, even widespread mortality, over extensive areas in New England include the beech, the red spruce, the white ash, and the white and yellow birches. Insect and disease organisms are known to increase under air pollution, and it would be surprising to discover that the problems observed in forests in the Northeast are not caused by the combination of air pollutants now present.

The pattern of change to be expected in the terrestrial vegetation under this series of stresses is well known. These transitions are under way: losses of forest productivity, shifts in species, losses of tree species, all accompanied by losses of freshwater fisheries and the acidification of ground water, with toxic consequences for man.

The evidence is that agricultural yields in the Ohio River Basin are being reduced significantly and that photosynthesis by forests over large areas is also being reduced. A measure of this is seen in the magnitude of reductions in solar energy captured by plants and made available by both agriculture and forests. These range upward to as much as 40 percent in certain circumstances. A general 20 percent reduction in the magnitude of these resources would not be surprising.

If the reduction applies to all of New England's forests, it would, in energy terms, amount to the output of between fifteen and thirty 1,000-megawatt power plants, or 135 to 270 billion kilowatts a year. Valued as electricity, it would be worth $7 billion to $14 billion. This is a substantial subsidy for the New England states to be paying from their forests and pastures and cultivated fields in the interests of industrialization elsewhere.

These statements may appear as mere assertions by an overly sensitive scientist. Each statement, however, can be documented in detail from the extensive literature now available on air pollution and on biotic effects. While none of these statements are beyond argument, the weight of evidence is that our regulatory system, as it stood before it was cut by the present administration, was inadequate to protect the public's vital interests. The proposals to weaken the Clean Air Act further promise still greater erosion of the capacity of the nation to support people.

How clean must we keep the air? Clean enough for green plants.●

HOPES FOR A NEW YEAR OF PEACE AND PROSPERITY

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, on Friday at sunset millions of Jews throughout the world will begin the celebration of the Jewish New Year, 5743. The sounding of the ram's horn on Rosh Hashanah marks the arrival of the high holy days. These 10 days which culminate in Yom Kippur are the most solemn time of the year in our religious calendar.

Rosh Hashanah is a time to remember and to reflect, not only on the events of the past year, but on the fundamental issues: the creation of the world, the meaning of one's existence, and the wonder of God's enduring covenant with Israel.

Following our ancient traditions, millions of Jews will pause in prayer, fasting, and ritual observances to put their lives in perspective and to renew their commitments to the tenets of their faith, so that by Yom Kippur their names may be written into the Book of Life.

But these holy days are also a time of thanksgiving and hope. We take time to thank our God for the gift of life, for our religious and cultural heritage which enriches our existence, and to marvel at the survival of the Jewish community despite thousands of years of persecution, oppression, and the almost demoniacal campaigns of murderous fanatics who sought to destroy our people. But the people of Israel live, and during this holy season they pray longingly for the time when all Jews will be able to live in peace and security, and for the day when the survival and prosperity of the nation of Israel is assured.

May I take this opportunity to extend to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all my colleagues and friends, a very special "Shannah Tova" and a new year of peace and prosperity for you and our great Nation.●

SOVIETS LINKED TO ASSASSINATION ATTEMPT OF POPE

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit two newspaper articles for the benefit of my colleagues on the new evidence beginning to surface linking the Soviet KGB to the assassination attempt of the Pope last year. These articles summarize an NBC special to be aired at 10 p.m. on Tuesday, September 21, 1982. I urge my colleagues in the Congress to try and watch that program.

I recently called for hearings to be held in the Helsinki Commission focusing on this issue and would strongly encourage my colleagues to attend this hearing at 9:30 a.m. on Thursday, September 23, in room 2172, Rayburn House Office Building.

[From the New York Times, Sept. 15, 1982]

NBC NEWS LINKS SOVIET TO ATTEMPT ON POPE'S LIFE

NBC News reported yesterday that it had found evidence suggesting that Pope John Paul II was the target of an assassination attempt with the knowledge and perhaps the assistance of Soviet and Bulgarian intelligence agencies.

NBC News said the Pope was targeted because of his support of the solidarity movement in Poland. The report also said that the Pope had sent a handwritten letter to Leonid I. Brezhnev, the Soviet leader, in 1980 in which the Polish-born Pope said he would abdicate the papacy and lead the resistance if Soviet troops invaded Poland.

The letter, reportedly delivered by a Vatican envoy, instigated a secret shuttle mission between Moscow, Rome and Warsaw that led eventually to a temporary easing of the Soviet attitude toward Solidarity, NBC News said.

It said its report came after a nine-month investigation by the correspondents Marvin Kalb and Bill McLaughlin. The network released details of the investigation today in advance of the airing of a documentary, "The Man Who Shot the Pope—A Study in Terrorism." It is scheduled to be broadcast Sept. 21.

In an article in the September issue of Reader's Digest, Claire Sterling, author of "The Terror Network," said the shooting of the Pope in St. Peter's Square in May 1981 was in retaliation for the Pope's support of Solidarity. Mrs. Sterling also maintained that the shooting had the backing of the Soviet Union, which she said acted through the Bulgarian intelligence organization.

[At the time of Mrs. Sterling's article, the Moscow radio broadcast a denunciation of the allegations, saying, "The absurdity and unfoundedness of this claim are obvious."]

NBC News traced what it called an unbroken line from Mehmet Ali Agca, the Turkish gunman convicted for the shooting of the Pope to organized crime elements in Turkey, the Bulgarian secret service and the K.G.B., the Soviet intelligence agency.

"A Soviet connection is strongly suggested, but it cannot be proved," Mr. Kalb said.

The correspondent said "it seems safe to conclude" that Mr. Agca had "been drawn into the clandestine network of the Bulgarian secret police and, by extension, the Soviet K.G.B."

ESCAPED FROM PRISON IN TURKEY

NBC news said bank records showed that Mr. Agca deposited $10,000 two months before the assassination of a Turkish newspaper editor, Abdi Ipecki. Mr. Agca was convicted of the murder but later escaped from a maximum security prison in Turkey. In addition, Mr. Agca had large sums of money deposited for him in Turkish banks while he was a student at Istanbul University.

NBC News said that Mr. Agca appeared to have been backed financially at every step of the way by organized crime in Turkey and that the Bulgarian secret service has strong ties to the Turkish syndicate.

NBC News quoted Vladimir Sakharov, a former K.G.B. agent who defected, as saying that information held by the Bulgarians would also be known by the K.G.B.

[Special for USA Today, Sept. 15, 1982]

SOVIETS PLOTTED TO KILL THE POPE, NBC REPORTS

The Soviet Union "responded with bullets" to Pope John Paul II's handwritten plea for Soviet troops to stay out of Poland, NBC News Correspondent Marvin Kalb said Tuesday.

Kalb offered that explanation for the attempted assassination of the pope by a Turkish terrorist in St. Peter's Square on May 13, 1981, after a press screening of an NBC "white paper" suggesting Soviet complicity.

The documentary—The Man Who Shot the Pope: A Study in Terrorism—reveals for the first time that the pope sent a special envoy to the Kremlin the previous August bearing what Kalb describes as "an extraordinary handwritten letter, in Russian," for Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev.

"It said though the pope was the head of a universal church, he was still a Pole, and deeply affected by events in Poland," says Kalb in the documentary, airing at 10 p.m. EDT next Tuesday.

"If the Russians moved against Poland," Kalb said, quoting directly from the letter, "the pope said he would 'lay down the crown of St. Peter' and return to his homeland to stand shoulder to shoulder with his people."

Kalb believes the letter, supplied by a source whom Kalb was "pledged not to identify," convinced the Soviet Union to keep troops out of Poland and made it possible for Solidarity leader Lech Walesa to sign the Gdansk Agreement establishing the first independent trade union in a Communist country.

The pope paid the price, according to the documentary, when outraged Soviet officials then hatched the plot kill him.

The plot quickened after Pope John Paul II met with Walesa in January of last year at the Vatican, says NBC, after the pope "approved of plans to send millions of dollars to Solidarity, and to stiffen the spine of the Catholic Church in Eastern Europe."

Kalb attributes his material in part to "western intelligence sources," otherwise unidentified, but defends his judgment at the outset. "NBC News has accumulated a great deal of evidence, some of it, to be sure, circumstantial," says Kalb. "A Soviet connection is strongly suggested, but it cannot be proved."

The documentary reports that Mehmet Ail Agca, the terrorist convicted of attempting to kill the pope, was linked to a "Turkish Mafia" closely connected with the Bulgarian secret police and the Soviet KGB.

"I certainly believe that any 007 at the service of any government would have an easy job trying to harm the pope," Vatican Cardinal Silvio Oddi told Kalb. "If—and what—secret service did the job, I don't know. We suspect. We think. We are trying to prove."

Kalb reports, moreover, that the "people who know the pope best" say he believes he is still threatened by the Soviets.

With the help of Agca's hired hand, Solidarity has been crushed, martial law imposed, and, Kalb concludes: "The Russians have checkmated the pope."●

AN INCENTIVE EMBODIED IN OUR CONSTITUTION

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, one of the provisions our Founding Fathers saw fit to embody and protect in the Constitution, specifically in article I, section 8, provides that Congress shall have the power:

To promote the progress of science and the useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

Under the patent system that was instituted in 1790, an inventor was granted a limited, 17-year monopoly on his invention in exchange for its disclosure to the public. The theory behind the patent system is that some incentive is needed to spur on innovative research and the investment of private risk capital. A patent provides such an incentive by giving the developer and marketer a limited exclusive market position in which they can hope to recoup their development costs and possibly make a profit.

Moreover, the principle behind the inclusion of the patent system in the Constitution has been historically proven. Our country in 1790 was exclusively agricultural, wholly dependent on Europe for its machines and manufactures. Many feel that the principle of patent protection has been instrumental in our Nation's evolution from where it stood in 1790 into the most successful industrialized Nation in the world.

Over the last 20 years, however, certain fields of endeavor have been less equal than others in terms of the duration of patent life. In 1962, the hypnotic drug thalidomide, which was available in the United States only as an experimental drug but received widespread use during the late 1950's in many countries, was pointed to as producing congenital defects in offspring. The furor created by this tragic finding led not only to increased caution among physicians about the use of drugs in pregnant women but also stimulated the congressional enactment of far more stringent drug testing requirements than had previously been the case. One of the results of the testing regulations, however, has been that a new drug, which prior to 1962 required only 1 year between patenting and getting FDA approval, now requires over 7, resulting in less than a 10-year patent life.

The question that is raised by this result is not only one of fairness and equity to all fields of endeavor, but of the need so well understood by our Founding Fathers—to promote progress and innovation in this country. Producing a drug today now entails 10 years, $70 million and a failure rate of 90 percent. Although the safety of the public should clearly receive the highest consideration, given the present high cost of producing a drug, and the tremendous contributions to medical progress such a discovery can make, it seems pointless and even counterproductive not to give this field of endeavor the same protection as is guaranteed other products.

For these reasons I intend to support H.R. 6444, the Patent Term Restoration Act, which would extend the patent term by the period of time required by the Food and Drug Administration to review and approve a new drug or medical device up to 7 years.

At a time when it seems realistic to expect that the Federal Government's ability to fund biomedical research appropriations may not be able to increase as quickly as in previous years, it seems unwise not to do our utmost to provide the private sector with the incentive embodied in our Constitution to continue the development of new products and treatments. To do otherwise will only jeopardize our country's ability to retain and use the ingenuity that is ours ultimately to provide for the public good.●

EXPLANATION OF ADDITIONAL WEEKS OF UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION AS PROVIDED IN H.R. 4961, THE TAX EQUITY AND FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY ACT

HON. HAROLD E. FORD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in order to assist my colleagues in answering constituent inquiries about the Federal supplemental benefits program contained in H.R. 4961, I am putting in the RECORD an explanation of this new program. Present law is described followed by an explanation of the Federal supplemental benefits program provided by H.R. 4961 and a chart showing the estimated maximum number of weeks of benefits that will be payable to unemployed workers in each of the States for the first quarter of fiscal year 1983. I realize that this explanation may not answer all of the questions that may come up about this program. I encourage my colleagues to contact the staff of the Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation at extension 5-1025 for further information.

PRESENT EXTENDED BENEFITS PROGRAM

Under present law, up to 26 weeks of State financed unemployment compensation benefits are payable to unemployed individuals who meet the qualifying requirements of State law. In 9 States, claimants may receive more than 26 weeks of State benefits.

Under the permanent Federal-State extended benefits program (EB), additional weeks of unemployment compensation are payable to individuals who exhaust their State benefits during periods of high unemployment. Extended benefits are financed 50 percent from State trust funds and 50 percent from Federal unemployment trust funds.

Until September 25, 1982, extended benefits are payable in a State when, over the most recent 13-week period, the State insured unemployment rate (IUR) averages at least 4 percent and, in addition, is at least 20 percent higher than the average State IUR during the comparable period in the previous 2 years. When the 20-percent factor is not met, a State, at its option, may provide extended benefits when the State IUR reaches 5 percent.

Forty States have adopted this optional State trigger.

The IUR is calculated by dividing the number of workers receiving State benefits by the number of workers covered by the State unemployment compensation program. Prior to last year's Reconciliation Act, workers receiving both State benefits and those receiving extended benefits were included in the calculation. Last year's act dropped extended benefits claimants from the calculation. In addition to this change in calculating the IUR, the Reconciliation Act increases the EB trigger rate effective September 25, 1982. On that date, both EB triggers will be increased 1 percent. In other words, after this date, extended benefits will be payable in a State when the State IUR equals 5 percent or greater—rather than 4 percent—and is 20 percent higher than it was during the comparable period in the previous 2 years; or, at its option, when the IUR equals 6 percent—rather than 5 percent—regardless of the IUR in previous years. The change in the calculation of the IUR has had the effect of lowering State IUR rates and consequently made it more difficult for States to remain on the EB program. The increase in the trigger rates effective September 25, 1982, will make it even more difficult for States to qualify for the EB program.

FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL BENEFITS PROVIDED IN H.R. 4961

H.R. 4961 provides up to an additional 10 weeks of benefits to unemployed workers in any State in which extended benefits have been payable since June 1, 1982. These benefits will be available even if the State has triggered off the EB program since that date. It should be pointed out that these Federal supplemental benefits—and administrative costs—will be paid entirely out of general revenues. A simple extension of EB, which is financed 50 percent from State trust funds, would have placed a severe financial burden on a number of State trust funds that have outstanding loans to the Federal Government for past EB payments.

In States that have not at anytime since June 1, 1982, met the EB triggers, but have an IUR of 3.5 percent or greater, jobless workers will receive up to an additional 8 weeks of benefits. Those in States with an IUR of less than 3.5 percent will receive up to an additional 6 weeks of benefits. These provisions of H.R. 4961 recognize that the current unemployment problem is national in scope, and unemployed workers in all States need additional help.

The Federal supplemental benefits will be payable for weeks of unemployment between September 12, 1982, and March 31, 1983. In order to be eligible for these benefits, an individual must have exhausted his regular State benefits and any extended benefits to which he is entitled, and first, his benefit year must end on or after June 1, 1982, or second, he must have been eligible for extended benefits for any week beginning on or after June 1, 1982.

When an individual is determined to be eligible for State unemployment compensation benefits, he generally has 52 weeks, known as the benefit year, in which to collect the benefits to which he is entitled. In most States the benefit year begins with the first week for which a valid claim for benefits was filed. Therefore, in most States, if an individual first filed a valid claim for unemployment compensation benefits for a week beginning on or after June 1, 1981, he should be eligible for Federal supplemental benefits. This is because his benefit year will end on or after June 1, 1982.

If an individual's benefit year ends before June 1, 1982, but he was eligible to receive extended benefits for any week beginning on or after June 1, 1982, he will be eligible to receive Federal supplemental benefits.

EXTRADITION ACT OF 1982

HON. GERRY E. STUDDS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, the House is expected soon to consider H.R. 6046, the proposed Extradition Act of 1982. Although I have not personally formed a final judgment about how I may vote on this measure, I have become aware of a number of questions which have been raised about specific aspects of the bill. Many of these questions are discussed in the attached essay which was written by Mr. Christopher Pyle, and which appeared in the New York Times on August 11.

I am particularly concerned about the provisions of the extradition bill which would authorize the arrest and detention of an individual solely on the basis of an accusation, unsupported by evidence, put forward by a foreign government; by the narrow definition of political offense which is adopted by the bill; and by the extent to which responsibilities of a judicial nature are placed in the hands of political officials from the Department of State.

As I say, I have a good deal of respect for the Committee on the Judiciary and for the authors of H.R. 6046. I am hopeful that when the House does debate this legislation, careful consideration will be given to the controversial provisions of the bill, and a full and thoughtful debate will be held on a series of amendments which I understand will be offered.

The following essay by Christopher Pyle discusses the extradition legislation in a manner which I believe should be of interest to my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 11, 1982]

RUINING EXTRADITION

(By Christopher H. Pyle)

SOUTH HADLEY, MASS.—For more than two centuries, the United States has provided a refuge to which opponents of authoritarian regimes could flee without fear that they would be returned to stand trial for political offenses. That policy may be about to end.

Under either of the extradition bills now cleared for debate in Congress, persons charged with political crimes would be stripped of their legal defense and United States courts would be turned into the long arms of foreign persecution.

The purpose of the bills—to facilitate the return of terrorists—is manifestly worthwhile. However, both bills are so badly written that they would endanger the very persons that American law governing extradition has always shielded: critics of foreign regimes, former freedom fighters against authoritarian rule, former officials of regimes that the United States once supported.

For example, both bills provide for the arrest of an accused person without any proof that he is guilty of a crime. A mere allegation by a foreign dictatorship, coupled with a promise to produce evidence sometime in the future, would be sufficient to cause the United States Government to jail the accused for months. No United States prosecutor has this power of arbitary detention, but under these bills, Albania, Rumania, South Africa, El Salvador and about 90 more countries with which we have extradition agreements would have it, and could use it to bring about the imprisonment of their critics within the United States.

Under current law, no American court will allow a person to be extradited if it can be shown that he or she is really being sought for "an offense of a political character." Each bill would, in its own way, destroy this defense.

The Senate bill, which the Administration favors, would do so by stripping the courts of jurisdiction over the political crimes defense. Instead, the accused would have to raise his claim with the State Department, which could then decide whether protecting him from persecution is worth the risk of alienating the foreign government involved.

The State Department's motive for supporting this bill is clear. It wants to be able to swap alleged criminals with foreign countries the same way that children trade baseball cards: "We'll give you one terrorist if you give us three embezzlers."

The House bill seems more protective of political refugees than the Senate bill because it would keep in the courts the power to decide the political crimes defense. However, the appearance is deceptive, because the House bill would forbid the courts to regard as political, and hence not extraditable, any offense involving bodily violence or a conspiracy to commit bodily violence. There is a tiny exception for crimes committed under "extraordinary circumstances," but the bill does not say what they might be. All that is clear is the political message: Protecting foreign revolutionaries from return to authoritarian regimes should be a rare, not common occurrence.

As if to emphasize a preference for authoritarian regimes, both bills would forbid the courts to question whether a request for extradition was really a subterfuge for persecution. Nor would the courts be allowed to hear evidence that the charges against the accused resulted from torture or to deny extradition on the ground that the requesting regime is notorious for brutal interrogations, unjust trials or cruel punishment. Judgments of this sort would be left to the State Department, which currently pretends that El Salvador protects human rights.

The Administration claims that the courts should be denied the power to look into foreign injustice in order to assure the neutrality of the United States in foreign political conflicts. However, there can be no doubt where the Justice Department's sympathies would lie; both bills would require its lawyers to represent all foreign governments in their extradition requests. The United States would be neutral—on the side of whoever happens to be in power.

In anticipation of this legislation and a treaty to implement it, the Marcos dictatorship is requesting the extradition of more than a dozen of its opponents now living in the United States. One of those charged with plotting in the United States to support bombings in the Philippines is Benigno Aquino Jr., an associate at Harvard University's School of International Affairs who ran against President Ferdinand E. Marcos in the last free election. The only "evidence" against Mr. Aquino comes from the confession of an alleged coconspirator who later recanted, claiming he had been tortured. However, if either bill now before Congress passes, that evidence will be sufficient to send this democratic politician back into the hands of the dictator he opposed.●

EARLY WARNING

HON. LES ASPIN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Transportation appropriations bill for fiscal year 1983 may be considered shortly by the House. I am, therefore, inserting into the RECORD a cost analysis of that bill prepared by the staff of the Budget Committee. The cost analysis uses data provided by the Congressional Budget Office.

This bill, like the three other appropriations bills that I have discussed previously, is within its discretionary budget authority targets provided through the budget process and thus not subject to delayed enrollment. In addition, the mandatory budget authority provided in the bill is within the 302(b) targets agreed to by the Appropriations Committee pursuant to the act and the first budget resolution. The budget resolution does not assume the need for future supplementals that would exceed these targets.

The subcommittee does exceed its outlay targets, however. It is not possible to know exactly why this occurred since outlays are an estimate, but it is likely that the Appropriations Committee action provides a different program mix than those assumed in their 302 subdivision. To the extent that the spending mix has been altered, it is likely that faster first-year spending means lower outlays in 1984 and 1985—I believe this phenomenon has no long-run significance.

EARLY WARNING SUMMARY: H.R. 97-7019, DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1983

Floor action: Tentative, Thursday, September 16, 1982

Scorekeeping: The functional totals included in the First Budget Resolution conference report are allocated to the appropriate House committees in accordance with Section 302(a) of the Budget Act. Each committee then divides the 302(a) allocation among its subcommittees or programs and reports its subdivisions back to the House in a 302(b) report. It is this 302(b) report that the House Budget Committee uses to "score" a spending bill.

Scoring of this bill: Using the 302(b) report, the Budget Committee makes several comparisons to determine whether or not a spending bill is within the targets of the First Budget Resolution. In scoring a spending bill, the Budget Committee pays particular attention to programs over which a committee has funding discretion. For example, the Appropriations Committee is bound by existing law and generally cannot effectively reduce amounts required for the funding of mandatory programs. Many of these comparisons are for informational purposes only; the only procedural sanction is deferred enrollment which causes a conference report to be held at the desk if the discretionary budget authority exceeds its target.

(1) Discretionary Programs in Bill: The bill equals the subcommittee's total for budget authority and thus would not be subject to the deferred enrollment provisions of the Budget Resolution. The bill is over the allocation for outlays by $244 million.

(2) Mandatory Programs in Bill: The bill is under the subcommittee's total for budget authority by $43 million and over the outlay total by $476 million.

(3) Overall Bill Total: The bill is under the subcommittee's budget authority total by $43 million and over the outlay total by $720 million.

(4) Credit Targets: The bill is under the subcommittee's total.

(5) Supplemental Amounts Which May Be Required: Future anticipated funding requirements also in the Subcommittee's jurisdiction if added to this bill would not breach the Subcommittee's 302(b) budget authority allocation but would further breach the Subcommittee's 302(b) outlay allocation.

For additional details see the attached early warning report.

EARLY WARNING ADDITIONAL DETAIL HOUSE BUDGET COMMITTEE

Bill: H.R. 7019 Department of Transportation and related agencies appropriation, fiscal year 1983.

STAFF ANALYSIS

Committee: Appropriations.

Subcommittee: Transportation.

Floor Manager: Mr. Lehman (Florida).

Ranking Minority Member: Mr. Coughlin (Pennsylvania).

Scheduled: Tentative, Thursday, September 16, 1982.

I. Description of bill: This bill provides appropriations for the Department of Transportation and several other smaller independent agencies.

II. Comparison with target for discretionary appropriatons action: Pursuant to the Budget Act and HBC scorekeeping, the subcommittee has two targets: one for discretionary programs and one for mandatory programs. Since the Appropriations Committee is bound by existing entitlement law, it generally cannot effectively change the amounts required for the funding of mandatory programs. The Subcommittee's target for discretionary programs is therefore the main focus for this Early Warning report. That target is specified in the report of the Appropriations Committee made pursuant to Sec. 302(b) of the Budget Act, in which the Appropriations Committee subdivided to subcommittees the amounts allocated to it in the First Budget Resolution for Fiscal Year 1983.

Further, if the conference report on this appropriation bill, combined with any other fiscal year 1983 appropriations that the subcommittee may have enacted this session, were to cause the target for discretionary budget authority to be breached, then the bill would be subject to the "deferred enrollment" provision of Section 4 of the Fiscal Year 1983 First Budget Resolution (or held at the desk and not sent to the President for signature).

The summary table below shows that the subcommittee is equal to its discretionary targets for budget authority and over in outlays. The numbers in the summary table could change as a result of floor amendments, Senate action, conference action on this bill, or possible future supplemental appropriations. Possible future supplementals are discussed in Section IV below.

III. Summary table:

[In millions of dollars]

	Budget authority	Outlays
The amounts shown below are only for discretionary 1983 spending by this subcommittee:
1. Discretionary amounts in bill	10,815	8,244
2. Prior action
3. Total action to date	10,815	8,244
4. 302(b) target	10,815	8,000
5. Over(+)/Under(−)		+244
6. Amounts assumed but not yet considered
7. Over(+)/Under(−)		+244
The amounts shown below are only for mandatory programs that are funded by this subcommittee:
8. Mandatory amounts in bill	384	380
9. Prior action		11,052
10. Total	384	11,432
11. 302(b) target	427	10,956
12. Over(+)/Under(−)	−43	+476
13. Supplemental amounts needed	39	31
14. Over(+)/Under(−)	−4	+507
The amounts shown below are for the bill total and include both discretionary and mandatory amounts:
15. Total amounts in bill	11,199	8,624
16. Prior action		11,052
17. Total	11,199	19,676
18. 302(b) total target	11,242	18,956
19. Over(+)/Under(−)	−43	+720
20. Supplemental amounts	39	31
21. Over(+)/Under(−)	−4	+751

Note.—Detail may not add due to rounding.

IV. Explanation of over/under: Since the assumptions behind a committee's 302(b) subdivision are not required to be provided to the House, the House Budget Committee is unable to give a definitive answer to the question of where a particular bill is over or under a committee's 302(b) subdivision. The Budget Committee can only compare the items in the bill to the assumptions contained in the budget resolution. It is important to note that the line item assumptions in the budget resolution are not binding on a committee.

In state transfer grants-highways is $212 million in budget authority and $35 million in outlays above the assumptions in the budget resolution.

Urban mass transportation funding is $148 million in budget authority over the resolution assumptions and $62 million in outlays under the resolution assumptions.

Funding for FAA operations is over the budget resolution assumptions by $152 million in budget authority and $132 million in outlays.

Funding for FAA facilities and equipment is over the budget resolution assumptions by $113 million in budget authority and $12 million in outlays.

Funding for Coast Guard operating expenses is over the budget resolution assumptions by $164 million in budget authority and $128 million in outlays.

Funding for Coast Guard acquisition, construction and improvements is under the budget resolution assumptions by $407 million in budget authority and $52 million in outlays.

V. Credit: The First Budget Resolution contains targets for credit program amounts. As with budget authority and outlays, the Appropriations Committee is allocated amounts for credit program levels, and subdivides those amounts among subcommittees. For comparative purposes, the table below shows the bill, plus items not yet acted on, and the credit subdivisions.

	Direct loan obligations	Primary guarantee commitments	Secondary guarantee commitments
1. Credit program limits in the bill	2	337
2. Limits assumed in the budget resolution not acted upon in the bill and other amounts not subject to limit	466	−280
3. Possible total for subcommittee	468	57
4. Credit subdivisions	550	125	3
5. Over(+)/Under(−)	−82	−68	−3

The great majority of direct loan activity under the jurisdiction of this subcommittee is not subject to limit. This occurs because (1) guaranteed loans purchased by the FFB are not subject to limit, and (2) direct loans incurred because of default on guaranteed loans are not subject to limit. In the aggregate the direct loan, primary loan guarantee and secondary loan guarantee commitment activity under the jurisdiction of this subcommittee, including activity not subject to annual appropriations limits, is less than the credit subdivisions allocated to this subcommittee. The largest credit program under the subcommittee's jurisdiction is rail rehabilitation and improvement loan guarantees. The bill limits the program to $275 million, which is $5 million more than the level assumed in the budget resolution.

VIII. Definitions of terms in summary table, section III:

Line 1. Discretionary amounts in bill: discretionary fiscal year 1983 appropriations in H.R. 7019.

Line 2. Prior action: the fiscal year 1983 budget authority and outlays for this committee that were appropriated in prior bills.

Line 3. Total action to date: line 1 plus line 2.

Line 4. 302(b) target for discretionary appropriations set by the Appropriations Committee pursuant to the Budget Act.

Line 5. Over(+)/Under(−): line 3 minus line 4.

Line 6. Amounts assumed but not yet considered: these are amounts assumed in fiscal year 1983 budget resolution for which funding has been deferred by the Appropriations Committee, probably until next spring's supplemental appropriations bill.

Line 7. Over (+)/Under(−): line 5 plus line 6.

Line 8. Mandatory amount in bill: funding for mandatory programs (entitlements).

Line 9. Prior action: outlays from budget authority enacted for years prior to fiscal year 1983, plus permanents and advance appropriations assigned to the Appropriations Committee.

Line 10. Total: line 8 plus line 9.

Line 12. Over (+)/Under(−): line 10 minus line 11.

Line 13. Supplemental amount needed: amounts for any new entitlement legislation assumed in the budget resolution and to fund mandatory items in the bill at the level estimated in the budget resolution.

EXTRADITION REFORM ACT OF 1982

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, it is with strong concern that I rise in opposition to H.R. 6046, the Extradition Reform Act of 1982. While I am strongly supportive of efforts to modernize and reform our extradition procedure so that they protect the civil liberties of those who face extradition because they are charged with serious crimes, I must oppose the bill because it has provisions which would prohibit the courts from reviewing extradition demands by foreign governments.

Court review is necessary to insure that the demand for extradition on the part of a foreign government is not merely an effort to supress political dissent. Additionally, the bill would permit individuals, both U.S. citizens and foreign nationals, to be detained without bail on the basis of only an allegation by a foreign government that an extraditable crime has been committed. Our history as a nation has been enhanced through the refuge we have provided on many occasions to victims of regimes which have a pattern and practice of human rights violations. H.R. 6046, while not deliberately seeking to overturn this proud tradition, is unfortunately drafted so broadly that it could endanger the very persons that our tradition of refuge has always shielded: Opponents of totalitarian and authoritarian regimes, be they U.S. citizens or foreign nationals.

My understanding is that a number of my colleagues will be offering amendments to H.R. 6046 which would alter the most objectionable provisions of this legislation.

I would urge my colleagues to give the most careful consideration to H.R. 6046 to alter the following provisions:

Require the court to hold an individual for at least 10 days based upon a mere request of a foreign government with no supporting evidence, unless the person can affirmatively demonstrate that he or she should be released;

Define the longstanding political crime exception to extradition so narrowly as to exclude in almost all circumstances crimes which in any was include violent conduct; and

Prohibit a court from inquiring into allegations that a State is seeking extradition of a person for the purpose of prosecuting such person because of his or her political opinions, race, religion, or nationality.

Consider just a few situations in which the courts would have no choice but to act:

A foreign government's mere, unsubstantiated allegation that an American citizen had, on a visit to that country, conspired to commit a violent act, coupled with a promise to produce evidence at a later date, would compel that the person be held without bail for for at least 10 and perhaps for more than 60 days.

A leading critic of a foreign dictatorship could be extradited based on allegations that he engaged in violent acts, without having the opportunity to demonstrate that the charges were a mere subterfuge to punish him for his political view or that he would be subjected to arbitrary detention or torture if extradited.

An individual who used violence to escape from a foreign prison where he was being tortured or who used force directed at military units as part of an uprising against a repressive regime would be unable to claim the political exception to extradition which has traditionally been the hallmark of American extradition law.

It is not sufficient that the executive branch could decline to file a complaint or to extradite in a particular case of manifest injustice. Every administration is under enormous pressure from its allies to extradite political opponents of the regime and to ignore evidence of torture or lack of due process. The recent decision by the Reagan administration to certify that the Government of El Salvador is not violating international human rights standards is but one recent manifestation of this continuing phenomenon.

In addition, I submit for your additional information a recent letter published in the New York Times by Christopher Pyle, a constitutional law and civil liberties scholar:

RUINING EXTRADITION

(By Christopher H. Pyle)

SOUTH HADLEY, MASS.—For more than two centuries, the United States has provided a refuge to which opponents of authoritarian regimes could flee without fear that they would be returned to stand trial for political offenses. That policy may be about to end.

Under either of the extradition bills now cleared for debate in Congress, persons charged with political crimes would be stripped of their legal defense and United States courts would be turned into the long arms of foreign persecution.

The purpose of the bills—to facilitate the return of terrorists—is manifestly worthwhile. However, both bills are so badly written that they would endanger the very persons that American law governing extradition has always shielded: critics of foreign regimes, former freedom fighters against authoritarian rule, former officials of regimes that the United States once supported.

For example, both bills provide for the arrest of an accused person without any proof that he is guilty of a crime. A mere allegation by a foreign dictatorship, coupled with a promise to produce evidence sometime in the future, would be sufficient to cause the United States Government to jail the accused for months. No United States prosecutor has this power of arbitrary detention, but under these bills, Albania, Rumania, South Africa, El Salvador and about 90 more countries with which we have extradition agreements would have it, and could use it to bring about the imprisonment of their critics within the United States.

Under current law, no American court will allow a person to be extradited if it can be shown that he or she is really being sought for "an offense of a political character." Each bill would, in its own way, destroy this defense.

The Senate bill, which the Administration favors, would do so by stripping the courts of jurisdiction over the political crimes defense. Instead, the accused would have to raise his claim with the State Department, which could then decide whether protecting him from persecution is worth the risk of alienating the foreign government involved.

The State Department's motive for supporting this bill is clear. It wants to be able to swap alleged criminals with foreign countries the same way that children trade baseball cards: "We'll give you one terrorist if you give us three embezzlers."

The House bill seems more protective of political refugees than the Senate bill because it would keep in the courts the power to decide the political crimes defense. However, the appearance is deceptive, because the House bill would forbid the courts to regard as political, and hence not extraditable, any offense involving bodily violence or a conspiracy to commit bodily violence. There is a tiny exception for crimes committed under "extraordinary circumstances," but the bill does not say what they might be. All that is clear is the political message: Protecting foreign revolutionaries from return to authoritarian regimes should be a rare, not common occurrence.

As if to emphasize a preference for authoritarian regimes, both bills would forbid the courts to question whether a request for extradition was really a subterfuge for persecution. Nor would the courts be allowed to hear evidence that the charges against the accused resulted from torture or to deny extradition on the ground that the requesting regime is notorious for brutal interrogations, unjust trials or cruel punishment. Judgments of this sort would be left to the State Department, which currently pretends that El Salvador protects human rights.

The Administration claims that the courts should be denied the power to look into foreign injustice in order to assure the neutrality of the United States in foreign political conflicts. However, there can be no doubt where the Justice Department's sympathies would lie; both bills would require its lawyers to represent all foreign governments in their extradition requests. The United States would be neutral—on the side of whoever happens to be in power.

In anticipation of this legislation and a treaty to implement it, the Marcos dictatorship is requesting the extradition of more than a dozen if its opponents now living in the United States. One of those charged with plotting in the United States to support bombings in the Philippines is Benigno Aquino Jr., an associate at Harvard University's School of International Affairs who ran against President Ferdinand E. Marcos in the last free election. The only "evidence" against Mr. Aquino comes from the confession of an alleged coconspirator who later recanted, claiming he had been tortured. However, if either bill now before Congress passes, that evidence will be sufficient to send this democratic politician back into the hands of the dictator he opposed.●

TAX INCREASES VERSUS REDUCED SPENDING

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I have received an excellent letter from one of my constituents, attorney Wayne B. Youngblood of Mayfield, Ky., in response to the tax increase package which recently passed the Congress and was signed into law by the President. Mr. Youngblood strongly urges Members of Congress to reduce Government spending and show the citizens of this Nation that they are fiscally responsible. Reckless disregard of the ever-growing deficit must not be tolerated. I would like to share his letter with my colleagues. The letter follows:

WAYNE B. YOUNGBLOOD,
Mayfield, Ky., August 19, 1982.

Hon. CARROLL HUBBARD,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HUBBARD: I just heard your floor speech on the 10 P.M. news tonight concerning the "tax increase." Although I very much favored the "tax increase" bill, I was elated to hear your reason for opposing it. I too agree that we need to balance the budget by reducing spending; however, everyone else seems to be saying that that's not possible or that the Congress will never reduce spending that much. In the past, I favored the tax cut (and I've opposed tax increases) solely because I wanted to keep the pressure on the need to reduce spending. However, this current year's projected deficit just seems to me to be making our long-term goal of eliminating the national debt that much harder. With this $100 million package, with perhaps more spending cuts with your help, and with economic recovery; the next three years look great to me.

It's my view that gradual economic recovery over a few years is the best we can hope for. That slow but steady method will, in my view, teach us a lot of economic lessons along the way and leave our country with a very efficient and sound springboard for long-term growth.

I'm thrilled that you and so many others in Congress seem to agree that we must reduce spending. I'd like to see another "massive" spending reduction (I thought the last one just whittled!), and most of the government employees dislocated by it could be shifted to a collection function rather than their current "hand-out" function. I'm very much for firm enforcement of the tax laws we do have. When our country makes it clear to all that we'll never again live beyond our means with deficits year after year, I sincerely believe that we'll see an outpouring of financial and patriotic support from our citizenry. There's millions of patriotic Americans who realize that we're all heirs of the greatest country in the world; but in the past no one wanted voluntarily to throw good money in a treasury being spent with reckless disregard. The Congress seems to be talking fiscal responsibility now; when we make further progress in cutting out all the nonsensical programs in the budget, I think we'll see a degree of cooperation unseen since WWII.

Thanks for listening, and please advise if ever I can be of any help.

Sincerely,

WAYNE B. YOUNGBLOOD.●

SOVIET EXPANSION

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article that is well worth the attention of my colleagues and should be read by every Member in this Congress. It is an excellent article written by our colleague MICKEY EDWARDS who zeros in on the real essence of the Soviet expansion issue.

The article follows:

SOVIET EXPANSION AND CONTROL OF THE SEA-LANES

(By Mickey Edwards)

Americans felt the pinch some years back when an Arab embargo cut down the flow of oil to U.S. shores. Consider how much greater the impact might be if the expanding Soviet Navy were to cut the sea-lanes which bring oil and many other vital resources to our shores.

Soviet expansion is a growing threat to the unhindered use of the world's sea-lanes, the vital threads by which nations are linked in a web of interdependence. Anything less than global access to the world's waterways places the United States in serious jeopardy. Let us, then, consider specific examples of Soviet expansion and the likely consequences for the West if it goes unchecked.

MIDDLE EAST

The 1979 invasion of Afghanistan compels us to recognize anew the centuries-old Russian desire for warm-water ports. With the southern border of Afghanistan 350 miles from the Arabian Sea, Soviet aircraft based in southern Afghanistan are now some 500 miles closer to the sea-lanes serving the Persian Gulf. At present, the Soviets are moving to upgrade the airports at Herat, Shindand, and Farah to the south into full-fledged advance air bases. In fact, Soviet aircraft are now closer to strategic points in the Persian Gulf than they would be if based in Tehran.

The ports at Gwadar in southwestern Pakistan and Chah Bahar in southeastern Iran beckon the Soviets enticingly. Naval bases in this area would provide ready access to the Gulf of Oman and the Strait of Hormuz, which lies at the entrance to the Persian Gulf. The strait is a vital "choke point" through which about 60 percent of the oil destined for Western Europe moves everyday. About 77 ships a day (roughly one ship every 19 minutes) negotiate the narrow strait. Most of them are oil tankers. Since both the eastbound and westbound shipping channels are located in Oman's territorial waters, this conservative, pro-Western country is responsible for guarding the increasingly vulnerable waterway. The Omani Navy numbers around 15 ships.

The Soviet Union could obtain a corridor to the Arabian Sea if political instability grows in the area adjacent to Afghanistan's southern border. They key area is Baluchistan, a volatile and disputed territory which straddles southeastern Iran and southwestern Pakistan and whose inhabitants spill over into Afghanistan. Throughout the last decade, the Baluchis have tried to form a separate state that would be independent of both Iran and Pakistan. The separatist movement on the Iranian side has been picking up steam in recent months.

An independent Baluchistan would almost certainly need the support of an ally powerful enough to guarantee its security against Iran and Pakistan. In such an event, the Soviets could present themselves as a logical choice, possibly under the guise of a legitimate Afghan Government. The southern flank of a separate pro-Soviet Baluchistan would contain the port towns of Gwadar, Chah Bahar, Pasni, and perhaps Karachi. As much as 700–800 miles of seacoast would thus be included in the new state. Advanced air bases in southern Afghanistan coupled with access to ports on the Arabian Sea would give the Soviets a double-fisted threat to Persian Gulf oil. The Soviet Union would also possess greatly enhanced ability to neutralize U.S. naval forces in the area.

Considerations that make a drive for autonomy in Baluchistan more likely are beginning to receive careful attention in Western intelligence circles. A guerrilla organization among radical Baluchi nationalists has been forming for at least a year. In addition, there have been reports, so far unconfirmed, that the Soviets have been using Afghan intermediaries to supply arms to Baluchis in Iran. To the extent that the regime of President Babrak Karmal strengthens its control over Afghanistan, it will be increasingly able to give attention to exploiting separatist movements south of its border.

When we turn our attention west of Afghanistan, the picture is just as bleak, for that way lies Iran. Within weeks of the invasion, Soviet forces were concentrated in western Afghanistan, along the Iranian border. The strongholds of the anti-Soviet Afghanistan rebel tribesmen are located in the north and east, away from Iran. The air bases previously mentioned are within 100 miles of the Iranian border, and they are being rapidly expanded. Hundreds of tanks—perhaps as many as 3,000—have been reported in the region. Soviet troops there are supported by sophisticated weapons, including armored personnel carriers, multiple-rocket launchers, self-propelled artillery, and mobile anti-aircraft guns. Clearly, Soviet forces are in position and equipped for a thrust into Iran should Moscow give the word. The justification available to the Soviets is the same they used for Afghanistan—that poltical instability in a bordering country threatens the security of the U.S.S.R.

Even apart from a military strike against Iran, the Soviets are now in a more favorable position than before to support subversion in both Iran and Pakistan and to hasten the destablization of the progressively fragile Khomeini government. One analyst who warned of the possible invasion of Afghanistan last fall warns that radical Afghan expatriates now living in Iran are in a position to play the role of Soviet surrogates in the event of a civil war in Iran.

Perhaps the situation would not be quite so ominous if Afghanistan represented the only staging point for Soviet aspirations in the Middle East. But, in fact, the Soviet Union is resolutely involving itself in countries all around the perimeter of the Persian Gulf. For example, there is evidence of a growing military presence in South Yemen, a completely Marxist, pro-Soviet country strategically located near the mouth of the Red Sea and bordering Oman. Intelligence reports have indicated that a number of Soviet surface warships and nuclear submarines have docked in South Yemen. In addition, Soviet destroyers, based in Yemen and outfitted with sophisticated electronic listening devices, have been prowling the Strait of Hormuz. East Germans virtually run the internal security system of the South Yemeni Government.

Furthermore, some analysts have assembled evidence to support the chilling contention that there are already three Cuban battalions in South Yemen. A possible role for these troops is indicated by intelligence reports that the Soviets have been shipping first-rate armored equipment to South Yemen—equipment that is much too sophisticated for their Arab clients: combat carriers, battle tanks, and anti-aircraft vehicles. This is precisely the same kind of modern equipment the Soviets have introduced into Cuba. In the wake of the Afghanistan situation, we seem to have forgotten about that infamous Soviet combat brigade in Cuba, but this is equipment the Soviets have been training the Cubans to use.

A mobile armored force in South Yemen, manned by trained personnel, is well suited for a quick strike against Oman. The size of the Omani Army is such that it could not reasonably be expected to resist such an attack. Additionally, Oman has already been plagued with insurgency problems of its own. Chiefly with British help, the Sultan of Oman was able in 1974 to defeat guerrillas in Oman's Dhofar province along the frontier it shares with South Yemen. These guerrillas were trained and armed in South Yemen and so indirectly supported by the Soviet Union. A renewed Dhofar insurgency, aided and supported by the South Yemenis, could set the stage for an attack by Cuban-manned armored divisions. Obviously, a Soviet or pro-Soviet presence in Oman would be an excellent staging point for more ambitious Russian projects in the area. One must bear in mind that many of the regimes in the Middle East are politically very fragile and vulnerable. The destabilization of the region around the Arabian peninsula could very well contribute to the destabilization of other moderate Arab governments, such as the one in Saudi Arabia.

That this is not mere speculation can be appreciated by taking a careful look at the attempted takeover of the Grand Mosque in Saudi Arabia in November 1979. For understandable reasons, the Saudis have tried to put a calm face on the episode. But European intelligence sources state that 70 to 80 of the 500 attackers received training from both Cubans and Russians in South Yemen and that Yemenis participated in the assault. Units of the South Yemen Army, supported by Soviet bloc advisors, were mobilized along the Saudi and North Yemeni borders. Large stockpiles of Soviet arms were established just inside the border. A prominent British analyst has gone so far as to say that all this was part of a large-scale plan that was to involve similar uprisings in other Saudi cities.●

"HEALTH FOR THE WHOLE FAMILY" SALUTING NATIONAL OSTEOPATHIC MEDICINE WEEK

HON. THOMAS COLEMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Speaker, 1 week is set aside each September to honor the people involved with the medical profession that offers patients something more—osteopathic medicine. This year, September 12 to 18 has been designated as "National Osteopathic Medicine Week."

More than 20,000 osteopathic physicians practice in States throughout the Nation, caring for 20 million Americans. The vast majority of DO's provide primary care and more than half of all osteopathic physicians practice in towns with populations of less than 50,000 people, often providing medical care to families in rural communities.

There are more than 200 osteopathic hospitals in 31 States. These hospitals have close to 25,000 beds available and employ nearly 70,000 people. Osteopathic hospitals treated over 800,000 people last year as inpatients, accounting for some 6 million patient days. Another 3 million Americans were seen as outpatients.

The osteopathic profession emphasizes primary care—general practice—in its medical school curricula and continuing professional education. However, many DO's are specialists, covering all areas of medical specialization from anesthesiology to neurology and urologic surgery.

The osteopathic profession is founded on the philosophy of treating the whole person, not just the symptom or disease, because what happens in one part of the body can affect other parts. The osteopathic physician pays particular attention to joints, bones, muscles, and nerves. Osteophatic therapy, the profession's "something more," often improves circulation and a normal blood supply and nerve function can enhance the body's natural healing process.

Today, we hear so much about the rising cost of health care. Osteopathic medicine emphasizes wellness and preventive care, and this approach contributes to keeping health care costs down. An important osteopathic premise is that a healthy state is the natural state of the body. However, when illness invades, the osteopathic physician considers it an invasion of the whole patient, not just an organ or a limb. Osteopathic medicine is patient oriented, not disease oriented.

Founded over 100 years ago by Dr. Andrew Taylor Still, osteopathic medical principles are built on the fact that the body is an integral unit, a whole, and the structure of the body and its functions work interdependently. To the osteopathic physician and the osteopathic hospital, each patient is unique.

It is my distinct privilege to represent the Sixth District of Missouri, the birthplace of osteopathic medicine. The first osteopathic medical school, the American School of Osteopathy, was chartered in Kirksville in 1892. Known today as the Kirksville College of Osteopathic Medicine, it is 1 of 15 such schools in the Nation. The University of Health Sciences in Kansas City, Mo., also contributes to the more than 1,000 osteopathic physicians who graduate each year from osteopathic medical schools. Many of these physicians will serve in rural areas and in communities with few physicians in relation to the population, thereby filling a crucial gap in the delivery of medical care to the American people.

We in Missouri are particularly proud of our many osteopathic hospitals. These include such fine hospitals as the Kirksville Osteopathic Health Center, a 254-bed facility with residency and intern training programs. Last year more than 40,000 inpatients and outpatients were treated at the health center.

Osteopathic physicians have made significant contributions to the practice of medicine. Osteopathic hospitals, many of which are located in small communities, serve the needs of their communities and provide quality, professional health services to the people who rely on them.

I am pleased to recognize and honor all those who are associated with osteopathic medicine.●

LAW ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES COOPERATE IN MARIHUANA ARREST

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, often we hear harsh criticisms leveled against our law enforcement officials for not catching criminals, bungling cases, and working against rather than with each other. I take this opportunity to inform my colleagues of an incident in my district which shows that local, State, and National enforcement agencies can, and do work together and, at least in this instance, the result has been a clean, successful arrest operation.

Recently, in Camdenton, Mo., the local detectives were tipped off as to where stolen street signs could be located. Upon checking into this information, they also found marihuana plants being grown on the premises. With the help of State and National officials, an arrest was made.

The result of this successful operation is that another avenue by which our young people are exposed to drugs has been closed. In an age when drugs are so readily available to destroy the minds of our young, it is gratifying to know that we have officials capable of stopping the spread of this poison.

I congratulate Sheriff Larry Whitten, Carl L. Hicks, Patrolman T. E. Simmons, Sergeant Herb Thomas, and all who aided in the arrest on this successful undertaking and thank them for their dedication which makes life safer for all Missourians.●

VETO OVERRIDE OF SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, there is simply no question about the importance of the action taken by the Representatives to override the President's veto of the supplemental appropriations bill. The conference report on the Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1982 contains a wide range of programs, all of which are essential to our constituents. The measure is in no way a "budget buster." In fact, this appropriation is almost $2 billion below the administration's fiscal year 1982 supplemental request. The funding provided in H.R. 6863 is below the fiscal year 1982 budget resolution by $8.1 billion in budget authority and $1.1 billion in outlays.

When President Reagan vetoed this measure, he nullified a number of major programs that in one way or another affect almost every citizen of my district. One of the major programs included in the bill is unemployment compensation. The bill provided benefits for up to 133,000 additional Michigan recipients which were authorized in the tax bill and $2 million for my State's program administration.

In the area of health, $122 million is appropriated to the States for the medicaid program, $6 million is appropriated for childhood immunization programs, with $1.5 million for tuberculosis vaccinations. For mental health, Michigan is targeted for $3 to $4 million in special projects and education, in addition to funding for the handicapped.

Of the $210.6 billion for senior citizen employment programs, $8 million is slated for Michigan's seniors.

In this critical period when students are finalizing their student aid for this academic year, the $217 million for student assistance is absolutely necessary. Michigan would receive $5.3 million for Pell grants and $2.8 million in supplemental educational opportunity grants, for a total of some $8.1 million. So that students' academic careers are not distrupted and so that we keep our pledge to provide financial assistance to them, it is imperative that the supplemental be approved.

In elementary and secondary education, the $148 million total contains $19 million for Michigan in compensatory education funds to offset the administration's decision to use outdated census data which cuts back on Michigan's funding. There are also $26.5 million in handicapped education, $2.5 million in vocational education, and $4.8 million for continuing education, which offset excessive cutbacks education programs have been forced to endure during the past 2 years. As the National School Boards Association noted to me in a letter encouraging my support for the override:

> Those programs are major success stories; they are neither wasteful nor unnecessary.

It is clear to me that President Reagan's objections to the bill focused not on its spending total, but on its spending priorities. He simply did not like the choices we made. He believes that we have chosen to spend too much on social programs and too little on defense. Indeed, we have established spending priorities in this bill which contrast sharply with his intentions to continue adding massive amounts to the Pentagon's budget and to make deep cuts in domestic programs.

The House did a good job in passing the conference report and funding the social programs that the President wants to cut. I have been back in my congressional district every weekend and I can assure my colleagues that there are very few citizens who feel we should trade our children's health and education, jobs and medicaid assistance for our elderly, or aid to unemployed workers for unnecessary increases in defense programs. We have done the best thing for our Nation by overriding this veto.●

SOFT TISSUE CANCERS AND VIETNAM VETERANS

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, during a hearing this morning before the House Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations we again witnessed the Veterans' Administration's unwillingness to agree to establish a framework for the resolution of veterans' claims due to agent orange exposure. Vietnam veterans were in effect told by the Veterans' Administration that no matter how much evidence is compiled, how conclusive it may be, their claim, if attributed to agent orange, will not be approved.

As such, I am compelled to introduce legislation to establish a presumption that soft tissue cancers appearing in Vietnam veterans are related to their service in Vietnam and therefore are compensable. There is an abundance of human data documenting the increased cancer risk to individuals exposed to dioxin, the chemical contaminant in agent orange. It is time to take action.

Following are summaries of these studies that I believe my colleagues will find of interest:

[From Pesticide and Toxic Chemical News, Feb. 13, 1980]

EPIDEMIOLOGICAL STUDIES LINK 2,4,5-T EXPOSURE TO CANCER IN HUMANS, EPA SAYS

A "growing body" of epidemiological evidence establishes a "clear association" between exposure to 2,4,5-T and dioxin and carcinogenic effects in humans, EPA asserted in its prehearing risk brief in the 2,4,5-T and silvex cancellation hearing (See separate stories).

According to EPA's Dorothy E. Patton, Office of General Counsel (OGC), four separate Swedish studies, with a fifth one expected to be published soon, link exposure to 2,4,5-T and TCDD to types of human cancer. She said the latest evidence by Swedish scientists L. Hardell and A. Sandstrom show "statisically significant increases in the risk of malignant mesenchymal tumors of the soft tissues (soft-tissue sarcomas) related to occupational exposure to phenoxy herbicides and to occupational exposure to chlorophenols."

Patton observed in a case-control study of the risk of soft-tissue sarcomas in a population in northern Sweden which includes forestry, sawmill and paper pulp workers, the researchers found that individuals previously exposed to 2,4,5-T and 2,4-D had a relative risk for soft-tissue sarcomas 5.3 times greater than unexposed individuals.

Moreover, she noted that soft-tissue sarcomas are a rare variety of cancer and the case control study by the two researchers "is generally recognized as the most effective epidemiologic method for documenting the relationship between a particular causative factor and a rare type of tumor."

In yet another case control study in a different population in southern Sweden, her brief said, researchers M. Eriksson, L. Hardell, N. Bern and T. Moller found "that individuals previously exposed to phenoxy herbicides had a relative risk for soft-tissue sarcomas 6.8 times greater than unexposed individuals, thus, she noted, confirming and replicating the studies of the other Swedish researchers.

In two separate epidemiological studies of "cohort" railroad workers exposed to 2,4,5-T and TCDD, the EPA brief said each study "documented a statistically significant increase in the incidence of stomach cancers among among such workers."

Cohort studies compare the incidence of disease among a group previously exposed to a chemical compared with a group not exposed to the chemical or exposed to a lesser degree.

Patton noted that in a recent update of an "inconclusive study of mortality and tumor incidence in a cohort study of Swedish railroad workers "by O. Axelson, C. Edling, H. Kling, K. Anderson, C. Hogstedt and L. Sundell, the researchers found "a significant excess incidence of stomach cancer among those workers first exposed to phenoxy herbicides more than ten years earlier."

The update was based on an earlier study by O. Axelson and L. Sundell in 1974 called "Herbicide Exposure, Mortality and Tumor Incidence: An Epidemiological Investigation on Swedish Railroad Workers."

She noted that in the update by Axelson, et al., the individuals exposed to phenoxy herbicides had observed incidence of stomach tumors 6.1 times greater than expected after allowing for a ten-year induction period. Furthermore, Patton argued that in a study of a cohort of workers exposed to TCDD at an accident in a trichlorophenol plant in Ludwigshafen, German, German researchers found "an excess incidence of stomach cancer among exposed workers."

Patton asserted these studies indicate that exposure to TCDD or preparations containing TCDD "has been clearly associated with an excess risk of stomach cancer in humans."

Using the findings of the EPA's Alsea study, coupled with the latest epidemiological studies, Patton concluded:

"Statistically significant increases in the risk of cancer and reproductive disorders have been documented in six separate human populations. These same types of adverse health effects have also been observed in experimental animals exposed to 2,4,5-T, silvex and/or TCDD. This combination of positive epidemiological findings and corroborative animal data provides a sound basis for the conclusion that exposure to pesticide products containing 2,4,5-T or silvex constitutes a human health hazard...

"The quality, quantity and variety of data demonstrating that the continued use of 2,4,5-T and silvex contaminated with TCDD presents risks to human health is unprecedented and overwhelming."

In previous cancellation hearings such as heptachlore/chlordane which led to the cancellation of the pesticide, she argued, cancellation was based on carcinogenic evidence in rodent test systems with other toxic effects in test animals not available

[From the Lancet, Jan. 31, 1981]

2,4,5-T, TRICHLOROPHENOL, AND SOFT TISSUE SARCOMA

SIR: Case-control studies from Sweden demonstrate relative risks of 6·2 and 5·1 for occupational exposure to phenoxy herbicides and chlorophenols among cases of soft tissue sarcoma. To estimate whether this excess risk can be detected among workers in the United States, we reviewed reports of four exposed cohorts (refs 3-5 and J. A. Zack unpublished) studied by epidemiologists from Dow Chemical U.S.A. and the Monsanto Company. Of the 105 deaths reported in the four cohorts, 3 (2·9 percent) were due to soft issue sarcoma. In rough comparison, for 1975 only 0·07 percent of deaths in U.S. males aged 20–84 years were due to soft tissue sarcoma (ICD 171, 8th revision).

The workers from the four U.S. cohorts were exposed either to the phenoxy herbicide 2,4,5-trichlorophenoxyacetic acid (2,4,5-T) or to 2,4,5-trichlorophenol (TCP), a feedstock for 2,4,5-T. Both 2,4,5-T and TCP are contaminated with the toxic dioxin isomer 2,3,7,8-tetrachlorodibenzo-p-dioxin (TCDD) which has been found to be carcinogenic in laboratory animals.

Zack and Suskind describe a male with chloracne after exposure in a TCP process accident at Monsanto Co. in 1949. He died in 1978 at age 58 with malignant fibrous histiocytoma of soft tissue origin. (In the paper by Zack and Suskind this case is coded as ICD 173·9; however, when the diagnosis was presented to our consulting nosologist, ICD 171 was the code of choice.) Cook et al. reported a male who worked on TCP production at Dow Chemical U.S.A. and had facial dermatitis; no diagnosis of chloracne was made. He died of fibrosarcoma in 1975 at age 53. Case 3 (J. H. Zack, unpublished) worked on 2,4,5-T synthesis at Monsanto Co. and died in 1972 at age 49 of a generalised liposarcoma. No history of chloracne was reported. Only one cohort, reported by Ott et al. of 2,4,5-T workers at Dow, contained no case of soft tissue sarcoma.

None of the four cohorts individually resulted in a reported excess risk for soft tissue sarcoma. When combined, however, the three cases from the four cohorts suggest a common pattern. This finding supports the concept of combining small cohorts of workers with a common occupational exposure for analyses. Such an effort to assemble an exposure registry of all people in the U.S. who have worked at the synthesis of 2,4,5-T is underway at the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (N.I.O.S.H.) the mortality experience of the combined cohort will be analysed retrospectively and followed up prospectively. This approach will provide greater statistical power than would be available for any subgroup of the registry analysed alone. N.I.O.S.H. has also embarked on a case-control study for soft tissue sarcoma to review occupational risk factors such as exposure to the phenoxy herbicides and chlorophenols, and to test further the results obtained in the Swedish case-control studies.

THORACIC SOFT-TISSUE SARCOMA IN VIETNAM VETERANS EXPOSED TO AGENT ORANGE

TO THE EDITOR: Case-control studies from Sweden report a fivefold to sixfold increased risk of soft-tissue sarcoma in lumberjacks exposed to herbicides containing phenoxyacetates. Long-term follow-up studies in cohorts of industrial workers employed in the manufacture of these chemicals have disclosed seven cases of soft-tissue sarcoma to date. On the basis of studies in laboratory animals, it is currently thought that dioxin (2,3,7,8-tetrachlorodibenzo-p-dioxin), an impurity present in these chemicals, may be the carcinogen. However, more follow-up and further studies are needed to define the true risk of malignant disease and the actual carcinogenic substance or substances involved.)

In Vietnam, where approximately 2 million troops were stationed for various periods between 1962 and 1971, nearly 45 million kg of Agent Orange and other defoliants were used. Follow-up of the veterans and their families to date has not revealed any serious untoward effects of such exposure, except for chloracne. So far there has been no excess incidence of cancer of any kind. We now report three cases of thoracic soft-tissue sarcoma in persons who served in Vietnam and were exposed to Agent Orange.

Patient 1 worked in Vietnam as a member of a helicopter-rescue unit of the United States Air Force in areas where defoliants were used during 1966 and 1967. In July 1979, at the age of 46, he underwent resection of a right upper-lobe lung lesion, which was diagnosed as inflammatory fibrous histiocytoma. He died in July 1981 with progressive lung and brain lesions.

Patient 2 was a United States Marine in Vietnam during 1966 and 1967, stationed in areas where defoliants were being used. Twice he was "completely soaked with Agent Orange." In December 1979, at the age of 32, he underwent a left pneumonectomy for a mediastinal fibrosarcoma. In June 1981, pulmonary metastases developed. He is currently receiving combination chemotherapy.

Patient 3 was in the United States Army in Vietnam in 1971, serving in areas where the defoliants were used. In January 1981, at the age of 31, he was evaluated for a left pleural effusion. At exploratory thoracotomy in August 1981, a pleural/diaphragnatic leomyosarcoma was noted and resected.

Soft-tissue sarcomas are rare neoplasms. If there is a true risk of these neoplasms in veterans who served in Vietnam, follow-up studies should be able to define it. If there is an increased risk of malignant disease in these veterans, then a more critical question that has to be addressed is: Are the defoliants causative, or is some other unidentified environmental factor responsible, acting alone or in concert with the defoliants?

THE DEATH OF BASHIR GEMAYEL

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it was with great sorrow and shock that I learned of the tragic assassination of Lebanese President-elect Bashir Gemayel. His demise is a loss not only for Lebanon, but for the entire Middle East.

This talented and promising young man had already begun to restore the power and the authority of the central Lebanese Government; he had begun to reconcile the various warring political and religious factions in his country. Just a few days ago, he made a nationwide appeal for Christians and Moslem communities to work together to rebuild Lebanon. I am confident that had he lived, he would have been an effective and dynamic President. In the end, however, he became the unfortunate victim of the violence and civil strife which he was attempting to stop.

I am sure that all of my colleagues here in this Chamber will join me in urging all of the concerned parties in Lebanon to exercise restraint. Let us hope that in spite of this event President Sarkis and future leaders of Lebanon will continue Mr. Gemayel's efforts to achieve rapprochement between the Muslims and Christians and restore the delicate political balance that has, until recently, existed in Lebanon. I strongly believe that the road to stabilization in Lebanon must continue to be followed.

Let us also hope that this mindless tragedy in Beirut will not undo the historic and valuable achievements of Ambassador Philip Habib, and that the march toward peace in the war-torn Middle East will continue. Bashir Gemayel would have wanted it so.●

COATED FABRIC TARIFF

HON. JAMES M. SHANNON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce, on behalf of myself and the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MARTIN), legislation to restore the traditional tariff treatment of coated fabric. By doing this, we intend to preserve an American industry which contributes well over $1 billion a year to our national product and provides tens of thousands of American jobs.

Since adoption of the tariff schedules of the United States in 1963, imitation leather and other plastic and rubber-coated, filled and laminated fabrics were classified as textile products for tariff purposes under schedule 3, series 355 of the tariff schedules. Schedule 3 is entitled "Textile Fibers and Textile Products," and series 355 refers specifically to textile materials "whether coated or filled."

The recent decision of the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals in U.S. v. Elbe Products Corp., 655 F. 2d 1107 (1981), decided over the objection of the Treasury Department, has eroded the longstanding classification of these products. In Elbe Products the court held that imitation leather products consisting of plastic coating over fabric were properly classified not under schedule 3, series 355, but under schedule 7 (specified products; miscellaneous and nonenumerated products), series 771 (materials "almost wholly of" rubber or plastic).

The Treasury Department has consistently argued against this result, and the Customs Service has consistently classified imitation leather and other coated fabrics under schedule 3. However, as a result of Elbe Products, the Department on March 25, 1982, issued a ruling paper establishing for customs purposes the new rule under which virtually all imitation leather must be reclassified under series 771. Other coated, laminated, or filled textile materials must also be reclassified.

If this reclassification is allowed to stand, the continued existence of our domestic industry, which has long relied on the established tariff treatment of its products, will be in severe jeopardy.

The fabrics in schedule 3 receive a duty rate as high as 13 percent plus 10 cents per pound. Fabrics reclassified to schedule 7 receive between 3.7 percent and 5.3 percent. In addition, when fabrics are reclassified to schedule 7, imports from developing countries—such as Taiwan, Korea, Mexico, Venezuela, and Brazil—become eligible under the generalized system of preferences for duty-free entry to this country. Unless action is taken now to reverse this reclassification, the results for the American industry will be tragic.

Mr. Speaker, our bill is narrowly drawn to achieve no more than a reinstatement of the tariff treatment which these fabrics have traditionally received and on which American manufacturers have relied for decades. I hope for its quick and favorable consideration.

A bill to amend the Tariff Schedules of the United States to correct an anomaly in the rate of duty applicable to textile fabrics, articles and materials coated, filled or laminated with rubber or plastics

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That part 12 of schedule 7 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) is amended by inserting immediately after headnote 1 of part 12 headnote the following new headnote:

"2. This part does not cover textile fabrics, articles or materials coated or filled, or laminated, with rubber or plastics or rubber or plastics materials, which are covered in part 4C of Schedule 3. The determination as to whether such textile fabrics, articles or materials are covered in part 4C of Schedule 3 shall be made without regard to headnote 1(vii) of part 4C of Schedule 3."

SEC. 2. Subpart C of part 4 of Schedule 3 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) is amended by inserting immediately after headnote 2 of subpart 4C headnotes the following new headnote:

"3. In determining whether fabrics, articles and materials are 'of textile materials' and covered by this subpart, the nontextile coating or filling and nontextile laminating substances shall be disregarded."

SEC. 3. Headnote 5 of Schedule 3 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) is amended to read as follows:

"5. For the purposes of parts 5, 6, and 7 of this schedule and parts 1 (except subpart A), 4, and 12 of schedule 7, in determining the classification of any article (other than an article which is a fabric provided for in part 4C of this schedule) which is wholly or in part of a fabric coated or filled, or laminated, with nontransparent rubber or plastics (which fabric is provided for in part 4C of this schedule), such article shall be regarded not as a textile material but as being wholly of rubber or plastics to the extent that the nontransparent rubber or plastics forms either the outer surface of such article or the only exposed surface of such fabric."

SEC. 4. The amendments made by this Act shall apply with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption on or after the date of enactment of this Act.●

JOHN GARDNER DEAD AT 49

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, John Gardner, the novelist, poet, and teacher whose readers throughout the Nation and the world have been growing in number for more than 10 years, has been a resident of Susquehanna County in northeastern Pennsylvania for a number of years.

In a tragic accident, Mr. Gardner was killed Tuesday in a motorcycle accident near his rural home. He was 49 years of age. His untimely death came as a shock to the innumerable fans his works have attracted, as well as to the literary and academic communities in both of which he has been a figure of great interest and respect.

Mr. Gardner, while not a Pennsylvanian by birth, was born not far away in Batavia in Genesee County in northwestern New York. His father was a dairy farmer; his mother a school teacher. He was deeply rooted in our section of the country. His writings tell us more of people and places we know.

Head of the creative writing program at the State University of New York at Binghamton since 1978, he had previously taught at colleges and universities in California, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio and Vermont. His own education was at Washington University in St. Louis, Mo. (BA) and the State University of Iowa (MA and Ph. D.).

His novels—"Grendel" (1971), "The Sunlight Dialogues" (1972), "October Light" (1976), which won the Nation Book Critics' Circle Award, "Mickelsson's Ghosts" (1982), and others—totaled more than two dozen in number. He also wrote plays, numerous stories, poems, librettos, an epic poem, and works of criticism, including his important 1978 book, "On Moral Fiction."

A writer like John Gardner is a man like others, yet one apart. We do not fully understand him, but he shows us more about ourselves.

We are glad that John Gardner lived among us for awhile. We deeply regret the accident that took him from the world.●

BILLS AGAINST DRUNK DRIVERS TO BE INTRODUCED

HON. HAROLD S. SAWYER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, most of us probably know of a teenager who was tragically maimed or killed in a drunk-driving accident. Last year alone over 25,000 Americans died in accidents involving alcohol—over 25,000 senseless and avoidable deaths.

This week the House of Representatives will be voting on two bills that could effectively reduce these horrible deaths.

One bill, the false identification bill, which I introduced in April, would penalize persons who purposely use the mails to provide minors with I.D.'s that have false birthdates, enabling minors to buy alcohol illegally. Violators could face a year in prison, $1,000 fine, or both.

The second bill, the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 embodies the provisions of H.R. 6170 which would provide highway trust fund funds to States that establish effective alcohol safety programs. Among other provisions, this 3-year program encourages statewide networks to identify repeat offenders and gives the courts broad power to recommend various punishments for offenders.

With the rising occurrence of these types of accidents, I think it is imperative that the Congress seriously address this problem by passing these two bills.●

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, due to fog in the Providence area, I was absent for the first two votes today. Had I been present, I would have voted "Aye" on approval of the Journal and "No" on H.R. 4374, the Shipping Act; I request unanimous consent that the record so reflect.●

MORE ON CHEMICAL WARFARE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, the damning evidence on the use of chemical warfare by the Soviet Union and its client states continues to mount. In a recent article by the Washington Post, a Soviet soldier captured by Afghan freedom fighters has alleged that Soviet forces in Afghanistan are using chemical weapons against the freedom fighters. The captured Soviet soldier said that he had seen three different kinds of chemical weapons stored by the Soviets: Picric acid which affects the eyes and respiratory system and causes burning of the skin; various asphyxiation gases; and a chemical agent referred to as "smirch" which is fired from helicopter gunships as well as jet aircraft.

In another article that appeared in the Wall Street Journal, Dr. Milton B. Amayun, a private Philippine missionary physician, who spent 2 years working in a Laotian refugee camp, concluded that the refugees were suffering from the effects of chemical attacks by Vietnamese and Laotian forces.

Mr. Speaker, I submit these articles for the RECORD in the hopes that the world will understand that the Soviet Union and its Communist client states will use any means, including the horror and barbarity of chemical warfare, to crush the human spirit.

SOVIET SOLDIER TELLS OF CHEMICAL ARMS USE

(By Aernout Van Lynden)

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN, Sept. 8—A Soviet soldier, held by Afghan rebels fighting the Soviet-backed regime in Kabul, has alleged that Soviet forces in Afghanistan are using chemical weapons against the guerilla insurgents.

Anatoly Sakharov, who said he is a 19-year-old conscripted soldier from Saransk, about 500 miles east of Moscow, said that he had seen specially stored chemical weapons at two of the four major Soviet air bases in Afghanistan—at Kabul and at Kunduz in the northern part of the country.

Sakharov said that he had never witnessed the use of chemical weapons but that on several occasions he had seen Russian soldiers who had been contaminated by gas used against the guerrilla insurgents. The soldiers, returning from combat operations, had been affected by burns, specifically in and around the eyes, and had some breathing problems, he said.

Sakharov, who was presented by the rebels to journalists yesterday for a three-hour interview just inside the Afghan border, said he had been held by the resistance since the beginning of last month, when he had walked off the Soviet air base in Kunduz intending to defect. He said in a prepared statement that he was willing to join the rebels and realized that the Afghan people want the Soviet troops to leave.

Sakharov's comments could not be independently confirmed. It seemed unlikely that the generally unsophisticated Afghan resistance groups had forced him to make his statement, although he may have done so in hope of increasing his chances of eventually securing his freedom from the insurgents. He filled out an International Red Cross identification card and said he was aware that five Soviet prisoners held by the rebels had been transferred to detention in Switzerland this year under a Red Cross and inter-governmental program.

Sakharov said that the three different kinds of chemical weapons he had seen stored were picric acid, which affects the eyes and respiratory system and causes burning of the skin; various asphyxiation gases, and a chemical agent he referred to as "smirch."

The picric and asphyxiant gases were contained in cylinders of a "dense, yellowish" color, Sakharov said. The gas or fluid is released from the cylinders from aircraft through a vent, which is clearly visible from the outside. "Smirch," he said, is contained in rockets fired for the most part by the helicopter gunships and occasionally from aircraft, including supersonic jets. He said these rockets had certain structural differences from ordinary high-explosive rockets.

Sakharov cited a conversation he said had taken place on June 2 with a member of one of the MI-24 helicopter gunship crews stationed at Kabul. The crewmember had told him that earlier that day his crew had been ordered to go into action after a successful rebel attack on a Soviet convoy on the road between Kabul and the Soviet Union. They had been ordered to use gas masks and when they had caught up with some of the rebels, fleeing into the mountains, chemical gases had been used against the guerrillas.

Allegations of Soviet use of chemical weapons against both the rebels and Afghan civilians since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in December 1979 have made repeatedly by refugees crossing the border into Pakistan, but the evidence has remained largely circumstantial.

The credibility of the charges also has been challenged because of U.S. government involvement in investigations of the use of chemical weapons by the Soviets in Afghanistan and by their Vietnamese allies in Laos and Cambodia. The U.S. charges have been used to buttress President Reagan's efforts to start production of nerve gas weapons and other chemical arms.

A 36-page special U.N. report about the use of chemicals in Afghanistan, which was leaked to the press earlier this year, was unable to come up with conclusive evidence. It did, however, include reports from doctors working in refugee camps in Pakistan who had said that on several occasions after several attacks on villages, "bodies had quickly decomposed, and limbs had separated from each other when touched."

Sakharov's testimony on the effects of "smirch," the first on the subject from a Soviet soldier fighting in Afghanistan, tallies closely with the doctors' description.

Sakharov, who appeared nervous but in good health during the interview, said he had been conscripted into the Army at the beginning of April and arrived in Kabul on May 17. After serving for two months at staff headquarters in Kabul, he was transferred to the air base in Kunduz.

He said he received basic training in Tashkent, with additional training after his arrival in Kabul. It was in Kabul that he underwent the standard training given to all Soviet soldiers in nuclear, biological and chemical warfare.

Sakharov said that they had been told their destination before leaving Tashkent and that the soldiers had been given some background on Afghanistan and its way of life. He had, however, not been told who precisely the enemy would be. The conscripts chatted and joked with each other about the rebels and seemed to have used the term dushman as a sort of equivalent of the American soldiers' "gook" in Vietnam.

The lean, 5 foot 10 inch blond soldier, who was wearing a military cap with the distinctive red star and golden hammer and sickle, was somewhat unclear on how he fell into the hands of the rebels. He described the atmosphere as "oppressive" at the two bases where he served, and he seemed to have had major disciplinary problems. The soldiers had not been allowed to leave the barracks, and there was little entertainment, he said.

DOCTOR WHO TREATED ASIAN REFUGEES FINDS EVIDENCE OF CHEMICAL WARFARE

(By Gerald F. Seib)

WASHINGTON.—Like his colleagues, the doctor was highly skeptical of reports that refugees in Southeast Asia had been victims of chemical warfare.

But after misdiagnosing hundreds of refugees as victims of tuberculosis and other lung diseases, he reconsidered. He listened more closely as the refugees told of mysterious attacks in Laos, and he began doing research. In the end, the doctor and his colleagues concluded that the refugees were indeed suffering the effects of chemical attacks. "We named the disease poison gas syndrome," he recalls.

That, in a nutshell, is the experience of Dr. Milton B. Amayun, a private Philippine doctor who spent two years working at a Laotian refugee camp in Thailand. He recently laid out his story in a report submitted to a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee studying the Reagan administration's charges that Soviet-equipped troops have been methodically using chemical weapons in Laos and Cambodia.

Dr. Amayun's story is a vivid case study of how outsiders are piecing together information suggesting that chemical warfare is being waged by Vietnamese and Laotian forces in Laos and Vietnamese forces in Cambodia. Like others who have struggled with the mysterious evidence, Dr. Amayun can't completely prove the case. In his report, which hasn't been made public yet, and a telephone interview, he acknowledges many questions he can't answer. He can't, for example, prove that the chemicals being used are the rare mycotoxins the State Department has singled out.

But Dr. Amayun's report fits into a pattern of evidence that has led the State Department to wage a public campaign against what it says are Soviet-inspired "yellow rain" chemical attacks. Congressional staffers familiar with the issue consider Dr. Amayun's story significant for several reasons. He seems an impartial source, because congressional staffers sought him out to make the report, without prompting from the State Department. The doctor isn't a government employee or even an American, so he apparently hasn't any political motives.

Dr. Amayun is a physician for World Vision International, a missionary organization that provides medical help around the globe. He began working in the Ban Vinai refugee camp, situated in Thailand about seven miles from the Laotian border, in 1979.

The camp had just swelled to 42,000 refugees fleeing the fighting in Laos between the Soviet-supported Laotian government and rebel forces. Practically all the refugees in the camp were members of the Hmong highland tribe, which has resisted government control.

Early in his duty, Dr. Amayun found that each day he was seeing 20 to 30 patients suffering from respiratory difficulties. They complained of coughing that produced bloody discharges, weight loss, anorexia and general malaise. Dr. Amayun and his colleagues decided they had a rash of tuberculosis and paragonimiasis, another lung disease, on their hands.

So in January 1980 they initiated a "major TB program," his report says. Six laboratory technicians were recruited to do mass screenings. A pathologist and tuberculosis nurse were brought in. The camp established a system to methodically diagnose and treat the diseases.

But after months of screening, laboratory technicians found that out of several hundred cases only 25 patients had tuberculosis and 30 had paragonimiasis.

"It was at this point," Dr. Amayun reported, "that we began to listen more carefully to the explanation given by the refugees for their malady: 'colored dust from the skies that kills.'"

The doctors began doing careful interviews of the refugees, a step passed over earlier because of, among other things, a formidable language barrier between the Hmongs and outsiders. In almost every "unexplainable" respiratory case, Dr. Amayun contends, it turned out that victims had a story of killer dust or smoke. In the interviewing process, doctors heard stories of orphaned children, animals killed instantly and poisoned streams.

So Dr. Amayun, who had become camp medical coordinator, opened a file of suspected gassing victims. He called in other doctors from refugee committees, the U.S. Embassy, the Canadian Embassy and World Vision. Most, he contends, were convinced that chemical attacks were taking place.

One outsider was notably unconvinced. The local representative of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees was "openly skeptical of the reports," Dr. Amayun says in his report. The U.S. government has been similarly frustrated in attempts to arouse U.N. interest. In an interview, Dr. Amayun says the U.N. is slow to respond "mainly because its findings would mean an indictment of some countries."

In the end, Dr. Amayun concluded that "chemicals have been used against the Hmong intermittently since 1976." He isn't sure exactly which chemicals. The symptoms are unfamiliar enough that Dr. Amayun suspects the U.S. may be right in charging that rare trichothecene mycotoxins are being used. But "I couldn't identify mycotoxins because even now few doctors know what the effects of mycotoxins are," he says.

Dr. Amayun left the refugee camp in the spring of 1981 and currently is at World Vision's offices in California. He says other doctors are similarly convinced chemical warfare is being conducted. But because they weren't as familiar with the Hmong, or are afraid of making political waves, some are more reluctant to speak up than he is.

"I feel responsible because the Hmong are voiceless," he says. "They have few advocates in this.●

BOY SCOUT TROOP 29 CELEBRATES ITS 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. PHILLIP BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, on October 1, 2, and 3, 1982, Boy Scout Troop 29, under the sponsorship of the San Francisco Buddhist Church, will celebrate its 50th anniversary. I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the accomplishments of troop 29 and commend the troop on their achievements and successes in the Scouting program.

Although many of the important documents concerning the history of troop 29 were lost when Japanese-American families were interned during World War II, through the memories and recollections by the Scouts of that era, and the recovery of several old photographs of the troop during its early days, it has been possible to reconstruct part of the troop's historical past.

This troop, which has served the San Francisco community for almost half a century, began modestly in 1932. Headed by Mr. Mikio Fujimoto, and centered in the basement of an old Victorian-styled home, this dynamic organization promptly gained international recognition, when its drum and bugle corps performed at the World Exposition in 1939.

Unfortunately, the troop was disbanded during World War II as a result of the tragic internment of Japanese Americans during this time. However, the troop's moral responsibilities and teachings passed on to its participants, as many former Scouts joined and served in the U.S. Armed Forces to defend our Nation during that time of crisis.

Indeed, the troop had been so successful prior to the war that many Japanese Americans after the war felt the reorganization and the rebuilding of Boy Scout Troop 29 was a top priority in educating the Japanese Americans of this Nation.

Once the effort was made, troop 29 prospered. In its 50-year history, over 350 families have sent their children to participate and become part of the Boy Scout program in troop 29. This troop has dedicated itself to bettering the community in which it thrives and can point to an impressive 52 members who have attained the prestigious rank of Eagle Scout.

The troop has made three trips to Japan—in 1965, 1974, and 1982—to participate in the Boy Scout World Jamborees. Their trips have been invaluable in promoting a good will relationship between the Scouts of Japan and the Scouts of this country.

Today, the proud tradition of troop 29 lives through the effective leadership of Scoutmaster Art Sawada. Scouting is an institution in our society which stresses the ideals and values of trust, courtesy, and self-reliance. These principles are exemplified in troop 29 as led by Mr. Sawada.

This year, as troop 29 celebrates its "Golden Anniversary," I wish to extend to them my heartfelt congratulations on their past achievements and wish them the best of luck in the decades ahead.●

OPPOSITION TO THE MARCOS STATE VISIT

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the official state visit of Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos is an affront to the basic tenets of American foreign policy. The Marcos regime has conducted 17 years of injustice, repression, denial of human rights, and the militarization of the region. Since 1974 U.S. Presidents have gradually encouraged improved ties with Marcos, but President Reagan is now breaking with that process and welcoming Marcos with open arms and full support.

Our Nation's global role is hurt by this visit. The President of the United States has turned his back on human rights in the Philippines.

More than 2 weeks ago I was joined by four of our colleagues in calling on President Reagan to cancel the planned visit. Since then, four other Members of the House of Representatives have added their support. Our concern is spelled out in the "Statement of Opposition to the Marcos State Visit" that appears below.

I urge my colleagues to carefully consider the implications of the Marcos visit for our relations with other repressive leaders, and thus our international effectiveness at pursuing foreign policy that reflects the values of our Nation:

STATEMENT OF OPPOSITION TO THE MARCOS STATE VISIT

The projected state visit of Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos should distress all those concerned with struggling for a foreign policy which truly serves the interests of peace, justice, and human rights.

The visit does not have the character of a "normal courtesy" accorded a foreign chief of state. Rather, it marks the culmination of a process of "normalization" with a repressive ally. Over the last year and a half, the Reagan administration has thrown its support fully behind Marcos, in spite of the latter's well-known and documented violations of human rights. This administration has even gone so far as declaring that these abuses are imaginary, as did Vice President George Bush when he lauded Marcos last year as an "adherent to democratic rights and processes."

Marcos' record, however, cannot be expunged. A recent confidential U.S. Embassy Report itself admits that cases of "salvaging" or unofficial executions carried out by the military have increased in many areas. U.S. military aid—now totalling over $100 million annually—goes to fuel an abusive military, many of whose members, according to the same report, engage in banditry and kidnapping. Torture and other abuses continue to be so prevalent that Amnesty International has declared the month of September as a period to spotlight human rights violations in the Philippines.

The policy of support for the Marcos government which successive administrations since Richard Nixon's have followed is a record we as American legislators are deeply ashamed of. Currently, this policy is justified under the rubric of "national security." We ask, however: What "security interests" are served by propping up an unpopular dictator? Whose interests are advanced by a policy of aggressive militarism that consists of backing isolated regimes such as those in El Salvador and the Philippines, whose only function is to thwart their people's desire for justice, national sovereignty, and equality?

What is deeply alarming is that the Reagan administration has now taken a major step towards extending Marcos' martial law to the Filipino community in the United States by negotiating an Extradition Treaty with the Philippines, the main purpose of which, the regime has openly admitted, is to send back Marcos' U.S.-based political foes. This move has gone hand-in-hand with the convening of a Federal Grand Jury to indict so-called "Filipino terrorists" under the Neutrality Act. And, as if these developments were not disturbing enough, evidence is now surfacing that the murder of two anti-Marcos labor union activists in Seattle in 1981 was the fruit of closer coordination between U.S. and Philippine security agencies.

The costs of this policy of backing Marcos and other dictators are borne not only by the Filipino people and the Filipino community in the U.S. Curtailing the rights of a sector of the population to free speech and political assembly may inevitably lead to curtailing the rights of all. Moreover, the working people and the poor of this country have to bear the brunt of economic costs of this policy, with the transfer of billions of dollars from the social budget to the ever-escalating defense budget.

It is high time that we as legislators take the lead in forging a new policy toward the Philippines, one based on equality, justice, and mutual respect among peoples—not on domination and support for repression.

An important first step in this process is to strongly protest and oppose the state visit of Ferdinand Marcos. This will not make up for our government's record of consistent support for the dictatorship. But it will, we hope, contribute to forging a new, enlightened, and equal relationship between the people of the Philippines and the people of the United States.

The institution of emergency rule by Mr. Marcos on August 31 is a blatant repudiation of any expectation that the Marcos regime will ever democratize. Emergency rule is nothing but a pretext to reimpose martial law, which was lifted in name last year. This development makes it all that more imperative for President Reagan to cancel the invitation for a state visit.

OPPOSITION TO THE EXTRADITION ACT OF 1982

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my opposition to H.R. 6046, the Extradition Act of 1982.

You will notice that the general tendency to label bills as "reform" has been resisted in this case and for good reason.

This bill takes some serious steps backward particularly in the narrowing of the definition of a political offense. However, from my point of view, what is even more troubling is the failure of this legislature to make the necessary reforms in the existing law.

In light of the alliances that the administration is making and strengthening with dictatorships around the world and its refusal to acknowledge systematic violations of human rights in countries such as El Salvador, we urgently need reform of the extradition laws.

Specifically, we need to assure the the rights of persons in the United States—citizens and aliens alike—are protected by the courts and are not dependent on the good will of the Secretary of State and the Attorney General.

Extradition reforms would: Apply the Bail Reform Act to those held for extradition, reversing the current presumption against bail and insuring that people will not be held in American jails because of the mere assertion of a foreign government that they had committed extraditable offenses; permit the courts to consider allegations that a person being extradited would be accorded due process rather than leaving such determinations to a Secretary of State who believes that Salvadoran peasants receive appropriate due process; and permit the courts to consider allegations that the request for extradition is a subterfuge and the person will be imprisoned because of political views or peaceful political activity. Again, such determinations cannot be left to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, it is far too late in the session to give this issue the careful attention it deserves. I hope that H.R. 6046 will not be scheduled. If it is, I intend to insist that it be fully debated and that a series of amendments be considered which will make this into genuine reform legislation while eliminating the further erosion of rights contained in the bill.●

SOCIAL SECURITY QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, September 15, 1982, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

SOCIAL SECURITY QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

In recent meetings I have held in the Ninth District, social security is still a prime topic of discussion. Hoosiers want to know about the outlook for the trust funds, and they ask questions on almost every other aspect of the program. These are some of the most frequently heard questions, and my responses:

Question. Why isn't something being done about social security for prisoners?

Answer. Much has been done. A few years ago, reports indicated that some 30,000 prisoners were receiving $60 million every year in social security benefits. Although these figures were very exaggerated, Congress recognized the problem and passed a law in 1980 to deny disability and student benefits to felons. The number of beneficiaries in prison was actually 6,000 to 7,000 in 1980. Approximately 80% of them were receiving disability or student benefits and have since been dropped from the rolls. The remaining prisoners have been receiving retirement benefits primarily, which would be terminated by bills now pending in Congress.

Question. Are the trust funds being used to pay welfare benefits?

Answer. No. By law, the trust funds cannot be used for any purpose other than the payment of social security benefits to families who have paid into the system. The misconception that welfare benefits are paid arises from the fact that the Social Security Administration handles a welfare program called Supplemental Security Income (SSI). However, SSI is funded by general tax revenue, not by the trust funds.

Question. Is it true that the trust funds loaned large sums of money to the Defense Department during World War II—sums which have never been repaid?

Answer. No. The trust funds have always invested their surplus monies in government securities. There has always been full and timely repayment of these securities—with interest.

Question. How realistic is the proposal to end the yearly payment of $700 million in social security benefits to aliens living outside the United States?

Answer. There are problems with it. For the most part, these benefits go to people who paid the pay roll tax when they worked in the United States. Ending their benefits might be seen as an attempt to deprive them of something they had earned. Some experts have questioned how much could be saved in any case, since millions of dollars collected from aliens would have to be returned and current contributions from aliens would have to be stopped. Moreover, such a move by the United States could prompt other nations to retaliate and cut off the sizeable pensions they are paying to American citizens.

Question. If a person pays into social security for years, how can his account possibly come up short when he begins to draw on it?

Answer. Social security is not set up like a savings account, in which a person's deposits accumulate slowly and then are withdrawn during retirement. From the beginning, it has been a "pay-as-you-go" system, with taxes paid in almost immediately paid out in the form of benefits. A person is paying the retirement benefits of his parent's generation; his retirement benefits will be paid by his children's generation.

Question. Can a person expect to get back in benefits as much as he paid in?

Answer. In general, yes. Past and present retirees will get the greatest return on investment because of their smaller pay roll deductions. For example, someone reaching 65 years of age in 1981 who paid the maximum tax throughout his working life contributed $14,700, a sum which he and his wife will get back during his first year or more of retirement. Overall, the average retired person today can hope to collect benefits five times as great as his contribution, plus interest. Even though the size of the return will greatly decline for those who retire in future years, the average younger worker is still expected to recover more in benefits than he paid in. In addition, his participation in social security may include survivors' and disability benefits and medical care in retirement.

Question. Why aren't government employees included in social security?

Answer. At present, some 10 percent of the labor force is not covered by social security. This includes 3 million federal civilian employees and 4 million workers in state and local government. When the system was set up in 1935, federal civilian employees were not included because they already had their own retirement system and were not considered to be as needy as older workers in commerce and industry. Employees of state and local governments were not included because of the questionable constitutionality of a compulsory federal tax affecting other governmental entities. The participation of state and local government workers was made voluntary, and currently about two thirds of them are covered. It is widely known that Congress will soon consider mandatory coverage for state and local government workers and for federal civilian employees.

Question. Why are benefits reduced when retirees decide that they want to work?

Answer. As the law is now written, retirees aged 65 to 71 years lose 50 cents in benefits for every dollar they earn in excess of $6,000 per year. Proponents of this "earnings test" say that it preserves the integrity of social security by ensuring that benefits replace income lost because of retirement. Also, elimination of the test would cost the system more than $8 billion per year. Beginning in 1983, the maximum age at which the test applies will drop to 69 years.

Question. Who determines whether retirees will get a cost-of-living increase each year?

Answer. Retirees are entitled to a cost-of-living increase by law, not by presidential edict. This law states that there will be an increase whenever inflation exceeds 3 percent per year. President Reagan wanted to change the law and delay the increase, but he withdrew his plan when he encountered stiff opposition in Congress.●

EXTRADITION: A CIVIL LIBERTIES PROBLEM

HON. SHIRLEY CHISHOLM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to my colleagues' attention some serious reservations which I have about H.R. 6046, the Extradition Act of 1982.

The bill as reported from the House Judiciary Committee not only fails to correct the current deficiencies in the extradition process but also narrows the scope of judicial review. This provision creates the risk that authoritarian regimes could in collaboration with the executive branch deprive foreigners and American citizens of their constitutional rights. Already we can see a dangerous precedent in the naming of persons for extradition to the Philippines before the Senate has even ratified the United States-Philippine Extradition Treaty. In addition, the asylum case of Dennis Brutus raises the possibility of a political opponent of the South African Government being faced with persecution because of his outspoken views. As indicated by the above examples, this legislation could clearly be used as a subterfuge to punish political opponents for their views.

I would hope that the house will not rush to judgment on H.R. 6046 but will instead give due consideration to the perfecting amendments to be offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CROCKETT) when this bill is brought to the floor. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the following editorial from the New York Times of August 11 by Prof. Christopher Pyle of Mount Holyoke College for my colleagues' attention.

[From the New York Times, Aug. 11, 1982]

RUINING EXTRADICTION

By Christopher H. Pyle

SOUTH HADLEY, MASS.—FOR MORE THAN TWO CENTURIES, THE UNITED STATES HAS PROVIDED A REFUGE TO WHICH OPPONENTS OF AUTHORITARIAN REGIMES COULD FLEE WITHOUT FEAR THAT THEY WOULD BE RETURNED TO STAND TRIAL FOR POLITICAL OFFENSES. THAT POLICY MAY BE ABOUT TO END.

Under either of the extradition bills now cleared for debate in Congress, persons charged with political crimes would be stripped of their legal defense and United States courts would be turned into the long arms of foreign persecution.

The purpose of the bills—to facilitate the return of terrorists—is manifestly worthwhile. However, both bills are so badly written that they would endanger the very persons that American law governing extradition has always shielded: critics of foreign regimes, former freedom fighters against authoritarian rule, former officials of regimes that the United States once supported.

For example, both bills provide for the arrest of an accused person without any proof that he is guilty of a crime. A mere allegation by a foreign dictatorship, coupled with a promise to produce evidence sometime in the future, would be sufficient to cause the United States Government to jail the accused for months. No United States prosecutor has this power of arbitrary detention, but under these bills, Albania, Rumania, South Africa, El Salvador and about 90 more countries with which we have extradition agreements would have it, and could use it to bring about the imprisonment of their critics within the United States.

Under current law, no American court will allow a person to be extradited if it can be shown that he or she is really being sought for "an offense of a political character." Each bill would, in its own way, destroy this defense.

The Senate bill, which the Administration favors, would do so by stripping the courts of jurisdiction over the political crimes defense. Instead, the accused would have to raise his claim with the State Department, which could then decide whether protecting him from persecution is worth the risk of alienating the foreign government involved.

The State Department's motive for supporting this bill is clear. It wants to be able to swap alleged criminals with foreign countries the same way that children trade baseball cards: "We'll give you one terrorist if you give us three embezzlers."

The House bill seems more protective of political refugees than the Senate bill because it would keep in the courts the power to decide the political crimes defense. However, the appearance is deceptive, because the House bill would forbid the courts to regard as political, and hence not extraditable, any offense involving bodily violence or a conspiracy to commit bodily violence. There is a tiny exception for crimes committed under "extraordinary circumstances," but the bill does not say what they might be. All that is clear is the political message: Protecting foreign revolutionaries from return to authoritarian regimes should be a rare, not common occurrence.

As if to emphasize a preference for authoritarian regimes, both bills would forbid the courts to question whether a request for extradition was really a subterfuge for persecution. Nor would the courts be allowed to hear evidence that the charges against the accused resulted from torture or to deny extradition on the ground that the requesting regime is notorious for brutal interrogations, unjust trials or cruel punishment. Judgments of this sort would be left to the State Department, which currently pretends that El Salvador protects human rights.

The Administration claims that the courts should be denied the power to look into foreign injustice in order to assure the neutrality of the United States in foreign political conflicts. However, there can be no doubt where the Justice Department's sympathies would lie; both bills would require its lawyers to represent all foreign governments in their extradition requests. The United States would be neutral—on the side of whoever happens to be in power.

In anticipation of this legislation and a treaty to implement it, the Marcos dictatorship is requesting the extradition of more than a dozen of its opponents now living in the United States. One of those charged with plotting in the United States to support bombings in the Philippines is Benigno Aquino Jr., an associate at Harvard University's School of International Affairs who ran against President Ferdinand E. Marcos in the last free election. The only "evidence" against Mr. Aquino comes from the confession of an alleged co-conspirator who later recanted, claiming he had been tortured. However, if either bill now before Congress passes, that evidence will be sufficient to send this democratic politician back into the hands of the dictator he opposed.

THE VIOLENT CRIME CONTROL ACT

HON. HAROLD S. SAWYER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, September 11, 1982, President Reagan announced that he was sending to Congress a second package of anticrime measures. I am pleased to introduce that package, the Criminal Justice Reform Act of 1982, in this body today.

As the ranking Republican on the Subcommittee on Crime, I concur in the President's view which he expressed on Saturday that Americans are sadly losing faith in our criminal justice system. The President correctly observed that the primary responsibility for dealing with violent career criminals rests with State and local authorities. However, there are steps that the Federal Government can take within our constitutional system to address the problem of violent crime and to thereby restore the confidence of the American people in the legal system.

The package which I am introducing today has three titles. The first makes important modifications in the insanity defense and is similar in many ways to the provisions contained in the Violent Crime Control Act which I introduced last November. Although the insanity defense is raised in relatively few cases, the John Hinckley case is a stunning illustration of the tragedy which ensues when the defense operates unjustly. It is imperative that the Federal Government correct the potential which currently exists for criminals to escape the punishment which they justly deserve.

Title II of the bill modifies the exclusionary rule which has been promulgated under the fourth amendment. Like H.R. 5971, which I introduced earlier this year with the support of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime (Mr. HUGHES), it would provide that evidence obtained as a result of a search or seizure which is otherwise admissible as evidence shall not be excluded in a Federal court proceeding if the search or seizure was undertaken by the law enforcement officer in a reasonable, good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment, even if the courts later rule it was not. The bill also provides that a showing that the evidence was obtained pursuant to and within the scope of a warrant constitutes prima facie evidence of such a belief, unless the warrant was obtained with intentional and material misrepresentation. This modification codifies recent case law in this area and honors the rationale underlying the exclusionary rule. As the Supreme Court noted in Elkins against United States, the "basic postulate of the exclusionary rule * * * is * * * to deter—to compel respect for the constitutional guaranty in the only effectively available way—by removing the incentive to disregard it." 364 U.S. 206, 217 (1960). Unfortunately, the exclusionary rule has become so complex that even the greatest legal minds can strongly disagree as to its applicability in a particular factual situation. It should come as no surprise, then, when the police officer's judgment on the constitutionality of his actions is subsequently overruled by the courts. Where the officer acts within a reasonable, good faith belief that his search or seizure was constitutional, he needs no further incentive to act legally. A subsequent reversal by the courts will serve only to demoralize him, embolden the criminal, and endanger the public. The provisions in this bill, like my bill, will address the problems created by the exclusionary rule, while preserving its intended benefits.

Title III of the bill would amend title 28 of the United States Code governing petitions for habeas corpus relief. Our Federal courts are currently overwhelmed by petitions for habeas corpus relief, particularly from State prisoners. Although such relief should, of course, be available where there has been manifest injustice, all too frequently these petitions are without merit. The President has recommended various changes which will discourage the filing of unmeritorious claims. Included among his recommendations are restrictions on the availability of Federal habeas corpus relief where a State defendant has failed to raise a claim properly in State proceedings, a statute of limitations on the filing of petitions for habeas corpus relief, authority for the Federal court to deny a habeas corpus petition on the merits notwithstanding the petitioner's failure to exhaust State remedies, and provisions according greater deference to full and fair State decisions. These provisions, along with recent decisions of the Supreme Court, should have a beneficial impact on the Federal courts' caseloads, while preserving the rights of prisoners.

Mr. Speaker, this package is the second that the President of the United States has sent to this Congress. Unfortunately, the first package, like my own Violent Crime Control Act, is languishing in committee. The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES) and I have been successful in moving various individual crime bills through this body, including legislation to criminalize the misuse of false identification documents and a bill to criminalize violent attacks on Cabinet officers and other high Government officials, which were just passed this week. Other significant measures, and particularly my bill, H.R. 4362, which would provide limited authority for the Federal courts to detain dangerous criminals prior to trial, have not been processed with the same speed. I urge the committee leadership to move these measures promptly during the closing weeks of this Congress so that effective crime legislation will be the landmark of the 97th Congress.●

WATER SUBJECT TO CONGRESSIONAL REGULATIONS

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I note with great interest an article in the September 12 Washington Post entitled "Wheat Farmer Stuns the West With Water Suit." It depicts the background of the case leading to the recent Supreme Court ruling in Sporhase against Nebraska that water is an article of commerce subject to congressional regulation.

Declaring water to be an article of commerce overturns the longstanding ruling by Justice Holmes in 1908 that water is a special resource not to be subject to a traditional commerce clause analysis. Rather, it should be treated, he reasoned, as a resource which is protected in the public's interest and not put up on the auction block to be made available to the highest bidder. Indeed, Congress has deferred to the States the responsibility to conserve and preserve their water resources, believing they are better suited to consider this delicate matter.

The Sporhase decision may begin to erode the established and complex system of State law regulating the use of these resources, particularly in the water-scarce western region of these resources, particularly in the water-scarce western region of our country. I am extremely concerned that the decision may open the door to wholesale transfers of water across State lines to the detriment of the legitimate right of our States to protect its water resources. The Supreme Court may well have given credence to the old saying that only money can make water run uphill.

Sporhase, in declaring water to be an article of commerce, gives Congress the authority to regulate it. A greater need now exists for the legislation I have introduced to protect shared-water resources. H.R. 5278, cosponsored by 24 of our colleagues, would prevent sales or transfers of interstate water resources unless the affected drainage basin States formed a compact and consented to the sale or transfer. This legislation provides a framework for the resolution of conflict, and treats all affected parties equally.

Mr. Speaker, I include the Post article in the RECORD for our colleagues to review.

WHEAT FARMER STUNS THE WEST WITH WATER SUIT

(By Dale Russakoff)

HOLYOKE, COLO., September 11.—He is a lifelong wheat farmer with an eighth-grade education. He files his legal documents in a cardboard fruit crate labeled "Pears Net Wt. 9 lbs." One of his lawyers is a self-described "country hick" and the other is fresh out of Creighton Law School in Omaha.

Yet Joy Sporhase, who says he is "proud to live in a country where you can go straight to the top," singlehandedly has shaken much of the West, upsetting the precarious legal system that guards the region's most precious resource: water.

All he wanted was to irrigate his Colorado corn and bean fields with water from his well just over the state line in Nebraska.

But nothing concerning water in the West is quite so simple. Sporhase stumbled onto a Nebraska law banning the shipment of underground water into Colorado. He fought it all the way to the Supreme Court. On July 2, he won.

Now Sporhase v. Nebraska has grown into something greater than one farmer's fight to irrigate his land. A dozen western states have laws similar to Nebraska's and most of them are in jeopardy.

The laws are part of an intricate legal system that rations the West's water between farmers and industry, and between states. Where there is water, there is wealth. Therefore, this system has shaped the West, and anything that challenges the system threatens the region's economic order.

Some politicians and interest groups predict that the Sporhase case could set off a "water rush," allowing huge energy companies to reach across state lines and guzzle water needed by farmers, toppling agriculture as the region's No. 1 livelihood.

Others say the impact will be gradual at most, that Sporhase is only the first in a series of cases that could reshape the distribution of the West's water profoundly.

As they pore over the ruling, these people often wonder at the upheaval caused by one hard-headed farmer whose land happened to straddle a state line.

"Sometimes," said water rights attorney Paul Bloom, "the most absurdly localized circumstances produce cosmic law. That's what you learn in law school. It's called precedent."

That's where Joy Sporhase, 65, came in. (Joy traditionally is a man's name in the Sporhase family). He didn't even intend to buy the farm. He and his son-in-law and partner, Delmar Moss, went to a farm auction near here in 1972 planning to buy some cattle. The land also was up for sale, and the highest bidder had offered $145 an acre.

"I thought to myself, heck, if it ain't gonna bring any more than that, why not buy it?" Sporhase recalled. He bid $146.

"Before we knew it, we'd bought a farm," he said. Word of the spur-of-the-moment purchase traveled fast to town, where Sporhase's wife, Gladys, was shopping. "Somebody said two crazy guys bought a farm, and I just knew it had to be them," she recalled.

The land covered 640 acres: 140 in Colorado and 500 in Nebraska, across the gravel road that is the state line at that point. It had a well, a fairly unremarkable contraption sitting 55 feet inside Nebraska. The former owner had written on his Nebraska well registration form that he intended to use the well to irrigate his land on both sides of the state line, and no one ever questioned him about it.

The well was routinely assigned the number G-33893 on Jan. 18, 1971—a number and a date that since have become part of the history of American water law. "See that?" Sporhase said as he pulled the registration form out of his fruit crate, pointing to the rough, handprinted words.

Several years later, Sporhase and Moss built a $47,000 sprinkling system to dribble water from the Nebraska well on their Colorado corn and bean fields. They contend that they notified state officials of their plan and were not warned against it.

"We were minding out own business," Sporhase said, "and here comes our first letter in the mail." He pulled the 1976 letter from the state Department of Water Resources from the crate. It referred to the 1971 registration form and the plan to pipe water from well No. G-33893 into Colorado. The letter threatened legal action if Sporhase and Moss persisted. "State law prohibits such activity," it said.

"We couldn't see where in the heck it made any difference," Sporhase said. "We owned the land on both sides of the line. The water sure wasn't paying any attention to where the line was. When Delmar went to Korea and my son went to Vietnam, it didn't make any difference what state the boys were from, did it?"

By an accident of geography, Sporhase and Moss found themselves at the center of the West's water troubles. Their farm sits atop a rock formation known as the Ogallala acquifer, the largest underground water source in the country, which now is drying up at an alarming rate.

The acquifer, which traps water like a sponge, supplies water for 15 million acres of farmland from South Dakota to Texas. At the current rate of use, it will dry up within 40 years, according to one study.

The states that depend on the acquifer have written volumes of rules and laws to try to keep what water remains to themselves. Colorado bans the export of underground water. Nebraska outlaws piping water from the acquifer to any state that in turn bans piping it into Nebraska.

Sporhase applied to Colorado for a permit to drill a well on that side of the line, but was turned down because state officials said the acquifer was already overused in his area. This meant he would have to let his 140 Colorado acres go dry, devaluing the land from $168,000 to $56,400.

Instead, the two farmers defied the Nebraska warning and continued to irrigate their Colorado land. When Nebraska filed suit as promised, Sporhase went straight to his lawyer, Dick Dudden of nearby Ogallala, Neb.

Dudden still recalls the day his fiesty farmer-client stormed into the office and vowed: "If I have to take my case to the U.S. Supreme Court, I'm going to do it."

The state won its case in Chase County, Neb., and again, when the farmers appealed, in the Nebraska Supreme Court. On Sept. 5, 1981, the farmers were forced to shut down operation of their well.

Then the initiative shifted to Dudden, who describes himself as a "country hick lawyer." Dudden, who had never before tried to take a case to the high court, bought a primer, "The United States Supreme Court," to learn how to apply for a hearing.

He also consulted a Denver firm whose attorneys had experience in Supreme Court appeals. They suggested that the farmers base the appeal on a technicality: that underground water is an "article of commerce."

Dudden assigned Ed Steenburg, his newest employe who had just graduated from Creighton Law School in Omaha, to spend the next month drafting the application to the court.

It was Steenburg's first case, and he worked 16-hour days and seven-day weeks, with Dudden going over one draft after another until at last the job was done. The application was filed under Dudden's name since Steenburg hadn't yet practiced the required three years to take a case to the high court.

On Nov. 28, 1981, Dudden received a call from a small Colorado weekly, The Yuma Pioneer, asking for reaction to a wire service report that the Supreme Court had agreed to hear the case. He thought it was a mistake. Then came a call from The Denver Post, and he began to believe it. Ten days later a post card arrived from the Supreme Court saying: "Sporhase vs. Nebraska. Probable jurisdiction noted."

Officials in western and midwestern states and almost every interest group that uses their water reacted with alarm. Seventeen briefs were filed in opposition to the farmers, only one in favor.

The abstruse argument that water was an article of commerce was obviously an explosive one. Western states have treated water differently from every other natural resource because of its importance to life.

They have divided the region's rivers and streams among themselves through complex formulas; sanctioned by the Supreme Court and interstate compacts. They have further divided their own water supplies among farmers, businesses, towns, wildlife, forests and other "beneficial uses."

Now Sporhase was arguing that water was part of the interstate commerce system, subject to regulation from Washington.

The briefs filed against Sporhase give a glimpse of what was at stake. A group of farmers called it a potential vehicle for the energy industry to siphon off water needed for agriculture; environmentalists saw in it a threat to state conservation programs that protect wildlife and forests; railroad interests perceived a boost to interstate coal pipelines—projects that need thousands of gallons of water and that threaten to break the rail lines' hold on the coal transportation business.

The only brief filed on the Sporhase-Moss side came from El Paso, which wants to pipe water from nearby New Mexico to meet its development demands but faces a New Mexico law similar to Nebraska's.

While the West debated these sweeping issues, the two farmers anxiously waited.

The hearing was scheduled for March 30, a Tuesday, but the Sporhases and the Mosses, the Duddens and the Steenburgs arrived on the Friday before. Dudden's father flew in from Phoenix. His son came down from Pennsylvania State University. Spor-hase's two granddaughters came along, as did some of his neighbors from Holyoke.

Joy Sporhase and his clan had never before been to Washington, and they spent the next three days on a nonstop tourist whirl. They took pictures of everything, later placing the snapshots in a brown leather scrapbook, which sits next to their Bible on the living room coffee table. At the front of the book is a picture of the Sporhases and their grandchildren standing on the front steps of the Supreme Court.

Joy Sporhase say he will never forget how he felt walking into the court's hearing room that morning. "It was the first time I ever had knots in my stomach and I'm not even scared of the devil," he said. "You just sat there and said to yourself: Here you are, clear at the top."

After the hearing, Sporhase and Moss went home to their farm to tend their fields of dryland wheat, the crop they substituted for irrigated corn and beans after their water was cut off. In the western states, officials and interest groups awaited the decision as if it was a verdict.

The July 2 ruling was not as broad as some opponents had feared, or as some supporters had hoped. The court did conclude that water is an article of interstate commerce, meaning Nebraska cannot ban its export to Colorado, throwing into doubt similar provisions in a dozen other states.

But the 7-to-2 ruling upheld the rest of Nebraska's water law, including the state's right to regulate water use to ensure conservation. The justices said a state still could ban water exports if the ban is "narrowly tailored" to the goal of conserving water.

For Joy Sporhase, that was plenty. But for most western state officials it was too much.

"Ouch!" was the reaction of Nebraska Gov. Charles Thone. Officials predicted a flood of spinoff lawsuits, one for each time a state denies water exports in the name of conservation. The conservation programs in some states are so sketchy that officials said they will have trouble defending export bans even if they are justified.

About a dozen legislatures now are considering new or amended water laws, and some environmentalists have predicted optimistically that the ruling could lead to more sophisticated conservation programs throughout the region.

The anxiety comes in part from what David Aiken, a water law specialist at the University of Nebraska, calls the specter of "a full social and political transformation." If water is part of interstate commerce, several officials asked, will it eventually be put on the market for the highest bidder? How can farmers compete with oil companies? Will farmland eventually go out of production?

"For every water right sold to an energy company, the agrcultural base is reduced, the political influence of farmers declines," Aiken said.

Attorneys for the energy industry said they see no dramatic transformation from Sporhase, although several said the case fits into the pattern of changes reshaping the West.

Edward W. Clyde of Salk Lake City, who has practiced water law for four decades, said the case improves the position of coal pipelines and other energy interests "only slight;" since a welter of other legal hurdles remain. He said he does not expect Congress to invoke the ruling to intervene in state water regulation.

Sporhase still hasn't received a permit to irrigate his Colorado acres. The court sent the case back to Nebraska with instructions to remove the export ban from the state's water law. Until that is done, state officials contend they cannot authorize Sporhase to pump water out of Nebraska. The farmer is considering a return trip to court.

On a recent day, Sporhase drove out to his well and parked his pickup on the state line. The sprinkler sat idle on the Colorado side, amid a field of dry wheat stubble. The well sat idle on the Nebraska side, overgrown with sunflowers and firebrush weeds.

Sporhase stood on the state line, leaned against his truck with the bumper sticker "Farmers Feed America. Do You?" and looked with pride and some consternation at his well.

"The day we stood up here at that auction and bid on this land," he said, "who ever would've thought we'd get into all this?"●

FULL CONSIDERATION DESERVED

HON. GUY VANDER JAGT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have learned that positive action now is being reported on H.R. 5133, more popularly known as local or domestic content legislation. It is my understanding that the House Committee on Energy and Commerce is expected momentarily to report the bill and refer it to our Subcommittee on Trade of the House Committee on Ways and Means for further hearings. Of equal importance, Chairman SAM GIBBONS, of the Subcommittee on Trade, has strongly indicated his willingness to call hearings on the measure as quickly as possible.

As my colleagues know, this legislation has particular meaning and impact on our automobile industry and, of course, on all of our autoworkers. At the same time, grave doubts have been raised as to the overall effect of this legislation and the distinct possibility of retaliatory trade restrictions by overseas trading partners in other areas of our economy.

We do have the benefit of exhaustive studies on this issue. Among others, one is by the United Auto Workers (UAW); another by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, as well as our own Congressional Budget Office. In recent days, another comprehensive study has been completed by the Heritage Foundation here in Washington. The uniqueness of the Heritage study is that it comments on and includes pertinent points from the other major studies mentioned above.

Because this is an issue which the House quite likely will consider before adjournment, I strongly recommend each Member obtain a copy of the Heritage Foundation report from their Washington office.

On a more personal basis, let me mention—simply to emphasize the importance of this legislation—a very recent experience of mine. During my annual congressional mobile office tour in our Ninth Congressional District, I scheduled a number of visits to communities within Muskegon County. At each of these stops, a large group of citizens representing the UAW made their presence known and their support of this legislation. They, in essence, were "petitioning" their Congressman in behalf of this bill. They did so, let me stress, in the finest tradition. They were courteous, they were determined, and they were effective. The plight of our autoworkers is real and is great. Auto imports have had a tremendous impact on one of our Nation's great industries. It is time—past time really—for this Congress to consider this issue.

I am pleased, therefore, that further hearings are planned and I am pleased that the House leadership intends, according to its announcements, to move swiftly. I admit that I have reservations as to the possible effects of this legislation on other workers and other businesses—but only hearings will clarify this matter.

One final comment, and that is I further understand that the original bill, H.R. 5133, has just recently been greatly altered by its chief sponsor, Congressman RICHARD OTTINGER, so that the new version would make compliance "fairer and more realistic" for foreign-based companies. A Detroit News article on this development also is included:

[From the Detroit News, Sept. 3, 1982]

TIMETABLE REVAMPED—DOMESTIC-CONTENT AUTO BILL EASED

(By John E. Peterson)

WASHINGTON.—The chief sponsor of a UAW-backed bill aimed at prodding foreign auto makers to build U.S. plants is easing some of the measure's requirements.

Rep. Richard L. Ottinger, D-N.Y., unveiled a substitute "domestic content" bill yesterday that he hopes will win House passage before the fall elections. The bill, however, apparently has little chance in the Senate.

Ottinger said the new version would make compliance "fairer and more realistic" for foreign-based companies such as Volkswagen and Honda that are committed to high-volume U.S. production.

Yet Ottinger's revised bill, if enacted, would force Japan's Toyota and Nissan (Datsun) to transfer much of their production to the United States or reduce the levels of their U.S. sales.

The original domestic-content bill would have required companies with annual U.S. sales of 500,000 or more cars to produce 90 percent of their value in the United States by 1985.

The new bill, drafted by Ottinger after consultations with UAW President Douglas Fraser, would delay the 90-percent requirement to 1986 and apply it only to companies selling 900,000 or more cars and light trucks a year in the United States.

Under the earlier bill, companies with annual sales of between 100,000 or 200,000 vehicles would have needed 25 percent U.S. content and those with sales between 200,000 to 500,000 would have needed 75 percent. The new bill would require 1 percentage point of domestic content for each 10,000 units sold, starting at 10 percent for 100,000 units.

At present sales levels, only general Motors, Ford and Chrysler would have to build cars with 90 percent local content, and they already do, said an Ottinger aide.

But Toyota and Nissan would have to increase the American-made parts in their U.S.-sold cars from the current 5 percent to nearly 75 percent by 1986 to maintain their present U.S. sales levels.

Though the Senate is likely to defeat the measure and President Reagan probably would veto it if it reached his desk, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill of Massachusetts has urged fellow Democratic leaders to secure passage before the November elections, according to knowledgeable Capitol Hill sources.

"Tip is convinced that passage of this bill will allow a number of vulnerable Democratic members from industrialized areas to pick up enough added votes to put them over the top," one O'Neill aide said. "Even though Senate passage is doubtful, they'll be able to go home and say, 'Look, we're trying to do something to get people back to work.' "

The bill's chances of Senate passage, however, "are just about nonexistent," said an aide to Democrat Wendell Ford of Kentucky, the measure's chief sponsor in the Senate.●

LEGISLATION INTRODUCED TO ESTABLISH A UNIFORM TARIFF SCHEDULE CLASSIFICATION AND DUTY RATE FOR IDENTICAL CORDAGE PRODUCTS

HON. DON BAILEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in recent years, the volume of importations into the United States of foreign-made cordage products has substantially increased, adversely affecting and injuring the United States cordage industry. This increase is due, in part, to the preferred tariff treatment accorded certain of these products because of an inadvertent and unintentional discrepancy in the custom laws. Because of this discrepancy, importations of plastic cordage (polypropylene, polyolefins, and copolymers) of identical characteristics and uses are classified under differing tariff schedule categories at substantially differing duty rates.

Cordage manufactured from plastic material which falls within the dimensional requirements of a strip is classified as "cordage." However, if the cordage is manufactured from plastic materials over 1 inch in width, such materials cease to be considered as textile fibers. Instead, it is considered as plastic and so classified under the tariff schedules. The reason behind this difference in classification is that the current definition of "cordage," as contained in schedule 3, part 2, headnote 1(a), restricts "cordage" to ". . . assemblages of textile fibers or yarns . . ." Importations of cordage manufactured from plastic material over 1 inch in width cannot be considered, under the dimensional requirements imposed for strips, as " . . . assemblages of textile fibers or yarns . . ." and, therefore cannot be classified as "cordage." Consequently, such cordage made from plastic material is classified by the Customs Service under schedule 7, part 12, subpart D, item 774.55 as "Articles Not Specially Provided for of Rubber or Plastics: Other" at a duty rate of 7.3 percent ad valorem.

The result is that two identical importations of polypropylene cordage of identical characteristics and use are classified under differing tariff schedule categories at substantially differing duty rates merely because one product was manufactured from plastic material over 1 inch in width while the other was not. The following two letters from the U.S. Customs Service clarify the basis for the difference in classification.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
U.S. CUSTOMS SERVICE,
Washington, D.C. April 28, 1982.

DEAR —— ——: This is in reply to your letter of January 27, 1982, concerning the tariff status of certain polypropylene twine. Five samples were submitted.

Each of the samples was submitted to our laboratory for analysis. Each was composed of polypropylene film which had been fibrillated and then twisted. All five samples were under 0.01 inch in thickness. Two of the samples, 375 Natural and 450 Natural, were determined to have been made from strips over 1 inch in width. The other three samples were determined to have been made from strips which were under 1 inch in width.

Headnote 3(c), Subpart 1E, Schedule 3, Tariff Schedules of the United States (TSUS), defines the term "plexiform filaments" as flexible filaments each of which consists of a network or plexus of fine fibers and which are suitable for the manufacture of textiles. All five samples are considered to be plexiform filaments. This office has previously ruled that plexiform filaments which are derived from strips over 1 inch in width do not constitute textile materials for tariff purposes.

Merchandise as represented by the three samples of twine which are derived from plastic strips 1 inch or less in width are classifiable under the provision for cordage of man-made fibers, measuring under 3⅛₆ inch in diameter, in item 316.55, TSUS, with duty at the column 1 rate of 10 cents per pound plus 13.8 percent ad valorem. Merchandise as represented by the two samples which are dervied from plastic strips over 1 inch in width are classifiable under the provision for other articles not specially provided for, of plastics, in item 774.55, TSUS, with duty at the column 1 rate 7.3 percent ad valorem. Merchandise classifiable in item 774.55, TSUS, may be entitled to duty-free entry under the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP), if a product of Taiwan, upon compliance with all applicable regulations.

For your information, the procedure whereby an American manufacturer petitions the Commissioner of Customs to change the classification of certain merchandise is set out in section 516, Tariff Act of 1930, as amended (19 U.S.C. 1516). Copies of this law and the relevant Customs Regulations are enclosed. If you believe that the classifications above are not correct, you may take action under section 516(a) of this law.

Sincerely,

HARVEY B. FOX,
Director, Classification and Value Division.

Enclosure.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
U.S. CUSTOMS SERVICE,
New York, N.Y., February 11, 1982.

DEAR —— ——: In your letter of January 22, 1982, you requested the tariff classification for polypropylene twine from Portugal, Korea, or Taiwan.

Five samples of polypropylene twine, ranging form 375 to 1100 feet per pound, were submitted with your inquiry. The twine is produced from extruded polypropylene film which has been slit into strips. These strips are then fibrillated and twisted into cordage.

The tariff classification of this type of merchandise is determined by the dimensions of the individual strips prior to fibrillation. Cordage which is produced from strips not over one inch in width is considered to be of man-made fiber textile material. Strips which are over one inch are considered plastic for tariff purposes. As it is quite difficult to determine the exact original width of a strip after it has been fully fibrillated, we cannot state with absolute certainty which of your samples fall into each category. We would therefore suggest that you check with your suppliers to ascertain the exact width of the strips prior to fibrillation.

After examining each of the five items, it is our opinion that at least three of the samples are produced from strips under one inch in width. If this is in fact the case, then samples (C) 900 natural, (D) 1000 black, and (E) 1100 hemp are classified under the provision for cordage of man-made fibers measuring under 9/16 inch in diameter, in item 316.55, Tariff Schedules of the United States, with duty at 10 cents per pound plus 13.8 percent ad valorem.

Due to the larger size and extensive fibrillation of items (A) 375 natural and (B) 450 natural, we are unable to determine the width of the strips from which these samples were produced. If strips under one inch were fibrillated, then classification would be under TSUS item 316.55, as discussed above. However, if these two twines are produced from polypropylene strips over one inch in width, they are classifiable under the provision for articles not specifically provided for, of plastics, in item 774.55, TSUS, and dutiable at 7.3 percent ad valorem.

Cordage of man-made fibers may be subject to import restraints (quotas) based on international trade agreements. Import restraints are imposed by the U.S. Customs Service under directives of the Committee for the Implementation of Textile Agreements, U.S. Department of Commerce, Washington, D.C. 20230. Polypropylene twine, produced in Korea of Taiwan and classified in TSUS item 316.55, requires a visa for category 605. Due to the changeable nature of these restraints, you are advised to contact your local Customs office prior to importation of this merchandise to determine the current status of such restraints.

Articles classifiable under item 774.55, TSUS, which are the products of Portugal or Korea are entitled to duty free treatment under the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) upon compliance with all applicable regulations. Taiwan is currently excluded from this duty exemption. However, the recently published ten month figures for items included under GSP indicate that, effective March 31, 1982, Taiwan may regain its duty-free status for tariff item 774.55.

This ruling is being issued under the provisions of Section 177.1(a)(1) of the Customs Regulations [19 C.F.R. 177.1(a)(1)].

Sincerely,

JOHN J. MARTUGE,
Area Director, New York Seaport.

Foreign manufacturers have taken full advantage of this discrepancy in the Customs laws. They have been certain that the cordage they produce for export to the United States is constructed of plastic material over 1 inch in width in order to obtain the advantages of the lower duty rates. As a consequence, they are afforded an unfair economic advantage over the domestic cordage industry. The situation is further aggravated by the fact that item 774.55 receives General Systems of Preferences treatment. This means that importations of cordage entering under item 774.55 from certain designated beneficiary countries receive duty-free status. Additionally, there are quota restrictions on cordage entered under Items 316.55, 316.58, 348.00, and 348.05, but no quota restrictions on cordage entered under item 774.55. Therefore, not only is the foreign manufacturer receiving the benefits of a lower duty or no duty for cordage made from plastic material entered under item 774.55, but he is also totally circumventing the quota restrictions imposed on other item categories.

It does not appear that such diverse and inequitable treatment was intended by the Congress when the tariff schedules were drafted, particularly when its direct effect is to seriously harm the United States cordage industry. The legislation I am introducing today will remedy this unfair situation. The legislation will amend the tariff schedules and result in all like cordage made from plastic material to be identically classified at the same duty rate regardless of the dimensions of the plastic material from which it is manufactured. The changes required in the tariff schedules are minor and will have the sole effect of affording all like importations of cordage identical treatment by the Customs Service. I urge my colleagues to join me in correcting the unfair treatment afforded the U.S. cordage industry under the U.S. tariff schedule.

I have included the text of the bill and ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the conclusion of my introductory statement.

The material follows:

H.R. 7107

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) in recent years various cordage products of virtually identical characteristics and use have been and are being imported into the United States;

(2) due to an insignificant variation in the size of the material from which these cordage products are manufactured, such products may be and have been imported under distinctly different classifications in the Tariff Schedules of the United States carrying substantially differend duty rates;

(3) the dimensions of the material from which the cordage products are manufactured has no effect on the finished products in terms of overall characteristics or use, and the finished products as imported into the United States are identical;

(4) in the drafting of such Tariff Schedules it was not the intention of Congress to have two identical products classified under varying provisions of the Tariff Schedules at differing duty rates;

(5) foreign manufacturers of cordage have been and are using this discrepancy in the Tariff Schedules to enter their products into the commerce of the United States at duty rates lower than those intended for cordage products;

(6) such action by foreign manufacturers has resulted in serious and substantial economic harm and injury to the United States cordage industry; and

(7) immediate measures are required to rectify this inequitable situation in the Tariff Schedules and to prevent further harm to the United States cordage industry.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to provide for identical classification and duty rates under the Tariff Schedules of the United States for importation of cordage products which are identical in character but which may have been manufactured from like materials of varying dimensions.

SEC. 2. AMENDMENTS TO TARIFF SCHEDULES.

(a) Part 2 of schedule 3 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States is amended—

(1) by amending headnote 1(a) thereto by inserting "plastics or man-made materials," immediately after "assembleges of textile fiber or yarns,"; and

(2) by amending the superior heading to items 316.55 and 316.58 by inserting", Plastics or other man-made materials" immediately after "Of man-made fibers".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) shall apply with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, on or after the 15th day after the enactment of this Act, but not before October 1, 1982.●

HUMAN RIGHTS IN SOUTH AFRICA

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 15, 1982

● Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, we have heard nothing but assurances from the Reagan administration and the South African Government that human rights conditions are improving in South Africa.

In fact, when the Ad Hoc Monitoring Group on Southern Africa wrote to South African Ambassador Sole about the admission of several detainees into the psychiatric ward of a Durban hospital, he intimated that the hospitalization was the result of a conspiracy to give publicity to conditions of detention, and that the detainees had faked their illness.

Yet others disagree. Last week, I received a letter from an organization called the Detainees' Parents Support Committee. This group is composed of parents who are trying to find out why their children have been detained by the South African police. They wrote in refutation of Ambassador Sole's letter.

So that the whole story is told, I would like to have this document inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

JOHANNESBURG,
August 24, 1982.

Congressman THOMAS DOWNEY,
U.S. Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR, We beg to refer to a letter sent to you some months back by the then South African Ambassador to your country, Mr. Donald Sole, dealing with the state of health of Political Detainees in South Africa and in which he claimed that most detainees had "faked" ill-health.

In refutation of this allegation this Committee drew up a carefully researched document setting out the truth of the matter. This memorandum was duly forwarded to you through Consular channels, but we have been given to understand that it has not reached you. We now therefore send you this enclosed copy direct through the post, and will also have it channelled through the American Press.

The recent death in detention of Mr. Moabi Dipale, after only three or four days in the hands of the Security Police underscores this issue sufficiently not to require any further comments.

Yours faithfully,

(For the D.P.S.C.)

[Memorandum]

REPLY TO THE SOUTH AFRICAN AMBASSADOR AT WASHINGTON, MR. DONALD SOLE, CONCERNING THE HEALTH OF DETAINEES

PREAMBLE

Prominent American politicians expressed concern at the conditions of incarceration of detainees held for interrogation by the South African Police. This followed the death in detention of Dr. Neil Aggett on the 5/2/1982 and the hospitalization of a number of other persons held in solitary confinement in terms of South African security legislation.

On the 12th May, it was reported that Mr. Sole, South African Ambassador to Washington, had released a statement to the effect inter alia that the hospitalizations of detainees were as a result of a conspiracy by unnamed persons to give publicity to conditions of detention and that the detainees had faked their illness. (Rand Daily Mail 12/5/82)

This Memorandum deals with the following:

(1) The source of the information supplied to Mr. Sole.

(2) The medical ethics involved in the release of the "information" contained in the statement.

(3) The inaccuracy of the contents of the said statement.

(4) The effects of solitary confinement on the health of a detainee.

(5) The request for an independent inquiry into the medical condition of the particular detainees mentioned in Mr. Sole's statement, as well as the medical treatment of detainees generally.

1. MR. SOLE'S SOURCE

The source of Mr. Sole's information was revealed in Parliament by Mr. Pik Botha, Minister of Foreign Affairs, on 20.5.82. He informed Parliament that Mr. Sole had obtained his information from the South African Police, the very agency which was responsible for the detention and interrogation of the detainees. (The Star, 20.5.82)

2. THE DISCLOSURE OF THE MEDICAL STATE OF DETAINEES

2.1 On March 5th, 1982 the Minister of Justice informed Parliament that it was questionable whether it was ethically justifiable "to publicly discuss" the psychiatric condition of detainees. (Hansard, 5.3.82, Column 23). The Department of Health has itself stated that "Permission for the disclosure of a diagnosis may be given only by the patient, next of kin or the medical practitioner in Court under protest". ("Special Areas of Primary Health", p. 33)

2.2 Mr. Sole's statement represents a turnabout on the part of the South African Government. In summary, representatives of the South African Government have seen fit to publicly disclose confidential medical information, which information was based on reports given to them by the Security Police. That this information itself has been refuted by the medical practitioners involved in treating the detainees, underscore the unreliability of the source of the information.

3. THE INACCURACY OF MR. SOLE'S STATEMENT

Mr. Sole's allegations are refuted as follows:

3.1 Mr. Sole alleged that the detainees were all hospitalized at almost the same time, which was when they had access to their families. Furthermore, Mr. Sole stated that there was a conspiracy to highlight mental illness which coincided with a campaign by the detainees relatives to publicise the conditions under which the detainees were being held.

In reply it must be pointed out that:

(a) all communications between detainees and relatives were supervised and controlled by, and in the presence of Security Police;

(b) the dates of hospitalization reveal no pattern of simultaneous hospitalization. The detainees referred to by Mr. Sole were hospitalised on dates which range from 20.11.81 to 16.3.82;

(c) some of those hospitalised received no family visits;

(d) the Parents' Support Committee reject strongly the suggestion that they conspired to induce their children to fake mental illness;

(e) it was the world wide concern at the death of Dr. Neil Aggett which induced the authorities to refer certain detainees to hospital who should have been taken there earlier.

(f) it is difficut to conceive of a conspiracy between the detainees who were held incommunicado in separate prisons up to 600 kilometers apart.

3.2 Mr. Sole has stated that 7 of the 9 detainees were faking mental illness. He stated in one instance that a psychiatrist could find nothing seriously wrong with detainees Mr. Pravin Gordhan and Mr. Sam Kikine. However, the psychiatrist, Dr. C. S. Levisohn, who treated these detainees has refuted this claim. He has stated that he could not understand where Mr. Sole had obtained his information for this was not what he had reported to the District Surgeon or the Commissioner of Police. (Natal Mercury 15.5.82) As Mrs. Gordhan has stated "The fact that Pravin was . . . admitted for psychiatric treatment by doctors appointed by the State is sufficient evidence of the truth." (Rand Daily Mail, 13.5.82).

3.3 Another example cited by Mr. Sole is that of Thozamile Gqeta, whom he alleges was released because of his mental condition and yet was able to continue his activities without let up or any sign of mental disturbance.

Mr. Gqeta, a prominent trade unionist, was detained on several occasions in 1980 and 1981. On some of these occasions he was maltreated and kept in solitary confinement for long periods of time. In October 1981 his mother and Uncle were killed when their house was burnt down under sinister circumstances. When Mr. Gqeta and his girlfriend were returning from his mother's funeral, she was shot dead by Ciskei Police. Shortly afterwards, he was detained yet again. It was at this point that he suffered such severe depression that doctors opposed his continued detention. When his brother visited him in hospital he reported that Thozamile was unrecognizable. A spokesman for the South African Allied Workers Union, (SAAWU) stated (22.5.1982) that when Mr. Gqweta was released, his mental condition was so poor, he received extensive and regular psychiatric treatment. He was too weak to continue his work for the union even had he wished to.

3.4 With regard Mrs. Levitan, Mr. Sole implies that she too faked mental illness and that "A psychiatrist indicated he could find little wrong with her." However, Mrs. Levitan was never admitted to a psychiatric ward, but was hospitalized twice as a result of a physical complaint.

3.5 In his disclosure, Mr. Sole stated that "Mrs. Mbatha suffered from high blood pressure (she is very obese) and has been treated in hospital for this condition". This statement is inaccurate. The facts of Mrs. Mbatha's illness are more revealing. In the first instance, Mrs. Mbatha is not obese. She was detained in October 1981. The police compelled her to take her 2 year old child with her. Subsequently, the police forcibly took the child away without revealing where they were going to place her. They taunted Mrs. Mbatha by informing her that the child would be placed in an institution for "Communist children" administered by the Security Police. Later Mrs. Mbatha became ill. Her first request to see a doctor was ignored. Approximately five days later, she was taken to a district surgeon who diagnosed high blood pressure, prescribed medication and instructed the Police to bring Mrs. Mbatha back within a week. The Security Police neglected to administer the medication and to take Mrs. Mbatha back to the district surgeon as instructed.

Mrs. Mbatha's condition deteriorated over the next fortnight until she collapsed suffering inter alia from partial paralysis. Mrs. Mbatha was only hospitalized 5 days later after the district surgeon had seen her condition. While she was in the hospital, the Security Police threatened her and accused her of shamming.

3.6 Mr. Sole claims that "detainees are able to give the utmost publicity to what in most cases turned out to be unfounded claims of illness."

In reply, we must point out that—

(a) the State has enacted legislation which serves to prevent detainees, their relatives and the press from giving publicity to the conditions of detention, the health of a detainee, or the methods of interrogation. (The Police Act, The Terrorism Act, the Prisons Act.) In terms of Section 6 of the Terrorism Act not even a parent is entitled to know if a detainee has been hospitalized. To us, the major cause for concern is not the publicity given to the conditions of detainees, but on the contrary, the secrecy surrounding their detentions.

(b) There is no public access to the complaints made by the detainee to the police, the Inspector, the magistrate or the district surgeon. Until such access exists there can be no guarantee that the detainee's complaints will be acted upon. The case of Mrs. Mbatha is evidence of the potential for neglect where the detainee is dependent on the will of her captors to see that he or she receives medical attention. This would appear to be aggravated where the authorities' attitude, as exemplified by the attitude of Mr. Sole's informants, is one of skepticism towards the complaints of detainees.

3.7 Mr. Sole states that the comparison between the treatment of detainees in South Africa and the use of psychiatric hospitals followed by other countries is not relevant.

We believe that this assertion should be qualified. In the first place we would point out that the clinical independence of the doctor treating a detainee patient has not been accepted by the South African Authorities. A detainee has no right to see a doctor of his choice. Even a decision of the State appointed doctor concerning the medical treatment of a detainee may be overruled by the Security Police. (See the record on the Biko inquest). Furthermore, communications between the detainee and the doctor have been relayed back to the Security Police.

Secondly we believe that the widespread use of detention in solitary confinement for long periods of time with or without exposure to the Security Police's methods of interrogation can have, and has had, profound psychological effects on the human mind. It is artificial to distinguish this form of mental treatment on the basis that it does not take place in a hospital. Such treatment is no less sinister because it takes place in a police station and detainees are merely treated in a hospital.

As regards the coupling of solitary confinement with drastic methods of interrogation, we refer to the words of the legal representative instructed by the Minister of Law and order. Mr. Schabort opposed the publication of a statement made by Dr. Neil Aggett 14 hours before he died, and in which he stated that he had been blindfolded, punched, kicked, electrically shocked and kept awake for days at a time. Mr. Schabort argued that publication of this statement was not in the national interest because it "would disclose the working methods and techniques of the Security Police". (The Star, 3.6.1982)

4. SOLITARY CONFINEMENT AND MENTAL HEALTH

4.1 The implications of Mr. Sole's statement are that solitary confinement per se poses no threat and has no effect on mental health. This view is shared by the Minister of Law and Order, Mr. Le Grange, who has stated in Parliament that solitary confinement is not mental torture. It should be pointed out here that solitary confinement for lengthy periods up to and sometimes exceeding a year is widespread practice in South Africa. Its use is mostly confined to persons detained without charge under legislation dealing with the 'security of the State'. (See 'Report on the Report of the Rabie Commission'—Centre for Applied Legal Studies—page 102.)

4.2 Professor C. J. Vorster of the Rand Afrikaans University does not share the view of the Minister of Law and Order. He has stated that solitary confinement is a severe form of mental torture. (Rand Daily Mail 11.2.1982) Professor Vorster stated that it is accepted worldwide amongst academics that solitary confinement or stimulus deprivation is at the same level as physical torture. Professor S. J. Saunders, Principal of the University of Cape Town, has stated "there is absolutely no doubt whatsoever that solitary confinement such as that experienced by detainees held in South Africa under Section 6 of the Terrorism Act, may result and frequently will result in serious psychological changes which will impair the detainee's ability to arrive at the truth" This view is shared by Professors Albino and Mathews of Natal University. ('The permanence of the temporary' SALJ, 1 966, p.23)

The Viljoen Commission of Inquiry into the Penal System of South Africa described solitary confinement and spare diet "as a form of punishment which cannot be tolerated in a civilized society."

4.3 Professor Vorster reviewing literature on the effects of solitary confinement has said that the effects of this treatment include hallucinations, disorientation, anxiety, delusions, susceptibility to persuasion or propaganda, and severe depression. (Rand Daily Mail, 11.2.82)

5. REJECTION OF MR. SOLE'S STATEMENT AND THE CALL FOR AN INDEPENDENT INQUIRY INTO THE TREATMENT OF DETAINEES

Mr. Sole's statement ought to be rejected in the first instance because of its inaccuracy and the unrealiability of its source and secondly because it implies that detention in solitary confinement is not a threat to the mental health of detainees. In this way, the South African Police and Mr. Sole seek to justify its prevalent use.

The detainees concerned see Mr. Sole's allegations in a serious light and accordingly have agreed, together with their doctors, to publicly refute Mr. Sole's allegations and to grant access to their medical records to any independent inquiry which wishes to establish the correctness of Mr. Sole's allegations. However, it is not only the cases of these particular detainees that need to be examined, but the practice of solitary confinement in South Africa and the existence or otherwise of adequate safeguards to guarantee the safety and health of detainees. The media has drawn attention to the tragic death of Dr. Neil Aggett. However, Neil Aggett was not the first person to die while detained under Security Legislation in recent years. He was the 50th.

APPENDIX

Medical Access to the Detainees:

(1) Only State appointed doctors have access to detainees.

(2) The detainee has no choice in what doctor he may see. After the death in detention of Dr. Neil Aggett, the Detainees Parents' Support Committee and its Health sub-Commission demanded that an independent panel of doctors chosen by the DPSC have the right of access to all detainees. The State refused to accede to this demand.

(3) There is not enforceable right by relatives of detainees to information relating to the health of the detainee.

(4) There is no routine psychiatric examination of persons held in solitary confinement.

(5) There is no guarantee that a decision by a doctor will not be overruled by the Security Police.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, September 16, 1982, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.
